Thus ſaith the Lord: the prophet which of arrogancie will propheſie in my name thoſe things I haue not commanded him, or elſe will propheſie in the name of other gods, let him bee ſlaine. And if thou ſhalt ſay with thy ſelfe, How ſhall I know what thing it is that the Lord hath not commanded to be ſpoken? This token ſhalt thou haue to know it by: Whatſoeuer thing the prophet in the name of God ſhall propheſie, and the ſame come not to paſſe, that maieſt thou be ſure the Lord hath not ſpoken, but the prophet hath imagined through the hautines of his own mind, & therfore thou ſhalt not be afraid of him.

The emperor preſerued by the power of God from the pope.

When the time was expired that Hildebrand in his diuination had ſet, & that neither the king was dead, neither the power of the empire empaired: and fearing leſt by the words of his owne mouth he ſhould be reprehended & condemned, ſubtilly hee turned his tale, ſaying, and perſuading the ignorant people that he ment not of the body of the king but of his ſoule: as though the ſoule of the king had loſt all, ſauing ſix of his knights or ſouldiers, or elſe had been dead during that ſpace: and thus by theſe ſleights he beguiled the ignorant people. Againſt ſuch peophets S. Gregory vpon Ezechiel ſaith: Between true prophets and falſe this difference there is, that true prophets, if they ſpeake any thing vpon their owne mind, they be ſoone rebuked: but the falſe prophets, both they tell lies, and not hauing the ſpirit of truth, they perſeuere in their falſitie.

A ſubtill ſhift of Hildebrand to ſaue his lying propheſie.

Three perſons before they were conuict, put to execution by Hildebrand againſt all law.

Ouer and beſide, the ſaid Hildebrand iudged to death three men before they were conuict, or elſe confeſſed their crime, without the ſentence of any ſecular iudge, and cauſed them to be hanged vpon a paire of gallowes, ouer againſt the church of S. Peter in a place called Palatiolum, without any delay or aduiſement, contrarie to the lawes which command that euery publike offender ſhould haue thirtie daies ſpace before hee bee put to execution. Which thing euen amongſt the pagans is in vre and obſerued, as teacheth the authoritie of S. Ambroſe, and the martyrdome of holy Marcellianus and Marcus.

Centius taken by the pope, and put into a barrell of nailes.

The pope taken of Centius.

Centius executed by the pope contrary to promiſe and faith.

He caſt Centius the ſonne of Stephan the alderman into priſon, being before his truſtie friend; and in a veſſell being thicke ſet with ſharpe nailes, he tormented him to the point of death, who after that he was eſcaped, apprehended the ſaid Hildebrand. Of this apprehenſion before he was ſet at libertie, he openly forgaue all the conſpirators. Which thing afterwards, contrarie to his fidelity, he brake and reuenged, & cauſed Centius to whom he had forgiuen all offences, to be taken, & hanged him & nine of his mē vpon the gallowes before S. Peters porch.

The villanie of the pope in killing a widowes ſonne which before had done his penance.

There was at the apprehenſion of pope Hildebrand, a certaine widowes ſonne, to whom (and others more for their penance) hee inioyned a yeares baniſhment. Which time being expleat or run out, the widow in token of more ample ſatisfaction, thinking thereby to haue appeaſed the minde of Hildebrand, put a halter about hir ſons necke, and drawing hir ſonne by the rope vnto the foot of Hildebrand, ſaid: My lord pope at your hands will I receiue againe my ſon, which one whole yere hath indured baniſhment and other penance by your holineſſe inioyned. Then the ſaid Hildebrand for that inſtant, becauſe of thoſe which were with him in companie (diſſembling his wrath) deliuered hir hir ſonne very churliſhly, ſaying: Get thee hence woman I bid thee, and let me be in reſt. After this he ſent his officers and apprehended the widowes ſon, and gaue commandement to the iuſtices to put him to death: who all together making anſwere, ſaid, that they could no more condemne or meddle with him, for that he had for his crime committed appealed once to the pope, and abidden the baniſhment, and done the penance by him inioyned. Hereupon this glorious Hildebrand diſpleaſed with the iudges, cauſed the foot of the widowes ſon to be cut off: making neither repentance, nor the lawes and ordinances to bee of any eſtimation with him: and thus his foot being cut off, he died within three daies after with the paine therof. Many other wicked deeds did this Hildebrand, vpon whom the blood of the church crieth vengeance, ſhed by the ſword (that is) the miſerable trecherie of his tongue: for which things (and that iuſtly) the church refuſed to communicate with him. Hæc Benno.

An other epiſtle of Benno to the cardinals.

An other letter of Benno.

TO the reuerend fathers of the church of Rome, and to his beloued in Chriſt, and to his brethren that ſhall for euer be beloued, Benno the cardinall of the church of Rome wiſheth faithfull ſeruice, health and communion with the ſeruants of the catholike church. Of the which communion, diſcipline, and power he vainely braggeth, that by the preſumption of his authority ſhall vniuſtly bind or loſe any maner of perſon. And he doth vniuſtly bind whatſoeuer he be, that curſeth any man (being willing to make ſatisfaction and bewailing his boldneſſe, being alſo vnconuict, and not confeſſing the crime) but rather curſing that partie in vaine, hee curſeth and condemneth himſelfe, turning his weapon vpon his owne perſon to his deſtruction. O ſtrange and new found trecherie proceeding from the ſanctuarie, nay rather from him which as high prieſt ſeemeth to rule the church, and to be a iudge ouer the iudges!

Hilde-

Digitized by Google

A diuelliſh practiſe of Hildebrand in ſetting the biſhops againſt the emperor.

Hildebrand was earneſtly in hand with the emperor, that he ſhould depriue thoſe biſhops, which came in by ſimonie. The emperor (thinking as a zealous prince, that this commiſſion had proceeded from the throne of God) without delay obeyed the ſame, and forthwith without any conſideration, or iudiciall order, depriued certaine biſhops, and thought that by this his obedience to Hildebrand he offered an acceptable ſacrifice to God, not knowing the craftie handling of him. But Hildebrand then againe placed thoſe, whom the emperor for ſimony at his commandement had before depoſed, and thoſe whom by that meanes he made to beare a hatefull heart to the emperor, he reconciled againe vnto himſelfe in great familiaritie, and by many and great othes taken of them, for their fidelitie towards him, he promoted aboue all the reſt. And thus by theſe pranks, the imperiall ſeate of the king being ſhortly after impaired, and deſtitute almoſt of friends, hee craftilie purchaſing the friendſhip and fauor of the greateſt princes, the better to bring his matters to paſſe: ſuddenly againe, without any lawfull acculation, without any canonicall vocation, without all iudiciall order, excommunicated the emperor (ſo obedient alwaies vnto him) and ſet the princes of the empire all againſt him. And notwithſtanding (as the apoſtle ſaith) that no man ought to circumuent his brother in his buſineſſe, as much as in him lay he rather mortified and killed him, then brotherly corrected him. Thus the emperor being many waies circumuented: as, excommunicated beſides the canonicall order, and by the conſent and counſell of Hildebrand, ſpoiled of the greateſt part of his imperiall honor, and ouercharged with great warres and ſlaughters of his owne ſubiects, in vaine deſired hee and ſued for to haue the canon read and heard, cauſing him by force and violence at Canuſium, in the preſence of Hildebrand, to accuſe himſelfe by his owne confeſſion.

The emperor cauſed by Hildebrand to accuſe himſelfe.

Say you now (I pray you) all ſuch as loue iuſtice, and loue not to leane either vpon the left hand, or elſe the right hand, in the fauor of any perſon; ſay your minds, whether that ſuch a confeſſion being forced vpon neuer ſo poore a man (much leſſe vpon an emperor) ought at ſuch a time to be preiudiciall or not? Or whether he which extorted the ſame confeſſion, is guiltie of the canon? Or elſe he, which being ſo peruerſlie iudged, ſuffered the iniurie of a moſt peruerſe iudge? Which alſo moſt patiently & publikely ſuffered this violence with lamentable affliction vpon his bare feet, clothed in thin garments, in the ſharpe winter, which neuer was vſed, and was three daies togither at Canuſium, made a ſpectacle both of angels and men, and a ludibrious mocking ſtocke to that proud Hildebrand. Neuer truſt me, if that fouretéen cardinals, the archdeacon himſelfe, and he that is called Primicerius, being all wiſe and religious men, beſides many other of the clerks of Lateran, to the iudgement and priuiledge of whole holy ſeate the whole world is obedient (weighing and conſidering his intollerable apoſtaſie) departed not from participating, and refuſed from communicating with him.

The great patience of the godly emperor.

This glorious Hildebrand, and his affinitie by their newe authoritie, breaking the decrées of the Chalcedon councell, not onely in words, but alſo in publike writings haue agréed, that it is tollerable both to baptiſe and communicat being out of the church of God: and how blind theſe men were, and alſo what heretiks they be, their owne writings doe declare. What a miſchiefe is this? (ſaith Benno) they preſume to iudge of the church, which ſwarme themſelues in all errors, who alſo eſtéeme the veritie but as a lie; and leſt their poyſoned falſhood both in words and writings ſhould appeare, they haue (like ſubtill poyſoners, the ſoner to deceiue) mired honie therewithall. A lie, ſaith ſaint Auguſtine, is euery thing pronounced with the intent of deceiuing of others.

Mendacium quid.

It were too long and tedious here to recite all the deteſtable doings, and diabolicall practiſes, of coniurings, charmes, and filthie ſorceries, exercciſed betweene him and Laurentius, and Theophylact, otherwiſe named pope Benedict the ninth, whereof a long narration followeth in the foreſaid epiſtle of Benno to the cardinals to be ſéene, to whom the reader may repaire, who ſo hath either leiſure to read or mind to vnderſtand more of the abominable parts and diuelliſh acts of this Hildebrand.

Pope Hildebrand a worker of ſorcerie and coniuring.

Thus hauing ſufficiently alleaged the words and teſtimonies of Benno and Auentinus, concerning the acts and facts of this pope; now let vs procéede (in the order as followeth in his ſtorie) to ſet forth the miſerable veration which the vertuous and godly emperor ſuſteined by that vngodly perſon.

Henricus 4. emperor.

About what time Hildebrand was made pope, Henricus the fourth emperor was incumbred and much vered with ciuill diſſention in Germanie, by reaſon of certaine grieuances of the Saxons againſt him and his father Henricus the third. Wherupon the matter growing to ſedition, ſides were taken, and great warres enſued, betwixt Otho duke of Saxonie, and Henricus the emperor. This buſie time ſéemed to Hildebrand very opportune to worke his feats, whoſe ſtudie and drift was euer from the beginning to aduance the dominion of the Romiſh ſeat aboue all other biſhops, and alſo to preſſe downe the authoritie of the temporall rulers, vnder the ſpirituall men of the church. And although he went about the ſame long before, by ſubtill traines and acts ſet forth concerning ſimonie: yet now he thought more effectuouſlie to accompliſh his purpoſed intent, after ỹ he was exalted thither, where he would be. And therefore now bearing himſelfe the bolder, by the authoritie of ſaint Peters throne, firſt he began to purſue the act ſet out by his predeceſſor, as touching ſimonie, curſing and excommunicating, whoſoeuer they were, that receiued any ſpirituall liuing or promotion at laie mens hands, as all ſuch as were the giuers thereof. For this he called then ſimonie, that vnder that colour he might defeate the temporall poteſtates of their right, and ſo bring the whole clergie at length to the lure of Rome. And forſomuch as the emperor was the head, thinking firſt to begin with him, he ſendeth for him by letters and legats to appeare in the councell of Lateran at Rome. But the emperor buſied in his wars againſt the Saxons, had no leiſure to attend to councels. Notwithſtanding Gregorius the pope proceédeth in his councell, rendring there the cauſe and reaſon before the biſhops, why he had excommunicate diuers of the clergie, as Herman biſhop of Bamberge, counſellor to the emperor, and other prieſts more for ſimony. And there moreouer in the ſaid councell, he threatneth to excommunicate likewiſe the emperor himſelfe, and to depoſe him from his regall kingdome, vnleſſe he would abrenounce the hereſie of ſimonie, and doe penance. The councell being ended, Guibertus archbiſhop of Rauenna perſuaded with one Centius (a Romane, the captaines ſonne, whom the pope had excommunicated) to take the emperors part againſt the pope: who watching his time in the temple of ſaint Marie, vpon Chriſtmaſſe day in the morning, taketh the pope and putteth him faſt in a ſtrong tower. The next day the people of Rome hearing this, harneſſe themſelues with all expedition to helpe the biſhop, whom when they loſed out of priſon, they beſieged the houſe of Centius, and pluckt it downe to the ground; his familie hauing their noſes cut off, were call out of the citie; Centius himſelfe eſcaping fled to the emperor. Guibert the archbiſhop pretending good will to the pope, departed from Rome, who likewiſe had wrought with Hugo Candidus cardinall, and with Theobaldus archbiſhop of Millain, alſo with diuers other biſhops about Italie, to forſake the pope and take the emperors part. Gregorie the pope, called Hildebrand, hearing the conſpiracie, layeth the ſentence of excommunication vpon them all, and depriueth them of their dignitie. The emperor being moued (not vnworthilie) with the arrogant preſumption of the proud prelat, called togither a councell at Wormes. In which councell all the biſhops not onely of Saxonie, but of all the whole empire of Germaines, agrée and conclude vpon the depoſition of Hildebrand, and that no obedience hereafter ſhould be giuen to him. This being determined in the councell, Roulandus a prieſt of Parmen was ſent to Rome with the ſentence, who in the name of the councell ſhould command Gregorie to yéeld vp his ſeate, and alſo charge the cardinals to reſort to the emperor for a new election of another pope. The tenor of the ſentence ſent by Roulandus was this.

Much boaſt made of Peters throne, but his life they let alone.

Hermannus excommunicate of Hildebrand.

Centius.

Hildebrand caſt in the tower.

Guibertus archbiſhop of Rauenna.

The ſentence of the councell of Wormes againſt Hildebrand.

The councell of Wormes againſt the pope.

Forſomuch as thy firſt ingreſſe and comming in hath beene ſo ſpotted with ſo manie periuries, and alſo the church of God brought in no little danger through thine abuſe and newfanglenes: moreouer, becauſe thou haſt defamed thine owne life and conuerſation, with ſo much and great diſhoneſtie, that we ſee no little perill or ſlander to riſe thereof: therefore the obedience which yet we neuer promiſed thee, hereafter we vtterlie renounce, and neuer intend to giue thee. And as thou haſt neither taken vs yet for biſhops (as thou haſt openly reported of vs) ſo neither will we hereafter take thee to be apoſtolike.

Vale.

Gregorie the pope tickled with this ſentence, firſt condemneth it in his councell of Lateran with excommunication. Secondarilie, depriueth Sigifridus archbiſhop of Mentz of his dignities, and eccleſiaſticall liuings, with all other biſhops, abbats and prieſts, as many as tooke the emperors part. Thirdly, accuſeth Henricus the emperor himſelfe, depriueth him of his kingdome and regall poſſeſſion, and releaſeth all his ſubiects of their oth of allegiance giuen vnto him, after this forme and maner.

The councell of Rome againſt the councell of Wormes.

Henricus the emperor excommunicated by Hildebrand.

The tenor of the ſentence excommunicatorie againſt Henricus the emperor, by Hildebrand.

Ex Platina.

O Bleſſed S. Peter prince of the apoſtles, bow downe thine eares I beſeech thee, and heare me thy ſeruant, whom thou haſt brought vp euen from mine infancie, and haſt deliuered me vntill this day from the hands of the wicked, which hate and perſecute me, becauſe of my faith in thee. Thou art my witneſſe, & alſo the bleſſed mother of Ieſu Chriſt, & thy brother S. Paul, fellow partner of thy martyrdome, how that I entred this function (not willingly) but inforced againſt my will: not that I take it ſo as a robberie, lawfullie to aſcend into this ſeate: but becauſe that I had rather paſſe ouer my life, like a pilgrime

Marke this ye papiſts that ſay the pope cannot erre.

Digitized by Google

The pope threatneth kindnesse of S. Peter.

or priuate person, then for any fame or glorie to climbe vp to it. I doe acknowledge (and that worthilie) all this to come of thy grace, and not of my merits, that this charge ouer christian people, and this power of binding and loosing is committed to me. Wherfore, trusting vpon this assurance for the dignitie and tuition of holy church in the name of God omnipotent, the father, the sonne, and the Holy ghost, I doe here depose Henrie the sonne of Henrie once the emperor, from his imperiall seat, and princely gouernment, who hath so boldy and presumptuouslie laid hands vpon thy church. And furthermore, all such as to fore haue sworne to be his subiects, I release them of their oth, whereby all subiects are bound to the allegiance of their princes. For it is meet and conuenient that he should be void of dignitie, which seeketh to diminish the maiestie of thy church. Moreouer, for that he hath contemned my monitions, tending to his health and wealth of his people; and hath separate himselfe from the fellowship of the church (which he, through his seditions, studieth to destroy) therfore I bind him by vertue of excommunication, trusting and knowing most certainely, that thou art Peter (in the rocke of whom as in the true foundation Christ) our king hath built his church.

Quis tulerit Gracos de seditione querentes? Iuuen.

The emperor thus assaulted with the popes censure, seeth abrode his letters throw all nations, to purge himselfe, declaring how wrongfully, and against all right hee was condemned. The princes of Almanie partly fearing the cracke of the popes thunderclap, partly againe reioycing that occasion was renewed to rebell against the emperor, assembled a commensement, where they did consult and so conclude, to elect another emperor, and to fall from Henrie, vnlesse the pope would come to Germany, and hee there content to submit himselfe and obtaine his pardon.

The Saxons take the popes part against the emperor.

Wherein is to be considered the lamentable affections of the Germans in those daies, so to forsake such a valiant emperor, and so much to repute a vile bishop. But this was the rudenesse of the world then, for lacke of better knowledge. The emperor seeing the chiefe princes readie to forsake him, promiseth them with an oth, that if the pope would repaire to Germany, he would aske forgiuenesse.

Upon this the bishop of Tricts was sent vp in commission to Rome, to intreate the pope to come into Germanie. The bishop (at the instance of the legat and of the princes) was content. He entred into Germanie, thinking to come to Augusta. After he was come to Vercellos (the bishop of that citie being the chancellor of Italie, and desirous to disturbe peace for the old grudge he had to the emperor) falslie persuadeth with the pope, that he was certaine the emperor was comming with a mightie great armie against him, counselling him therefore to prouide betimes for his owne safegard in some stronger place. Wherby the popes mind being altered, he retired backe to Canusium or Canollus, a citie being subiect to Matilda, a countesse of Italie, where he should not need to feare the emperor.

Peace disturbed through wicked counsell.

Henricus vnderstanding the false feare of the pope, and of his retire to Canusium, incontinent (comming out of Spires with his wife and his yong sonne, in the deepe and sharpe of winter) resorteth to Canollus. All his peeres and nobles had left him for feare of the popes curse, neither did any accompanie him. Wherefore the emperor, being not a little troubled (laying apart his regall ornaments) came barefooted with his wife and child to the gate of Canollus, where he from morning to night (all the day fasting) most humblie desireth absolution, craning to be let in, to the speech of the bishop. But no ingresse might be giuen him once within the gates. Thus he continuing three daies togither in his petition and sute; at length answere came, that the popes maiestie had yet no leisure to talke with him. The emperor nothing moued therwith, that he was noe let into the citie, patient and with an humble mind abideth without the wals, with no little grieuance and painefull labor, for it was a sharpe winter, and all frosen with cold. Notwithstanding, yet through his importunate sute, at length it was granted through the intreating of Matilda ye popes paramor, and of Arelaus earle of Sebaudia, and the abbat of Cluniake, that he should be admitted to the popes speech. On the fourth day being let in, for a token of his true repentance, hee yeeldeth to the popes hands his crowne, with all other ornaments imperiall: and confessed himselfe vnworthie of the empire, if euer he doe against the pope hereafter, as he hath done to fore, desiring for that time to be absolued and forgiuen. The pope

A wondrous submission of a valiant emperor to a vile pope.

Notable patience in a noble emperor.

Henricus the emperor, with his wife and child, barefoot and barelegd waiting on pope Hildebrand, three daies and three nights, at the gates of Canusium, before he could be suffered to come in.

Diuers conditions of the pope.

answereth he will neither forgiue him, nor release the bond of his excommunication, but vpon conditions. First, to promise, that he shall be content to stand to his arbitrement in the counsell, and to take such penance as he shall inioyne him: also that he shall be prest and readie to appeare, in what place or time the pope shal appoint him. Moreouer, that he being content to take the pope iudge of his cause, shall answere in the said councell to all obiections and accusations laid against him, and that he shall neuer seeke any reuengement herein. Item, that he (though he be quit and cleared therin) shall stand to the popes mind and pleasure, whether to haue his kingdome restored, or to lose it.

Pope both accuser and iudge.

Finally, that before the triall of his cause, he shall neither vse his kingly ornaments, scepters, or crowne, nor vsurpe the authoritie to gouerne, nor to exact any oth of allegiance vpon his subiects, &c. These things being promised to the bishop by an oth, and put in writing, the emperor is onely released of excommunication. The tenor of the writing is this.

Heere the beast of the Apocalyps appeareth in his colours.

The forme and tenor of the oth, which Henricus made to the pope.

I Henricus king, after peace and agreement made to the mind and sentence of our lord Gregorius the seuenth, promise to keepe keepe all couenants and bonds betwixt vs, and to prouide that the pope go ſafely whereſoeuer he will without any danger either to him or to his retinue; eſpecially in all ſuch places as bee ſubiect to our empire. Nor that I ſhall at any time ſtay or hinder him, but that hee may doe that belongeth to his function, where and whenſoeuer his pleaſure ſhall be. And theſe things I bind my ſelfe with an oth to keepe. Actum Canoſ. 5. calend. Februarij indic. 15.

Digitized by Google

Thus the matter being decided betwixt them after the popes owne preſcribement, the emperor taketh his iourny to Papia. The pope with his cardinals did vance and triumph with no little pride that they had ſo quailed the emperor, and brought him on his knees to aſke them forgiuenelle. Yet notwithſtanding, miſtrulting themſelues, and miſdoubting time, what might befall them hereafter, if fortune ſhould turne, and God giue the emperor to inioy a more quiet kingdome: therefore to preuent ſuch dangers betime, they ſtudy and conſult priuily with themſelues how to diſplace Henry cleane from his kingdome. And how that deuice might ſafely be conueied, they conclude and determine to deriue the empire vnto Rodulphus, a man of great nobility amongſt the chiefeſt ſtates of Germanie, and alſo to incite and ſtir vp all other princes & ſubiects (being yet free and diſcharged from their oths) againſt Henry, and ſo by force of armes to expell the emperour out of his kingdome. To bring this purpoſe the better to paſſe, legats were ſent downe from the pope, Sigehardus patriarch of Aquileia, and Altimanus biſhop of Padway, which ſhould perſwade through all France, that Henry the emperor was rightfully excommunicated, and that they ſhould giue to the biſhop of Rome their conſents in chuſing Rodulphus to be emperor. This being done, there was ſent to the ſaid Rodulphus duke of Sueuia, a crowne from the pope with this verſe:

The crafty conſpiracy of the cardinals againſt the emperor.

The verſe.

Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodulpho.

The rocke gaue the crowne to Peter,
Peter giueth it to Rodulph.

Here by the way of digreſſion (to make a little gloſſe vpon this barbarous verſe) two notable lies are to be noted. One, where he lieth vpon Chriſt, the other where he lieth vpon Saint Peter. Firſt, that Chriſt gaue any temporall diademe to Peter, it is a moſt manifeſt lie, and againſt the ſcriptures, when as he would not take it, being giuen to himſelf, and ſaith, his kingdome is not of this world. Againe, where he ſaith that Peter giueth it to Rodulph: here he plaieth the poet; for neither had Peter any ſuch thing to giue; and if he had, yet hee would not haue giuen it to Rodulph from the right heire: neither is it true that Peter did giue it, becauſe Hildebrand gaue it. For it is no good argument; Hildebrand did giue it; Ergo, Peter did giue it: except ye will ſay, Hildebrand ſtirred vp great wars and bloudſhed in Germany; Ergo, Peter ſtirred vp great wars in Germany. So Peter neither could, nor would, nor did giue it to Rodulphus, but only Hildebrand the pope: who after he had ſo done, he gaue in commandement to the archbiſhop of Mentz and of Cullen, to elect this Rodulphus for emperor, and to anoint him king, and alſo to defend him with all force and ſtrength they might.

The gloſſe vpon the verſe of Hildebrand.

The pope proued a double lier.

While this conſpiracy was in hand, Henricus the emperor was abſent, and the popes ambaſſadors with him alſo. In the meane ſpace Rodulphus was elected emperor, vnknowing to Henry. Vpon this commeth the biſhop of Straſborough vnto the emperor, certifying him what was done. He ſuſpecting and ſeeing the ſtomacke and doings of the Saxons ſo bent againſt him, muſtereth his men with expedition, and marcheth forward to defend his right; but firſt ſendeth to Rome (truſting vpon the league betwixt him and his pope) and requireth the biſhop to proceed with his ſentence againſt Rodulphus, for the rebellious inuaſion of his empire. But the biſhop minding nothing leſſe, ſendeth word againe, not to be right to condemne any perſon (his cauſe being not heard:) thus vnder the pretence of the law, colouring his vnlawfull treachery. Henricus thus diſappointed and forſaken on euery ſide, with his men about him, attempteth battell againſt Rodulphus. In which battel, a maruellous great ſlaughter was on both ſides, but the victory on neither part certaine; ſo that both the captaines yet challenged the empire. After the battell and great murther on both ſides, they ſent to Rome both, to know of the popes determination, to whether of them two he iudged the right title of the empire to appertain. The biſhop commandeth them both to breake vp their armies, and depart the field, promiſing that he ſhortly would call a councel where this matter ſhould be diſputed; in the meane time they ſhould ceaſe from war. But before the meſſengers returned againe (their armies being refreſhed) they had another conflict togither, but no victory got on either part. Thus both the captaines being wearied in warres, the Romiſh beaſt the biſhop which was the cauſe thereof, perceiuing whither theſe cruell wars would tend, to the great calamity not onely of the Germans, but alſo of other nations (truſting to finde another way to helpe Rodulphus and his adherents) ſendeth downe a commiſſion by Otho archbiſhop of Treuers, Bernardus deacon, and Bernardus abbat of Haſſilia: to whom he gaue in charge that they ſhould call togither a councell or ſitting in Almany, and there to be defined to whether part the empire ſhould pertaine, by moſt right and publike conſideration; promiſing that what they ſhould therein determine, he (looking vpon the matter, through the authoritie of God omnipotent, and of ſaint Peter, and ſaint Paul) would ratifie the ſame. Moreouer, for that no let nor impeachment ſhould happen to the legats by the way, hee giueth with them letters to the princes and nations of Germany; whereof the contents bee declared briefely in Platina, if any liſt to reade them.

Great wars ſtirred vp by the pope.

The pope traitor to the emperor.

But the emperor would not ſo permit the legats to haue any councell within Germany, except they would firſt depriue Rodulphus of his kingdome. The legats conſidering that to be againſt the drift and intention of the pope, returned againe from whence they came. The pope hearing this, and ſeeing his purpoſe was ſo diſappointed by the emperor, deuiſeth out another excommunication againſt him, and againe bereaueth him of his kingdome: ſending about his letters excommunicatory throughout all places, thinking thereby to further the part of Rodulphus the better. Platina hath in his booke the whole effect of the writing, which tendeth after this ſort.

The copie of the ſecond excommunication of Hildebrand againſt the emperor.

BLeſſed S. Peter, prince of the apoſtles, and thou Paul alſo the teacher of the Gentiles, giue eare vnto me I beſeech you a little, and gently heare me, for you are the diſciples and louers of truth. The things that I ſhall ſay are true. This matter I take in hand for truth ſake, that my brethren (whoſe ſaluation I ſeeke) may the more obſequiouſly obey me, & better vnderſtand, how that I truſting vpon your defence (next to Chriſt & his mother, the immaculat virgin) reſiſt the wicked, and am ready to helpe the faithfull. I did not enter this ſeat of mine owne accord, but much againſt my will, and with teares, for that I accounted my ſelfe vnworthy to occupy ſo high a throne. And this I ſay, not that I haue choſen you, but you haue choſen me, and haue laid this great burthen vpon our ſhoulders. And now, whereas by this your aſſignement, I haue aſcended vp this hill, crying to the people, and ſhewing them their faults, and to the children of the church their iniquities, the members of Satan haue riſen vp againſt mee, and haue laid hands togither to ſeeke my bloud. For the kings of the earth haue riſen vp againſt mee, and the princes of this world, with whom alſo haue conſpired certaine of the clergy ſubiects againſt the Lord, and againſt vs his annointed, ſaying: Let vs breake aſunder their bonds, and caſt off from vs their yoke. This haue they done againſt me, to bring me either to death, or to baniſhment. In the number of whom is Henricus, whom they call king, the ſonne of Henry the emperor, which hath lift vp ſo proudly his hornes & heele againſt the church of God, making conſpiracie with diuers other biſhops, both Italian, French, and Germans. Againſt the pride of whom, hitherto your authority hath reſiſted, who rather being broken then amended, comming to mee in Ciſalpina, made humble ſute to me for pardon and abſolution. I thinking nothing elſe but true repentance in him, receiued him againe to fauor, and did reſtore him to the communion only, from which he was excommunicat; but to his kingdome (from which in the ſynod of Rome hee was worthily expelled) I did not reſtore him, nor to the rents and fruits thereof (that he might returne to the faith againe) that I granted not to him. And that I did for this purpoſe, that if he ſhould deferre to fall to agreement with certaine of his neighbours, whom he hath alwaies vexed, and to reſtore againe the goods both of the church, and otherwiſe; then he might be compelled by the cenſures of the church and force of armes thereunto. Whereby diuers and ſundry biſhops and princes of Germany (ſuch as he had long troubled) being helped by this opportunity, elected Rodulphus their duke to be king in the place of Henricus, whom they for his tranſgreſſions had remoued and diſpatched from his empire. But Rodulphus firſt in this matter vſing a princely modeſtie and integrity, ſent vp his meſſengers to me, declaring how he was conſtrained (wild he, nild he) to take that regall gouernment vpon him, albeit he was not ſo deſirous thereof, but that he would rather ſhew himſelfe obedient to vs, then to the other that offered him the kingdome; and whatſoeuer our arbitrement ſhould be therein, he would be vnder obedience, both of God and of vs. And for more aſſurance of his obedience, he hath ſent his owne children hither for pledges. Vpon this Henricus began to ſnuffe, and firſt intreated with vs, to reſtraine and inhibit Rodulphus through the paine of our curſe, from the vſurpation of his kingdome. I anſwered againe, I would ſee whether of them had more right and title thereunto, and ſo ſend our legats thither vpon the ſame, to know the whole ſtate of the matter, and thereupon I would decide betwixt them, whether of them had the truer part. But Henricus would not ſuffer our legats to come to take vp the matter, and ſlew diuers both ſecular men, and of the clergy, ſpoiling and prophaning churches, and ſo by this meanes hath indangered himſelfe in the bonds of excommunication. I therefore truſting in the iudge-

O pettie[fo]gs hypocrit.

The pope praiſeth ſaint Peter to diſhonor his king.

And ſaint Peter bindeth the pope to honor his king.

Crocodili lachryme.

Scripture well applied.

A figure called ἀντιμεσώδη.

Cuius contrarium verum eſt.

Vim faciunt ſcripturæ, vt plenitudinem accipiant poteſtatis.

Let all papiſts marke here well the holineſſe of their holy father.

As though he were not ſet vp by you rather then by them.

Digitized by Google

ment and mercy of God, and in the ſupportation of the bleſſed virgin, alſo vpō your authority, do lay the ſentence of curſe vpon the ſaid Henricus, and all his adherents: and here againe I take his regall gouernment from him, charging and forbidding all chriſtian men that haue bin ſworne vnto him, (whom I diſcharge here of their oth) that hereafter they obey him in nothing, but to take Rodulphus to their king, who is elected by many princes of the prouince. For ſo right it is and conuenient, that as Henry for his pride and ſtubbornnes, is depriued of his dignity and poſſeſſion: ſo Rodulphus being gratefull to all men, for his vertue and deuotion be exalted to the imperiall throne and domination.

The more to blame emperors to ſuffer you to be ſo ſaucy with them.

Therefore, O you bleſſed princes of the apoſtles, grant to this, and confirme with your authority that I haue ſaid, ſo that all men may vnderſtand, if you haue power to bind and looſe in heauen, you haue alſo power in earth to giue & take away empires, kingdomes, principalities, and whatſoeuer here in earth belongeth to mortall men. For if you haue power to iudge in ſuch matters as appertaine to God: what then ſhould we think you haue of theſe inferior and prophane things? And if it be in your power to iudge the angels, ruling ouer proud princes, what then ſhall it beſeeme you to do vpon their ſeruants? Therfore let the kings vnderſtand by this example, and all other princes of the world, what you bee able to doe in heauen, and what your are with God, that thereby they may feare to contemne the commandement of holy church. And now doe you exerciſe this iudgement quickly vpon Henricus, whereby all men may ſee this ſonne of iniquity to fall from his kingdome, not by any chance, but by your prouiſion and only worke. Notwithſtanding this I would craue of you, that he being brought to repentance through your interceſſiō, yet in the day of iudgement, may finde fauor and grace with the Lord. Actum Romæ, nonis Martij, indictione 3.

Nero argumentum.

Confer this clauſe with the hiſtory of the ſtory hereafter. O double hypocrit.

Furthermore, Hildebrand not yet content with this, interdicteth & depoſeth alſo Guibertus archbiſhop of Rauenna, for taking the emperors part, commanding all prieſts to giue no maner obedience to him, and ſendeth thither to Rauenna another archbiſhop with full authority.

Guibertus archbiſhop depriued.

After and vpon this, Henricus and Rodulphus to try the matter by the ſword, coped togither in battell, not without bloudſhed, where Henricus by the fauor of God againſt the iudgement of Hildebrand had the victory. Rodulphus there greatly wounded in the conflict, was had out of the army, and caried to Hyperbolis, where hee commanded the biſhops and chiefe doers of his conſpiracy to be brought before him. When they came, he lifted vp his right hand, in which he had taken his deadly wound, and ſaid: This is the hand which gaue the oth and ſacrament vnto Henricus my prince, and which through your inſtigation, ſo oft hath fought againſt him in vaine: now go and performe your firſt oth and allegiance to your king; for I muſt to my fathers, and ſo died. Thus the pope gaue battell, but God gaue the victory.

The 4. battell betwixt Henry and Rodulph. Henricus victor.

Rodulphus at his death repenteth.

The pope giueth war, God giueth victory.

Henricus (after his enemy being thus ſubdued, and wars being ceaſed in Germany) forgat not the old iniuries receiued of Hildebrand, by whom he was twice excommunicated, and expelled from his kingdome, and three daies making humble ſute (yea and that in ſharpe winter) could find no fauor with him. Beſides that, he incited moreouer and aided his enemy againſt him. Wherefore calleth togither a councell or aſſembly of diuers biſhops of Italy, Lombardy and Germany at Brixia, 1083, where he purged himſelfe, and accuſed the biſhop Hildebrand of diuers crimes, to be an vſurper, periured, a necromancer and ſorcerer, a ſower of diſcord; complaining moreouer of wrongs and iniuries done by the biſhop and church of Rome, in that the church of Rome preferred the biſhop before him, when that his father being emperor before him, had inthronized and ſet in diuers and ſundry biſhops there by his aſſignement, without all others election. And now this biſhop contrary to his oth and promiſe made, thruſt in himſelfe, without the will and knowledge of him, being their king and magiſtrat. For in the time of his father Henricus the third, this Hildebrand with other, bound themſelues with a corporall oth, that ſo long as the emperor and his ſonne now being king, ſhould liue, they ſhould neither themſelues preſume nor ſuffer any other to aſpire to the papall ſeat, without the aſſent and approbation of the foreſaid emperors; which now this Hildebrand, contrary to his corporall oth had done. Wherefore the foreſaid councell with one agreement condemned this Gregory, that he ſhould be depoſed. The tenor of which condemnation is thus expreſſed in Abbate Vrſpergenſi.

Concilium Brixienſe.

Anno 1083

No biſhop of Rome can be choſen without conſent of the emperor.

Abbas Vrſpergenſis.

The ſentence of the councell of Brixia, againſt Hildebrand.

BEcauſe it is not vnknowne, this biſhop not to be elected of God, but to haue intruded himſelfe by fraud and mony, who hath ſubuerted all eccleſiaſticall order, who hath diſturbed the gouernment of the chriſtian empire, menacing death of body and ſoule againſt our catholike & peaceable king, who hath ſet vp and maintained a periured king, ſowing diſcord where concord was, cauſing debate amongſt friends, ſlanders, and offences amongſt brethren, diuorcements and ſeparation amongſt the maried (for he tooke away the mariage of prieſts, as Henricus Mutius witneſſeth) and finally diſquieting the peaceable ſtate of all quiet life: Therefore we here in the name and authority of God congregat togither, with the legats and hands of 19. biſhops, the day of Pentecoſt at Mentz, doe proceed in canonicall iudgement, againſt Hildebrand, a man moſt wicked, preaching ſacrilege and burning, maintaining periury and murthers, calling in queſtion the catholike faith of the body and bloud of the Lord, a follower of diuination and dreames, a manifeſt necromancer, a ſorcerer, and infected with a pythonicall ſpirit, and therefore departed from the true faith, we iudge him to be depoſed and expelled. And vnleſſe he hearing this, ſhall yeeld and depart the ſeat, to be pertually condemned. Enacted 7. Calend. Iulij, feria. 5. indictione 3.

Henricus Mutius.

Note here the pope iudged and depoſed of the councell.

This being enacted and ſent to Rome, they elected Guibertus archbiſhop of Rauenna in the place of Hildebrand, to gouerne the church of Rome, named Clemens the third. But when Hildebrand neither would giue ouer his hold, nor giue place to Clement, the emperor gathering an army to ſend to Italy, came to Rome to depoſe Gregory, & to place Clement. But Hildebrand ſending to Matilda the counteſſe before mentioned, required (in remiſſion of all her ſins) to withſtand Henry the emperor; and ſo ſhe did. Notwithſtanding Henricus preuailing, came to Rome, where he beſieged the city all the Lent, and after Eaſter got it, the Romans being compelled to open the gates vnto him: ſo he comming to the temple of S. Peter, there placeth Clement in his papacy. Hildebrand ſtraight flieth into Adrians tower with his adherents, where he being beſet round about, at length ſendeth for Robert Guiſcardus his friend a Norman. In the mean time, while Robertus collecteth his power, the abbat of Cluniake, conferring with Gregory, exhorteth him to crowne Henricus emperor in Lateran. Which if he would doe, the other promiſeth to bring about, that Henry ſhould depart with his army into Germany, whereunto the people of Rome alſo did likewiſe moue him. To whom Gregory anſwered, that he was content ſo to doe (but vpon condition) that the emperor would ſubmit himſelfe to aſke pardon, to amend his fault, and to promiſe obedience. The emperor not agreeing to thoſe conditions, went to Senas, taking Clement new ſtalled pope with him.

The pope ſeeketh ſuccor of his paramour. The firſt example to fight for remiſſion of ſins, began in Hildebrand.

After the returne of the emperor, the foreſaid Robert Guiſcardus approching with his ſouldiors, burſt in at one of the gates, and ſpoileth the city. And not long after deliuereth Hildebrand out of his enemies hands, and carried him away to Campania, where he not long continuing after, died in exile.

Platina. Naucleru. Sabellicus. Crantzius. Benno, &c.

Antonius writeth, that Hildebrand, as hee did lie a dying, called to him one of his chiefe cardinals, bewailing to him his fault and miſorder of his ſpirituall miniſtery, in ſtirring vp diſcord, war, and diſſenſion; whereupon he deſired the cardinall to goe to the emperor, and deſire him of forgiuenelle, abſoluing from the danger of excommunication both him and all his partakers both quicke and dead.

¶ Thus haſt thou (gentle reader) the full hiſtory of pope Gregory the ſeuenth, called Hildebrand; which I haue laid out more at large, and deſire thee to marke, becauſe that from this pope (if thou marke well) ſpringeth all the occaſion of miſchiefe, of pride, pompe, ſtoutneſſe, preſumption and tyranny, which ſince that time hath raigned in his ſucceſſors hitherto, in the cathedrall church of the Romiſh clergy. For here came firſt the ſubiection of the temporall regiment, vnder the ſpirituall iuriſdiction: and emperors, which before were their maſters, now are made their vnderlings. Alſo here came in the ſuppreſſion of prieſts mariage, as is ſufficiently declared. Heere came in moreouer, the authority of both the ſwords ſpirituall and ſecular into ſpirituall mens hands. So that chriſtian magiſtrates could do no thing in election, in giuing biſhopricks or benefices, in calling councels, in hearing and correcting the exceſſes of the clergy, but only the pope muſt do all. Yea moreouer, no biſhop nor paſtor in his owne pariſh could excommunicat or exercile any diſcipline amongſt his flocke, but only the pope challenged that prerogatiue to himſelfe. Finally, here came in the firſt example to perſecute emperors and kings with rebellion and excommunication, as the clergy themſelues hereafter do teſtifie and witnes in proceeding againſt Paſchalis. Thus theſe notes being well obſerued, let vs (by the grace of Chriſt) now repaire againe to our country hiſtory of England.

Hildebrand the firſt author and patron of all miſrule that followed after in popes.

About the death of pope Hildebrand (or not long after) followed the death of king William conqueror, in the yeer 1090, after he had raigned in England the ſpace of one and twenty yeeres, and ten moneths. The cauſe of his ſickneſſe and death is ſaid to be this: for that Philip the French king vpon a time (ieſting) ſaid that king William lay in childbed and nourished his fat belly. With this the foreſaid William hearing thereof, anſwered again, and ſaid, when he ſhould be churched, he would offer a thouſand candles to him in France, wherewithall the king ſhould haue little ioy. Whereupon king William in the moneth of July (when the corne, fruit, and grapes were moſt flouriſhing) entred into France, and ſet on fire many cities and townes in the weſt ſide of France. And laſtly, comming to the city of Meaux, where hee burning a woman being as a recluſe in a wall incloſed (or as ſome ſay, two men anachorits incloſ-inclosed) was so feruent and furious about the fire, that with the heat partly of the fire, partly of the time of the yeere, thereby he fell into sicknesse and died vpon the same.

The death of William Conqueror.

Digitized by Google

By the life and acts of this king it may appeare true, as stories of him report, that he was wise, but guilefull; rich, but rouetous; a faire speaker, but a great dissembler; glorious in victory and strong in armes, but rigorous in oppressing whom he ouercame, in leuying of tasks passing all others. Insomuch that he caused to be inrolled and numbred in his treasury euerie hide of land, and owner thereof: what fruit and reuenewes surmounted of euery lordship, of euery township, castell, village, field, riuer, and wood, within all the realme of England. Moreouer, how many parish churches, how many liuing cattell there were, what and how much euery baron in the realme could dispend, what fees were belonging, what wages were taken, &c. The tenor and contents of which testament yet remaineth in rols. After this tasking or numbring, which was the yeere before his death, followed an exceeding murren of cattell, and barrennesse of the ground, with much pestilence and hot feuers among the people, so that such as escaped the feuer, were consumed with famin. Moreouer, at the same season among certaine other cities, a great part of the city of London, with the church of Pauls was wasted with fire, in the yeere of our Lord 1085.

Pestilence in England, and murren of beasts.

London with the church of Pauls burnt.

In hunting and in parks the foresaid king had such pleasure, that in the country of Southhampton by the space of 30 miles, he cast downe churches and townships, and there made the new forrest, louing his Deere so dearly, as though hee had beene to them a father, making sharpe lawes for the increasing thereof, vnder paine of losing both the eies. So hard he was to Englishmen, and so fauorable to his owne country, that as there was no English bishop remaining, but onely Wolstan of Worcester, who being commanded of the king and Lanfranke to resigne vp his staffe, partly for inability, partly for lacke of the French tongue, refused otherwise to resigne it, but only to him that gaue it, and so went to the tombe of king Edward, where he thought to resigne it, but was permitted to inioy it still: so likewise in his daies, there was almost no Englishman that bare office of honor or rule in the land. In so much that it was halfe a shame at ỳ time to be called an Englishmã. Notwithstanding hee some deale fauored the city of London, and granted vnto the citizens the first charter that euer they had, written in the Saxon, with greene wax sealed, and contained in few lines.

Wolstan bishop of Worcester.

Among his other conditions, this in him is noted, that so giuen he was to peace and quiet, that any maiden being laden with gold or siluer, might passe through the whole realme without harme or resistance. This William in his time builded two monasteries, one in England at Battell in Sussex, where he won the field against Harold, called the abby of Battell; another besides named Barmondsey in his countrie of Normandy.

England peaceable from theeues.

The abby of Battell.

The abby of Barmoundsay.

After the life and story of king William thus briefly described, with the acts and order of battell betweene him and king Harold (although much more might haue been written of that matter, if the booke had come sooner to my hands, which afterwards I saw) now remaineth in the end of this story to describe the names of such barons & nobles of Normandy, which entred with him into this land, as well of them which were imbarked with him, and slaine also (as appeareth in the battell) as also of them who were planted and aduanced by the said Conqueror in the lands and possessions of English lords, whom he either expelled, or else beheaded. The names of which Normans here follow vnder written.

Out of the annals of Normandy in French, whereof one very ancient written booke in parchment remaineth in the custody of the writer hereof.

The day after the battell, very early in the morning, Odo bishop of Baieux sung masse for those that were departed. The duke after that desirous to know the estate of his battell, and what people he had therein lost and were slaine, he caused to come vnto him a clerke that had written their names when they were imbarked at S. Valeries, and commanded him to call them all by their names, who called them that had bin at the battell, & had passed the seas with duke William. And hereafter follow their names.

The names of those that were at the conquest of England.

Odo, bishop of Baieulx.
Robert, Conte de Mortaign. These two were bretheren vnto duke William by their mother.
Baudwin de Buillon,
Roger conte de Beaumont, surnamed With ỳ beard; of whom descended the line of Meullent.
Guillaume Malet,
Le sire de Monfort, sur Rille,
Guill. de Vicxpont,
Neel de S. Saueur le Viconte,
Le Sire de Fougiers,
Henrie Seigneur de Ferrieres,
Le Sire Daubemare,
Guillaume Sire de Rommare,
Le Sire de Lithehare,
Le Sire de Touque,
Le Sire de la Mare,
Le Sire de Neauhou,
Le Sire de Pirou,
Rob. Sire de Beaufou,
Le Sire Danou,
Le Sire de Sotouille,
Le Sire de Margneuille,
Le sire de Tancaruille,
Eustace Dambleuille,
Le sire de Mangneuille,
Le Sire de Grãtmesnil
Guillaume Crespin,
Le sire de S. Martin,
Cuill. de Moulins,
Le sire de Puis,
Geoffrey sire de Maienne,
Auffroy de Bohon,
Auffroy & Maugier de Cartrait,
Guill. de Garrennes,
Hue de Gournay, Sire de Bray,
Le conte Hue de Gournay,
Euguemont de laigle,
Li viconte de Touars,
Rich. Danuerrenchin,
Le sire de Biars,
Le sire de Solligny,
Le Bouteiller Daubigny,
Le sire de Maire,
Le sire de Vitry,
Le sire de Lacy,
Le sire du val Dary,
Le sire de Tracy,
Hue sire de Montfort,
Le sire de Piquegny,
Harnon de Kaieu,
Le sire Despinay,
Le sire de Port,
Le sire de Torcy,
Le sire de Iort,
Le sire de Riuiers,
Guillaume Moyonne,
Raoul Tesson de Tingueleiz,
Roger Marmion,
Raoul de Guel,
Auenel des Byars,
Paennel du Monstier Hubert,
Rob. Bertramle Tort,
Le sire de Seulle,
Le sire de Doriual,
Le sire de Breual,
Le sire de S. Ichan,
Le sire de Bris,
Le sire du Homme,
Le sire de Sauchhoy,
Le sire de Cailly,
Le sire de Semilly,
Le sire de Tilly,
Le sire de Romelly,
Mar. de Basqueuille,
Le sire de Preaulx,
Le sire de Gonis,
Le sire de Sainceaulx,
Le sire de Moulloy,
Le sire de Monceaulx,

¶ The archers du val du Reul, and of Bretheul, and of many other places.

Le sire de S. Saen, i. de S. Sydonio,
Le sire de la Kiuiere,
Le sire de Salnaruille,
Le sire de Rony,
Eude de Beaugieu,
Le sire de Oblie,
Le sire de Sacie,
Le sire de Nassie,
Le Visquaius de Chymes,
Le sire du Sap,
Le sire de Glos,
Le sire de Mine,
Le sire de Glanuille,
Le sire de Breencon,
Le Vidam de Partay,
Raoul de Morimont,
Pierre de Bailleul, sire de Fiscamp,
Le sire de Beausault,
Le sire de Tillieres,
Le sire de Pacy,
Le Seneschal de Torcy,
Le sire de Gacy,
Le sire Doully,
Le sire de Sacy,
Le sire de Vacy,
Le sire de Tourneeur,
Le sire de Praeres,
Guillaume de Coulombieres,
Hue sire de Bollebec,
Rich. sire Dorbeck,
Le sire de Bonneboz,
Le sire de Tresgoz,
Le sire de Montfiquet,
Hue le Bigot de Maletot,
Le sire de la Hay,
Le sire de Mombray,
Le sire de say,
Le sire de la Ferte,
Bouteuillain,
Troussebout,
Guillaume Patric de la Laund,
Hue de Mortemer,
Le sire Danuillers,
Le sire Donnebaut,
Le sire de S. Cler.
Rob. le filz Herneys duc de Orleans,
Le sire de Harecourt,
Le sire de Creuecœur.
Le sire de Deincourt,
Le sire de Bremetot,
Le sire de Combray,
Le sire Daunay,
Le sire de Fontenay,
Le conte Deureux,
Le sire de Rebelchil,
Alain Fergant conte de Britaigne,
Le sire de S. Vallery,
Le conte Deu,
Gualtier Giffard cõte de Longeuille,
Le sire Destouteuille,
Le conte Thomas Daubmalle,
Guill. conte de Hoymes & Darques,
Le sire de Bereuille,
Le sire de Breante,
Le sire de Freauuille,
Le sire de Pauilly,
Le sire de Clere,
Toustan du Bec,
Le sire de Maugny,
Roger de Montgomery,
Amauri de Touars.

Ouer and besides the great number of knights and esquires that were vnder them. In the same battell betweẽ the said William the bastard, duke of Normandy on the one part, and king Harold on the other part, there were slain on king Harolds side of Englishmen, 66654. And on duke Williams side there were slaine 6013 men, as it is to be found in the chronicles of S. Peter of Westminster, besides those that were drowned in the riuer of Thames.

Whenas the aboue named and many other great lords were so called, some of them appeared, other some did not, for some of them were slaine there in the field, and others so wounded, that they could not come forth to shew themselues. Then gaue the duke commandement, that the dead should be buried; and those that were sicke comforted and eased the best that might be, &c.

Our

Digitized by Google

Out of the ancient chronicles of England, touching the names of other Normans which seemed to remaine aliue after the battell, and to be aduanced in the signiories of this land.

IOhn de Maundeuile,
Adam Vndeuile,
Bernard de Freuile,
Rich. de Rochuile,
Gilbert de Frankuile,
Hugo de Douile,
Symond de Roteuile,
R. de Euile,
B. de Kneuuile.
Hugo de Moruile,
R. de Coleuile,
A. de Waruile,
C. de Karuile,
R. de Roteuile,
S. de Stoteuile.
H. Bonum,
I. Monum,
W. de Vignoum,
K. de Viſpount,
W. Bailbeof,
S. de Baleyn,
H. de Marreys,
I. Aguleyne,
G. Agilon,
R. Chamburlayne,
N. de Vendres,
H. de Verdon,
H. de Verto,
C. de Vernon,
H. Hardul,
C. Cappan,
W. de Camuile,
I. de Cameyes,
R. de Rotes,
R. de Boys,
W. de Waren,
T. de Wardboys,
R. de Boys,
W. de Audeley,
K. Dynham,
R. de Vaures,
G. Vargenteyn,
I. de Haſtings,
G. de Haſtank,
L. de Burgee,

R. de Butuileyn,
H. de Malebranch,
S. de Malemain,
G. de Hauteuile,
H. Hauteyn,
R. de Morteyn,
R. de Mortimer,
G. de Kanouile,
E. de Columb,
W. Paynel,
C. Panner,
H. Pontrel,
I. de Riuers,
T. Reuile,
W. de Beauchamp,
R. de Beaupale,
E. de Oü,
F. Louel,
S. de Troys,
I. de Artel,
Iohn de Montebrugge,
H. de Mounteſerel,
W. Truſſebut,
W. Truſſel,
H. Byſet,
R. Baſſet,
R. Molet,
H. Malouile,
G. Bonet,
P. de Bonuile,
S. de Rouile,
N. de Norbeck,
I. de Corneux,
P. de Corbet,
W. de Mountague,
S. de Mountfychet,
I. de Geneuyle,
H. Gyffard,
I. de Say,
T. Gilbard,
R. de Chalons,
S. de Chauward,
H. Ferret,
Hugo Pepard,
I. de Harecourt,

H. de Haunſard,
I. de Lamare,
P. de Mautreuers,
G. de Ferron,
R. de Ferrers,
I. de Deſty,
W. de Werders,
H. de Borneuile,
I. de Saintenys,
S. de Syncler,
R. de Gorges,
E. de Gemere,
W. de Feus,
S. de Filberd,
H. de Turberuile,
R. Troblenuer,
R. de Angon,
T. de Morer,
T. de Rotelet,
H. de Spencer,
R. de Saintpuenten,
I. de Saint Martin,
G. de Cuſtan,
Saint Conſtantin,
Saint Leger & Saint Med,
M. de Cronu & de S. Viger,
S. de Crayel,
R. de Crenker,
N. Meyuel,
I. de Berners,
S. de Chumly,
E. de Charers,
I. de Grey,
W. de Grangers,
S. de Grangers,
S. Baubenyn,
H. Vamgers,
E. Bertram,
R. Bygot,
S. Treoly,
I. Trigos,
G. de Feues,
H. Filiot,
R. Taperyn,

S. Talbot,
H. Santſauer,
T. de Samford,
G. de Vandien,
C. de Vaurort,
G. de Mountague,
Tho. de Chambernon,
S. de Montfort,
R. de Ferneuaulx,
W. de Valence,
T. Clarel,
S. de Cleruaus,
P. de Aubemarle,
H. de Saint Aruant,
E. de Auganuteys,
S. de Gant,
G. de Malearbe,
H. Mandut,
W. de Cheſun,
L. de Chandut,
R. Filz vrs,
B. Vicont de Low,
G. de Cantemere,
T. de Cantlow,
R. Breaunce,
T. de Broxeboof,
S. de Bolebec,
B. Mol de Boef,
I. de Muelis,
R. de Brus,
S. de Brewes,
I. de Lille,
T. de Bellile,
I. de Wateruile,
G. de Neuile,
R. de Neuburgh,
H. de Burgoyne,
G. de Bourgh,
S. de Lymoges,
L. de Lyben,
W. de Helyoun,
H. de Hildrebron,
R. de Loges,
S. de Seintlow,

I. de Maubank,
P. de Saint Malow,
R. de Leoferne,
I. de Louotot,
G. de Dabbeuile,
H. de Appetot,
W. de Percy,
H. de Lacy,
G. de Quincy,
E. Tracy,
R. de la Souche,
V. de Somery,
I. de Saint Iohn,
T. de Saint Gory,
P. de Boyly,
R. de Saint Valery,
P. de Pinkeny,
S. de Pauely,
G. de Monthaut,
T. de Mountcheſy,
R. de Lymozy,
G. de Lucy,
I. de Artois,
N. de Arty,
P. de Grenuile,
I. de Greys,
V. de Creſty,
F. de Courcy,
T. de Lamar,
H. de Lymaſtz,
I. de Moubray,
G. de Morley,
S. de Gorney,
R. de Courtenay,
P. de Gourney,
R. de Cony,
I. de la Huſe,
R. de la Huſe,
V. de Longeuile,
P. Longeſpy,
I. Pouchardon,
R. de la Pomercy,
I. de Pountz,
R. de Pontlarge,
R. Eſtraunge,
Tho. Sauage.

A little aboue, mention was made of the bishops sea of Shireborne, translated from thence to Salisbury. The first bishop of Salisbury was Hirmannus a Norman, who first began the new church and minster of Salisbury. After whom succéeded Olmundus, who finished the worke, and replenished the house with great liuing, and much good singing. This Olmundus first began the ordinary which was called Secundum vsum Sarum, An. 1076. The occasion whereof was this, as I find in an old story booke intituled Eulogium. A great contention chanced at Glastenbury betweéen Thurstanus the abbat and his couent, in the daies of William Conqueror. Which Thurstanus the said William had brought out of Normandy from the abby of Cadonum, and placed him abbat of Glastenbury. The cause of this cõtentious battell was, for that Thurstanus contemning their quier seruice, then called the vse of Saint Gregory, compelled his monks to the vse of one William a monke of Fiscam in Normandy. Whereupon came strife and contentions amongst them, first in words, then from words to blowes, after blowes then to armor. The abbat with his gard of harnest men, fell vpon the monks, and draue them to the steps of the high altar, where two were slaine, eight were wounded with shafts, swords, and pikes. The monks then driuen to such a strait and narrow shift, were compelled to defend themselues with formes and candlesticks, wherewith they did wound certaine of the souldiors. One monke there was (an aged man) who in stead of his shield, toke an image of the crucifix in his armes for his defence, which image was wounded in the breast by one of the bow-men, whereby the monke was saued. My story addeth more, that the striker incontinent vpon the same fell mad; which sauoreth of some monkish addition besides the text. This matter being brought before the king, the abbat was sent againe to Cadonum, and the monks by the commandement of the king were scattered in far countries. Thus by the occasion hereof, Olmundus bishop of Salisbury deuised that ordinary, which is called the vse of Sarum, and was afterward receiued in a maner through all England, Ireland and Wales. And thus much for this matter, done in the time of this king William.

The first bishop of Salisbury. Olmund bishop of Sarum. Ordinale ecclesiastici officij secundum vsum Sarum. Ex Eulogio historico. lib. 1. The vse and ordinary of Sarum, how and when it was deuised.

Which William after his death by his wife Matildis or Maud, left three sonnes, Robert Courtsele, to whom he gaue the dutchy of Normandy; William Rufus his second sonne, to whom he gaue the kingdome of England; and Henry the third sonne, to whom hee left and gaue treasure; and warned William to be to his people louing and liberall, Robert to be to his people sterne and sturdy.

In the history called Iornalensis, is reported of a certaine great man, who about this time of king William was compassed about with mice and rats, and flying to the midst of a riuer, yet when that would not serue, came to the land againe, and was of them deuoured. The Germans say that this was a bishop, who dwelling betweéne Cullen and Mentz, in time of famin and dearth, hauing store of corne and graine, would not helpe the pouerty crying to him for relefe, but rather wished his corne to be eaten vp of mice and rats. Wherefore being compassed with mice and rats (by the iust iudgement of God) to auoid the annoiance of them, he builded a tower in the midst of the riuer of Rheine (which yet to this day the Dutchmen call Rats tower) but all that would not helpe, for the rats and mice swam ouer to him in as great abundance as they did before, of whom at length he was deuoured.

Example of Gods iust iudgement vpon a bishop, who being vnmercifull to the poore, was eaten with rats and mice.

William Rufus.

WIlliam Rufus, the second son of William Conqueror, began his raigne in the yéere of our Lord 1088, and raigned thirteene yéeres, being crowned at Westminster by Lanfrancus, who after his coronation, released out of prison by the request of his father, diuers of the English lords, which before had béen in custody. It chanced that at the death of William Conqueror, Robert Courtsey his eldest sonne was absent in Almanie; who hearing of the death of his father, and how William his younger brother had taken vpon him the kingdome, was therewith greatly moued, in so much that he laid his dukedome to pledge vnto his brother Henry, and with that good gathered vnto him an army, and so landed at Hampton, to the intent to haue expelled his brother from the kingdome. But William Rufus hearing thereof, sent to him faire and gentle words, promising him dedition and subiection, as to the more worthy and elder brother; this thing only requiring, that Anno 1088 William Rufus.

Digitized by Google

seeing he was now in place and possession, he might inioy it during his life, paying to him yeerely three thousand markes, with condition; that which of them ouerliued the other, should inioy the kingdome. The occasion of this variance betweene these brethren, wrought a great dissension betweene the Norman lords and bishops, both in England and in Normandy. In so much that all the Norman bishops within the realme almost rebelled against the king, taking part with duke Robert, except onely Lanfrancus, and Wolstan bishop of Worcester aboue mentioned, an Englishman, who for his vertue and constancie was so well liked and fauoured of his citizens, that (imboldened with his presence and praier) they stoutly maintained the citie of Worcester against the siege of their enemies, and at last vanquished them with vtter ruine. But duke Robert at length by the aduice of his counsell (hearing the words sent vnto him, and wagging his head thereat, as one conceiuing some matter of doubt or doublenesse) was yet content to assent to all that was desired, and so returned shortly after into Normandy, leauing the bishops and such others in the briers, which were in England taking his part against the king.

Wolstan bishop of Worcester.

This Rufus was so ill liked of the Normans, that betweene him and his lords was oft dissension. Wherefore (well neere) all the Normans tooke part against him: so that he was forced of necessitie to draw to him the Englishmen. Againe, so couetous he was, and so immeasurable in his tasks and takings, in selling benefices, abbies and bishoprickes, that he was hated of all Englishmen.

Anno 1091

In the third yeere of this king, died Lanfrancus archbishop of Canturbury; from whose commendation and worthinesse, as I list not to detract any thing (being so greatly magnified of Polydorus his countryman) so neither doe I see any great cause why to adde any thing thereto. This I thinke, vnlesse that man had brought with him lesse superstition, and more sincere science into Christ his church, he might haue kept him in his country still, and haue confuted Berengarius at home. After the decease of Lanfranke, the sea of Canterbury stood empty foure yeeres.

The death of Lanfrancus archbishop of Canterbury.

After the councell of Lanfrancus aboue mentioned, wherein was concluded for translating of bishops seas, from villages into head cities; Remigius bishop of Dorchester, who (as ye heard, accompanied Lanfrancus vnto Rome) remoued his bishops sea from Dorchester vnto Lincolne, where he builded the minster there situate vpon an hill within the said citie of Lincolne. The dedication of which church, Robert archbishop of Yorke did resist, saying, that it was builded within the ground of his precinct. But after, it had his Romish dedication by Robert Bleuet, next bishop that followed. By the same Remigius also was founded the cloister or monasterie of Stow, &c.

Remigius bishop of Lincolne.

Lincolne minster builded.

Stow abby builded.

Anno 1092

In the fourth yeere of this king, great tempests fell in sundry places of England, specially at Winchcombe, where the steeple was burned with lightning, the church wall burst thorow, the head and right leg of the crucifix, with the image of our lady on the right side of the crucifix throwne downe, and such a stinke left in the church, that none might abide it. At London the force of the weather and tempest ouerturned six hundred houses. In which tempest the roofe of Bowchurch was hurled vp in the wind, and by the vehemencie thereof was pitched downe a great depnesse into the ground.

Winchcombe steeple burnt with lightening.

Six hundred houses blowne downe with wind.

The roofe of Bow-church ouerthrowne.

King William (as ye haue heard, an exceeding poller, or rauener rather of church goods) after hee had giuen the bishoprick of Lincolne to his chancellor Robert Bleuet (aboue minded) began to cauill, auouching the sea of Lincolne to belong to the sea of Yorke, till the bishop of Lincolne had pleased him with a great sum of mony of fiue thousand marks, &c.

Robert Bleuet paid fiue thousand marks for his bishoprick.

And as nothing could come in those daies without mony from the king; so Herbert Losinga, paying to the king a piece of mony, was made bishop of Thetford, as he had paid a little before to bee abbat of Ramsey. Who likewise the same time remouing his sea from Thetford to the citie of Norwich, there erected the cathedrall church with the cloister in the said citie of Norwich, where he furnished the monks with sufficient liuing and rents of his owne charges, besides the bishops lands. Afterward, repenting of his open and manifest simony, he went to Rome, where hee resigned into the popes hands his bishoprick, but so, that incontinent he receiued it againe. This Herbert was the sonne of an abbat called Robert, for whom he purchased of the king to be bishop of Winchester, whereof run these verses:

Herbert Losinga bishop of Norwich.

Losinga 1.

adulator.

Norwich minster builded by Herbert.

Filius est præsul, pater abba, Simeon vtérque:
Quid non speremus si nummos possideamus?
Omnia nummus habet, quod vult facit, addit & aufert,
Res nimis iniusta, nummus fit præsul & abba, &c.

We heard a little before of the death of pope Hildebrand, after the time of which Hildebrand the Germaine emperors began to lose their authority and right in the popes election, and in giuing of benefices. For next after this Hildebrand, came pope Victor by the setting vp of Matilda, and the duke of Normandy, with the faction and retinue of Hildebrand, who likewise shewed himselfe stout against the emperour. But God gaue the shrewd cow short hornes. For Victor being poisoned (as some say in his chalice) sate but one yeere and a halfe. Notwithstanding the same imitation and example of Hildebrand continued still in them that followed after. And like as the kings of Israel followed most part the steps of Jeroboam, till the time of their desolation: so for the greatest sort all popes followed the steps and proceedings of this Hildebrand their spirituall Jeroboam, in maintaining of false worship, and chiefly in vpholding the dignity of that sea, against all rightfull authority, and the lawfull kingdome of Sion. In the time of this Victor, began the order of the monks of Charterhouse, through the meanes of one Hugo bishop of Gracionople, and of Bruno bishop of Cullen.

Pope Victor poisoned in his chalice.

A comparison betwixt Hildebrand pope of Rome, and Jeroboam king of Israel.

The order of charter monks began.

Next to Victor sat Urban the second, by whom the acts of Hildebrand were confirmed, and also new decrees enacted against Henry the emperor. In this time were two popes at Rome, Urbanus and Clemens the third, whom the emperor set vp. Vnder pope Vrban came in the white monks of Cistercian order, by one Stephan Harding a monke of Shireborne, (an Englishman) by whom this order had his beginning in the wildernesse of Cistery, within the prouince of Burgoine, as witnesseth Cestrensis. Others write that this Harding was the second abbat of that place, & that it was first founded by the means of one Robert abbat of Molisme in Cestercium, a forrest in Burgundy, Anno 1098, (perswaded perchance by Harding) and afterwards in the yeere of our Lord 1135, it was brought into England by a certaine man called Elpeke, which builded an abbie of the same order called Meruale. In this order the monks did liue by the labor of their hands; they paid no tithes nor offerings, they wore no fur nor lining, they wore red shoes, their coules white, and cotes blacke, all shorne saue a little circle, they eat no flesh but only in their iourny. Of this order was Bernardus, &c.

Pope Urban the second.

Two popes in Rome.

The order of Cistercian or white monks began.

This Urban held diuers councels; one at Rome, where he excommunicated all such lay persons as gaue inuestiture of any ecclesiasticall benefice. Also all such of the clergy as abiected themselues to be vnderlings or seruants to lay persons for ecclesiasticall benefices, &c.

Synodus Romana vel Placentina.

Another councell he held at Cleremount in France, where among other things, the bishop made an oration to the lords being there present, concerning the voyage and recouering of the holy land from the Turkes and Saracens. The cause of which voyage first sprang by one Peter a monk or hermit, who being in Jerusalem, and seeing the great misery of the christians vnder the Pagans, made thereof declaration to pope Vrban, and was therein a great solicitor to all christian princes. By reason whereof, after the foresaid oration of pope Vrban, 30000 men (taking on them the signe of the crosse for their cognisance) made preparation for that voyage, whose captaines were Godfrey duke of Lorraine, with his two brethren, Eustace and Baldwine, the bishop of Pody, Bohemund duke of Puell and his nephew Tancredus, Raimund earle of saint Egidius, Robert earle of Flanders, and Hugh le Grand, brother of Philip the French king. To whom also was ioined Robert Curthoise duke of Normandy, with diuers other noble men, with the foresaid Peter the hermit, who was the chiefe causer of that voyage.

Synodus Clarimontana.

The voyage vnto the holy land.

The number that went.

The captaines of them which went to the holy land.

At that time many of the said noble men laid their lands and lordships to morgage to prouide for the forenamed voiage; as Godfrey duke of Lorraine, who sold the dukedome of Bollogne to the bishop of Eburone for a great sum of mony. Also Robert Curthoise duke of Normandy, laid his dukedome to pledge to his brother William king of England for ten thousand pounds, &c.

Thus the christians, which passed first ouer Bosphorus, hauing to their captaine Peter the hermit (a man perchance more deuout then expert to guide an armie) being trapped of their enemies, were slaine and murthered in great numbers among the Bulgars, and neere to the towne called Ciuitus.

Anno 1096

When the nobles and the whole army met together at Constantinople (where Alexius was emperor) passing ouer by Hellespontus going to Hierusalem, they tooke the cities of Nicea, Eraclea, Tarsis, and subdued the country of Cicilia, appointing the possession thereof to certaine of their captaines.

The acts of the christians in their voyage to win Hierusalem.

Antioch was besieged, and in the ninth month of the siege, it was yeelded to the christians by one Pyrrhus; about which season were fought many strong battels, to the great slaughter and desolation of the Saracens, and not without losse of many christian men. The gouernance of this citie was committed to Bohemund duke of Puell, whose martiall knighthood was often proued in time of the siege thereof.

Antioch taken by the christians.

Anno 1098

And not long after, Corbona master of the Persians chiualry was vanquished and slaine, with an hundred thousand infidels. In which discomfiture were taken 15000 camels.

The slaughter of the Persian infidels.

Hierusalem on the nine and thirtith day of the siege, was conquered by the christians. Robert also duke of Normandy was elect to be king thereof. Howbeit he refused it, hearing of the death of king William Rufus of England; wherefore hee neuer sped in all his affaires well after the same. Then Godfrey, captaine of the christian army, was proclaimed the first king of Hierusalem. At the taking of the citie was such Hierusalem conquered by the christians. Ex Henric. lib. 7.

Pope Victor the third.

such a murther of men, that bloud was congealed in the street the thicknesse of a foot. Then after Godfrey, raigned Baldwin his brother: After him Baldwin the secõd nephew: Then Gaufridus duke of Gaunt, and after him Gaufridus his sonne, by whom many great battels there were fought against the Saracens, and all the country thereabout subdued, saue Ascalon, &c. And thus much hitherto touching the voiage to the holy land. Now to our owne land againe.

About this time (as Matt. Parisiensis writeth) the king of England fauored not much the see of Rome, because of their impudent and insatiable exactions which they required, neither would he suffer any of his subiects to goe to Rome, alleaging these words in the author thus expressed: Quòd Petri non inhærent vestigijs, præmijs inhiantes; non eius potestatem retinent, cuius sanctitatem probantur non imitari: that is, Because they follow not the steps of Peter, hunting for rewards; neither haue they the power and authority of him, whose holinesse they declare themselues not to follow, &c.

The king of Englands iudgement against the pope. Ex Matt. Paris.

Decrees of pope Urbanus.

By the same Urbanus the seuen houres which we cal Septem horas canonicas, were first instituted in the church.

Item, by this pope was decreed, no bishop to be made but vnder the name and title of some certaine place.

Item, that mattins and houres of the day should euery day be said.

John Stella.

Also euery saturday to bee said the masse of our lady, and all the Iewes sabbath to be turned to the seruice of our lady, as in the councell of Turon, to the which seruice was appointed the antheme, Ora pro populo, interueni pro clero, intercede pro deuoto fœmineo sexu.

Nauclerus.

Dist. 31. Eos qui 15. q. 6. Iuratos.

Item, all such of the clergy as had wiues, to be depriued of their order.

Item, to be lawfull for subiects to breake their oth of allegiance, with al such as were by the pope excommunicat.

Item, not to be lawfull both for husband and wife to christen one child both togither; with matters many more.

By the same pope thus many chapters stand written in the canon law, Dist. 7. Sanctorum. dist. 31. Eos qui 1. q. 1. Si qui dist. 56. Presbyterorum, 11. q. 3. quibus 15. q. 6. Iuratos 16, q. 7. Congregatio 19, q. 2. Statuimus, 23. q. 8. Tributum, 30, q. 4. quod autem, &c.

30 q. 8. quod autem.

Example of Gods rightfull iudgement in punishing cruel murther.

In the first yeere of this kings raigne, Malcolme king of Scots, which foure times before had made great slaughter of old and young in the north parts, as is before shewed, burst into Northumberland with all the power hee could make, and there by the right iudgement of God was slaine with his son Edward, and also Margaret his wife, sister to Edgar Adeling aboue minded, a vertuous and deuout lady, within three daies after.

Anselme made archbishop of Canterbury.

The same yeere he gaue the archbishoprick of Canterbury (after that hee had detained the same in his owne hands foure yeeres) to Anselme abbat of Becke in Normandy.

This Anselme was an Italian, in the citie of Augusta borne, and brought vp in the abbie of Becke in Normandie: where he was so strict a follower of vertue, that (as the storie recordeth) he wished rather to be without sin in hell, then in heauen with sin. Which saying and wish of his (if it were his) may seeme to proceed out of a mind, neither speaking orderly according to the phrase and vnderstanding of the scripture, nor yet sufficiently acquainted with the iustification of a christian man. Further, they report him to be so far from singularity, that he should say, it was the vice which thrust the angels first out of heauen, and man out of paradise.

The saying of Anselme pondered.

The vice of singularity.

Of this Anselme it is moreouer reported, that he was so ill willing to take the archbishoprick, that the king had much adoe to thrust it vpon him: and was so desirous to haue him take it, that the city of Canterbury (which before Lanfrancus did hold but at the kings good will and pleasure) he gaue now to Anselme wholly, which was about the yeere of our Lord 1093. But as desirous as the king was then to place the said Anselme, so much did he repent it afterward, seeking all maner of meanes to defeat him if he might. Such strife and contention rose between them two for certaine matters, the ground and occasion whereof first was this:

Anselme ill willing to take the archbishoprick.

Canterbury first giuen to the archbishop wholly.

Strife and contentiõ between the king and Anselme.

After that Anselme had been thus elected to the sea of Canterbury, before he was fully consecrate, the king communed with him (allaying by all gentle maner of words to intreat him) that such lands & possessions of the church of Canterbury as the king had giuen & granted to his friends since the death of Lanfrancus, they might still inioy the same, as their owne lawfull possessions, through his grant and permission. But to this, Anselme in no case would agree. Wherupon the king conceiuing great displeasure against him, did stop his consecration a great season, till at length in long processe of time, the king inforced by the daily complaints and desires of his people and subiects for lacke of an archbishop to moderat the church, was constrained to admit and authorize him vnto them. Thus Anselme with much adoe, taking his consecration, and doing his homage to the king, went to his sea of Canterbury. And not long after, the king sailed ouer to Normandy.

Anselme stopped from his consecration.

Anselme consecrated.

Anselme doth homage to king William.

About this time there were two striuing in Rome for the popedome, as is afore touched, Urbanus and Guibertus. Diuers realmes diuerslie consenting, some to the one, some to the other. England taking part with their king, was rather inclined to Guibertus, called Clement the third: but Anselme did fully goe with Urbanus, making so his exception with the king, entring to his bishoprick. After the king was returned againe from Normandy, the archbishop commeth to him, and asketh leaue to goe to Rome, to fet his pall of pope Urban: which when he could not at first obtaine, he maketh his appeale from the king to the pope. Whereat the king being iustly displeased, chargeth the archbishop with breach of his fealty, contrary to his promise made: that is, if hee without his licence, would appeale either to Urban or to any other pope. Anselme answereth againe, that it was to be referred vnto some greater councell, where it is to be disputed, whether this be to breake a mans allegiance to a terrene prince, if he appeal to the vicar of saint Peter. And here much arguing and contending was on both sides. The kings reason proceedeth thus: The custome (saith he) from my fathers time hath been in England, that no person should appeale to the pope without the kings licence. Hee that breaketh the customes of the realme, violateth the power & crowne of the kingdom. He that violateth and taketh away my crowne, is a traitor & enemy against me, &c. To this Anselme replieth againe; The Lord (saith he) easily discusseth this question, briefly teaching what fidelity and allegiance we ought to giue vnto the vicar of S. Peter, where he saith; Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke will I build my church, &c. And to thee I will giue the keies of the kingdome of heauen, and whatsoeuer thou shalt bind in earth, it shall be bound in heauen; and whatsoeuer thou lowsest in earth, shall be lowsed in heauen, &c. Againe, to them all in generall he saith; He that heareth you heareth me; and who despiseth you despiseth me. And in another place; He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of mine eye. On the other side, what duty we owe to the king, he sheweth also; Giue (saith he) to the emperor, what belongeth to the emperor, and to God, giue that to God belongeth. Wherefore in such things as belong to God, I will yeeld, and must yeeld by good right and duty, my obedience to the vicar of saint Peter; and in such things as belong againe to terrene dignities of my prince, in those I will not deny to him my faithfull helpe and counsell, so far as they can extend.

England fauored Clement.

Anselme holdeth with Urbanus.

Anselme denied leaue to goe to Rome.

Anselme appealeth from the king, to the pope.

Anselme charged for a traitor.

The kings argument against Anselme.

The custome of England from William Conquerors time, not to appeale to the pope.

Anselmes reply against the king.

The reasons of Anselme to proue the popes authority aboue other kings.

Anselme here ignorantly calleth the Pope the vicar of S. Peter, where the canon law calleth him but the successor of Peter, and vicar of Christ.

Thus haue ye the grounded arguments of this prelat, to stand so stiffly against his prince, whereunto peraduenture was ioined also some peere of a stubborne heart. But in this conclusion, none of his fellow bishops durst take his part, but were all against him: namely, William bishop of Duresme; to whom Anselme thus protesteth, saying: Whosoeuer hee were that would presume to proue it any breach of allegiance of fealty to his soueraigne, if hee appealed to the vicar of saint Peter, he was ready to answere at all times to the contrary. The bishop of Duresme answering againe, that hee which would not be ruled by reason, must with force be constrained, &c. The king hauing on his part the agreement of the bishops, thought to depriue the archbishop both of his pall for all sea, and to expell him out of the realme. But he could not performe his purpose; for Anselme as he was ready to depart the realme, he said, whensoeuer he went, he would take his office and authority with him, though he toke nothing else. Whereupon that matter was deferred till a longer time. In the meane season the king had sent priuily two messengers vnto pope Urban, to intreat him to send his pall to the king, for him to giue it where he would. Which messengers by this time were returned againe, bringing with them from Rome Gualter bishop of Alban the popes legat, with the pall to bee giuen vnto Anselme. This legat first landing at Douer, from thence came priuily (vnknowne to Anselme) to the king, declaring and promising, that if Urban was receiued pope in England, whatsoeuer the king required to be obtained, he by his priuilege from the apostolicall sea would ratifie and confirme the same: saue onely that when the king required of the legat that Anselme might be remoued, the legat thereunto would not agree, saying that it was vnpossible to be obtained, that such a man as he being lawfully called, should be expelled without manifest cause. In conclusion, so it followed, ỹ although he could not obtaine his request of the legat, yet the legat wrought so with the king, that Urban was proclaimed lawfull pope throughout all the realme.

All the bishops of the Realme stood of the kings side against Anselme, William bishop of Duresme.

Gualterus the popes legat commeth to England.

Anselme could not be remoued by the king.

The pope taketh this as no fault, for a subiect to repugne against his king.

Then were sent to Anselme certaine bishops to moue and proue his mind, declaring what charges and paines the king had been at in his behalfe, to procure the pall for him from Rome, which otherwise would haue stood him in great expences, & that all this the king had done for his sake. Wherefore it were good reason and conuenient, that he (to gratifie the king) should something condescend to his request againe. But with all this Anselme the stout archbishop would not bee moued. Wherefore the king seeing none other remedy, was compelled to grant vnto him the full right of his archbishoprick. And so the day appointed when ỹ pall should be brought to Canterbury (being carried with al solemnity in a thing of siluer) the archbishop with a great concourse of people, came forth bare foote with his priestly vestments, after a most goodly maner to meet the same: and so being brought in, was laid vpon the altar, whilest Anselme (spreading ouer his shoulders his popish vestments) proceeded vnto his popish masse.

The stoutnesse of Anselme standing against his king.

The maner of bringing in Anselmus pall into Canterbury.

Thus

Digitized by Google

Thus agreement being made betweene the king and the bishop, so long as it would hold, it happened the yeare following, the king with his armie entred into Wales, to subdue such as there rebelled against him. After the victorie gotten, the king returned home againe with triumph, to whom Anselme thought to haue come to congratulate his prosperous successe. But the king preuented him by messengers, laying to the bishops charge both the small number and euill seruice of his souldiers sent to him at his need. At the hearing hereof, all the hope of Anselme was dasht, who at the same present had thought to haue obtained and done many great matters with the king touching the state of the church. But here all turned contrarie to his expectation: insomuch that hee was charged against the next court of parliament, to make his answere. But he auoided that by appealing to Rome. Wherefore he made his sute and friends to the king for licence to goe to the pope. Unto the which sute the king answered againe, that hee should not goe, neither was there any cause for him so to doe, for that both hee knew him to be of so sound a life, that hee had done no such offence, whereof he needed to craue absolution at Rome, neither was there any such lacke of science and knowledge, that he needed to borrow any counsell there: Insomuch (saith the king) I dare say, pope Urban rather hath to giue place to the wisedome of Anselme, then Anselme to haue need of Urban. Wherefore as he hath no cause to go, so I charge him to tarrie. And if he continue in his stubbornnesse still, I will assuredly seize vpon his possessions, and conuert his archbishoprike into my coffers: for that hee transgresseth and breaketh his fidelitie and obeysance, promising before to obserue all the customs of my kingdome. Neither is it the fashion in this realme, that any of my nobles should goe to Rome without my sending. And therfore let him sweare vnto me, that he shall neither for any greeuance appeale hereafter to the see of Rome, or else let him void my realme.

Another quarell of the king against Anselme.

Anselme againe appeareth to Rome.

The kings answere to Anselme for his appealing to Rome.

The custome of England.

No prelate or noble man to go to Rome without the kings sending.

Against these words of the king, Anselme thinking not best to replie againe by any message, but by word of mouth, comming himselfe personally to the king, placeth himselfe (after his order) on the right hand of the prince, where he made his replie vnto the message sent to him by the king. Whereas you say I ought not to goe to Rome either for lacke of any trespasse, or for abundance of counsell and knowledge in me (albeit I grant to neither of them as true) yet what the truth is therein, I refer it to the iudgement of God. And whereas yee say that I promised to keepe and obserue your customs: that I grant, but with a condition: so far to keepe them, and such of them to obserue, as were consonant to the lawes of God, and ruled with right and equitie. Moreouer, whereas ye charge me with breach of my fidelitie and allegiance, for that contrarie to your customs I appeale to the see apostolike (my reuerence and dutie to your soueraignetie reserued) if another would say it, that is vntrue. For the fidelitie and obeysance that I owe to thee (O king) I haue it of the faith and fidelitie of God, whose vicar S. Peter is, to whose seate I do appeale. Further, whereas ye require me to sweare, that I shall for no cause hereafter at any time appeale to Rome: I pronounce openly that a christian prince requireth such an oth of his archbishop vniustly. For if I should forsweare S. Peter, I should denie Christ. And when I shall at any time denie Christ, then shall I bee content and readie to stand to the satisfaction of my transgression to you, for asking licence to go to Rome. And peraduenture when I am gone, the goods of the church shall not so serue your temporall desires and commodities as ye weene for. At these words of the bishop, the king and his nobles were not a little incensed: defending againe, that in obseruing the kings customs, there was neither condition nor any clause put in, either of God or right. No was? said Anselme. If so be that in your customs was neither mention made of God nor of right, whereof was there mention then? For God forbid that any christian should be bound to any customs which goe contrarie to God and to right. Thus on both sides passed much altercation betweene them.

The answere of Anselme to the king.

Note the high reasons of Anselme.

At length the king, after many threatning words, told him hee should carrie nothing out of the realme with him. Well said the bishop, if I may neither haue my horse nor garments with me, then will I walke on foot; and so addressed him toward his tourney (all the other bishops forsaking him) whereof none would take his part: but if hee came to them for counsell, they said he was wise enough, and needed not their counsell, as who for his prudence knew best what was to be done, as also for his holines was willing and able to persecute the same that he did know. As for them, they neither durst nor would stand against the king their lord; whose fauor they could not lacke, for the perill that might happen both to themselues & to their kindred. But for him because hee was both a stranger, and void of such worldly corruption in him: they willed him to go forward as he had begun, their secret consent he should haue, but their open voice they would not giue him. Thus Anselme remaining at Douer fifteene daies tarrying for wind, at last sped him toward his passage. But his packing being secretly knowne in the court, the kings officer, William Warlwast, preuented his purpose, searching by the kings commandement al his trusses, coffers, satchels, sleeues, purse, napkin, and bosome for letters, and for money, and so let him passe. Who sailing into France, first rested a while at Lions, from thence came to Pope Urban, according to the tenor and forme of a certaine epistle of this, wherein among many other things in the same epistle contained: these words he writeth to pope Paschalis, the third yere after his banishment, after the death of Urban, and a little before the death of the king.

The bishops left Anselme alone.

Anselme flying out of England.

Anselme searched by the kings officer for letters.

To the lord and reuerend father Paschalis, *high bishop, Anselme seruant of the church of Can-*turburie offreth due subiection from his heart, and prayers, if they can stand in any stead.

Ex epist 36. paulo post initium.

I See in England many euils, whose correction belongeth to me, and which I could neither amend, nor suffer without mine owne fault. The king desireth of me, that vnder the name of right I should consent to his pleasures, which were against the law and will of God. For he would not haue the pope receiued nor appealed vnto in England, without his commandement; neither that I should send a letter vnto him, or receiue any from him, or that I should obey his decrees. He suffered not a councell to be kept in his realme now these thirteene yeares, since he was king. In all these things and such like, if I asked any counsell, all my suffragan bishops of his realme, denied to giue me any counsell, but according to the kings pleasure. After that I saw these and such other things that are done against the will and law of God: I asked licence of him to goe to Rome, vnto the see apostolicall, that I might there take counsell for my soule, and the office committed vnto me. The king said that I offended against him for the onely asking of licence; and propounded to me, that either I should make him amends for the same as a trespasse (assuring him neuer to aske his licence any more to appeale to the pope at any time hereafter) or else that I should quickly depart out of his land. Wherefore chusing rather to goe out of the land then to agree to so wicked a thing, I came to Rome as you know, and declared the whole matter to the lord pope. The king by and by (as soone as I went out of England) inuaded the whole archbishoprike, and turned it to his owne vse, taxing the monks only with bare meate, drinke and cloth. The king being warned and desired of the lord pope to amend this, contemned the same, and yet continueth in his purpose still. And now is the third yeare since I came thus out of England, and more. Some men not vnderstanding, demand why I did not excommunicate the king. But the wiser sort, and such as haue vnderstanding, counsell me that I do not this thing: because it belongeth not vnto me both to complaine and to punish. To conclude, I was forewarned by my friends that are vnder the king, that mine excommunication (if it should bee done) would bee laughed to scorne and despised, &c.

A fragment or portion of a letter of Anselme to pope Paschalis. Ex legenda Anselmi Edmero, ex epist. Anselm. 36.

The king would not haue the pope receiued nor appealed vnto in England.

Anselme complaineth of the king and of his suffragan bishops.

The king contemneth the popes warning.

By these here aboue prefixed, appeareth how Anselme the archbishop comming vnto Rome, made his complaint to pope Urban of the king: and how the pope writing vnto the king in the behalfe of Anselme, his letters and commandements were despised. And now to our storie. In the meane time, while the popes letters were sent to the king, Anselme was bid to waite about the pope to looke for an answere backe. Who perceiuing at length, how little the king reputed the popes letters, began to be wearie of his office, desiring the pope that hee might bee discharged thereof: but the pope in no case would thereto consent, charging him vpon his obedience, that whersoeuer hee went, he should beare with him the name and honor of the archbishp of Canturburie. Whereunto Anselme againe said, his obedience he neither durst nor would refuse, as who for Gods cause was readie to suffer whatsoeuer should happen (yea though it were death it selfe) as hee thought no lesse would follow thereof. But what should we thinke (saith he) is there to be done, where not onely iustice taketh no place, but is vtterly oppressed? And whereas my suffragans not onely doe not helpe (for dread) the righteous cause, but also for fauor doe impugne the same? Well (saith the pope) as touching these matters, wee shall sufficiently prouide for at the next counsell to be holden at Baion, whereas I will you the same time and place to bee present.

When the time of the councell was come, Anselme amongst others was called for, who first sitting in an vtter side of the bishops, afterwards was placed at the right foot of the pope, with these words: Includamus hunc in orbe nostro tanquam alterius orbis papam. Whereupon the same place after him was appointed to the successors of the see of Canturbury, in euery generall councell by the decree of pope Urban, to sit at the right foot of the pope. In this said counsell great stir and much reasoning there was against the Grecians, concerning the matter and order of proceeding of the holy Ghost. Where is to be noted, that the Greeke church hath of long time dissented from the Latine church in many and sundrie points, to the number of twentie, or almost 29 articles, as I haue them collected out of the register of the church of Hereford: whereof like as occasion hereafter may serue (God willing) for a further Concilium Baionense.

Anselme and his successors of Canturburie placed at the right foot of the pope in his generall councels.

De processione spiritus sancti.

The difference betweene the Greeke church and the Latine.

Digitized by Google

ther and more ample tractation to be made: so here by the way partly I meane to touch some. The first is,

Wherein the Greeke church differeth from the Latine.

Ex registro eccles. Hereford.

THe first article wherein the Greeke church altereth from the Latine or Romish church is this: Quòd sunt extra obedientiam Romanæ ecclesiæ, pro eo quòd ecclesia Constantinopolitana non est subiecta, sed ei æqualis. 1. Dicunt dominum apostolicum non habere maiorem potestatem, quàm quatuor patriarchæ. Et quicquid sit præter scientiam eorum per papam vel sine eorum approbatione, nullius est valoris, &c. In English.

The articles and opinions of the Greeke church differing from the Latine church of Rome.

First they are not vnder the obedience of the church of Rome, because that the church of Constantinople is not subiect, but equall to the same.

2 They hold that the bishop of the apostolike sée of Rome, hath not greater power then the foure patriarchs. And what soeuer the pope doth beside their knowledge, or without their approbation, it is of no value.

3 Item, they say what soeuer hath béen done or concluded since the second generall councell, is of no full authoritie, because from that time they recount the Latins to bee in error, and to be excluded out of the holy church.

4 Item, Dicunt eucharistiam consecratam per Romanam ecclesiam non esse verum corpus Christi. That is: They hold the eucharist consecrated by the church of Rome, not to bee the very body of Christ. Also where the Romish church doth consecrate in vnleauened bread, they consecrate in bread leauened.

5 Item, they say that the Romish church doth erre in the words of baptisme, for saying, I baptise thee: when they should say, Let this creature of God be baptised, &c.

6 They hold moreouer, to bee no purgatorie, nor that the suffrages of ꝑ church do auaile the dead, either to lessen the paine of them that be destinat to hell, or to increase the glory of them that be ordained to saluation.

7 Item, they hold that the soules out of the bodies departed (whether they haue done good or euill) haue not their perfect paine, nor glorie: but are reserued in a certaine place, till the day of iudgement.

8 Item, they condemne the church of Rome, for mixing cold water in their sacrifice.

9 Item, they condemne the church of Rome, for that as well women as priests annoint children (when they baptise them) on both shoulders.

10 Item, Dicunt panem nostrum panagiam. That is, They call our bread Panagia.

11 Item, they blame the church of Rome for celebrating their masse on other daies besides sundaies, and certaine other feasts appointed.

12 Also in this the Greeke church varieth from the Latine, for they haue neither creame, nor oyle, nor sacrament of confirmation.

13 Neither do they vse extreme vnction, or anoiling after the maner of the Roman church, expounding the place of S. Iames of the spirituall infirmitie, and not corporall.

14 Item, they inioyne no satisfaction for penance, but only that they shew themselues to the priests, annointing them with simple oyle in token of remission of sinnes.

15 Item, only on maundie thursday they consecrate for the sicke, keeping it for the whole yeare after, thinking it to be more holy on that day consecrated, then vpon any other. Neither do they fast any saturday through the whole yeare, but onely on Easter euen.

16 Item, they giue but onely fiue orders, as of clerks, subdeacons, deacons, priests, and bishops; when as the Romane church giueth nine orders, after the nine orders of angels.

My copie here seemed to want somewhat.

17 Moreouer, the Grecians in their orders make no vow of chastitie, alleging for them the fift canon of N. ¶ Ego presbyter vel diaconus, vxorem causa honestatis non reiciam, &c. That is: I N. priest or deacon will not forsake my wife for honestie sake.

18 Item, euery yere the Grecians vse vpon certaine daies to excommunicate the church of Rome, and all the Latines as heretiks.

19 Item, among the said Grecians they are excommunicate, that beat or strike a priest. Neither do their religious men liue in such priestly chastitie as the Roman priests do.

20 Item, their emperor amongst them doth ordaine patriarchs, bishops, and other of the clergie, and deposeth the same at his pleasure, also giueth benefices to whom he listeth, and retaineth the fruits of the same benefices, as pleaseth him.

This article seemeth not to be rightly collected out of the Grecians.

21 Item, they blame the Latin church because they eat not flesh, egs and chéese on fridaies, and doe eate flesh on saturdaies.

22 Item, they hold against the Latine men, for celebrating without the consecrated church, either in the house or in the field: and fasting on the sabbath day: and for permitting menstrous women to enter into the church before their purifying: also for suffering dogs and other beasts to enter into the church.

23 The Grecians vse not to kneele in all their deuotions, yea not to the body of Christ (as the register tearmeth it) but one day in the whole yeare: saying and affirming, that the Latins be gotes and beasts, for they are alwaies prostrating themselues vpon the ground in their prayers.

24 The Grecians moreouer permit not the Latins to celebrate vpon their altars. And if it chance any Latin priest to celebrate vpon their altar, by and by they wash their altar in token of abomination and false sacrifice. And diligently they obserue, that whensoeuer they do celebrate, they do but one liturgie or masse vpon one altar or table that day.

25 Item, they dissent from the church of Rome touching the order and maner of the proceeding of the holy Ghost.

These articles, wherin is declared the difference betweene the east and west church, of the Grecians and Romans, as I found them articulated and collected in an ancient and authenticall register of the church of Hereford: so I thought here to insert them, & leaue them to the consideration of the reader. Other foure articles more in the same register be there expressed concerning simonie, diuorce, not with them forbidden: and touching also their emperor; and how they teach their children to heare or damnifie by any maner of way the Latine priests, &c. Which articles, for that either they séeme not truely collected out of their teachings, or else not greatly pertinent to the doctrine of religion, I ouerpasse them. To the purpose now of our storie againe.

When certaine of these aboue prefired were moued in the foresaid councell to be discussed; namely concerning the assertion of proceeding of the holy Ghost, and concerning leauened bread in the ministration of the Lords supper; Anselme, as is aboue said, was called for, who in the tractation of the same articles so bestirred him in that councell, that he well liked the pope and them about him, as mine author recordeth. Whereupon, touching the matter of vnleauened bread, how indifferently he séemed there to reason, and what he writeth to Ualeran bishop of Nurenburgh, thereof ye shall heare by a piece of his letter sent to the said bishop, the copie hereof insueth.

Anselme a stout champion against the Grecians.

Anselme seruant to the church of Canturburie, to Waltram bishop of Nurenburgh. Epist. 325. post initium.

A letter of Anselme sent to Waltram bishop of Nurenburgh. Ex epist. Anselmi, 325.

AS concerning the sacrifice, in which the Grecians thinke not as we do: it seemeth to many reasonable catholike mẽ, that which they do, not to be against the christian faith: for both hée that sacrificeth vnleauened and leauened, sacrificeth bread. And where it is read of our Lord (when hee made his bodie of bread) that he tooke bread and blessed: it is not added vnleauened, or leauened. Yet it is certaine that he blessed vnleauened bread (peraduenture) not because the thing that was done required that, but because the supper in which this was done, did giue that. And whereas in an other place he called himselfe and his flesh bread, because that as many as liue temporally with this bread, so with that bread he liueth for euer. Hee saith not vnleauened or leauened, because both alike are bread: for vnleauened and leauened differ not in substance as some thinke, like as a new man afore sin, and an old rooted man in the leauen of sinne, differ not in substance. For this cause therefore only he might be thought to call himselfe and his flesh, bread, & made his body of bread, because that this bread (vnleauened or leauened) giueth a transitorie life; and his body giueth euerlasting life, not for that it is either leauened or vnleauened. Although it be a commandement in the law to eate vnleauened bread in the passeouer, where all things are done in a figure, that it might be declared that Christ whom they looked for was pure and cleane: and we that should eate his body were admonished to be likewise pure from all leauen of malice and wickednesse. But now, after we are come from the old figure to the new truth, and eate the vnleauened flesh of Christ, that old figure in bread (of which we make that flesh) is not necessarie for vs. But manifest it is, to bee better sacrificed of vnleauened, then of leauened, &c.

Bread in the communion to be vnleauened is not necessarie.

To this letter I haue also adioyned an other epistle of his to the said Waltram, appertaining to matters not much vnlike to the same effect: wherin is intreated touching the varietie and diuers vsages of the sacraments in the church, whereby such as call and crie so much for vniformitie in the church, may note peraduenture in the same something for their better vnderstanding.

A peece of an other letter of Anselme to the said Waltram bishop of Nur.

To the reuerend father and his friend, Waltram by the grace of God the worshipfull bishop of Nurenburgh, Anselme the seruant of the church of Canturburie, greeting, &c. Ex epist. Anselmi, 317.

Another letter.

YOur worship complaineth of the sacraments of the church, that they are not made euery where after one sort, but are handled in diuers places after diuers sorts. And truely, if they were ministred after one sort and agreeing through the whole church church, it were good and laudable. Yet notwithstanding, because there be many diuersities which differ not in the sum of the sacrament, in the strength of it, or in the faith, or else can be gathered into one custome: I thinke that they are rather to bee borne with in agreement of peace, then to be condemned with offence. For we haue this from the holy fathers, that if the vnitie of charitie be kept in the catholike faith, the diuersitie of customes hurt nothing. But if it be demanded whereof this diuersitie of customes do spring; I perceiue no other cause thereof, but the diuersitie of mens wits, which although they differ not in strength and truth of the thing: yet they agree not in the fitnesse and comelinesse of the ministring. For that which one iudgeth to be meeter, oftentimes an other thinketh lesse meet: wherefore not to agree in such diuersities, I thinke it not to swarue from the truth of the thing, &c.

Digitized by Google

Diuersitie of vsages in the church to be borne with peace, rather then to be condemned with offence.

Diuers customes in the church hurt nothing.

Excommunication denounced against the Grecians.

Then in the storie it followeth, after long debating and discussing of these matters in the councell, when they had giuen forth their determination vpon the same; and the pope had blasted out his thundring excommunications against the Grecians, and all that toke their part: at length was brought in, touching the complaints and accusation against the king of England. Vpon the hearing wherof, pope Urban with his adherents was readie to proceed in excommunication against the king. But Anselme kneeling before the pope, after hee had first accused his king, then after obtained for him longer time to be giuen vpon further triall.

Excommunication bent against king William.

First breake his head, and then giue him a plaster.

Thus the councell breaking vp, the pope returning againe to Rome, directeth downe his letters to the king, commanding him that Anselme with all his partakers (in speedie wise) should be reuested againe into his archbishoprike, and al other possessions thereunto appertaining. To this the king sendeth answere againe by messengers, who comming to the pope, declared in the kings behalfe on this wise; That the king their master did not a little maruell, what came in his mind to command Anselme to be reuested and reseized againe into his former archbishoprike, seeing he told him before plainely, that if hee went out of England without his leaue, hee would so doe vnto him. Well (saith the pope) haue ye no other matter against Anselme but onely this? No (quoth they.) And haue ye taken all this trauell (saith the pope) to come hither so far to tell me this, that the primate of your countrie is therfore seized and dispossessed, because he hath appealed to the see and iudgement apostolicall? Therefore if thou louest thy lord, speed thee home and tell him, if hee will not bee excommunicated, that he quickely reuest Anselme againe to all that he had before. And lest I make thee to be hanged for thy labour, looke to thy tearme, and see that thou bring me answere againe from him into this citie, against the next councell the third weeke after Easter. The messenger or speaker being somewhat astonied at the hearing of this so tragicall answere, thinking yet to worke something for his king and master; came secretly to the pope, saying that hee would confer a certaine mysterie from his king priuatlie with his holinesse betweene them two. What mysterie that was, or what there passed from the king to the pope and the court of Rome, mine author doth not shew: but so cunningly that mysterie was handled, that with a full consent both of the pope and all the court of Rome, a longer day was giuen, from Easter to Michaelmas, and the popes cholerike heate so assuaged, that when the councell came (which then was holden at S. Peters church in Rome) albeit great complaints were then denounced against the king: yet such fauor was found, that hee toke no harme. Onely the sentence of excommunication was there pronounced against such lay persons as gaue inuesture of churches, & them that were so inuested. Also against them that doe consecrate such, or which giue themselues in subiection to laymen for ecclesiasticall liuings, as is before touched, &c.

Message betweene the king and the pope.

A loud cracke of thunder, but without a thunderbolt.

A bribing mysterie handled at Rome.

Concilium Romanum. Optimus eau sidicus nummus.

Acts of the councell of Rome.

This councell being finished, the archbishop seeing the vnstedfastnesse of the pope (which pleased him but a little) toke his iourney into Lions, where he continued his abode a long time, till the death first of pope Urban, then after of the king.

Of this king William many things be diuerslie recorded, some to his commendation, and some to his discommendation: whereof this is one, which some will ascribe to hardinesse, but I rather to rashnes in him. As this king vpon a time was in his disport of hunting, suddenly word came to him, that Cenourona (a citie in Normandie) was besieged. The king without longer tarrying or aduisement toke the straight way toward the sea side, sending to his lords that they should follow after. They being come to his presence, aduised him to stay till the time his people were assembled, but he would not bee staied: saying, that such as him loued (hee knew) would follow him shortly, and so went to take ship. The shipmaster seeing the weather so darke and cloudie, was afraid, and counselled the king to tarie till the wind did turne about, & the weather more fauourable. But the king persisting in his iourney, commanded him to make all the spæd he might for his life: saying, that he neuer heard that any king yet was euer drowned. And so passed the sea in safetie, and came to Normandie.

The hardines or rather rashnes of king William.

The saying of king William, how he neuer knew anie king drowned.

The thirteenth yeare of his reigne the said king William hauing the same time in his hand three bishoprikes, Canturburie, Winchester, and Sarum; also twelue abbeyes in farme: as he was in his disport of hunting in the new forrest, by glancing of an arrow (shot of a knight named Walter Tirell) was wounded to death, and so speechlesse was carried to Westminster, and there was buried. Where also is to be noted, that Richard the cosen germane of king William, and sonne to duke Robert his brother, was likewise slaine in the foresaid forrest. See the iust hand of God vpon kings vsurping wrongfully vpon other mens grounds, as did William Conqueror their father, in making this new forrest, plucking downe diuers churches and townships the compasse of thirtie miles about. Here therefore appeareth, that although men cannot reuenge, yet God reuengeth either in them, or in their posteritie, &c. This king as he alwaies vsed concubines, so left he no issue legitimate behind him. His life was such, that it is hard for a storie that should tel the truth, to say whether he was more to be commended or reproued. Among other vices in him, especially is to be rebuked in him vnmeasurable and vnreasonable couetousnes: insomuch that he coueted (if he might) to be euery mans heire. This one example of a liberall and princely nature I find in him: that vpon a time, when a certaine abbat of a place was dead, there came to his court two monks of the same house, who before had gathered much money, and made their friends to the king, and offered large offers, either of them to be promoted to that dignitie. There was also the third monke of the same place, which of meekenesse and humilitie followed the other two; to the intent that vpon him whom the king had admitted for abbat, he should giue attendance, and as his chapleine to haue with him returned. The king called before him the two monks seuerally, of whom the either outproffered the other. As the king cast his eye aside, he espied the third monke standing by, supposing that his comming had been also for the like cause. Then the king calling him, asked what he would do, whether he would giue more then his brethren had offered to be abbat. He answered to the king, and said: that hee neither had nor would (if he might) offer any pennie for it, by any such vnlawfull meane.

The death of William Rufus.

Walter Tirrell.

The new forrest.

Example of the iust hand of God reuenging the faults of kings in their posteritie.

Couetousnes noted in king William.

A famous example of bribes refused.

Two bribing monks both disappointed.

When the king had well pondered this third monks answere, he said that he was best worthie to be abbat, and to haue the rule of so holy a charge; and so gaue vnto him that benefice without taking any pennie.

Vrban excommunicated Henrie the fourth emperor.

Vrban bishop of Rome, who (as is said) succeeded after Victor, ruled the church of Rome, about the space of twelue yeres: and among his other acts, hee excommunicated the emperour Henrie the fourth of that name, as a man not much deuote to that see of Rome. But yet a worthie and victorious prince hee was; in whom albeit some vice perchance might be noted: yet none such, wherefore any prelate or minister of Christ ought to excite his subiects to rebell against publike authoritie of God appointed. This emperor Henry the fourth was by foure popes seuerally excommunicat: first by Hildebrand, by Victor, Vrban, and Paschal; Which excommunication wrought so in the ignorant and blind hearts of the people, that many (as well of the nobles as of the multitude, contrarie to their sworne allegiance) rebelliouslie conspired against their king and emperor. In number of whom, amongst the rest, was one certaine earle named Ludouicus, to whom Waltramus bishop of the church of Mergburgh (a godly and faithfull man, as appeareth) doth write letters of fatherly admonition, exhorting and instructing him in the office of obedience. Vnto the which letters hee likewise doth answere againe, by cauilling sophistication, and by meere affection, rather disposed to discord, then seeking sinceritie of truth. And for so much as in these two letters, the argument of christian obedience on both sides is so debated by proofes and reasons, as may be profitable for the reader to peruse and vnderstand: I thought therefore not to defraud the English reader of the same, whereof peraduenture some vtilitie might be taken. The tenor of the bishops letter to the earle here followeth.

Henrie the fourth emperor, by foure popes excommunicated.

Ludouicus earle conspiring and rebellious against the emperor.

The epistle of Waltramus bishop of Mergburgh to the earle Ludouicus, exhorting to concord and obedience.

Anno 1090

Ex appendice Mariani Scoti.

WAltramus Dei gratia id quod est, Ludouico serenissimo principi, cum instantia orationum, semetipsum ad omnia deuotissimum. Omni regno vtilis est concordia, desiderabilis est iustitia, &c.

Concord and iust obedience necessarie in a common wealth.

In English.

Waltram by the grace of God being that he is, to Ludouike the noble prince, with instance of prayers offereth himselfe seruiceable to all things. To euery realme concord is a thing profitable, and iustice much to be desired. For this vertue is the mother of godlinesse, and the consecration of all honestie. Whosoeuer seeking after ciuill dissension, & incenseth others to effusion of blood, he is a murtherer, and partaker with him, who euer gaping & thirsting for anothers blood, goeth about seeking whom he may deuoure. You therefore, considering with your selfe (most noble prince) how God is the God of peace and not of dissension (so much as in you doth lie) haue peace with all men. God is charity, the diuell is hatred. The whole law & prophets consist in loue & charitie. He that hateth & maligneth his brother is a murtherer, & hath no part with Christ in the kingdome of God. This we read testified and protested both by him which is the truth himselfe,& by him which was the scholar of the truth: who vpon the breast of the Lord (drinking a more ful draught of the gospell) reioyceth the citie of God with abundance of plentifull flouds. In like maner that worthie vessell of election, who being rapt vp to the third heauen (not by man, but by reuelation of Iesus Christ) protesteth also, saying: Let euery soule submit himselfe to higher powers: There is no power, saith he, but of God. He that resisteth power, resisteth the ordinance of God. If that be true therfore, which certaine of our friends do iangle among women, and the vulgar sort, that we ought not to bee subdued to kingly power: then is it false which the apostle teacheth, that euery soule must submit himselfe vnder power & superiority. But can the verity lie? Or doe we seeke for experimēt of him, who spake in the apostle, Christ the Lord? Or do we prouoke the Lord? Be we stronger then hee? For what doth he but thinketh himselfe stronger then the Lord, that resisteth the ordinance of God? For there is no power but of God. But what saith the prophet? Confounded be all they that striue against thee O Lord, and the men which rupugne against thee shall perish. Rodolph, Hildebrand, Egbert, with many other princes, resisted the ordinãce of God in Henrie the emperor. And lo, euen as they had neuer been, so are they now perished; and as their end was euil, so their beginning could not be good.

Digitized by Google

Disobedience punished of God.

Now therfore, forsomuch as they which be contrarie to vs do earnestly striue against vs euen with their owne arguments, wheras of right (I dare refer me to your iudgement) we ought to vse the authority of Christ & ancient fathers, before that which our aduersaries take out of their own treasurie: And becauſe I will not refuse the order of law in this behalfe; let it bee the end of the strife, that either I may be openly shamed before the people, either else (the victorie falling on our side) we may win you to the obedience of our soueraigne lord the emperor. Also take you heed to this saying; If any man doe preach otherwise then that which is preached, let him be of you accursed. This curse, I say, doth not proceed from any new prophane authoritie, but is thundred downe from the third heauen. And of them which know not the righteousnes of God, but goe about to stablish their owne righteousnesse, and therefore bee not subiect to the righteousnes of God, I may boldly say; let such be accursed. So may you well say, Confounded bee all they that proudly rise vp against the Lord; but thy seruant (O Lord) shall reioyce. For as thou hast well said, Without me you can doe nothing, so in iudging of the wicked thou dost not condemne the iust. Who art thou that iudgest another mans seruant, to his owne lord whether he doth stand or fall?

Gal.

Iohn.

Rom.

The answere of earle Lewis to bishop Waltram.

A railing answere to the former letter of bishop Waltram.

THe earle Lewis to the lord Waltram, howsoeuer vnworthie or vnmeet he be for the name. Like as a good man from the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good fruit, so doth the euill man from the euill treasure of the heart bring forth euill fruit. What arrogancie hath so possest you, to prouoke my displeasure with such iniurious contumelies? For indeed those my good lords and spirituall fathers, which strengthen mee in the way of righteousnes: you (railingly) call them bloodie men like vnto Satan, and the wholesome lessons which they teach, you say they are but dreams of the common people amongst foolish wome. Hath God any need of your iudgement that you should speake leasings for him? Iniquitie hath taught your mouth to follow blasphemous tongues: so that well may the prophet say of you, He would not vnderstand to doe well, hee hath deuised wickednes vpon his bed. Although therefore you being altogither froward, haue only spoken froward things: yet we haue determined to set a watch before your mouth, like as if a shameles person should stand vp before vs: & the word of God doth prouoke vs, saying: Answer a foole according to his owne foolishnesse, lest he should seeme wise in his owne opinion. Shall follie speake & wisedome hold hir peace? Shall lies be freely vttered, & truth compelled to keepe silence? Shall darkenes couer the earth, & shal not the Lord arise & shine? yea rather the light hath lightened the darkenes, & darkenes hath not comprehended it. In consideration hereof our hearts haue melted, and our zealous meditation haue set vs on fire. We therfore speake and crie, and the little foxes which vndermine the Lords vincyards (as much as in vs is) we driue away, fearing the threatning prophecie: You haue not withstood our aduersaries, neither haue you made a bulworke for the defence of the house of Israel, that you might be able to stand in battell in the day of the Lord. Let them heare (I speake not to you which haue eares and heare not, eyes and see not, which haue made darke the light that is in you) but let them heare (I say) that bee well disposed, and haue eares to heare withall: as for you, you haue no vnderstanding, and if you haue you cloke it. Neither haue you any thing to say or to proue, by what reason wee should be subiect to the lord Henrie whom you call emperor. And yet (as it is giuen vs to vnderstand) you goe about to persuade, that of necessitie we ought to be subiect to him, and that by the argument of S. Paul; Let euery soule be subdued to the higher powers, for there is no power but of God; he therefore that doth withstand power, doth resist Gods ordinance. The which sentence of the apostle, we say that you doe euill conceiue, and therfore euill interpret:

Well said, when you are not able to withstand his wisedome, call him a foole. Note how the earle here calleth light darknes and darknes light.

He hath vttered more reason then you are able euer to answere to.

for if euery power be of God (as you vnderstand) what is ment by that, that the Lord doth speake of some by the prophet? They did reigne and were not made princes by me, and I knew them not. If euery power be of God as you take it, what is to be thought of that, that the Lord doth say: If thine eye offend thee, plucke it out, and cast it from thee? For what is power, but the eye? Certainely, Aug. in the exposition of this sentence of the apostle (Let euery soule, &c:) doth say, that if the powers do command any thing against God, then haue them in contempt: but yet neuertheless feare them. Is there any iniquitie with God? Is Christ the minister of sin? God forbid. What shall we therefore say? Doth the apostle preach contrarie to truth? Aug. saith, No. One wind filleth many pipes of diuers tunes. Therefore let vs heare the apostle agreeing and expounding himselfe, and destroying his enemie and auenger: There is (saith he) no power but of God. What followeth? He therefore (saith he) that doth resist the power, &c: God forbid, doth nothing follow? But what doth follow? Those powers which bee ordained of God truely, that is it we looke for. O crafty tongue, O hart imagining mischief, O consuming breath that shal not returne, why hast thou lied to the Holy ghost? Thine owne conscience shall accuse thee. Behold the wicked fleeth and no man doth pursue him. Why would you suppresse the truth to the intent to deceiue? Why stole ye away the pith & effect of this sentence? For if these words should be taken away from the midst of the sentence, it should lie (contrarie to it selfe) inconuenient and halfe dead. The word of the Lord is herein fulfilled, He that diggeth a pit for his neighbour shall fall therin himselfe. Verily you can neither excuse you of theft, neither auoid the punishment due for the same. O vnhappie man! what shall you answere to the iudge, when he shall require an account of his seruants of whom he putteth you in trust, seeing you shall be set before him in the midst, & proued a picker of your masters treasure? Wherefore did you not feare the iudgement & execution, when as the guiltines of offence doth require condigne punishment? The apostle through the Holy ghost did foresee, that you and such heretiks as you are should spring in the church, which should cal good euill, & euill good, & that should put darkenes in place of light, & light in place of darkenes, which also should take occasion by the sentences of truth to bring in error: when as he did set this before, There is no power but of God: to the intent he might take away the coniecture of false vnderstanding. For (saith he) those powers that be, are ordained of God. Giue therfore an ordinarie power, and we doe not resist, yea we will forthwith doe our homage. But I doe maruell (if at the least there remaine in you any one drop of blood) that you are not ashamed, to call the lord Henrie a king, or to allow him any ordinarie place.

Whether euery power is to be obeyed or no. Ose.8.

If euery power which offendeth his subiects is to be cast out, then hath this earle made a fatre argument.

How finely these papists describe themselues in their owne colour.

But Paul iudged the emperor to be an ordinarie power, when he appealed to him.

Is this a seemely order (thinke you) to giue place to wickednesse, and to make a generall confusion in mixing good and euill, Gods and mans deuices togither? Either do you thinke this good order for man to sin against his owne body, as (oh shamefull wickednesse) to make his owne wife a common harlot, a mischiefe not heard of at any time since the beginning of the world before now? Or do you allow this for good order, when as the Lord saith, Defend the widows, especially such as require equitie of iustice, and then them to send away most filthily defiled? Mad Orestes doth protest him to be out of his wit that will say these things to be orderly or well done. Vntill this most miserable time, nature hath euer loued secrecie; but your king giuen vp to a reprobrte sense, hath vncouered the priuities of nature, who hath not let to lay abrode all shamefastnesse. We will not speake of other things which cannot be numbred, that is to say, burning of churches, robberies, firing of houses, manslaughters, murders, and such like, the number wherof he knoweth, and not we: for let vs speake chiefly of those things which most grieue the church of God. Harken therfore to true & not fained things: Harken, I say, to matters of earnest, & to no trifles. Euery one that doth sell spirituall dignities, is an heretike. But the lord Henrie, whom they call a king, doth sell both bishopriks and abbacies: for truly he sold for money the bishoprike of Constance, Babemberge, Mentz, and many others. The bishoprikes of Ratisbone, Augusta, and Strausbrough he sold for a sword, & the abbey of Fulda for adulterie: and for filthie sodomitrie hee sold the bishoprike of Mon. A wickednesse it is to speake or heare of such a fact. The which things if without shame ye wil denie, he is to be condemned by the witnesse of heauen & earth: yea & of the silly poore idiots that come from the smiths forge. Wherfore the lord Henry is an heretik, for the which most wicked euils he is excommunicate from the see apostolike, so that he may not exercise either kingdom or power ouer vs which be catholike. And wheras you burthen vs with hatred of our brethren, know you that we purpose not to hate any of affection, but of a godly zeale. God forbid that we should thinke Henry worthy to be accounted amongst our christian brethren, who indeed is reputed for an ethnike and publican, in that he refused to heare the church which so oft hath reproued him. The hatred of whom we offer vnto God for a great sacrifice, saying with the Psalmist: Lord shall not I hate them that hate thee? and shall not I triumph ouer thine enemies? I hate them with an inward hatred that be enemies to me for thy sake. The truth it selfe commending the worthinesse of this hatred, doth say: If any doe not hate father and mother, brethren and sisters for my sake,

This is likely, that the emperor would make his owne wife a common harlot.

Euill will neuer said well.

A zeale, but far from knowledge.

And when they shall slay you, they shall thinke they doe God great seruice. Ioh.16.

Digitized by Google

sake, he cannot be my disciple. We are not therefore iustly to be reproued of hatred, which do giue ouer our owne soule to bee in the way of God: who indeed are commanded to hate father and mother, and euery affection which doth withstand vs for walking in the path of God. Hereof it commeth, that we labor with al our studie and indeauour to beware of the enimies of the church, and them to hate; not for that they bee our enimies, but Gods. Further, where you persuade peace to bee had with all men, you must remember what the apostle doth put before, If it may be. But if it cannot be that we can haue peace with them, who can be contrarie to God? Who doth not know the Lord our sauiour, to commend not onely peace, when as hee saith; My peace I giue vnto you, my peace I leaue vnto you: but that he is the peace (as saith the apostle:) he is the peace which made of both one: for hee calleth him our peace, speaking in commendation of the peace: Think not (saith he) that I came to send peace, for I came not to send peace, but the sword. What is meant by this? Why is peace called a sword? Or doth peace bid battell? Yea truely, to destroy the peace of the diuell. For the diuell hath his peace, wherof the Lord speaketh: When as the strong man keepeth his house, he doth possesse all his substance in peace. Oh how mightilie doth the diuell keepe his souldiers and his house in this time! who with the shield of falshood, and the helmet of vntruth, so doth defend him, that hee will not suffer either arrow or dart of truth to pierce him. Neuertheless, our Lord being more strongly armed, and fiercely comming vpon your giant, is able to ouercome him and to take away his weapons, wherein hee putteth his trust. We are not therfore to be blamed, if we do detest that peace, more cruell then any war, the which the truth it selfe did reprooue, weeping ouer Ierusalem, and saying: Truely, it grieueth me this day to see sinners in peace; being like vnto that peace, whereat the Psalmist was offended. Whereas you condemne pope Gregorie, king Rodulphus, and marques Eggebertus, as men that haue died of an vnhappie death, and do magnifie your lord, because he doth ouerliue them: it doth plainely (forsooth) appeare, that you remaine voide of all spirituall consideration. Is it not better to die well, then to liue ill? They be truely happie, who suffer persecution for righteousnesse sake. By the same reason may you esteeme Nero, Herod, and Pilat happie, in that they ouerliued Peter, Paul, Iames apostles, and Iesus Christ. What can be said more foolish and wicked then this opinion? Wherefore refraine your babling tongue from this blasphemie, lest that you place your selfe in the number of them, which seeing the end of the iust to be glorious (themselues doing late and vnfruitfull penance, bewailing in the anguish of the spirit) shal say: These be they whom sometime we had in derision & laughed to scorne, we being out of our wits, thought their liues madnesse, & their end to bee without honor. Behold how they be allowed to bee amongst the children of God, and their portion is amongst the saints. Wherefore we haue erred from the way of truth, and the brightnesse of righteousnesse did not shine vpon vs. What did our pride auaile vs? And what profit did the boasting of our riches bring vs? They are all vanished away like a shadow. The which words we haue registred vp into perpetuall memory, and we do despise euery attempt that shall lift vp it selfe against the truth of God; and reioycing in troubles, we may be reproued, put to shame and rebuked, yea and finally be slaine and killed, but we will neither yeeld, nor bee ouercome. And with great triumph will we reioyce in our fathers doings, of whom you (as a beardlesse boy, and of small knowledge) haue not rightly conceiued: who indeed despising princes commandements, haue deserued euerlasting reward.

Yea true, if he had compelled you to forsake the name of Christ, which he neuer did.

Oh how craftilie doth Satan here shape himselfe to an angell of light!

There is a certaine chronicle in old English meeter, which among other matters speaking of William Rufus, declareth him to be so sumptuous and excessiue in pompous apparel, that hee being not contented with a paire of hose of a low price, which was three shillings, caused a paire to bee bought of a marke; whereupon his chamberleine procuring a paire much worse then the other before, said:

That they costened a marke, and vnneth he them so bought:
Yea belamie (quoth the king) they are well bought.

Whereby is to be noted what difference is to be seene betweene the hose of princes then, & the hose of seruingmen now.

Ex vetusto chronico.

Appendix historiæ.

After the time of this king William, the name of kings ceased in the countrie of Wales among the Britaines, since king Ris, who in the reigne of this king, the yeare of our Lord 1093, was slaine in Wales. Ex continuatione Roger. Houed.

Kings ceased in Wales.

King Henrie the first.

{Anno 1100}

HEnry the first of that name, the third son of William Conquerour, succeeding his brother Rufus, began his reigne in England, the yeere of our Lord 1100, who for his knowledge and science in the seuen liberall arts was surnamed Clerke or Beuclerke. In whom may well appeare, how knowledge and learning doth greatly conduce to the gouernment and administration of any realme or countrie. At the beginning he reformed the state and condition of the clergie, released the grieuous paiments, reduced againe king Edwards lawes, with emendation thereof; hee reformed the old and vntrue measures, and made a measure after the length of his arme, he greatly abhorred excesse of meats and drinks, many things misused before his time hee reformed, and vsed to vanquish more by counsell then by sword. Such persons as were nice and wanton, he secluded from his court. This man (as appeareth) little fauoured the vsurped power of the bishop of Rome. Soone after he was king, hee married Matild or Maud, daughter of Malcolme king of Scots, and of Margaret his wife, daughter of Edward the outlaw, as is before specified, being a professed nun in Winchester, whom notwithstanding (without the popes dispensation) he married by the consent of Anselme, by the which Maud he receiued two sons, William and Richard, and two daughters, Maud and Marie, which Maud afterward was married to Henry the fift emperor, &c.

Henrie Beuclerke the first, king of England.

What learning doth in a prince.

The lawes of king Edwards reduced.

The measure of England made after the length of king Henries arme.

Wanton persons remoued out of the court.

Ex Mat. Paris. Flor. hist.

In the second yeare of his reigne, Robert his elder brother duke of Normandie, who being occupied in the christian warres against the Turks, and being elect (as you heard) king of Ierusalem, hearing of the death of Rufus, refused the kingdome thereof: for the which (as is thought) he neuer sped well after. Thus the said Robert leauing off the Lords businesse, and returning into Normandie, made there his preparation, and came ouer into England with a great host to challenge the crowne: but by mediation of the lords it was agreed vpon, that Robert should haue yearely during his life three thousand marks, as was likewise promised him before by king Rufus his brother: and whether of them ouerliued the other, to be the others heire. And thus Robert departed againe into Normandie, to the great discontentation of his lords there. But in few yeares after, the forenamed tribute of three thousand marks through the meanes of queene Maud, was released to the king his brother. In processe of time, variance falling betweene king Henrie and the said Robert his brother: at length Robert in his war was taken prisoner and brought ouer into England, and was put into the castle of Cardife in Wales, where hee continued as prisoner while he liued.

Example what it is to leane off the Lords businesse.

Duke Robert taken prisoner.

In this time, as about the third yeare of this king, the hospitall of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield was founded (by meanes of a minstrell belonging vnto the king, named Raier) and after it was finished by Richard Whittington alderman and maior of London. This place of Smithfield was at y day a lay stal of all ordure or filth, and the place where the felons and other transgressors of the kings lawes were put to execution.

The hospitall of Bartholomew founded. Raier and Richard Whittington founders of saint Bartholomewes in London.

Diuers strict lawes were by this king prouided, especially against theeues and felons: that whosoeuer were taken in that fault, no money should saue him from hanging.

Item, that whoso did counterfeit false money, should haue both his eyes and nether parts of his body cut off.

Item, in the same councell was decreed an order for priests to be sequestred from their wiues, which before were not forbidden, according as the words of mine author do purport, whose words be these: Anselmus prohibuit vxores sacerdotibus Anglorum, antè non prohibitas. Quod quibusdam mundissimum visum est, quibusdam periculosum, ne dum mundicias viribus maiores appeterent, in immundicias horribiles ad christiani nominis summum dedecus inciderent, &c. Henr. Hunt.

Ex Hen. lib. 7. Anselmus.

Item, it was then decreed, that monks and priests should beare no rule ouer lay persons.

Item, it was then decreed concerning brodering of haire, and wearing of garments.

Item, that the secret contract betweene a yong lad and a yong maid should not stand: with other things more concerning the excommunication of Sodomits, &c.

In the storie of William Rufus before, was declared how Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie departing out of the realme, went vnto the pope; who after the death of king William was sent for againe by the foresaid king Henrie, and so returned againe, and was at the councell of the king at Westminster; where the king in the presence of the lords as well temporall as spirituall, ordained and inuested two bishops, Roger bishop of Salisburie, and Roger bishop of Hereford. During which parliament or councell of the king, Anselme in his conuocation deposed and displaced diuers abbats and other prelats from their rowmes and dignities: either for that they lawfully came not by them, or vprightly did not administer the same.

The king ordeined and inuested bishops without the pope.

After this councell, and the other before set forth by Anselme, Herbert bishop of Norwich, had much adoe with the priests of his diocesse: for they would neither leaue their wiues nor yet giue ouer their benefices. Whereupon he wrote to Anselme the archbishop for counsell, what was to be done therin. Which Anselme required him (as he did others more the same time by writing) to persuade the people of Northfolke and Suffolke: that as they professed christianity, they should subdue them as rebels against the church, and vtterly to driue both them and their wiues out of the countrie, placing monks in their rowmes, as by the epistles of the said Anselme doth appeare. Wherof certaine parcels shall hereafter (by the grace of Christ) insue for the better euidence of this and the other his acts aboue recited.

Herbert Bishop of Norwich driueth his priests from their wiues had much adoe.

Anselme cruell and fierce against married priests. Ex epist. Ansel. 176.

The like businesse also had Gerard the archbishop of Yorke, in depriuing the priests of his prouince from their wiues:

which thing with all his excommunications and thundrings he could hardly bring about. Upon this ruffling of Anselme with married priests, were riming verses made to helpe the matter withall, when reason could not serue. Which verses for the follie thereof I thought here to annex.

Versus malè fe-riati, ex bibliis Rumsey.

O malè viuentes, versus audite sequentes,
Vxores vestras, quas odit summa potestas,
Linquite propter eum, tenuit qui morte trophæum.
Quod si non facitis, inferna claustra petetis.
Christi sponsa iubet, ne presbyter ille ministret,
Qui tenet vxorem, Domini quia perdit amorem:
Contradicentem fore dicimus insipientem:
Non ex rancore loquor hæc, potius sed amore.

§ Anno § 1103

A strife betweene king Henrie and Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie.

About the end of the third yeare of this king, which was the computation of our Lord 1103, a variance fell betweene king Henrie and Anselme, the occasion whereof was this. Ye heard a little before how Henrie the foresaid king had of his owne authoritie inuested two bishops, one Roger which was chancellor, bishop of Salisburie: and another bishop of Hereford. Besides them diuers also he inuested, and diuers other like things toke hee vpon him in the ecclesiasticall state, which hee might lawfully do, Gods word allowing well the same: but because it was restrained by the bishop of Rome for him so to doe, this Anselme swelled, fretted and waxed so mad, that he would neither consent to it, neither yet confirme them, nor communicate nor talke friendly with them, whom the king had instituted and inuested: but opprobriously called them abortiues, or children of destruction, disdainefully rebuking the gentle king as a defiler of religion and pollutor of their holy ceremonies: as witnesseth Polydorus. With this vncomely outrage the king was much displeased (as he might full well) and required Gerard the archbishop of Yorke (as he ought him allegiance) to consecrat them: who without delay did so, well performing the same, saving that one William Giffard, to whom the king had giuen the bishoprike of Winchester, refused to take his consecration by the hands of the archbishop of Yorke. For the which cause the king (worthilie with him offended) depriued him both of bishoprike and goods, and banished him the realme.

Giffard bishop of Winchester refuseth to be consecrated by the archbishop of Yorke.

A strife betweene king Henrie and Anselme archbishop of Canturburie. Ex Guli. lib. 1. de gestis.

Moreouer, the king required of Anselme the archbishop of Canturburie, to doe vnto him homage after the maner of his ancestors, as witnesseth Guliel. de gestis pontif. Anglo. Also it was asked of the said Anselme, whether that he would be with the king in giuing inuestures, as Lanfrancus his predecessor was with his father. To whom Anselme said, that he promised not at any time, that hee would enter into this order, to keepe the law or custom of his father, as Lanfrancus did. Moreouer, as concerning homage to be done to the king, that he refused, alleging the censures of the popes excommunication, who in his councell of Rome a little before, had giuen forth open sentence of excommunication, vpon all such laie persons (whatsoeuer they were) that should from henceforth confer or giue any spirituall promotions: also vpon them that receiued them at their hands, either yet should consecrate any such receiuers. Moreouer, he accursed all them that for benefices or other ecclesiasticall promotions should subiect themselues vnder the homage or seruice of any great man, king, prince, duke, or earle of the laitie. For it was vnseemely (said the pope) and a thing very execrable, that the hands which were conuerted into so high a working, as was granted to no angel (that is, to create him with their crosses, which created all, and to offer vp the same before the sight of the father for the saluation of the whole world) should be brought to such a slauerie, as to bee subiect to those filthie hands, which both day and night are polluted with shamefull touchings, robberies and bloodshed, &c. This decree of pope Urban, Anselme alleging for himselfe, denied to subiect himselfe to the kings homage, fearing (as he said) the popes excommunication. Vpon this, messengers were sent to Rome on both parts vnto the pope (then Paschalis) who stoutly standing to the steps & determinations of Urban his predecessor, would in no case yeeld to the kings inuesting.

Acts of the Roman councell against laymen to giue any spirituall promotions. No spirituall person to be vnder subiection to any lay personage. Ex Iornalensis bibliotheca historia. Anselme refuseth to do homage to his king. Messengers sent to Rome. Ex Matthæo Paris. Ex Guliel. lib. 1. de gestis pont. Ang.

In the meane time, while there was long disputation on both sides for inuesting; the nobles of the realme contended, that inuestings did belong to the kings dignitie: wherefore the king calling for Anselme againe, required him either to doe homage to him, or else to voide his kingdome. To whom Anselme replying againe, required the popes letters to be brought forth, and according to the tenor thereof, so the matter to bee decided. For now the messengers were returned from Rome, with the popes answere, altogither bearing with Anselme. Then said the king: What haue I to doe with the popes letters? I will not forgo the liberties of my kingdom for any pope. Thus the contention continued betweene them. Anselme saith, hee would not out of the realme, but depart home to his church: and there see who would offer him any violence, and so did. Not long after, message came from the king to Anselme, requesting him after a gentle sort, to repaire to the kings presence againe, to set an end of the controuersie begun: whereunto Anselme granted and came. Then were new ambassadors sent againe to the pope, that he would something qualifie and moderate (or rather abolish) the straitnesse of the Roman decree before mentioned. On the part of Anselme went two monks, Baldewinus and Alexander. On the kings behalfe were sent two bishops, Robert, bishop of Lichfield, and Herbert bishop of Norwich, with the kings letters written vnto the pope, containing in forme as followeth.

The king hath nothing to do with the popes letters.

Messengers sent againe to Rome.

Patri venerabili Paschali summo pontifici, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum, salutem. Promotioni vestræ in sedem sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ plurimùm congaudeo, petens vt amicitia quæ patrimeo cùm antecessoribus vestris fuit, inter nos quoque illibata permaneat. Vnde, vt dilectio & benignitas a me videatur sumere initium, beneficiũ quod ab antecessoribus meis beatus Petrus habuit, vobis mitto: eósque honores & eam obedientiam quam tempore patris mei antecessores vestri in regno Angliæ habuerunt, tempore meo vt habeatis volo, eo videlicet tenore, vt dignitatis vsus & consuetudines, quas pater meus tempore antecessorum vestrorum in regno Angliæ habuit, ego tempore vestro in eodem regno meo integrè obtineam. Notúmque habeat sanctitas vestra, quòd me viuente (Deo auxiliante) dignitates & vsus regni Angliæ non minuentur. Et si ego (quod absit) in tanta me dilectione ponerem: optimates mei (imo totius Angliæ populus) id nullo modo paterentur. Habita igitur (charissime pater) vtiliori deliberatione, ita se erga nos moderetur benignitas vestra, ne quid inuitus faciam, & a vestra me cogatis recedere obedientia. In English.

The letter of king Henrie the first vnto the pope.

To the reuerend father Paschall the chiefe bishop, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, greeting. For this your promotion vnto the see of the holy church of Rome, as I am heartily glad: so my request is to you, that the friendship and amity, which hath beene tofore betweene my father and your predecessors in times past, may now also betweene vs in like maner continue vndiminished. And that loue and gentlenesse may first begin on my part; here I send to you that gift that S. Peter had in former time of my predecessors. And likewise the same honors and obedience, which your predecessors haue had in the realme of England before in the time of my father, I will you to haue the same in my time also: after this forme I meane and tenor, that the vsage and maner of dignitie and customs which my father hath had in this realme of England in the time of your ancestors; I in like ample maner also now in your time may fully inioy the same in this the said realme of England. Thus therefore be it knowne to your holinesse, that during this life of mine (God almightie abling me to the same) these aboue mamed dignities, vsages, and customes of this realme of England, shall in no part be lessened. Yea, and if that I (as God forbid I should) would so much deiect my selfe vnto such cowardnesse: yet my nobles, yea the whole people of England in no case would suffer it. Wherefore (deare father) vsing with your selfe a better deliberation in the matter, let your gentlenesse so moderat it selfe towards vs, lest ye compell me (which I shal do against my will) to recede and depart vtterly from your obedience.

Spoken like a king.

The king is at a point to leaue the popes obedience.

At the same terme also hee sent another letter or epistle to the said pope, craning of him the pall for Gerardus archbishop of Yorke, the forme whereof here also followeth.

Another letter of king Henrie the first, sent to the pope

Reuerendo & diligendo patri vniuersali papæ Paschali, Henricus Dei gratia rex Anglorum, salutem. Amor quem plurimùm erga vos habeo, & benignitas quæ multùm vestros actus exornat, &c. In English.

To the reuerend and welbeloued father, vniuersall pope Paschalis, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, greeting. The great loue which I beare to you, and the no lesse gentlenesse in you, which not a little beautifieth your doings, ministreth to me boldnesse to write. And whereas I thought to haue retained still this Gerardus with me, and to haue craued your pall for him by letters: yet notwithstanding, when his desire could not otherwise be satisfied, but would needs present himselfe before your presence, by his owne heart to craue of you the same, I haue sent him vp vnto you, desiring your benigne fatherhood in this behalfe, that he obtaining the pall at your hands, may be sent home againe to me. And thus requring the assistance of your praiers, I pray the Lord long to conserue your apostleship.

This second letter of the king in sending for the pall, was well taken of all the court of Rome, which (as mine author saith) procured such fauor to Gerardus archbishop of Yorke, and bringer therof: that no complaint of his aduersaries afterwards could hurt him with the pope. Notwithstanding he was accused grieuously for diuers things, and specially for not standing to the consecration of Anselme archbishop of Canturburie.

A place of Polydorus Virg. found faultie. Ex Guliel. lib. 1. de pont. Ang.

Polydorus in his eleuenth booke of his English historie affirmeth, that Anselmus also went vp to Rome with Gerardus, about the same cause. But both the premises and sequell of the storie argue that to be vntrue, for what needed the two monks to be sent vp on Anselms side, if hee had gone vp himselfe? Againe, how could the pope write downe by the said messengers to Anselme, if hee had there been himselfe present? For so proceedeth the storie by the narration of Malmesburie and others.

After

The pope loth to goe against his owne profit.

After the ambassadors (thus on both sides sent vp to Rome) had labored their cause with instant sute, one against the other; the pope glad to gratifie the king (yet loth to grant his request, being against his owne profit, and therefore more inclining to Anselms side) sendeth downe his letters to the said Anselme, signifying that he would not repeale the statutes of his holy fathers for one mans pleasure: charging him moreouer, not only not to yelde in the cause of inuesting, but constantly to adhere to the foresaid decreement of pope Urban his predecessor, &c. Besides this letter to Anselme, he directed also another to the king himselfe: which letter, mine author saith, the king suppressed and did not shew, onely declaring by word of mouth, what the ambassadors had said vnto him from the pope. Which was, that he permitted vnto him the licence of inuesting, vpon condition that in other things hee would execute the office of a good prince, &c. To this also the testimony of the two bishops aboue minded, did accord, which made the matter more probable. But the two monks on the other side replied againe, bringing forth the letter of Anselme to the contrary, &c. To them was answered againe, that more credit was to be giuen to the degree and testimony of the bishops, then to theirs. And as for monks, they had no suffrage nor testimony (said they) in secular matters, and therefore they might hold their peace. But this is no secular matter, said Baldwine abbat of Ramsey. Whereunto the nobles againe of the kings part answered, saying; that he was a good man, and of such demeanor, as they had nothing to say against him, neither so would if they might: but yet both humane and diuine reason taught them so, to yeelde more credit and confidence to the testimony of three bishops, then of two monks. Whereby may well appeare, that Anselme at that time went not with them. Then Anselme seeing the king and his peeres how they were set, and hearing also the testimony of the three bishops, against whom he saw he could not preuaile, and also hauing the popes seale, which hee saw to be so euident on the contrary side, made his answere againe; that he would send to Rome for a more certainty of truth. Adding moreouer, that he neither would, nor durst giue ouer his cause, though it should cost him his life, to do or proceed against the determination of the church of Rome, vnlesse he had a perfect warrant of absolution from thence, for his discharge. Then was it agreed by the king and his nobles, that hee should not send, but go himselfe to Rome. And much intreaty was made, that he would take that iourny in hand himselfe, in his owne person, to present himselfe to the pope for the peace of the church and of his country. And so at the length, by perswasion, was content, went to Rome, and spake with the pope. In short time after followeth also the kings ambassador (William Warlwast) new elect bishop of Excester, who there pleading on the kings side, for the ancient customes of the realme, and for the kings right of inuesting, &c. first declared, how England of a long continuance had euer bin a prouince peculiar to the church of Rome, and how it paied duly his yeerely tribute vnto the same. Inferring moreouer how the king, as he was of nature very liberal, so also of courage a prince stout and valiant. Then what a shame would he thinke it should be to him (as it were indeed) if he, who in might and dignity far exceeded all his progenitors, should not defend and maintaine the liberties and customes by them procured? Wherefore he desired the pope to see to the matter, so as might stand both with the kings honor, and also with his owne profit and aduantage; who otherwise no doubt should lose a great peece of mony out of the realme, vnlesse he did remit something of the seuerity of his canons and lawes decretall.

He meaneth beside the two bishops, Gerardus, which made the third.

Anselme a denout chaplen to the church of Rome.

Anselme tourneth againe to Rome.

The effect of the oration of M. Warlwast at the popes court.

With these and such other perswasions like to the same effect, the court of Rome was well contented, agreeing that the kings request ought with all fauor to be granted. But the pope and Anselme sat still marking their doings. The ambassador supposing their silence to be halfe a yeelding vnto him, added moreouer and said; that the king, no not for the crowne of his realme, would lose the authority of inuesting or admitting his prelats within his dominion. Whereunto the proud pope answering againe, burst out in these words: Nor I (said he) for the price of this head (as thou saiest) will lose the giuing of spirituall promotions in England, and confirming it with an oth (Before God saith he I speake it) know it for a certaine, &c. Then it followeth in the story of Malmesbury: With this word of the pope, the mindes of the rest were changed, saying: Benedicta sit cordis tui constantia, benedicta oris tui loquela. The kings attorny also was therewith dashed, who notwithstanding yet brought to passe, that certaine of the kings customes vsed before of his father, were released vnto him. At the which time in the same court was decreed, that (the king only which had inuested them, being excepted) the other which were inuested by the king, to be excommunicated: the absolution and satisfaction of whom, was left to Anselme the archbishop.

Ex Guli. de gestis pont. lib. 1.
Ex Matth. Paris. lib. 3.
A proud answer of the pope.

Excommunication abused.

Thus Anselme being dismissed from Rome, took his iournie toward England. But the ambassador pretending to goe to S. Nicolas, remained behinde, to see whether he could win the popes mind to the kings purpose. Which when he saw it would not be, he ouertaketh Anselme by the way, at Placentia, and opened to him the kings pleasure. The king (saith he) giueth to you in charge and commandement, that if you will come to England, and there behaue your selfe to him, as your predecessors did to his father, you should be receiued and retained in the realme accordingly: if not, you are wise enough (saith he) yee know what I meane, and what will follow, &c. And so with these words parting from him, returned againe to the king. Anselme remained at Lions a yere and a halfe, writting diuers letters to the king, after this effect, and words as followeth.

Anselme restrained from comming to England. Ex Radulph. Londinens.

To his reuerend lord, Henry, king of England, Anselme, archbishop of Canturbury, faithfull seruice with praiers. Epist. 224.

A letter of Anselme to king Henry.

Although you vnderstand by William Warlwast, what we haue done at Rome; yet I shall shortly shew you that belongeth to mee. When I came to Rome, I declared the cause wherefore I came to the lord pope. He answered that he would not swarue from the statutes of his predecessors. Furthermore, he commanded me that I should haue no fellowship with them that receiued inuestings of churches at your hands, after the knowledge of this prohibition, except they will doe penance, and forsake that they had receiued, without hope of recouery, neither that they should communicat with the other bishops that had consecrated such men, except they would present themselues to the iudgement of the apostolike sea. The foresaid William can be a witnesse of all these things if he will. This William when we departed asunder (reckoning vp in your behalfe the loue and liberalitie which you haue had alwaies towards me) warned me as your archbishop, that I should shew my selfe such a one, that if I would come into England, that I might be with you as my predecessour was with your father: and yee might intreat me with the same honour and liberality that your father intreated my predecessor. By which words I vnderstand, that except I should shew my selfe such a one, you would not haue mee come into England. For your loue and liberalitie I thanke you: but that I should bee with you as my predecessor was with your father, I cannot doe it. For I dare not do homage to you, nor dare communicat with them that take inuestings of churches at your hands: because of the foresaid inhibition made, I my selfe hearing it. Wherefore I desire you to send me your pleasure heerein (if it please you) whether I may returne into England (as I said) with your peace, and power of mine office.

The proud stoutnesse of a prelat in a wrong cause.

In the meane while, great businesse there was, and much posting went to and fro betweene the king, the archbishop, and the pope, but nothing was done: for neither would the pope agree to the king, neither would the king condescend to the archbishop. At last, the archbishop seeing by no meanes he could preuaile against the king, thought to reuenge himselfe by excommunication, and so went about the same. The king, hauing word thereof by the countesse Adela his sister, desireth her to come to him into Normandy, and bring Anselme with her: whereupon (through the means of the countesse) reconcilement was made, and the archbishop was restored to his former possessions againe. Only his returne into England was deferred, because he would not communicat with those whom the king had inuested. So the king tooke his passage ouer into England, and Anselme made his abode at the abby of Becke.

Anselme about to excommunicat the king.

Reconcilement made betweene the king and Anselme.

Then were ambassadors againe directed vnto Rome, William Warlwast, and Baldwin aboue named, abbat of Ramesey, who at length concluded the long controuersie betweene the king and the pope, vpon this agreement, that the king should take homage of the bishops elect, but should not deale with inuesting them by staffe & ring, &c. While the ambassadors were thus in their sute at Rome, diuers complaints were daily brought from England to Anselme, against the priests and canons, who in his absence, contrary to the late councell holden at London, receiued their wiues vnto their houses againe, and so were permitted by the king, paying him certaine mony for the same. Anselme (the more enemy against lawfull marriage) grieued therewith, addresseth his letters vnto the king, requiring him to refraine from any more taking of such exactions; declaring moreouer and affirming, that the offences of all such ecclesiasticall ministers, must be corrected by the instance of bishops, and not of lay men. To this the king answereth gently againe by letters, tempering himselfe; how he purposed shortly to come ouer into Normandy, and if he had done any thing amisse, either in these or other things, he would reforme it by his obedience.

Ambassage to Rome.

Guliel. Malmesb. lib. 1. de gest. pontif.

Priests receiued their wiues againe by the absence of Anselme.

The faults of ecclesiasticall ministers belong to none but to bishops to correct, quoth Anselme.

It was not long after (the messengers being now returned from Rome) but the king as he had promised, sped him into Normandy, where hee warring against his brother Robert, brought both him and the country of Normandy at last vnder his subiection. But first meeting with Anselme at the abby of Becke, he conuented and agreed with him in all such points as the archbishop required. As first, that all his churches, which before were made tributary vnto king William his brother, now should remaine free from all tribute. Item, that he should require nothing of the said churches or prouinces, in the time of the seat being vacant. Moreouer, concerning such priests and ministers, as had giuen mony to the king for their company with their wiues, it was agreed that they should surceasse from all

The king brought vnder the archbishop.

Conditions granted by the king to Anselme.

Digitized by Google

all ecclesiasticall function, the space of three yéeres, and that the king should take no more after such maner. Item, that all such goods, fruits, and possessions, as had been taken away before from the archbishoprick, should be restored at his comming againe into England, &c.

Lawfull matrimony punished.

Anselme returneth into England.

This Anselme, the stout champion of popery and superstition, after this victory gotten vpon the king, for the which he so long fought; with ioy and triumph saileth into England, hauing all his popish requests obtained. Where first he fleeth like a lion vpon the married priests, contrary to the word of God, diuorcing and punishing that by mans authority, which the eternall and almighty God had coupled. Next, he looketh to them, which did hold any church by farme vnder the king. Against simony likewise, and against them that married within the seuenth degrée, he proceedeth with his full pontificall authority.

Priests driuen againe from their wiues.

Anno 1106

Shortly after, as king Henry had finished his warre in Normandy, and with victory returned againe into England, about the sixth yéere of his raigne, Anselme archbishop of Canturbury (by the permission of the king) assembled a great councell at Westminster in London, of the clergy and prelats of England.

In the which by the bishop of Romes authority he so wrought with the king, that at length, albeit (as the story saith, not without great difficulty) it was newly confirmed and enacted, that no temporall man after that day, should make inuesture with crosse or with ring, or with pastorall hooke. In this councell sundry and diuers iniunctions were giuen forth to priests and deacons: as diuers other synodall acts also by the same Anselme had been concluded in other councels before. And because here falleth in mention of the acts synodall concluded in the time of this Anselme, I thought here good to packe them all in one generall heape together, as we find them in Malmesbury, and in other sundry authors scatteringly recited.

Ex lib. Guliel. de gestis pontifi. l. 1. Ex Iornalensi & alijs.

The first thing decréed by this Anselme in his synodal councels, was touching the fault of simonie, whereby diuers both bishops and abbats (as is aforesaid) were at the same time deposed. And lay men forbidden to conferre any ecclesiasticall promotion.

Priestly apparell.

Also it was decréed, that no bishop should beare any office in secular mens businesse or meetings. And that such should not goe apparrelled as the lay men did, but should haue their vestures decent and meet for religious persons. And that in all places they should neuer go without some to beare witnesse of their conuersation.

Archdeaconries not to be farmed.

Item, that no archdeaconries should be let out to farme.

Item, that no archdeacon should be vnder the degrée of a deacon.

Mariage of priests forbidden.

Item, that no archdeacon, priest, deacon, subdeacon, colligener, nor canon, should from thencefoorth marry a wife, nor yet kéep her, if he had been maried to one before.

How of chastitie brought in.

Item, that euery subdeacon, being vnder the degrée of a canon (after the profession of chastity, marrying a wife) should be subiect to the same rule.

Benefices not to goe by heritage.

They ordained also, that a priest kéeping company with his wife, should be reputed vnlawfull, and that he should say no masse; and if he said masse, he should not be heard.

They charged that none were admitted to orders from that time forward, from the degrée of a subdeacon, vnlesse he did profesle chastity.

That priests sonnes should not claime by heritage the benefices of their fathers, as the custome had alwaies béene before.

How then was Steuen Gardiner lord chancellor in queene Maries time?

Item, that no spirituall person should sit in any secular office, as to be procurators or iudges of bloud.

Item, that priests should not resort to tauerns, or bankets, nor sit drinking by the fire side.

That the garments of priests should be of one colour, and that their shoes should be decent.

Priests crowns
Tithes.
Buying of prebends.
Building of chapels.
Euery church to finde his own priest.
Abbats to maintaine no war.

Item, that monks or any other of the clergy (if they forsake their order) either to come againe, or to be excommunicated.

Item, that the men of the clergy should weare broad crownes.

Item, that no tithes should be giuen but to the church.

Item, that no churches or prebends should be bought.

That no new chapels should bee made without consent of the bishop.

That no church should be hallowed, before the necessary prouision were made for the priest, and for the church to be maintained.

That abbats should set forth no men to war, and that they must both léep and eat in the same house with their monks, vnlesse some great necessity doe let.

Monks limited in giuing penance.

Item, that monks doe inioine no penance to any man without the knowledge of his abbat. And that their abbats may giue no licence therein, but onely for such persons whose charge they haue of soule.

Monks no godfathers, nor nuns godmothers.

That no monks should bee godfathers, nor nuns godmothers.

Abby lands.

That monks should haue no lordships to farme.

Item, that monks should take no churches but by the bishop, neither should so spoile and oppresse the churches giuen to them, with their rents, that sufficient were not left for the ministers of the same.

Impropriations restrained.

That priuie contract betweene man and woman without witnesse should not stand, but be frustrat if each party doe goe from the contract.

Priuy contracts.

Item, that such as weare long haire of the clergy, be so rounded, that part of their eare appeare, and that their eies be not couered.

Rounding.

Item, that there be no matrimoniall copulation, within the seuenth degrée of kindred, nor so to continue if they bee maried: but the marriage to be broken. And if any being priuie to that incest, do not detect the same, he to be guilty of the same crime.

Mariage within the seuenth degree restrained.

Item, that no funerall or burynges be without their owne parish church, so that the priest thereof doe lose that which to him is due.

Burynges.

Item, that no man vpon any newe fangled rashnesse, do attribute any reuerence or opinion of holinesse to dead mens bodies, to fountaines, or to any other thing (as the vse hath been in times past) without authority of the bishop.

No holinesse to be giuen to shrines and places.

Item, that no buying and selling be vsed hereafter in England of men, as of other cattell.

Selling and buying of men.

Item, after the restraint of priests marriage, when filthy sodomitry began to come in the place thereof, then were they forced also to make an act for that; which was this.

Sodomitry.

With a grieuous curse we condemne both them that occupie the vngratious vice of sodomitry, and them also that willingly assist them, or be wicked doers with them in the same, till such time as they may deserue absolution by penance and confession.

A flay with a for taile for sodomitry.

So that whatsoeuer he be that is noised or proued to be of this wickednes (if he be a religious person) he shal from thencefoorth be promoted to no degrée of honor, and that which he hath shall be taken from him.

If he be a lay person, he shall bee depriued of all his fréedome within the land, and be no better then a forrener.

And because it shal be knowne, the absolution of such as be secular, to belong only to bishops: it was therfore enacted, that on euery sunday in euery parish church of England, the said excommunication should be published, &c.

But marke in this great matter what followed. For as Ranulphus Cestrensis witnesseth: this grieuous generall curse was sone called backe againe by the sute of certaine, which perswaded Anselme, that the publication or opening of that vice, gaue kindlings to the same in the hearts of lewd persons, ministring occasion of more boldnesse to them to doe the like. And so to stop the occasion of filthy sodomitry, the publication thereof was taken away; but the forbidding and restrainment of priests vnlawfull mariage (which chiefly was the cause thereof) remained still. And thus euer since horrible sodomitry remained in the clergy both for lacke of marriage more vsed, and for lacke of publication lesse punished.

Ranulph. Cestrensis, lib. 7.

Note the preposterous proceeding of Anselme in ceasing the vice of sodomitry.

Besides all these synodall acts aboue comprehended, and giuen out by Anselme in his councels before, here also in this present councell at Westminster, in the yéere of this king aforesaid, he also directed other new iniunctions to the priests.

First, that they and their wiues should neuer more meet in one house, neither yet haue dwelling in their territories.

Penalties and forfets against priests that keepe their wiues.

Item, that the priests, deacons, and subdeacons, should kéepe no woman in their house, vnlesse they were of their next kin.

Item, for such as had disseuered themselues from the society of their wiues, yet for some honest cause they had to common with them, they might, so it were without doore, and with two or three lawfull witnesses.

In the latter dates shal come false teachers, forbidding mariage, and eating of meats, &c.

Item, if any of them should be accused by two or three witnesses, and could not purge himselfe againe by sir able men of his owne order (if he be a priest, or if he be a deacon by foure, or if he be a subdeacon by two) then he should be iudged a transgressor of the statutes, depriued of his benefice, and be made infamous, or be put to open reproch of all men.

Item, he that rebelled, as in contempt of this new statute, held still his wife, and presumed to say masse, vpon the eight day after (if he made not due satisfaction) should be solemnly excommunicated.

Item, all archdeacons and deacons to be straitly sworne, not to winke or dissemble at their méetings, nor to beare with them for mony. And if they would not be sworne to this, then to lose their offices without recouery.

Purification of priests that had been maried.

Item, such priests as forsaking their wiues, were willing to serue still and remaine in their holy order, first must cease forty daies from their ministration, setting vicars for them in the meane time to serue; and taking such penance vpon them, as by their bishop should be inioined them.

Thus haue ye heard the tedious treatise of the life and doings of Anselme, how superstitious in his religion, how stubborne against his prince he was, what occasion of warre and discord hee ministred by his complaints (if they had béene taken) what zeale without right knowledge, what feruencie without cause he pretended, what paines without profit hee tooke. Who if he had bestowed that time and trauell in preaching ching Chriſt at home to his flocke, which he toke in gadding to Rome, to complaine of his country, in my minde he had been better occupied. Moreouer, what violent and tyrannicall iniunctions he ſet forth of inueſting and other things, yee haue heard; but ſpecially againſt the lawfull and godly mariage of prieſts. Wherein, what a vehement aduerſary he was, here may appeare by theſe minutes or peeces extracted out of his letters, which we haue here annexed; in forme and effect as followeth.

Digitized by Google

A letter of Anſelme.

Anſelme archbiſhop, to his brethren and deareſt ſonnes the Lord prior and others at Canturbury.

King Henry permitted prieſts to haue both churches and wiues. Ex epiſt. Anſel. 77. & 177. Pope Paſchal hath ſo decreed it at Rome. Ergo prieſts muſt haue no wiues.

AS concerning prieſts, of whom the king commanded that they ſhould haue both their churches and their women as they had in the time of his father, & of Lanfrancus archbiſhop: both becauſe the king hath reueſted and reſeized of the whole archbiſhopricke, & becauſe ſo curſed a mariage was forbidden in a councell in the time of his father and of the ſaid archbiſhop: boldly I command by the authority which I haue by my archbiſhopricke, not onely within my archbiſhopricke, but alſo throughout England: that all prieſts which keepe women ſhall be depriued of their churches and eccleſiaſticall benefices.

A letter of pope Paſchalis to Anſelme.

Paſchal biſhop, ſeruant of Gods ſeruants, to his reuerend brother Anſelme, archbiſhop of Canturbury, greeting and apoſtolicall bleſſing.

Ex epiſt. Anſel. 33. If profit of the church may come by prieſts children, what hurt the were it to the church for prieſts to haue wiues?

WE beleeue your brotherhood is not ignorant what is decreed in the Romiſh church concerning prieſts children. But becauſe there is ſo great multitude of ſuch within the realm of England, that almoſt the greater and better part of the clerks are reckoned to be on this ſide: therefore we commit this diſpenſation to your care. For we grant theſe to be promoted to holy offices by reaſon of the need at this time, and for the profit of the church (ſuch as learning and life ſhall commend among you) that yet notwithſtanding the preiudice of the eccleſiaſticall decree be taken heed to hereafter, &c.

Another letter of Anſelme for inueſting.

To the reuerend lord and louing father Paſchal high biſhop, Enſelme ſeruant of Canturbury church, due ſubiection and continuall praiers.

King Henry and his nobles ready to forſake the Romiſh church.

AFter that I returned to my biſhoprick in England, I ſhewed the apoſtolicall decree: which I being preſent, heard in the Romiſh councell. 1. That no man ſhould receiue inueſting of churches at the kings hand, or any lay perſon, or ſhould become his man for it, and that no man ſhould preſume to conſecrat him that did offend herein. When the king and his nobles, and the biſhops themſelues, and others of the lower degree heard theſe things, they took them ſo grieuouſly, that they ſaid they would in no caſe agree to the thing, and that they would driue me out of the kingdome, and forſake the Romiſh church, rather then keep this thing. Wherefore reuerend father, I deſire your counſell by your letter, &c.

Another letter of Anſelme.

Anſelme archbiſhop, to the reuerend Gudulphus biſhop, and to Arnulphus prior, and to William archdeacon of Canturbury, and to all in his dioceſſe, greeting.

A letter of Anſelme againſt prieſts receiuing againe their wiues. Ex epiſt. 37. Prieſts excommunicated for receiuing againe their wiues.

WIlliam our archdeacon hath written vnto me, that ſome prieſts that be vnder his cuſtody (taking againe their women that were forbidden) haue fallen vnto the vncleannes from the which they were drawne by wholeſome counſell and commandement. When the archdeacon would amend this thing, they vtterly deſpiſed with wicked pride, his warning and worthy commandement to be receiued. Then he calling togither many religious men and obedient prieſts, excommunicated worthily the proud and diſobedient, that beaſtly deſpiſed the curſe, and were not afraid to defile the holy miniſtery, as much as lay in them, &c.

Vnto theſe letters aboue prefixed, I haue alſo adioined an other of the ſaid Anſelme, touching a great caſe of conſcience, of a monks whipping of himſelfe. Wherein may appeare both the blind and lamentable ſuperſtition of thoſe religious men, and the iudgement of this Anſelme in the ſame matter.

Another letter of Anſelme.

Anſelme archbiſhop, to Bernard monke of the abby of S. Warburg, greeting and praier.

A letter of Anſelme.

IHeard it ſaid of your lord abbat, that thou iudgeſt it to be of greater merit, when a monke either beateth himſelfe, or deſireth himſelfe to be beaten of another; then when he is beaten (not of his owne will) in the chapter, by the commandement of the prelacie. But is not ſo as you think. For that iudgement that any man commandeth to himſelfe, is kingly. But that which he ſuffereth by obedience in the chapter is monkiſh. The one is of his owne will, the other is of obedience, and not of his owne will. That which I call kingly, kings and rich proud men command to be done to themſelues. But that which I call monkiſh, they take, not commãding, but obaying. The kingly is ſo much eaſier, by how much it agreeth to the will of the ſufferer. But the monkiſh is ſo much the grieuouſer, by how much it diſſereth from the will of the ſufferer. In the kingly iudgement, the ſufferer is iudged to be his owne: in the monkiſh he is proued not to be his owne. For although the king or rich man, when he is beaten, willingly ſheweth himſelfe humbly to be a ſinner; yet he would not ſubmit himſelfe to this humbleneſſe at any others commandement, but would withſtand the commander with all his ſtrength. But when a monke ſubmitteth himſelfe to the whip humbly in the chapter at the will of the prelat; the truth iudgeth him to be of ſo much greater merit, by how much he humbleth himſelfe more, and more truly then the other. For hee humbleth himſelfe to God only, becauſe he knoweth his ſinnes. But this man humbleth himſelfe to man for obedience. But he is lowlier that humbleth himſelfe both to God and man for Gods cauſe, then he which humbleth himſelfe to God only, and not to Gods commandement. Therefore if he that humbleth himſelfe, ſhall be extolled, Ergo he that more humbleth himſelfe, ſhall be more exalted. And where I ſaid, that when a monk is whipped, that it differeth from his wil; you muſt not ſo vnderſtãd it, as though he would not patiently beare it with an obedient will; but becauſe by a naturall appetite he would not ſuffer the ſorrow. But if ye ſay, I doe not ſo much flie the open beating for the paines (which I feele alſo ſecretly) as for the ſhame: know then that hee is ſtronger that reioiceth to beare this for obedience ſake. Therefore be thou ſure, that one whipping of a monke by obedience, is of more merit then innumerable whippings taken by his owne mind. But whereas hee is ſuch, that alwaies he ought to haue his heart ready without murmuring obediently to be whipped, we ought to iudge him then to be of a great merit, whether hee be whipped priuily or openly, &c.

Ex epiſt. 255. Whether is more merit for a monke to cauſe himſelfe in the chapter to be whipped, or to ſuffer obediently the whipping of his abbat.

The iudgement or concluſion of Anſelme vpon the caſe. Falſe opinion of merit.

And thus much concerning Anſelme archbiſhop of Canturbury, whoſe ſtout example gaue no little courage to Thurſtinus and Becket his ſucceſſors, and others that followed after, to do the like againſt their kings and princes, as in proceſſe hereafter by the grace of Chriſt ſhall appeare.

§ Anno 1105 §

About this time 1105, two famous archbiſhops of Mentz being right vertuous and well diſpoſed prelats, were cruelly and tyrannouſly dealt withall, and intreated by the biſhop of Rome: their names were Henry and Chriſtian. This Henry hauing intelligence that hee was complained of to the pope, ſent a learned man (a ſpeciall friend of his) to excuſe him, named Arnold, one for whom he had much done, and promoted to great liuings and promotions. But this honeſt man Arnold, in ſtead of an excuſer, become an accuſer, bribing the two chiefeſt cardinals with good gold, by which meanes he obtained of the pope thoſe two cardinals to be ſent as inquiſitors and onely doers in that preſent caſe. The which (comming to Germany) ſummoned the ſaid Henry, and depoſed him of his archbiſhopricke (for all he could doe) either by law or iuſtice: ſubſtituting in his place the foreſaid Arnold, vpon hope (truly) of the eccleſiaſticall gold. Whereupon that vertuous and honorable Henry (as the ſtory telleth) ſpake vnto thoſe his peruerſe iudges on this wiſe: If I ſhould appeale vnto the apoſtolike ſea for this your vniuſt proceſſe had againſt mee, perhaps the pope would attempt nothing any more therein then yee haue, neither ſhould I win any thing by it, but only toile of body, leſſe of goods, affliction of mind, care of heart, and miſſing of his fauor.

Iudges corrupted.

Wherefore I doe appeale vnto the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as to the moſt high and iuſt iudge, and cite you before his iudgement, there to anſwer me before the high iudge. For neither iuſtly nor godly (but by corruption as it pleaſeth you) you haue iudged. Whereunto they ſcoffingly anſwered: Goe you firſt, and we will follow. Not long after (as the ſtory is) the ſaid Henry died. Whereof the ſaid two cardinals hauing intelligence, ſaid one to the other ieſtingly; Behold, he is gone before, and we muſt follow according to our promiſe. And verily they ſaid truer then they were aware of: for within a while they died in one day. For the one ſitting vpon a iakes to eaſe himſelfe, voided out all his intrailes into the draught, and miſerably ended his life. The other gnawing off the fingers of his hands, and ſpitting them out of his mouth (all deformed in deuouring himſelfe) died. And in likewiſe, not long after the end of theſe men, the foreſaid Arnold (moſt horribly) in a ſedition was ſlaine; and certaine daies (lying ſtinking aboue the ground vnburied) was open to the ſpoile of euery raſcall and harlot. The hiſtoriographer in declaring hereof crieth vpon the cardinals in this manner: O ye cardinals, yee are the beginning and authors hereof. Come ye hither therefore, come yee hither, and heape and carry vnto your countries

A terrible example for corrupt iudges to beware.

the

the diuell, and offer your selues to him with that mony, whereof ye haue been most gluttonous and insatiable.

About the same time and yeere when king Henry began his raigne, pope Paschalis entred his papacie, succeeding after Urbanus, about the yeere of the Lord 1100, nothing swaruing from the steps of Hildebrand his superior. This Paschalis being elected by the cardinals, after that the people had cried thrice, Saint Peter hath chosen good Rainerus, hee then putting on a purple vesture, and a tire vpon his head, was brought vpon a white palfray into Lateran, where a scepter was giuen him, and a girdle put about him, hauing seuen keies, with seuen seales hanging thereupon for a recognisance or token of his seuen-fold power, according to the seuen-fold grace of the holy Ghost; of binding, losing, shutting, opening, sealing, resigning, and iudging, &c. After this Paschalis was elected pope, Henry the fourth, the foresaid emperor (of courage most valiant, if the time had serued thereto) thought to come vp to Italy to salute the new pope. But vnderstanding the popes mind bent against him, he changed his purpose. In the meane time, Paschalis to shew himselfe inferior to Hildebrand in no point, began first to depose all such abbats and bishops whom the emperor had set vp. Also banished Albertus, Theodoricus, and Maginulphus striuing at the same time for the papacie. I spake before of Guibert, whom Henry the emperour had made pope against Hildebrand. Against this Guibert, Paschalis made out an army, who being put to flight, not long after departed.

The popes tirement.

The seuenfold power of the pope.

About the same time, Anno 1101, the bishop of Fluence began to teach and to preach of antichrist then to be borne and to be manifest, as Sabellicus testifieth: whereupon Paschalis assembling a councel, put to silence the said bishop, and condemned his bookes. In this councell at Trecas, priests that were married were condemned for Nicolaitans. Item, according to the decree of Hildebrand, all such of what degree or estate soeuer they were (being laymen) that gaue any ecclesiasticall dignities, were condemned of simonie. Furthermore, the statute of priests tithes there he renewed, counting the selling away thereof as a sinne against the holy Ghost. Concerning the excommunication and other troubles, that Hildebrand wrought against Henricus the fourth emperor, it is declared sufficiently before. This excommunication Paschalis the pope renewed afresh against the said Henry. And not onely that, but also conuenting the princes of Germany vnto a generall assembly set vp his owne sonne against him, causing the bishop of Mentz, of Cullen, and of Wormes, to depriue him of his imperiall crowne, and to place his sonne Henricus the fifth in his fathers kingdome, and so they did. Comming to the place at Hilgesheim, first they required his diadem, his purple, his ring, and other ornaments pertaining to the crowne, from him. The emperor demandeth the cause, being then excommunicat and void of friends. They pretending againe (I cannot tell what) for selling of bishoprickes, abbacies, and other ecclesiasticall dignites for mony: also alleaging the popes pleasure and of other princes. Then required he first of the bishop of Mentz (and likewise of the other two, whom he had preferred to their bishoprickes before) asking them in order, if he had receiued of them any peny for his promoting them to their dignities. This when they could not deny to be so; Well (saith he) and doe you requite me againe with this? With diuers other words of exhortation, admonishing them to remember their oth and alleagiance to their prince. But the periured prelats, neither reuerencing his maiesty, nor moued with his benefits, nor regarding their fidelity, ceased not for all this, but first plucked from him (sitting in his throne) his crowne imperiall, then diuested him, taking from him his purple and his scepter. The good emperor being left desolat and in confusion, saith to them: Videat Deus & iudicet: that is, let God see and iudge. Thus leauing him, they went to his sonne to confirme him in his kingdome, and caused him to driue his father out. Who then being chased of his owne sonne (hauing but nine persons about him) did flie by the dukedome of Limbrugh, where the duke being then in hunting, perceiuing and hearing of him, made after to follow him. The emperor fearing no other but present death (for he had displaced the same duke before out of his dukedome) submitted himselfe, crauing of him pardon, and not reuengement. The duke full of compassion, and pitying his estate, not only remitted all his displeasure, but also receiued him to his castell. Moreouer, collecting his souldiors and men of war, brought him to Cullen, and there was well receiued. His sonne hearing this, besieged the citie of Cullen. But the father by night escaping, came to Leodium, where resorted to him all such as were men of compassion and of constant heart. In so much, that his power being strong enough, hee was now able to pitch a field against his enemies, and so did; desiring his friends that if he had the victory, they would spare his sonne. In fine, (the battell ioined) the father had the victory, the sonne was put to flight: many being slain on both sides. But shortly after, the battel renewed againe, the sonne preuailed, the father was ouercome and taken. Who then being vtterly dispossessed of his kingdome, was brought to that exigent, that comming to Spire, was faine to craue of the bishop there (whom he had done much for before) to haue a prebend in the church; and for that he had some skill of his booke, he desired to serue in our ladies quire. Yet could he not obtaine so much at his hand, who swore by our lady, he should haue none there. Thus the wofull emperor (most vnkindly handled, and repulsed on euery side) came to Leodium, and there for sorrow died, after he had raigned fifty yeers, whose body Paschalis after his funerall, caused to be taken vp againe, and to be brought to Shires, where it remained fiue yeeres vnburied. Hæc ex Helmoldo.

Of antichrist, borne and manifest.

The bishops of Fluence a martyr.

Sabellicus.

A councell at Trecas.

A tragicall historie of the pope Paschalis setting the son against the father.

Ex historia Helmoldi.

The vnkindnes of a proud prelat.

The emperor fiue yeers without burial.

After the decease of this emperor Henry the fourth, his sonne Henricus the fifth raigned the space of twenty yeeres. Who comming to Rome to be crowned of the pope, could not obtaine it, before hee would fully assent to haue this ratified, that no emperor should haue any thing to do with the election of the Roman bishop, or with other bishoprickes. Besides that, (about the same time) such a stir was made in Rome by the said bishop, that if the emperor had not defended himselfe with his owne hands, he had been slaine. But as it happened, the emperor hauing the victory, amongst many other Romans (which were partly slaine, partly taken in the same skirmish) he taketh also the pope, and leadeth him out of the citie: where he indenteth with him vpon diuers conditions, both of his coronation, and of recouering againe his right and title in the election of the pope, and of other bishops: whereunto the pope assenting, agreed to all. So the emperor (being crowned of Paschalis) returned againe with the pope to Rome.

Anno 1106

Henricus emperor. Ex chronico Cuionis, lib. 3.

The pope taken prisoner.

All the conditions betweene the emperor and the pope (so long as the emperor remained at Rome) stood firme and ratified. But as soone as the emperor was returned againe to Germany, forthwith the pope calling a synod, not only reuoked all that he had agreed to before: but also excommunicated Henricus the emperor, as hee had done his father before, reproouing the former Priuilegium for prauilegium. The emperor returning from Rome to France, there maried Mathild daughter to king Henry. Who then hearing what the pope had done, (grieued not a little) with all expedition marched to Rome, and putteth the pope to flight, and finally placeth another in his stead. In the meane time the bishops of Germany (the popes good friends) slept not their businesse, incensing the Saxons all that they might against their Cesar: in so much that a great commotion was stirred vp, and grew at length to a pitcht field: which was fought in the month of February, by the wood called Sylua Catulaira, in the yeere of our Lord one thousand one hundred and fifteene.

War raised by the pope and his papists.

The emperor seeing no end of these conflicts (vnlesse hee would yeeld to the pope) was faine to giue ouer, and forgoe his priuiledge, falling to a cõposition, not to meddle with matters pertaining to the popes electiõ, nor with inuesting, nor such other things belonging to the church and churchmen. And thus was the peace betweene them concluded, and proclaimed to no smal reioicing of both the armies, then lying by Wormes, neere the riuer of Rhene.

Peace concluded betweene the emperor and the pope.

In the time of this Paschalis, liued Bernardus, called Abbas Clarauallensis, in the yeere 1108, of whom sprang the Bernardine monks.

Bernardus the abbat.

Bernardine monks came in.

About what time the city of Worcester was consumed almost all with fire, An. 1109.

The city of Worcester almost all consumed with fire.

All this while Henricus the emperor had no issue (hauing to wife Mathildis, the daughter of Henry the first, king of England) and that by the iust iudgement of God, as it may appeare. For as he hauing a father, persecuted him by the popes setting on, contrary to the part of a naturall son: so Gods prouidence did not suffer him to be the father of any child, naturally to loue him, or to succeed him.

Mathildis. Example of the lords iust retribution and iudgement.

After the death of Paschalis, An. 1118, succeeded pope Gelasius, chosen by the cardinals, but without the consent of the emperor, whereupon rose no little variance in Rome. And at length another pope was set vp by the emperour called Gregorius the eighth, and Gelasius driuen away into France, and there died. After whom came Calixtus the second, (chosen likewise by a few cardinals, without the voice of the emperour) who comming vp to Rome to inioy his seat, first sent his legat into Germany to excommunicat the emperor Henricus, who then hauing diuers conflicts with his fellow pope Gregorius, at length draue him out of Rome. At this time by this occasion, great disputation and controuersie was betweene the emperor and the popes court, whether of them in dignity should excell the other: whereof reasons and arguments on both sides were alleaged, as in the verses here following are comprehended.

Two popes striuing together.

Pope Calixtus the second.

The pope excommunicateth the emperor.

A gratefull example of a good and thankfull duke.

A naughty son of a good father.

Ex Helmoldo, & Gotfrido Viterbiensi.

Allegatio imperatoris contra papam.

Cæsar lex viua stat regibus imperatiua,
Legeq; sub viua sunt omnia iura datiua,
Lex ea castigat, soluit & ipsa ligat.
Conditor est legis, neq; debet lege teneri,
Sed sibi complacuit sub lege libenter haberi:
Quicquid ei placuit, iuris adinstar erat.
Qui ligat ac soluit Deus ipsum protulit orbi,
Diuisit regnum diuina potentia secum,
Astra dedit superis, cætera cuncta sibi.

Responsio

Digitized by Google

Responsio Romanæ curiæ contra imperatórem.

Pars quoque papalis sic obuiat imperiali,
Sic dans regnare, quòd Petro subyciaris:
Ius etenim nobis Christus vtrumque parit.
Spiritus & corpus mihi sunt subiecta potenter,
Corpore terrena teneo cœlestia mente,
Vnde tenendo polum, soluo ligóque solum.
Æthera pandere, cœlica tangere, papa videtur:
Nam dare, tollere, nectere, soluere cuncta meretur,
Cui dedit omne decus lex noua, léxque vetus.
Annulus & baculus quamuis terrena putentur,
Sunt de iure poli, quæ significare videntur.
Respice iura Dei, mens tua cedat ei, &c.

In conclusion, the emperor being ouercome so much with the vaine reasons of the popes side, and fearing the dangerous thunderbolt of his curse (talking with princes and perswaded by his friends) was faine to condescend to the vnreasonable conditions of the pope. First to ratifie his election, notwithstanding the other pope (whom the said emperor had set vp) yet was aliue. Secondly, that he should resigne vp his right and title in matters pertaining to the election of the pope, and inuesture of bishops.

This being done and granted, and the writings thereof set vp in the church of Lateran for a triumph of the emperor thus subdued, the pope maketh out after Gregorius his fellow pope, being then in a towne called Sutrium, being besieged and taken, Gregorius also was taken. Whom Calixtus the pope, sitting vpon a camell (his face to the camels taile) brought him so through the streetes of Rome, holding the taile in his hand in stead of a bridle, and afterward being shorne, was thrust into a monastery.

Gregorius brought into Rome by the pope, his face to the horse taile. Ex Platina. Vincentio. Stella &c.

Amongst many other acts done by this glorious pope, first he established the decrées of the papall sea against this emperor. He brought in the fours quarter fasts, called ember daies. Dist. 70. cap. Ieiunium.

The ember daies by whom they were brought in, and when. Dist. 76. cap. Ieiunium.

By the same Calixtus, the order of monks called Præmonstratenses were brought in.

The order of monks. Præmonstratenses.

Further, by him it was decreed to be iudged for adultery, if any person (by his life time) had put from him either bishopricke or benefice, grounding vpon this scripture of S. Paul to the Romans: Alligata est vxor legi viri, quàm diu vir eius viuit: eo defuncto, soluta est a lege viri, &c. That is, The wife is bound to the law of her husband, so long as the husband liueth: after he is dead, she is loose from the law of her husband, &c.

Scripture clerkly applied of the pope.

Item, the same Calixtus holding a generall councell at Rhemis, decreed that priests, deacons, and subdeacons should put away their concubines and wiues: or else, whosoeuer was found to keepe his wife, to be depriued of benefice, and all other ecclesiasticall liuings: whereupon a certaine English writer made these verses following:

Priests and ministers compelled to leaue their wiues.

O bone Calixte, nunc omnis clerus odit te.
Quondam presbyteri poterant vxoribus vti,
Hoc destruxisti, postquam tu papa fuisti, &c.
That is, word for word.
The hatred of the clergy, hast thou good Calixte,
For sometimes priests might vse their wiues right,
But that thou hast reiected, since pope thou wast elected.

Anno 1109

And thus much of the Roman matters. Now to our country storie againe. After the death of Anselme before mentioned (who deceased the yéere of Christ 1109. after he had béen in the sea sixteene yéeres) the church of Canturbury stood void fiue yéeres: and the goods of the church were spent to the kings vse. And when he was praied to helpe the church that was so long without a pastor, his answer was: pretending that where his father and brother had accustomed there to set the best tried and approued men that might be found, to the intent therefore that he might do the same (in chusing such, which either should equall the former examples of them before, or at least follow their footsteps as néere as they could) he tooke therein the more time and leasure. And so with shift of answer delaied out the time, while he had filled his coffers with the commodities of that benefice.

The bishopricke of Ely first planted. Henry first bishop of Ely.

The same yéere (after the death of Anselme) the king conuerted the abby of Ely to a bishopricke, which before was vnder the bishopricke of Lincolne, placing there Henry bishop of Bangor, the first bishop of that sea. And as of late yéeres before this, diuers wonders were séene, as starres falling from heauen, so thicke that they could not be numbred, at the setting forth of the christians to the holy land: Iornalens. A blasing starre ouer Constantinople. A spring boiling out bloud (séene at Fincham sted in Barkeshire) three weekes togither. An. 1090. Gisburnensis. After that, the firmament appearing so red, as it had béen all on fire: also two full moones appearing together, one in the east, the other in the west (on Maundy thursday) with a blasing starre in the same yéere appearing about the taking of duke Robert, hauing a white circle inclosing it, An. 1106. Iornalens. Also with an eclipse of the Sun darkned after that. So likewise about this present yéere, An. 1110. was séene the flood of Trent, about Nottingham, so dried vp from morning to three of the clocke at after noone, that men might go ouer it dry shod: Gisburnens. Also in Shrewsbury a great earthquake happened, and after that followed a sharpe winter, great murren of beasts, and pestilence of men, as Gualterus Gisburnens. recordeth. Moreouer, the same author mentioneth, that next about the same yéere, the like vading of water also happened in the flood of Medway: and in the Thamis (betwéene the bridge and the tower, and vnder the bridge, from midnight to the next euening) was so great an ebbe, that an vnnumerable sort of people and children waded ouer, scarce knée déepe in the water, the sea withdrawing his tide ten miles from his accustomed course. Rog. Houeden. Gualter. Gisburnens. &c. In the which yéere also, as the said author and Iornalens. doe testifie, the cittie of Worcester by casuality was consumed with fire. Also the city of Chester, An. 1114. Rog. Houed.

Trent dried vp.

An earthquake. Murren and pestilence. Ex Gualtero Gisburnens.

Anno 1113

Worcester consumed with fire.

Anno 1114

The next yéere following, Rodulphus bishop of Rochester (an Englishman) was promoted to bee archbishop of Canturbury, and Thurstinus the kings chaplen was elect archbishop of Yorke. Who being content to receiue his benediction or consecration of the sea of Canturbury; yet because he refused to make his profession of obedience to the same sea, he was by the king deprined of his dignity.

Rodulphus archbishop of Canturbury. Thurstinus archbishop of Yorke.

Then Thurstin (by the instigation of certaine of his clerks at Yorke) tooke his iourny to Rome, who there making his complaint to pope Paschalis, brought with him a letter from the pope to the king, where among other words was contained as followeth: Audiuimus electum Eboracensis ecclesiæ, virum sapientem & strenuum, sine iudicio ab Eboracensi sequestratum ecclesia, quod nimirũ diuinæ iustitiæ, & S. patrũ institutionibus aduersatur. Nos quidem neque Cant. ecclesiam minui, neque Eboracensem volumus præiudicium pati, sed eam cõstitutionem quæ à B. Gregorio Anglicæ gentis apostolo, inter easdem ecclesias constituta est, firmam censemus, illibatámque seruari. Idem ergo electus vt iustitia exigit, ad suam ecclesiam omnibus modis reuocetur. Si quid autem quæstionis inter easdem ecclesias nascitur, præsentibus vtrisque partibus in vestra præsentia pertractetur, &c.

Diuision betweene Thurstine of Yorke, and Rodulph archbishop of Canturbury for subiection. The letter of Paschalis to king Henry.

In English thus:

We heare and vnderstand, that the archbishop elect of the church of Yorke (a discréet and industrious man) is sequestred from the church of Yorke, which standeth against both diuine iustice, and the institution of holy fathers. Our purpose is, that neither the church of Canturbury should be impaired, nor against that the church of Yorke should suffer any preiudice, but that the same constitution which was by blessed Gregory (the apostle of the English nation) set and decreed betwéene those two churches, should remaine still in force and effect vnuiolat. Wherefore, as touching the foresaid elect, let him be receiued againe by any meanes, as right and méete it is, vnto his church. And if there be any question betwéene the foresaid churches, let it be handled and decided in your presence, both the two parties being there present, &c.

Ex Gualtero Gisburnens. Ex Guliel. de pontif. lib. 4. Ex Rog. Houed. Fabia. &c.

Upon the occasion of this letter, a solemne assembly there was appointed at Salisbury, about the hearing of this controuersie. The variance betwéene these two prelats still increased more and more. Rodulph archbishop of Canturbury in no case would yéeld nor condescend to giue imposition of hands vnto him, vnlesse he would make his profession of obedience. Thurstin againe said he would willingly receiue and imbrace his benediction; but as touching the profession of his subiection, that he would not agrée vnto. Then the king declaring his mind therein, signified vnto Thurstin, that without his subiection and obedience professed to the archbishop of Canturbury, hee should not inioy his consecration to bee archbishop of Yorke. Whereunto Thurstin nothing replying againe, renounced his archbishoprick, promising moreouer to make no more claime vnto it, nor molest them that should inioy it.

Anno 1116

Assembly of the nobles of Salisbury. Thurstin refuseth to professe subiection to the archbishop of Canturbury. Thurstin promiseth to renounce his archbishoprick.

Shortly after this, it happened that pope Paschalis died: after whom, as is aboue rehearsed, succeeded pope Gelasius, who liued not full a yéere, and died in France. Whereupon the cardinals (which then followed the said pope Gelasius vnto Cluniake) created another pope of their chusing, whom they called Calixtus the second. The other cardinals which were at Rome did chuse another pope called Gregory, as mention before is made: about which two popes much stir there was in christian realmes. As this Calixtus was remaining in France, and there calling a generall councell at Rhemis, as ye heard before; Thurstinus the archbishop of Yorke desired licence of the king to go to the councell, purposing there to open the cause of his church, which eftsones he obtained: first promising to the king that he should there attempt nothing that should be preiudiciall to the church of Canturbury. In the meane time, the king had sent secret word vnto the pope, by Rodulph and other procurators, that in no case he would consecrat Thurstinus. Yet, notwithstanding the faithfull promise of the pope made to the king, so it fell out, that the said pope through the sute of his cardinals, whom Thurstinus had won to him, was inclined to consecrat him, and gaue him the pall. For this deed the king was sore discontented with Thurstin, and warned him the entry of his land.

Anno 1118

Pope Calixtus breaketh promise with the king. Thurstin sacred archbishop of Yorke by the pope against the kings mind.

In this councell at Rhemis (aboue mentioned) where were gathered 434. prelats, these fiue principall acts were concluded:

Concilium Rhemense.

1. That

Digitized by Google

Acts of the councell of Rhemis.

1 That no man should either buy or sell any bishopricke, abbatship, deanry, archdeaconship, priesthood, prebendship, altar, or any ecclesiasticall promotion, or benefice, orders, consecration, church halowing, seat or stall within the quier, or any office ecclesiasticall, vnder danger of excommunication, if he did persist.

2 That no lay person should giue inuesture of any ecclesiasticall possession; or that any spirituall man should receiue any such at any lay mans hand, vnder paine of deprivation.

3 That no man should inuade, take away, or detaine the goods or possessions of the church; but that they should remain firme and perpetuall, vnder paine of perpetuall curse.

4 That no bishop or priest should leaue any ecclesiasticall dignitie or benefice to any, by way of inheritance. Adding moreouer, that for baptisme, chrisme, anoiling, or burial, no mony should be exacted.

5 Item that all priests, deacons, and subdeacons, should be vtterly debarred and sequestred from company of their wiues and concubines, vnder paine of excluding from all christian communion.

The acts sent to the emperor.

The acts thus determined, were sent eftsones to Henricus the emperor, to see and try, before the breaking vp of the councell, whether he would agree to the canonicall elections, free consecration, and inuesting of spirituall persons, and to other acts of the said councell. The emperor maketh answer againe, that he would lose nothing that ancient custome of his progenitors had giuen him. Notwithstanding, because of the authority of the generall councell, he was content to consent to the residue, saue only the inuesting of ecclesiasticall function to bee taken from him, to that he would neuer agree. Vpon this, at the next returne of the pope to the councell, the emperor was appointed to be excommunicated. Which thing, when diuers of the councell did not well like, and therefore did separat themselues from the rest, the pope applying against them the multitude of the seuenty disciples which were offended at the Lord, when he taught them of eating of his flesh and blood, and therfore diuided themselues from him; declaring moreouer to them, how they which gathered not with him, scattered; and they that were not with him, were against him. By these and such like perswasions, reducing them againe to his side, and so by that councell Henricus the emperor was excommunicated.

The emperor agreed not to the popes inuesting.

The councell diuided.

Ex Rog. Houed.

Henry the emperor excommunicated.

Agreed that England should haue no other legat from Rome, but only the archbishop of Canturbury.

It was not long after but the pope came to Gisortium, where Henry king of England resorted to him, desiring and also obtaining of him, that he would send henceforth no legat, nor permit any to be sent from Rome to England, vnlesse the king himselfe should so require, by reason of some occasion of strife, which else could not otherwise be decided by his owne bishops at home. The cause why the king required this of the pope was, for that certaine Roman legats had been in England a little before (to wit) one Guido, and another Roman named Anselmus, and another also called Petrus, who had spoiled the realme of great treasure, as the accustomed maner of the popes prend legats is wont to be, Guliel. de pont. lib. 1. Also he required of the pope, that he might vse and retaine all the customes vsed before of his forefathers in England and in Normandy.

England spoiled by the popes legats.

All the customs of the realme granted of the pope.

To these petitions the pope did easily consent, requiring againe of the king, that he would licence Thurstinus the archbishop aboue minded, to returne with fauor into his realme. But that the king vtterly denied, vnlesse he would professe subiection to the church of Canturbury, as his predecessors had done before, and excused himselfe by his oth, which hee before had made. To this the pope answered againe, that he by his authority apostolicall, both might, and would also easily dispence with him for his promise or oth. Then the king said, that hee would talke with his counsell thereof, and so bend him an answer of his mind. Which answere was this, that for the loue and request of the pope, he was cõtent that Thurstinus should reenter his realme, and quietly inioy his prelatship, vpon this condition, that he would (as his predecessors did) professe his subiection to the church of Canturbury. Otherwise (said he) so long as he was king, hee should neuer sit archbishop of the church of Yorke. And thus ended that meeting betweene the king of England and the pope for that time.

Anno 1120

The yeere following after that, which was An. 1120, the foresaid pope Calixtus directeth his letters for Thurstinus to the king, and to Rodulph archbishop of Canturbury. In which epistle, by his full power apostolicall, he doth interdict both the church of Canturbury, and the church of Yorke, with all the parish churches within the same cities, from all diuine seruice, from the burial also of the dead, except onely baptising of children, and absolution of them that lie on dying; vnlesse within a month after the receit of the same, Thurstinus without any exaction of subiection made) were receiued and admitted to the sea of Yorke, and that the king likewise should doubtlesse be excommunicated, except he would consent vnto the same. Whereupon Thurstinus for feare of the popes curse, was immediatly sent for and reconciled to the king, and was placed quietly in his archiepiscopall sea of Yorke.

The popes letter to the king, compelled to receiue Thurstinus for feare of the popes curse.

Thurstinus restored.

Anno 1122

It followed not long after (within two yeeres) Rodulph archbishop of Canturbury departed, in whose sea succeeded after him Guilielmus de Turbine. About which time (in the seuen and twentith yeere of the kings raigne) the gray friers by procuring of the king came first into England, and had their house first at Canturbury. About the same season or a little before, the king called a councell at London, where the spiritualty of England (not knowing to what purpose it was required) condescended to the king to haue the punishment of married priests: by reason of which grant (whereof the spiritualty afterwards much repented) the priests paying a certain to the king, were suffered to retaine their wiues still, whereby the king gathered no small sum of mony, Rog. Houed. Guliel. Gisburnensis. At this time began first the foundation of the monastery called Gisburne in Cleueland.

William archbishop of Canturbury.

The gray friers first came into England.

Anno 1125

Priests paid for their wiues.

Ex Roger. Houed. Et Guliel. Gisburnensi. Hunting. lib. 7.

The abby of Gisburne builded.

It was aboue touched, how Matild or Maud daughter to king Henry, was married to Henry the fifth emperor; who after the decease of the said emperor her husband, returned about this present time with the imperiall crowne to her father in Normandy, bringing with her the hand of S. James. For the loy whereof the king builded the abby of Reading, where the said hand was reposed. This Matild was receiued by the said councell to be next heire to the king her father, in possession of the English crowne, for lacke of issue male. And soone after vpon the same, was sent ouer to Normandy, to marry with Gefrey Plantagenent earle of Anion, of whom came Henry the second, who (after Stephan) was king of England. And about this time also was founded the priory of Norton in the prouince of Chester, by one William the sonne of Nichelle. In the story of Polychronicon, Iornal. and Polydorus is declared; how the king was troubled greatly with three sundry visions appearing vnto him by night. The first was of a great multitude of husbandmen of the country, which appeared to flie vpon him with their mattocks and instruments, requiring of him his debt which he did owe vnto them. In the second, hee saw a great number of souldiers and harnessed men to come fiercely vpon him. In the third, he saw a company of prelats & churchmen, threatning him with their bishops staues, and fiercely approching vpon him. Whereupon (being dismaied) in all haste ran and tooke his sword to defend himselfe, finding there none to strike: who afterward asking counsell concerning these visions, was monished by one of his physitians (named Grimbald) by repentance, almes, and amendment of life, to make some mends to God, and to his country whom he offended. Which three vowes thus being made, the next yeere after he went to England; where he being vpon the seas in a great tempest with his daughter Matild, remembred there his three vowes. And so comming to the land (for performance of the same) first released vnto the commons the Dane gilt which his father and his brother before had renewed. Secondly, he went to S. Edmundsbury, where he shewed great benefits to the churchmen. Thirdly, he procured iustice to be administred more rightly throughout his realme, &c. Also he ordained and erected a new bishopricke at Carlill.

S. James hand.

Reading abby founded.

Matild daughter of king Henry heire to the crowne.

Geffrey Plantagenet.

Henry 2. borne of Matild the empresse.

Anno 1130

The priory of Norton founded.

Three terrible visions of the king.

Three vowes made of king Henry.

Anno 1131

Dane gilt released.

The church reuiued.

Iustice rightly administred.

Bishoprickes of Carlill newly erected by king Henry.

In the three and thirtith yeere of the kings raigne (as witnesseth a certaine author) a great part of the citie of London, with the church of S. Paul, was burned with fire in Whitsunweeke.

The city and Pauls church of London burned.

After Calixtus (whose story and time is before discoursed) succeeded pope Honorius the second, notwithstanding that the cardinals had elected another, yet he by the meanes of certaine citizens, obtained the papacie, An. 1125. About the second yeere of his induction (as is to be read in Mat. Parisiens.) there was a certaine legat of his called Iohannes Cremensis, sent downe to England from the pope for the redresse I cannot well tell whereof. But in deed the chiefest purpose of his comming, as of all others after him in those daies, was to fill their pouches with English mony, as may further appeare by their procedings. This legat comming then with the popes letters directed both into England and into Scotland, after he had well refreshed himselfe in bishops houses, and amongst the abbats, at length resorted to London, where he assembled the whole clergie togither, inquired of priests concubines, otherwise called their wiues, and making thereupon a statute in the said synod of London, after this tenor: Presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, & canonicis, vxorum, concubinarum, & omnium omnino fœminarum cõtubernia, autoritate apostolica inhibemus, præter matrem aut sororem, vel amitam, aut eiusmodi quæ omnino careant suspicione. Et qui decreti huius violator extiterit (confessus vel conuictus) ruinã ordinis patiatur. Inter consanguineos seu affinitate propinquos, vsque ad septimam generationem, matrimonia contrahi prohibemus. That is, To priests, deacons, subdeacons, and canons, we doe vtterly inhibit by authority apostolicall, all maner society and conuersation with all kind of women, except only their mother, sister, or aunt, or such whereof can rise no suspicion. And whosoeuer shall be found to violat this decree, being conuict thereof, shall sustaine thereby the losse of all that he hath by his order. Moreouer, amongst kinred or such as be ioined in affinity, we forbid matrimony vnto the seuenth generation, &c. But see how God worketh against such vngodly procedings. The next night after it hapned the same cardinall (ruffling and reuelling with his concubines) to be apprehended in the same vice, whereof he had so strictly giuen out precepts the next day before, to the no little slander and shame, as Mat. Paris. doth write, of the whole clergy.

Matthæus Parisiensis.

A Romish statute concerning priests wiues and concubines.

Marriage forbid to the seuenth degree.

The popes legat giuing precepts of chastitie, was found with an harlot.

Vnto

Digitized by Google

Vnto this time liued Henricus the fift emperour, after hée had raigned twentie yeares, dying without issue, as is before mentioned. Next after Henricus, the imperiall crowne came vnto Lotharius duke of Saxon, in the yeare one thousand one hundred twentie and seuen.

Arnulphus martyred at Rome. The history of Arnulphus.

Certaine histories make mention of one Arnulphus, in the time of this pope Honorius the second. Some say hée was archbishop of Lugdune, as Hugo, Platina, Sabellicus. Tritemius saith he was a priest, whose history, as it is set forth in Tritemius, I will briefly in English expresse. About this time, saith he, in the daies of Honorius the second, one Arnulphus Priest, a man zealous and of great deuotion, and a worthie preacher, came to Rome, which Arnulphus in his preaching rebuked the dissolute and lasciuious lasciuiousnesse, incontinencie, auarice, and immoderat pride of the clergie, prouoking all to follow Christ and his apostles in their pouertie rather, and in purenesse of life. By reason whereof, this man was well accepted, and highly liked of the nobilitie of Rome for a true disciple of Christ, but of the cardinals and the clergie, no lesse hated then fauoured of the other. In so much that priuilie in the night season they tooke him and destroyed him. This his martyrdome, saith he, was reuealed to him before, from God by an angell, he being in the desert when he was sent forth to preach, whereupon he said vnto them publikely with these words: I know (saith he) ye seeke my life, and know you will make mée away priuilie: but why? Because I preach to you the truth, and blame your pride, stoutnesse, auarice, incontinencie, with your vnmeasurable greedinesse in getting and heaping vp of riches, therefore be you displeased with me. I take héere heauen and earth to witnesse, that I haue preached vnto you, that which I was commanded of the Lord. But you contemne me and your Creator, who by his only sonne hath redéemed you. And no marueil if you seeke my death, being a sinfull person, preaching vnto you the truth, when as if Saint Peter were héere this day and rebuked your vices, which do so multiplie aboue all measure, you would not spare him neither. And as he was expressing this, with a loud voice he said moreouer: For my part I am not afraid to suffer death for the truths sake; but this I say vnto you, that God will looke vpon your iniquities, and will be reuenged. You being full of all vnpuritie, play the blind guides to the people committed vnto you, leading them the way to hell; a God he is of reuengeance. Thus the hatred of the clergie being incensed against him for preaching truth, conspired against him, and so laying priuie wait for him, tooke him and drowned him. Sabellicus and Platina say they hanged him.

Arnulphus martyr.

In the second tome of the generall councels imprinted at Cullen, is mentioned a certaine booke called Opus tripartitum, written as the author supposeth, aboue foure hundred yeares ago, either of this Arnulphus, or iust about the same time. In this booke the writer complaineth of many enormities and abuses in the church. First of the number of holy daies, declaring what occasions of vice grow thereby, according vnto the common saying of whores and naughtie women, which say they vantage more in one holy day then in fiftie other daies besides.

Ex Tritemio. A booke called Tripartitum, written 400 yeares ago.

Number of holie daies.

Item, complaineth of the curious singing in cathedrall churches, whereby many be occasioned to bestow much good time, yea many yeares about the same, which otherwise they might giue to the learning of better sciences.

Curious singing in cathedrall churches.

Likewise complaineth of the rabble and the multitude of begging friers and religious men, and professed women, shewing what great occasion of idle and vncomely life commeth thereof.

The world ouercharged with begging religions.

Also of the inconsiderat promotion of euill prelats, and of their great negligence, in correcting and reforming the euill demeanor of the people.

Promotion of euill prelats.

Item of the great wantonnesse and lasciuiousnesse in their seruants and families, concerning their excessiue wearing of apparell.

Superfluitie of apparell in bishops families.

Item, complaineth also of the outragious and excessiue gaines that prelats and other vnder them take for their seale, especially of officials, scribes, and such like; which giue out the seale they care not how nor wherfore, so they may gaine money.

Bishops seales abused to get money.

He complaineth in like maner that prelats be so slacke and negligent in loking to the residents in their benefices.

Non residents in benefices.

Further, lamenteth for the rash giuing of benefices to parsons, vicars, and curats, not for any godlinesse or learning in them, but for fauour or friendship, or intercession, either else for hope of some gaine, whereof springeth this great ignorance in the church.

Rash bestowing of benefices.

After this he noteth in prelats, how they waste and expend the goods of the church in superfluities, or vpon their kinsfolkes, or other worse vses, which should rather be spent on the poore.

Wasteful spending of the church goods.

Merily, in the tenth chapter hée complaineth, for that through the negligence of men of the church (especially of the church of Rome) the books and monuments of the old councels, and also of the new, are not to be found: which should be reserued and kept in all cathedrall churches.

Old bookes of councels lost by the negligence of the clerkes.

Item, that many prelats be so cold in doing their duties. Also reprocheth the vnchast and voluptuous demeanour of ecclesiasticall persons, by the example of storkes, whose nature is (saith he) that if any of their company leauing his owne mate, ioyneth with any other, all the rest flieth vpon him, whether it be he or she, beateth him, and plucketh his fethers off: what then, saith he, ought good prelats to do to such a person of their companie, whose filthines and corrupt life both defileth so many, and stinketh in the whole church?

The vnchast life of prelats condemned by the nature of the storkes.

Againe, for so much as we reade in the booke of Esdras, lib. 2. cap. 9. that he purging Israel of strange women, began first with the priests; so now likewise in the purging and correcting of al sorts of men, first the purgation ought to begin with these, according as it is written by the prophet Ezechiel; Begin first with my sanctuarie, &c.

Amendment of life ought first to begin with the priests.

Moreouer, how that in the time of Philip king of France, the whole realme was interdicted, for that the king had but one woman in stead of his wife, which was not his wife by law. And againe, séeing in these our daies the king of Portugale hath béen sequestred from his dominion, by the authoritie of the church, being thought not sufficient to gouerne: What then ought to be said to that prelat who abuseth other mens wiues, virgins and nuns, which also is found vnable and insufficient to take vpon him the charge of soules?

The realme of France interdicted.

King of Portugale deposed.

About the yéere of our Lord 1128, the orders of the knights of the Rhodes called Johannits, also the order of Templars rose vp.

The knights of the Rhodes and Templars.

After Honorius, next in the same vsurpation succéeded pope Innocentius the second, An. 1130. But as it was with his predecessors before him, that at euerie mutation of new popes came new perturbations, and commonly neuer a pope was elected, but some other was set vp against him (sometimes two, sometimes three popes together) so likewise it happened with this Innocentius; for after he was chosen, the Romans elected another pope named Anacletus. Betwixt these two popes was much ado, and great conflicts through the partaking of Rogerius duke of Sicile, taking Anacletus part against Innocentius, vntill Lotharius the emperor came, who rescuing Innocentius, droue Rogerius out of Italy. Our stories record, that king Henrie was one of the great helpes in setting vp and maintaining this pope Innocentius against Anacletus: Gisburnensis.

Pope Innocentius the second.

Vnkindnesse betweene popes.

Amongst many other things, this pope decréed that whosoeuer did strike a priest or clerke being shauen, hée should bée excommunicated, and not to be absolued, but only of the pope himselfe.

The popes curse proclamed against such as strike any priest.

About the time of doing these things, being the yeare of our Lord 1135, king Henrie being in Normandie, as some say, by taking there a fall from his horse, as others say, by taking a surfet in eating lampries, fell sicke and died, after he had raigned ouer the realme of England fiue and thirtie yéeres and odde monthes, leauing for his heires Matild the empresse his daughter, with her yong sonne Henrie to succéed after him, to whom all the prelats and nobilitie of the realme were sworne. But contrarie to their oath made to Maud in the presence of her father before; William the archbishop of Canturburie and the nobles of the realme crowned Stephen earle of Bologne, and fifters sonne to king Henrie, vpon Saint Stephens day in Christmas weeke, which archbishop the next yeare after died, being, as it was thought, iustly punished for his periurie. And many other lords which did accordingly, went not quit without punishment. In the like iustice of punishment is numbred also Roger bishop of Salisburie, who contrarie vnto his oath, being a great doer in the coronation of Stephen, was apprehended of the same king, and miserablie, but iustly, extermined.

The death of king Henrie. {Anno 1135}

Periurie iustly punished.

A certaine written English storie I haue, which addeth more, and saith, that king Stephen hauing many foes in diuers quarters kéeping their holds and castles against him, went then to Oxford and tooke the bishop of Salisburie, and put a rope about his necke, and so led him to the castle of Wies, that was his, and commanded them to render vp the castle, or he would slay and hang their bishop. Which castle being giuen vp, the king tooke the spoile thereof. The like also he did vnto the bishop of Lincolne named Alexander, whom in like manner he led in a rope to a castle of the bishops that was vpon Trent, and bad them deliuer vp the castle, or else he would hang their lord before the gate. Long it was before the castle was giuen vp, yet at length the king obtaining it, there entred and tooke all the treasure of the bishop, &c. Roger Houeden and Fabian alledging a certaine old authour, whom I cannot find, referreth a great cause of this periurie vnto one Hugh Bigot, steward sometime with king Henrie. Who immediatly after the death of the said Henrie, came into England, and before the said archbishop and other lords of the land, tooke wilfully an oath and swore, that he was present a little before the kings death, when king Henrie admitted for his heire (to be king after him) Stephen his nephew, for so much as Maud his daughter had discontented him. Whereunto the archbishop with the other lords gaue too hastie credence. But this Hugh, saith he, scaped not vnpunished, for he died miserable in a short time after. Ex Fabian. Albeit all this may be supposed rather to be wrought not without the practise of Henrie bishop of Winchester, and other prelats by his setting on, which Henrie was brother vnto king Stephen, &c.

Ex chron. Anglic. incerti autoris. The bishop of Sarum and of Lincolne taken prisoners of the king, and led with ropes about their necks.

Roger Houed. in vit. Steph.

Ex Fabi. in vita Steph.

Digitized by Google

King Stephan.

Anno 1136 King Stephan.

THus when king Stephan, contrarie vnto his oath made before to Maud the empresse, had taken vpon him the crowne (as is aboue said) he swore before the lords at Orford, that he would not hold the benefices that were voided, and that he would remit the Dane-gilt, with many other things, which after he little performed. Moreouer, because he dreaded the coming of the empresse, he gaue licence to his lords, euery one to build vpon their owne ground strong castles or fortresses, as them liked. All the time of his raigne he was vexed with wars, but especially with Dauid king of the Scots, with whom hee was at length accorded: but yet the Scotish king did him no homage, because he was sworne to Maud the empresse. Notwithstanding, yet Henrie the eldest son to king Dauid did homage to king Stephan. But he after repenting thereof, entred into Northumberland with a great host, and burnt and slew the people in most cruell wise, neither sparing man, woman or child. Such as were with child they ript, the children they tost vpon their speares points, and laying the priests vpō the altars, they mangled and cut them all to pieces, after a most terrible manner. But by the manhod of the English lords and souldiers, and through the meanes of Thurkin archbishop of Yorke, they were met withall, and slaine a great number of them, and Dauid their king constrained to giue Henrie his sonne hostage for suretie of peace. In the meane time king Stephan was occupied in the south countries, besieging diuers castles of diuers bishops and other lords, and tooke them by force, and fortified them with his knights and seruants, to the intent to withstand the empresse, whose comming he euer feared.

Building of castles in England.

The crueltie of the Scots against the Englishmen.

Anno 1140 Maud the empresse came into England against Stephan.

About the first yeare of his raigne, Maud the empresse came into England out of Normandie, and by the aid of Robert earle of Glocester, and Ranulph of Chester, made strong warre vpon king Stephan. In the end wherof the kings partie was chased, and himselfe taken prisoner, and sent to Bristow there to be kept in sure hold. The same day when king Stephan should ioyne his battell, it is said in a certaine old chronicle before minded, that he being at the masse (which then the bishop of Lincolne said before the king) as he went to offer vp his taper, it brake in two pieces. And when the masse was done, (at what time the king should haue beene houseled) the rope whereby the pix did hang, did breake, and the pix fell downe vpon the altar.

King Stephan taken prisoner.

After this field, the quéene, king Stephans wife (lying then in Kent) made great labour to the empresse and her counsell, to haue the king delivered and put into some house of religion, but could not obtaine. Also the Londoners made great suite to the said empresse, to haue and to vse againe S. Edwards lawes, and not the lawes of her father, which were more strict and strange vnto them then the other. Which when they could not obtaine of her and her counsell, the citizens of London, being therewith discontented, would haue taken the empresse: but she hauing knowledge thereof, fled priuilie from London vnto Orford. But then the Kentishmen and Londoners taking the kings part, ioyned battell against the empresse, there the foresaid Robert earle of Glocester, and base brother to the empresse was taken, and so by exchange, both the king and earle Robert were deliuered out of prison. Then Stephan without delay, gathering to him a strong army, straitly pursued the foresaid Matild or Maud with her friends, besieging them in the castle of Orford. In the siege whereof fell a great snow and frost so hard, that a man well laden might passe ouer the water: vpon the occasion whereof, the empresse bethinking her selfe, appointed with her friends and retinue, clothed in white sheets, and so issuing out by a posterne gate, went vpon the ice ouer Thames, and so escaped to Walingford. After this, the king (the castle being gotten) when he found not the empresse, was much displeased, and molested the countrie about diuers waies. In conclusion, he pursued the empresse and her companie so hard, that he caused them to flie the realme, which was the first yeare of his raigne.

What it is for princes to be hard and strict to their subiects.

King Stephan and Robert earle of Glocester deliuered by exchange.

Ex incerti autoris chronico.

The second yeare after this, which was the eight yeare of his raigne, there was a parlament kept at London, vnto the which all the bishops of the realme resorted, and there denounced the king accursed, and all them with him that did any hurt to the church, or to any minister thereof. Whereupon the king began somewhat to amend his conditions for a certaine space: but afterward (as my storie saith) was as ill as he was before; but what the causes were, my author maketh no relation thereof, &c. To returne againe to the storie, the empresse compelled, as is said, to flee the realme, returned againe into Normandie to Gefferey Plantagenet her husband. Who, after he had valiantly wonne and defended the duchie of Normandie, against the puissance of king Stephan a long time, ended his life, leauing Henrie his sonne to succeed him in that dukedome. In the meane while, Robert earle of Glocester, and the earle of Chester, who were strong of people, had diuers conflicts with the king, in so much that at a battell at Wilton betweene them the k. was well neere taken, but yet escaped with much paine.

The decease of Gefferey Plantagenet.

It was not long after, but Eustace sonne to king Stephan, who had married the French kings sister, made war on duke Henrie of Normandie, but preuailed not. Soone after, the said Henrie duke of Normandie (in the quarrell of his mother Maud) with a great puissance entred into England, and at the first wan the castle of Malmesburie, then the tower of London, and afterward the towne of Nottingham, with other holds and castles, as of Walingford and other more. Thus betweene him and the king were fought many battels, to the great annoyance of the realme. During which time, Eustace the kings sonne departeth. Vpon the occasion whereof, the king caused Theobald (which succeeded next after William aboue mentioned) archbishop of Canturburie, to make meanes to the duke for peace, which vpon this condition betweene them was concluded, that Stephan during his life time should hold the kingdome, and Henrie in the meane time to be proclamed heire apparent in the chiefe cities throughout the realme. These things thus concluded, duke Henrie taketh his iourney into Normandie (king Stephan and his sonne William bringing him on his way) where William the kings sonne taking vp his horse before his father, had a fall and brake his leg, and so was had to Canturburie. The same yeare king Stephan, about October (as some say for sorrow) ended his life, after he had raigned nineteene yeares periuredly.

Henrie duke of Normandie.

Henrie entreth into England.

Theobald archbishop of Canturburie.

Peace betweene king Stephan and duke Henrie concluded.

The death of king Stephan.

As Theobald succeeded after William archbishop of Canturburie, so in Yorke after Thurkin succeeded William, which was called S. William of Yorke, who was poisoned in his chalice by his chaplaines.

Saint William of Yorke.

In the time of this king, which was the sixteenth yeare of his raigne, Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and legat to the pope, did hold a councell at London. In the which councell first began new found appellations from councels to the pope, found out by Henrie bishop of Winchester. For as the words of mine author do record: In Anglia namque appellationes in vsu non erant, donec eas Henricus Wintonienſis epiſcopus dum legatus eſſet, malo ſuo crudeliter intruſit. In eodem namque concilio ad Romani pontificis audientiam ter appellatum eſt, &c. That is: For appellations before were not in vse in England, til Henrie bishop of Winchester being then the popes legat, brought them cruelly in, to his owne hurt. For in that councell thrice appeale was made to the bishop of Rome.

In the time of king Stephan died Gratianus a monke of Bononie, who compiled the booke called the popes decrees. Also his brother Petrus Lombardus bishop of Paris, which is called the master of sentences, compiled his foure bookes of the sentences. These two brethren were the greatest doers in finding out and establishing this blind opinion of the sacrament, that the only similitude of bread and wine remained, but not the substance of them: and this they call the spirituall vnderstanding of the mysterie. And therefore no maruell if the sunne in those daies were séene blacke and dimme.

Gratianus the compiler of the popes decrees.

Petrus Lombardus master of the sentences.

Some also affirme, that Petrus Comestor, writer of the scholasticall historie, was the third brother to these aboue named.

Petrus Comestor.

In the same time and raigne of the said king Stephan was also Hugo surnamed De sancto victore. About the which time (as Polychronicon reciteth) liued and died Bernardus Clarevallensis.

Hugo de sancto victore.

Bernardus Clarevallensis.

The author of the historie called Iornalensis, maketh also mention of Hildegare the nun and prophetesse in Almanie, to liue in the same age. Concerning whose prophesie against the friers, hereafter (by the grace of Christ) more shall be said, when we come to recite the order and number of friers and religious men crept into the church of Christ.

Hildegare.

We reade moreouer of one named Ioannes de temporibus, which by the affirmance of most of our old historiens, liued 361 yeares (seruant once to Carolus Magnus) and in the raigne of Stephan king of England died. Polychron. lib. 7. Continuator Henr. Hunt. Iornalensis in vita Steph. Nicol. Triuet. &c.

Ioannes de temporibus.

In the daies also of this king, and by him, was builded the abbey of Feuersham, where his sonne and he were buried. He builded the monasterie of Finerneis and of Fomitance, the castle of Walingford, with a number of other castles more.

During the time of the said king Stephan, the yeare of our Lord 1144, the miserable Iewes crucified a child in the citie of Norwich. Nicol. Triuet, & alij.

The Iewes crucified a christian bodie at Norwich.

Much about the same time came vp the order of the Gilbertines, by one Gilbert sonne to Jacoline a knight of Lincolneshire, &c.

The order of the Gilbertines.

Mention hath been made before of certaine English councels holden in the time of this king, where it was (in one of them vnder Theobald the archbishop of Canturburie) decreed, that bishops should liue more discreetly, should teach their flocke more diligently: that reading of scriptures should be frequented more vsually in abbeyes: that priests should not be rulers of worldly matters; and that they should learne and teach the Lords prayer and creed in English. Malmesb.

The Lords prayer and the creed in English.

Matth. Parisiensis writeth, how Stephan king of England in these daies reserued to himselfe the right and authoritie of bestowing of spirituall liuings, and inuesting prelats, in the yeare 1123.

Matth. Pariſienſ. lib. chron. de Stephan king of England.

At which time also, Lotharius the emperour began to doe the the like in recouering againe the right and priuiledge taken away from Henricus his predeceſſour, had not Bernardus giuen him contrarie counſell.

Curſing with booke, bell, and candle.

Heere came into the church the manner of curſing with booke, bell, and candle, deuiſed in the councell of London, holden by William biſhop of Wincheſter vnder pope Celeſtinus, which ſucceeded after Innocentius, An. 1144.

Also Lotharius ſucceeded in the imperiall crowne Conradus, the nephew of Henricus the fift afore mentioned, An. 1138. which only amongſt many emperours is not found to receiue the crowne at the popes hand.

{Anno 1038}

In the daies of this emperor, who raigned fiftéene yeares, were diuers popes, as Celeſtinus the ſecond, Lucius the ſecond, Eugenius the third, at which time the Romans went about to recouer their former old manner of chuſing their conſuls and ſenators. But the popes then being in their ruffe, in no caſe would abide it, whereupon aroſe many commotions, with much ciuill war amongſt them. In ſo much that pope Lucius (ſending for aid to the emperour, and he otherwiſe letted at that time could not come) armed his ſouldiers, thinking to inuade them, or elſe to deſtroy them in their ſenat houſe. But this comming to their knowledge before, the people was all in aray, and ſo much adoe was amongſt them. Pope Lucius being alſo amongſt them in the fight (well pelted with ſtones and blowes) liued not long after. Likewiſe pope Eugenius after him, An. 1145, purſuing the Romans for the ſame matter, firſt did curſe them with excommunication: after, when hée ſaw that would not ſerue, he came with his hoſt, and ſo compelled them at length to ſéeke his peace, and to take his conditions, which were theſe; That they ſhould abolith their conſuls, and take ſuch ſenators as he by his papall authoritie ſhould aſſigne them.

Pope Lucius the ſecond warring againſt the ſenators.

Spirituall excommunication abuſed in temporall cauſes.

Then followed Anaſtaſius the fourth, and after him Adrian the fourth an Engliſh man, by his name called Breakeſpeare, belonging once to S. Albons. This Adrianus kept great ſtirre in like ſort with the citizens of Rome for abolithing their conſuls and ſenat, curſſing, excommunicating, and warring againſt them with all power he could make, to the time he remoued the conſuls out of their office, and brought them all vnder his ſubiection. The like buſineſſe and rage he alſo ſtirred vp againſt Apulia, and eſpecially againſt the empire, bluſtring and thundering againſt Fredericus the emperor, as (the Lord granting) you ſhall heare anon, after we haue proſecuted ſuch matter, as neceſſarily appertaineth firſt to the continuation of our Engliſh ſtorie.

Adrianus a pope, an Engliſh man.

King Henrie the ſecond.

{Anno 1154}

King Henrie the ſecond.

HEnrie the ſecond of that name, the ſonne of Gefferey Plantagenet, and of Maud the empreſſe, and daughter of king Henrie the firſt, began his raigne after king Stephen, and continued fiue and thirtie yeares. The firſt yeare of his raigne he ſubdued Ireland, and not long after, Thomas Becket was made by him lord chancellour of England. This king caſt downe diuers caſtles which were erected in the time of king Stephen. He went into the north parts, where he ſubdued William king of Scotland, who at that time held a great part of Northumberland, vnto Newcaſtle vpon Tine, and ioyned Scotland to his owne kingdome from the ſouth ocean, to the north iles of Orchades. Also he put vnder his dominion the kingdome of Wales, and there let to fall downe many great woods, and made the waies plaine. So that by his great manhood and policie, the ſeignorie of England was much augmented with the addition of Scotland, Ireland, the iles Orchades, Britaine, Poictou, and Guien. Alſo he had in his rule, Normandie, Gaſcoine, Angeou, and Chinon: alſo Aluerne and the citie of Tholous he won, and were to him ſubiect. Quer and beſides (by the title of his wife Elenor, daughter to the earle of Poictou) he obtained the mounts Pyrams in Spaine: ſo that we reade of none of his progenitors, which had ſo many countries vnder his dominion.

Thomas Becket chancellour of England.

{Anno 1157}

In England were ſéene in the firmament two ſunnes, or (as it is in Chronica chronicorum) in Italie appeared three ſunnes by the ſpace of three houres in the weſt, and the yéere following appeared three moones, whereof the middle moone had a red croſſe ouerthwart the face, whereby was betokened (by the iudgement of ſome) the great ſchiſme that after fell among the cardinals for the election of the biſhop of Rome: or elſe rather the buſineſſe betweene Fredericus the emperour and the popes, whereof partly now incidently occaſion giueth vs to diſcourſe; after that I haue firſt written of Gerhardus and Dulcinus Nauarenſis, who in their time according to their gift, did earneſtly labour and preach againſt the church of Rome, defending and maintaining, that prayer was not more holy in one place then in another, that the pope was antichriſt, that the clergie and prelats of Rome were reiect, and the verie whore of Babylon prefigured in the Apocalypſe, &c. Peraduenture theſe had receiued ſome light of knowledge of the Waldenſes, who at length with a great number of their followers were oppreſſed and ſlaine by the pope. And although ſome inconuenient points of doctrine and diſhoneſtie in their aſſemblies be againſt them alledged of ſome, yet theſe times of ours do teach vs ſufficiently, what credit is to be giuen to ſuch popiſh ſlanders, forged rather vpon hatred of true religion, then vpon any iudgement of truth. Illiricus in his booke De teſtibus, referreth the time of theſe two to the yeare of our Lord 1280: but as I find in the ſtorie of Robert Guiſburne, theſe two about the yeare of our Lord 1158, brought thirtie with them into England, who by the king and the prelats were all burnt in the forehead, and ſo driuen out of the realme, and after (as Illiricus writeth) were ſlaine by the pope.

Gerhardus, and Dulcimus, preachers againſt antichriſt of Rome.

Ex hiſtoria Giſburnenſi.

{Anno 1158}

And now (according to my promiſe preuiſed) the time requireth to proceed to the hiſtorie of Fredericus the firſt (called Barbaroſſa) ſucceſſor vnto Conradus in the empire, who marched vp to Italie, to ſubdue there certaine rebels. The pope hearing that, came with his clergie to meet him by the way, in a towne called Sutrium, thinking by him to find aid againſt his enemies. The Emperour ſéeing the biſhop, lighteth from his horſe to receiue him, holding the ſtirrup to the prelat on the left ſide, when he ſhould haue held it on the right, whereat the pope ſhewed himſelfe ſomewhat grieued. The emperour finding, excuſed himſelfe that he was neuer accuſtomed to hold ſtirrups. And ſéeing it was done only of good will, and of no duty, the leſſe matter was what ſide of the horſe he held. The next day to make amends againe to the biſhop, the emperor ſending for him, receiued him, holding the right ſtirrup vnto the prelat, and ſo all the matter was made whole, and he the popes white ſonne againe.

Frederikus Barbaroſſa emperour.

The pope diſpleaſed that the emperour did not hold his right ſtirrup.

The emperour holdeth the popes ſtirrup.

After this, as they were come in and ſat together, Adrianus the pope beginneth to declare vnto him, how his anceſtors before him, ſuch as ſought vnto the ſée of Rome for the crowne were wont alwaies to leaue behind them ſome ſpeciall token or monument of their beneuolence, for the obtaining thereof, as Carolus Magnus in ſubduing the Lombards, Otho the Berengarians, Lotharius the Normans, &c. Wherefore he required ſome benefit to proceed likewiſe from him vnto the church of Rome, in reſtoring againe the countrie of Apulia to the church of Rome. Which thing if he would doe, he for his part againe would do that which appertained vnto him to do: meaning in giuing him the crowne, for at that time the popes had brought the emperours to fetch their crowne at their hands.

The popes old practiſe in ſetting princes together by the eares.

Frederike with his princes, perceiuing that vnleſſe hée would of his owne proper coſts and charges fetch in againe Apulia out of Duke Williams hands, he could not ſpeed of the crowne, was faine to promiſe to all that the pope required, and ſo the next day after was crowned.

This done, the emperour returneth into Germanie, to refreſh his armie and his other furniture, for the ſubduing of Apulia. In the meane while Adrianus not thinking to be idle, firſt giueth forth cenſures of excommunication againſt William duke of Apulia. Beſides, not content with this, ſendeth alſo to Emmanuel emperor of Conſtantinople, incenſing him to war againſt the foreſaid William. The duke perceiuing this, ſendeth to the pope for peace, promiſing to reſtore to him whatſoeuer he would.

Warre ſtirred vp by the pope.

But the pope through the malignant counſell of his cardinals would grant to no peace, thinking to get more by warre. The duke ſéeing nothing but war, prepareth himſelfe with all expedition to the ſame. To be briefe, making all his power out of Sicilia, he arriueth at Apulia, and there putteth Emmanuel the emperour to flight. This done, he proceedeth to the citie of Bonauenture, where the pope with his cardinals were looking for victorie. He planting there his ſiege, ſo ſtraitly preſſed the citie, that the pope with his cardinals were glad to intreate for peace, which they refuſed before. The duke granted vnto their peace vpon certaine conditions: that is, that neither he ſhould inuade ſuch poſſeſſions as belonged to Rome, and that the pope ſhould make him king of both Sicils. So the matter was concluded and they departed. The biſhop comming to Rome, was no leſſe troubled there about their conſuls and ſenators, in ſo much that when his curſes and excommunications could not preuaile nor ſerue, he was faine to leaue Rome, and remoued to Ariminum.

What more gainefull to the pope then peace.

The pope driuen to intreat for peace.

The emperour all this while ſitting quietly at home, began to conſider with himſelfe, how the pope had extorted from the emperours, his predeceſſours, the inueſting and induing of prelats, how he had pilled and polled all nations by his legats, and alſo had béen the ſower of ſeditions through all his empire: he began therefore to require of all the biſhops of Germanie homage, and oath of their allegeance; commanding alſo, the popes legats, if they came into Germanie without his ſending for, not to be receiued. Charging moreouer all his ſubiects, that none of them ſhould appeale to Rome. Beſides this, in his letters he ſet and preferred his name before the popes name: whereupon the pope being not a little offended, directed his letters to the foreſaid Frederike Emperour, after this tenor and forme as followeth.

The godly proceedings of Frederike the emperour againſt the pope.

The copie of Adrianus the popes letters, to Frederike the emperour.

ADrianus epiſcopus ſeruus ſeruorum Dei, Frederico imperatori ſalutem, & apoſtolicam benedictionem, &c. ¶ Cætera vide in priore editione. In English.

Digitized by Google

A letter of pope Adrian to the emperour Frederike.

Adrian bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to Frederike emperour, health and apostolical benediction. The law of God, as it promiseth to them that honor father and mother long life, so it threatneth the sentence of death to them that curse father and mother. Wee are taught by the word of truth, that euerie one, the which exalteth himselfe, shall be brought low. Wherefore (my well beloued sonne in the Lord) we maruell not a little at your wisdome, in that you seeme not to shew that reuerence to blessed S. Peter, and to the holy church of Rome, which you ought to shew. For why? In your letters sent to vs, you prefer your owne name before ours, wherein you incur the note of insolencie, yea rather (to speake it) of arrogancie. What should I heere recite vnto you, the oath of your fidelitie, which you sware to blessed S. Peter and to vs, and how you obserue and keepe the same? Seeing you so require homage and allegeance of them that be gods, and all the sonnes of the high God, and presume to ioyne their holy lands with yours, working contrarie to vs: seeing also you exclude, not only out of your churches, but also out of your cities, our cardinals, whom we direct as legats from our side: what shall I say then vnto you? Amend therefore I aduise you, amend; for while you go about to obtaine of vs your consecration and crowne, and to get those things you haue not, I feare much your honour will lose the things you haue. Thus fare ye well.

The emperours name before the popes.

The answere of Frederike the emperour to the pope.

FRederike by the grace of God, Romane emperour, euer Augustus, vnto Adrian bishop of the Romane church, and vnto all such that be willing to cleaue vnto those things which Iesus began to worke and teach, greeting. The law of iustice giueth to euery person accordingly that which is his. Neither do we derogate from our parents: of whom, according as we haue receiued this our dignity of the imperial crowne and gouernance: so in the same kingdome of ours, we doe render their due and true honor to them againe. And for so much as dutie in all sorts of men is to be sought out, let vs see first in the time of Constantine (Siluester then being bishop of Rome) what patrimonie or regalitie he had of his owne, due to him that he might claime. Did not Constantine of his liberal benignity giue libertie, and restored peace vnto the church? And whatsoeuer regalitie or patrimonie the see of our papacie hath, was it not by the donation of princes giuen vnto them? Reuolue and turne ouer the ancient chronicles (if either you haue not read, or neglected that we do affirme) there it is to be found. Of them which be Gods by adoption, and hold our lordships of vs; why may we not iustly require their homage, and their sworne allegeance, when as he which is both your master and ours (taking nothing of any king or any man, but giuing all goodnesse to all men) paid toll and tribute for him and Peter, vnto Cæsar? giuing you example to do the like. And therefore saith to you and all men, Learne of me, for I am meeke and humble of heart, &c. Wherefore either render againe your lordships and patrimonies which yee hold of vs: or else if ye find them so sweet vnto you, then giue that which is due to God, vnto God: and that which is due to Cæsar, vnto Cæsar. As for your cardinals, we shut them out both of churches and cities, for that we see them not preachers, but prollers; not repairers of peace, but rakers for money; not pillars and vpholders of the church, but pollers insatiable of the world, and moilers of money and gold. What time we shall see them to be other men (such as the church requireth them to be) members and makers of peace, shining forth like lights to the people, assisting poore and weake mens causes in the way of equitie, &c: then shall they find vs prest and readie to relieue them with stipends, and all things necessarie. And whereas you inferre such questions as these vnto secular men (little conducing to religion) you incur thereby no little note and blemish of your humilitie (which is keeper of all vertues) and of your mansuetude. Therefore let your fatherhood beware and take heed, lest in mouing such matters as seeme to vs vnseemely for you, yee giue thereby offence to such as depend of your word (giuing eare to your mouth, as it were to an euening shower:) for wee cannot but tell you of that we heare, seeing now the detestable beast of pride doth creepe into the seat of Peter, prouiding alwaies (as much as we may by Gods grace) for the peace of the church. Fare ye well.

Upon this Adrian the pope directeth out a bull against Frederike, excommunicating him with publike and solemne ceremonies. Moreouer, conspiring with William duke of Apulia sought all manner of waies to infest the emperour, and to set all men against him, especially the clergie. Amongst manie other writing to Hillinus bishop of Triuers, to Arnulphus bishop of Mentz, and to Frederike bishop of Cullen, seeketh first to make them of his side. His epistle to them soundeth to this effect.

Afflictions and proud letter of the pope to the bishops of Germanie.

THe empire of Rome was transferred from the Greekes to the Almans, so that the king of Almans could not be called emperour, before he were crowned of the bishop apostolicall. Before his consecration hee is a king, afterwards emperour. Whence hath he his empire then, but of vs? By the election of his princes he hath the name of a king, by our consecration he hath the name of the emperour of August, or of Cæsar. Ergo by vs he raigneth as emperour. Search ancient antiquities. Zacharias P. promoted Carolus, and made him a great name, that he was made and called emperour: and after that, euer the king of Almans was named emperour and aduocat to the see apostolicall, so that Apulia (conquered by him) was subdued to the bishop of Rome: which Apulia with the citie of Rome is ours, and not the emperours. Our seat is at Rome, the seat of the emperour is at Aquis in Arduenna, which is a wood in France. The emperor whatsoeuer he hath, he hath it of vs. As Zacharias did translate the empire from the Greeks to the Almans, so we may translate it againe from the Almans to the Greekes. Behold it lieth in our power to giue it to whom we will, being therefore set vp of God aboue gentiles and nations, to destroy and plucke vp, to build and to plant, &c.

Well bragged and like a pope.

Scripture wel wrested.

And yet further to vnderstand the ambitious presumption of this proud see of Rome, it so chanced this emperour Fredericus at his first comming vp to Rome, did behold there in the palace of Lateran, a certaine picture brought forth vnto him, how Lotharius the second emperor was crowned of the pope, with the inscription of certaine verses in Latine, declaring how the foresaid emperour comming to Rome, first did sweare to the citie, after was made the popes man, and so of him receiued the crowne. Fredericus offended with this picture, desired the pope it might be abolished, for that it should be no cause of any dissension hereafter. The pope vnderstanding the intent of the emperour, how loth he was to come vnder subiection to his see, deuised by all craftie waies to bring it to passe. And first taking his occasion by the bishop of Laodicea (being then detained in custodie, I cannot tell by whom) sent diuers and sharpe letters vnto him; and yet not so sharpe, as proud and disdainfull. Wherein the first salutation by his legats, was this in Latine: Salutat vos beatissimus pater noster papa, & vniuersitas cardinalium, ille vt pater, hi vt fratres. That is, Our most blessed father the pope greeteth you, and the vniuersall companie of the cardinals, he as your father, they as your brethren. Meaning thereby that he should vnderstand himselfe to be subiect and vnderling to the pope, no lesse then the cardinals were. Moreouer in his letters obiecting diuers things against him, reciteth how many and great benefits he had receiued of the church of Rome, by the which church he had obtained the fulnesse of his honour and dignitie, &c. The emperour with his princes perceiuing whereunto the pope by his legats did shot (being a prince of courage) could not abide such intolerable presumption of a proud message: whereupon much contention fell betweene the legats and the princes. And of whom then, say the legats, receiueth Cesar the empire, if hee take it not of the pope: with the which word the German princes were so much offended, that had not the emperour stayed them (with much ado) they would haue vsed violence against the legats. But the emperour not permitting that, commanded the legats away, straitly charging them to make no turne by the way to any person or persons, but straight to depart home. And he, to certifie the whole state of the empire of the truth of the matter, directeth forth these letters that follow.

Ex Radennico, in appendice Frisingen.

See the ambitious presumption of a proud priest.

The tenor of the emperours letter sent through all his empire.

FOr so much as the prouidence of God (whereof dependeth all power both in heauen and earth) hath committed to vs his annointed, this our regiment and empire to be gouerned, and the peace of his churches by our imperiall armes to be protected; we cannot but lament and complaine to you with great sorrow of heart, seeing such causes of dissension (the root and fountaine of euils, and the infection of pestiferous corruption) thus to rise from the holy church, imprinted with the seale of peace, and loue of Christ.

By reason whereof (except God turne it away) we feare the whole bodie of the church is like to bee polluted, the vnitie thereof to be broken, and a schisme and diuision to be betwixt the spirituall and temporal regiment. For we being of late at Bisunze, and there intreating busily of matters pertaining as wel to the honor of our empire, as to the wealth of the churches, there came ambassadors of the sea apostolicall, declaring that they brought a legacie to our maiestie of great importance, redounding to the no small commoditie of our honor and empire.

Who then, the first day of their comming, being brought to our presence, and receiued of vs (as the manner is) with honour accordingly, audience was giuen them to heare what they had to say. They forthwith bursting out of the mãnon of iniquitie, hautie pride, stoutnesse and arrogancie, out of the execrable presumption of their swelling heart, did their message with letters apostolicall, whereof the tenour was this: That we should alwaies haue before our eyes, how that our soueraigne lord the pope gaue vs the imperiall crowne, and that it doth not repent him, if so be it we haue receiued greater benefits at his hand.

And

And this was the effect of that ſo ſweet and fatherly legation, which ſhould nouriſh peace both of the church and of the empire, to vnite them faſt together in the band of loue.

At the hearing of this ſo falſe, vntrue, and moſt vaineglorious preſumption of ſo proud a meſſage, not only the emperors maieſtie conceiued indignation, but alſo all the princes (there preſent) were moued with ſuch anger and rage thereat, that if our preſence and requeſt had not ſtaied them, they could not haue held their hands from theſe wicked prieſts, or elſe to haue proceeded with ſentence of death againſt them.

Furthermore, becauſe a great number of other letters (partly written alreadie, partly with ſeales readie ſigned, for letters to be written according as they ſhould thinke good to the churches of Germanie) were found about them, whereby to worke their conceiued intent of iniquitie here in our churches, to ſpoile the altars, to carie away the iewels of the church, and to fley off the limis & plates of golden croſſes, &c. To the intent their auaricious meaning ſhould haue no further power to raigne, we gaue them commandement to depart the ſame way they came. And now, ſeeing our raigne and empire ſtandeth vpon the election of princes, from God alone, who in the paſſion of his ſonne ſubdued the world to be gouerned with two ſwords neceſſarie, and againe, ſeeing Peter the apoſtle hath ſo informed the world with this doctrine, Deum timete, regem honorificate: that is; Feare God, honor your king: therefore, whoſo ſaith that we haue and poſſeſſe our emperiall kingdome by the benefit of the lord pope, is contrarie both to the ordinance of God, and to the doctrine of Peter, and alſo ſhall be reproued for a lier.

Note heere a couragious hart in a valiant emperour.

An example for all princes to follow.

Note.

Therefore as our endeuour hath been heretofore, to helpe and to deliuer the ſeruile captiuitie of churches out of the hand, and from the yoke of the Egyptians, and to maintaine the right of their liberties and dignities, we deſire you all with your compaſſion to lament with vs, this ſlanderous ignominie inferred to vs and our kingdome, truſting that your faithfull good will, which hath been euer truſtie to the honor of this empire, (neuer yet blemiſhed from the firſt beginning of this citie, and of religion) will prouide, that it ſhall haue no hurt through the ſtrange nouelties and preſumptuous pride of ſuch. Which thing rather then it ſhould come to paſſe, know you this for certaine; I had rather incur the danger of death, then to ſuffer ſuch confuſion to happen in our daies.

This letter of Cæſar fretted the pope not a little, who wrote againe to the bishops of Germanie, accuſing the emperor, and willing them to worke againſt him what they could. They anſwere againe with all obedience to the pope, ſubmitting themſelues, and yet threatning the emperour, and blaming him rather; and exhorted him hencefoorth to temper his letters and legacies with more gentlenes and modeſtie; which counſell hee alſo followed, perceiuing otherwiſe, that he could not preuaile.

Much trouble had good Frederic with this pope, but much more with the other that followed. For this pope continued not very long, the ſpace only of 4. yeares and od months. About whoſe time roſe vp the order of the hermits by one William once duke of Aquitania, and afterward a frier. This Adrianus walking with his cardinals abroad, to a place called Anagnia or Arignanum, (as Volateran calleth it) chanced to be choked with a flie getting into his throat, and ſo was ſtrangled, who in the latter time of his papacie was wont to ſay, that there is no more miſerable kind of life in the earth, then to be a pope, and to come to the papacie by blood, that is (ſaid he) not to ſucceed Peter, but rather Romulus, who to raigne alone did ſlay his brother.

The order of hermits.

{Anno 1159}

The ſaying and iudgement of pope Adrianus of the papal ſee.

The popes rather ſucceſſors to Romulus then to Peter. Pope Alexander the third.

Although this Adrian was bad enough, yet came the next much worſe, one Alexander the third of that name; who yet was not elect alone; for beſide him the emperor with nine cardinals (albeit Sabellicus ſaith but with three) did ſet vp another pope, named Victor the fourth. Betweene theſe two popes roſe a foule ſchiſme and great diſcord, and long continued. In ſo much that the emperour being required to take vp the matter, ſent for them both to appeare before him, that in hearing them both, he might iudge their cauſe the better. Victor came, but Alexander (diſdaining that his matter ſhould come in controuerſie) refuſed to appeare. Whereupon the emperour with a full conſent of his biſhops and clergie about him, aſſigned and ratified the election of Victor to ſtand, and ſo brought him into the citie, there to be receiued and placed. Alexander, flying into France, accuſed them both, ſending his letters to all chriſtendome againſt them, as men to be auoided and caſt out of all chriſtian companie. Alſo to get him friends at Rome by flatterie and money, got on his ſide the greateſt part of the citie, both to the fauouring of him, and to the ſetting vp of ſuch conſuls as were for his purpoſe. After this, Alexander comming from France to Sicill, and from thence to Rome, was there receiued with much fauour, through the helpe of Philip the French king.

Alexander cloſeth the emperour.

The emperour, hearing this rebellion and conſpiracie in Rome, remoued with great power into Italie, where he had deſtroyed diuers great cities. Comming at length to Rome, {Anno 1164} he required the citizens that the cauſe betwixt the two popes might be decided, and that he which had the beſt right might be taken. If they would ſo do, he would reſtore againe that which he tooke from them before. Alexander miſtruſting his part, and doubting the wils of the citizens (hauing ſhips readie prepared for him, from William duke of Apulia) fetcht a courſe about to Venice.

To declare heere the difference in hiſtories, betweene Blondus, Sabellicus, and the Venetian chroniclers, with other writers, concerning the order of this matter, I will ouerpaſſe. In this moſt doe agree, that the pope being at Venice, and required to be ſent of the Venetians to the emperour, they would not ſend him. Whereupon Frederic the emperour ſent thither his ſonne Otho, with men and ſhips well appointed, charging him not to attempt any thing before his comming. The yong man more hardie then circumſpect (ioyning with the Venetians) was ouercome, and ſo taken, was brought into the citie. Hereby the pope toke no ſmall occaſion to worke his feats.

The father to helpe the captiuitie and miſerie of his ſonne, was compelled to ſubmit himſelfe to the pope, and to intreat for peace. So the emperour comming to Venice (at S. Marks church, where the biſhop was, there to take his abſolution) was bid to kneele downe at the popes feet.

The proud pope ſetting his foot vpon the emperors necke, ſaid the verſe of the Pſal. Super aſpidem & baſiliſcũ ambulabis, et cõculcabis leonẽ et draconem; That is: Thou ſhalt walke vpon the adder & on the baſiliske, and ſhalt treade downe the lion and the dragon. To whom the emperor anſwering again, ſaid: Non tibi ſed Petro: That is: not to thee but to Peter. The pope againe: Et mihi, et Petro: Both to me and to Peter. The emperor fearing to giue any occaſiõ of further quarrelling, held his peace, & ſo was abſolued, & peace made betweene them. The conditions whereof were theſe. Firſt, that he ſhould receiue Alexander for the true pope. Secondly, that he ſhould reſtore againe to the church of Rome all that he had taken away before. And thus the emperour obtaining againe his ſonne, departed.

Holy Scripture abuſed.

The pope treading on the emperours necke.

Pope Alexander treading on the necke of Frederike the emperour.

Heere, as I note in diuers writers, a great diuerſitie and varietie touching the order of this matter (of whom ſome ſay that the emperour campt in Paleſtina before he came to Venice, ſome ſay after) ſo I maruell to ſee in Volateran (ſo great a fauourer of the pope) ſuch a contradiction, who in his two and twentith booke ſaith, that Otho the emperors ſonne was taken in this conflict, which was the cauſe of the peace betweene his father and the pope. And in his three and twentith booke againe

Volateran taken with a contradiction.

M. iij. ſaith,

saith, that the emperour himselfe was taken prisoner in the same battell: and so afterwards (peace concluded) toke his iourney to Asia and Palestina. This pope in the time of his papacie (which continued one and twentie yeares) kept sundrie councels both at Turo and at Lateran, where he confirmed the wicked proceedings of Hildebrand, and others his predecessors; as to bind all orders of the clergie to the vow of chastitie; which were not greatly to be reprehended, if they would define chastitie aright. For who so liueth not a chast life (saith he) is not fit to be a minister. But herein lieth an error full of much blindnesse, and also perill, to thinke that matrimonie immaculat (as S. Paul calleth it) is not chastitie, but only a single life, that they esteeme to be a chast life.

Concilium Lateranense. The clergie bound to the vow of chastitie. Papists erre not so much in promising chastity, as in defining chastitie.

Now for so much as our English pope holy martyr, called Thomas Becket, hapned also in the same time of this pope Alexander, let vs somewhat also speake of him, so far as the matter shall seeme worthie of knowledge, and to stand with truth: to the end that the truth thereof being sifted from all flatterie and lies of such popish writers as paint out his storie, men may the better iudge both of him what he was, and also of his cause.

The life and historie of Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie.

Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturbury.

IF the cause make a martyr (as is said) I see not why we should esteeme Thomas Becket to die a martyr, more then any other whom the princes sword doth here temporally punish for their temporall deserts. To die for the church, I grant is a glorious matter. But the church (as it is a spirituall and not a temporall church) so it standeth vpon causes spirituall, and vpon an heauenly foundation, as vpon faith, religion, true doctrine, sincere discipline, obedience to Gods commandements; and not vpon things pertaining to this world, as possessions, liberties, exemptions, priuiledges, dignities, patrimonies, and superiorities. If these bee giuen to the church, I pray God churchmen may vse them well; but if they be not giuen, the church cannot claime them; or if they be taken away, that standeth in the princes power. To contend with princes for the same, it is no matter, (in my mind) materiall, to make a martyr, but rather a rebellion against them, to whom we owe subiection. Therefore, as I suppose Thomas Becket to be farre from the cause and title of a martyr (neither can he be excused from a plaine rebell against his prince) so yet would I haue wished against the law rather publikely to haue found out his fault, then the swords of men (not bidden nor sent) to haue smitten him, hauing no speciall commandement, neither of the prince, nor of the law so to do. For though the indignation of the prince (as the wise prince saith) is death, yet it is not for euery priuat person straightwaies to reuenge the secret indignation of his prince, except he be publikely authorized thereunto. And this had been (as I suppose) the better way, the lawes first to haue executed their iustice vpon him. Certes, it had been the safest way for the king, as it proued after; who had iust matter enough, if he had prosecuted his cause against him. And also thereby his death had been without all suspicion of martyrdome, neither had there followed that shrining and sainting of him as there did. Albeit the secret prouidence of God (which gouerneth all things) did see this way percase to be best, and most necessarie for those daies. And doubtlesse (to say here what I thinke, and yet to speake nothing against charitie) if the emperours had done the like to the popes, contending against them, what time they had taken them prisoners, that is, if they had vsed the law of the sword against them, and chopped off the heads of one or two, according to their traiterous rebellion, they had broken the necke of much disturbance, which long time after did trouble the church. But for lacke of that, because emperours hauing the sword, and the truth on their side, would not vse their sword; but standing in awe of the popes vaine curse, and reuerencing his seate for Saint Peters sake, durst not lay hand vpon him, though he were neuer so abominable and traiterous a malefactour: the popes perceiuing that, toke so much vpon them (not as the Scripture would giue) but as much as the superstitious feare of emperours and kings would suffer them to take; which was so much, that it past all order, rule, and measure: and all because the superiour powers either would not, or durst not practise the authoritie giuen vnto them of the Lord, vpon those inferious, but suffered them to be their masters.

Becket no martyr.

But as touching Thomas Becket, whatsoeuer is to bee thought of them that did the act, the example thereof yet bringeth this profit with it, to teach all Romish prelats not to be so stubborne (in such matters not pertaining vnto them) against their prince, vnto whom God hath subiected them.

Now to the storie, which if it be true that is set forth in Quadrilogo, by those foure, who toke vpon them to expresse the life and processe of Thomas Becket, it appeareth by al coniectures that he was a man of a stout nature, seuere, and inflexible. What persuasion or opinion he had once conceiued, from that he would in no wise be remoued, or very hardly. Threatnings and flatterings were to him both one; in this point singular, following no mans counsell so much as his owne. Great helps of nature there were in him (if hee could haue vsed them well) rather then of learning; albeit somewhat skilfull he was of the ciuill law, which hee studied at Bononie: in memorie excellent good, and also well spoken in courtly and worldly matters. Besides this, he was of a chast and strait life, if the histories be true; although in the first part of his life (being yet archdeacon of Canturburie, and after lord chancellour) he was verie euill, courtly, pleasant, giuen much both to hunting and hawking, according to the guise of the court; and highly fauoured he was of his prince, who not only had thus promoted him, but also had committed his sonne and heire to his institution and gouernance. But in this his first beginning, he was not so well beloued, but afterward he was againe as much hated (and deseruedly) both of the king, and also of the most part of his subiects, saue only of certaine monkes and priests, and such others as were perswaded by them, who magnified him not a little for vpholding the liberties of the church (that is) the licentious life and excesse of churchmen. Amongst all others, these vices he had most notable, and to bee rebuked; full of deuotion, but without all true religion; zealous, but cleane without knowledge. And therefore as he was stiffe and stubborne of nature, so (a blind conscience being ioyned withall) it turned to plaine rebellion. So superstitious he was to the obedience of the pope, that he forgot his obedience to his naturall and most beneficiall king: and in maintaining (so contentiously) the vaine constitutions and decrees of men, he neglected the commandements of God. But herein most of all to be reprehended, that not only (contrarie to the kings knowledge) hee sought to conuey himselfe out of the realme (being in that place and calling) but also (being out of the realme) set matter of discord betweene the pope and his king, and also betweene the French king and him, contrarie to all honestie, good order, naturall subiection, and true christiantie. Whereupon followed no little disquietnesse after, both to the king, and damage of the realme, as heere (in processe and order following, by the grace of Christ) we will declare; first beginning with the first rising vp of him, and so consequently to prosecute in order his storie as followeth.

What commeth of blind zeale destitute of right knowledge.

And first heere to omit the progenie of him and of his mother named Rose, whom Polyd. Virgilius falsely nameth to be a Saracen, when indeed shee came out of the parts bordering neere to Normandie; to omit also the fabulous vision of his mother, mentioned in Roberto Crikeladensi, of a burning torch issuing out of her bodie, and reaching vp to heauen: his first preferment was to the church of Branfield, which hee had by the gift of S. Albans. After that, he entred in the seruice of the archbishop of Canturburie, by whom he was then preferred to be his archdeacon; and after by the said Theobald was put (as a man meet for his purpose) to king Henrie to bridle the yong king, that hee should not bee fierce against the clergie, whom in processe of time the king made lord chancellour, and then he left playing the archdeacon, and began to play the chancellour. He fashioned his conditions like to the kings both in waightie matters and trifles; hee would hunt with him, and watch the time when the king dined and slept. Furthermore, he began to loue the merrie iestings of the court, to delight himselfe with the great laud of men, and praise of the people. And that I may passe ouer his houshold stuffe, hee had his bridle of siluer, and the bosses of his bridle were worth a great treasure. At his table and other expences he passed any earle: that on the one side men would iudge him little to consider the office of an archdeacon; and on the other side would iudge him to vse wicked doings. Hee played also the good souldier vnder the king in Gascoigne, and both wan and kept townes. When the king sent Thomas being chancellour home into England (ambassadour with other nobles after the death of the archbishop) hee willed Richard Lucie (one of the chiefest) to commend in his name this Thomas to the couent of Canturburie, that they might chuse him archbishop; which thing he did diligently. The monkes said it was not meet to chuse a courtier and a souldier to be head of so holy a company; for he would spend (said they) all that they had. Others had this surmise also, because he was in so great fauour with the prince the kings sonne, and was so suddenly discharged of the chancellourship which he had borne fiue yeares: in the foure and fortith yeare of his age (on the saturday in Whitsonweeke) he was made priest, and the next day consecrated bishop.

The life of Thomas Becket. Polydorus mistaketh the mother of Becket. Ex Roberto Crikeladensi. Ex Florilego.

As touching the priesthood of this man, I find the histories to varie in themselues: for if he were beneficed, and chaplaine to Theobald, and afterwards archdeacon (as some say) it is no other like, but that he was priest before, and not (as our most English stories say) made priest in one day, and archbishop the next.

Difference in chronicles.

But howsoeuer this matter falleth, heere is in the meane time to be seene, what great benefits the king had done for him, and what great loue had been betweene them both. Now after that Becket was thus promoted, what variance and discord hapned betweene them, remaineth to be shewed: the causes of which variance were diuers and sundrie.

As first, when (according to the custome) the kings officers gathered of euerie one hide money through the realme, for the defence of their owne countrey; the king would haue taken it to his coffers. But the bishop said, that which euerie man gaue

The causes of variance retired betweene the king and the archbishop.

Herbertus de Boscham. Ioan. Charnot. Alanus abbat of Teuchburie. Gulielmus Cantuariensis. Thomas Becket described.

Digitized by Google

gaue willinglie, he should not count as his proper rent.

Another cause was, that where a priest was accused of murder, and the kings officers and the friends of the dead accused the priest earnestlie afore the bishop of Salisburie his diocesan to whom he was sent, desiring iustice to be done on him, the priest was put to his purgation. But when he was not able to defend himselfe, the bishop sent to the archbishop to aske what he should do. The archbishop commanded he should be depriued of all ecclesiasticall benefices, and shut vp in an abbie to doe perpetuall penance. After the same sort were diuers others handled for like causes, but none put to death, nor lost ioynt, nor burned in the hand, or the like paine.

The third cause was, that where a canon of Bruis did reuile the kings iustices, the king was offended with the whole clergie. For these and such like, the archbishop (to pacifie the kings anger) commanded the canon to be whipped and depriued of his benefices for certaine yeeres. But the king was not content with this gentle punishment, because it rather increased their boldnesse, and therefore he called the archbishop, bishops, and all the clergie to assemble at Westminster. When they were assembled together, the king earnestlie commanded that such wicked clerks should haue no priuiledge of their clergie, but bee deliuered to the gailors, because they passed so little of the spirituall correction; and this he said also their own canons and lawes had decreed. The archbishop counselling with his bishops and learned men, answered probablie: and in the end he desired hartily the kings gentlenesse (for the quietnesse of himselfe and his realme) that vnder Christ our new king, and vnder the new law of Christ hee would bring in no new kind of punishment into his realme (vpon the new chosen people of the Lord) against the old decrees of the holie fathers; and oft he said, that he neither ought nor could suffer it. The king moued therewith (and not without cause) alleageth againe and exacteth the old lawes and customes of his grandfather, obserued and agreed vpon by archbishops, bishops, prelats, and other priuiledged persons, inquiring likewise of him whether he would agree to the same, or else now (in his raigne) would condemne that which in the raigne of his grandfather was well allowed. To which lawes and customes the said Thomas did partlie grant, and partly not grant. The copie of the which foresaid laws are contained in the number of eight and twentie or nine and twentie, whereof I thought heere to recite certaine not vnworthie to be knowne.

The copie of the old lawes and customes whereunto Thomas Becket did grant.

The kings customs.

1 That no order should be giuen to husbandmens children and bondmens children, without the assent or testimoniall of them, which be the lords of the countrie where they were borne and brought vp: and if their sonnes become clerks, they shall not receiue the order of priesthood without licence of their lords.

Out of an English chronicle as it appeareth, drawne out of French by earle Riuers, lord Scales.

2 And if a man of holy church hold any lay fee in his hand, he shall do therefore the king the seruice that belongeth thereto, as vpon iuries, assise of lands and iudgements, sauing onlie at execution doing of death.

3 If any man were the kings traitor, and had taken the church, that it should be lawfull to the king and his officers to take him out.

4 And if any fellons goods were brought to holie church, that there should none such keepe there, for euery fellons goods bee the kings.

5 That no land should be giuen to the church, or to any house of religion, without the kings licence.

These articles following Thomas agreed not vnto.

1 If that betweene a clerke and a lay man were any striuing for church goods, they would the plea should bee done in the kings court.

2 That there should neither bishop nor clerke goe out of the land without the kings licence, and then he should sweare vpon a booke he should procure no hurt against the king, nor none of his.

3 If any man were denounced accursed, and were come againe to amendment, the king would not that he should bee sworne, but only find sureties to stand to that that holy church should award.

4 The fourth, that no man that held of the king in chiefe or in seruice, should be accursed without the kings licence.

5 That all the bishoprikes and abbies that were vacant, should be in the kings hands, vntill such time that he should chuse a prelat thereto, and he should be chosen out of the kings chapels; and first before he were confirmed, he should doe his homage to the king.

6 If any plea were brought to ỹ consistory, they should appeale from thence to the archdeacon, and from thence to the bishops court, and from the bishops court to the archbishops, and from thence to the king, and no further. So that in conclusion, the complaints of holy church must come before the king, and not the pope.

7 That al debts that were owing through trothplight, should not be pleaded in spirituall, but in temporall courts.

8 That the Peter-pence, which to the pope were gathered, should be taken to the king.

9 If any clerke for felonie were taken and so proued, hee should bee first degraded, and then through iudgement to bee hanged, or if he were a traitor, to be drawne.

Other lawes and constitutions made at Clarendon in Normandie and sent to England, whereunto Becket and the pope would not agree, he being then fled out of the realme.

The lawes of Clarendon.

1 If any person shall bee found to bring from the pope, or from the archbishop of Canturburie any writing containing any indict or curse against the realme of England, the same man to be apprehended without delay for a traitor, and execution to be done vpon the same.

2 That no monke nor any clerke shall be permitted to passe ouer into England without a passport from the king or his iustices; who so doth the contrarie, that man is to be tached and imprisoned.

3 No man to be so bold once to appeale to the pope, or to the archbishop of Canturburie out of England.

4 That no decree or commandement proceeding from the authoritie of the pope or the bishop of Canturburie, to be receiued in England, vnder paine of taking and imprisoning.

5 In generall, to forbid any man to carrie ouer any commandement or precept, either of clerke, or layman, to the pope or to the archbishop of Canturburie, vnder paine of imprisonment.

6 If any bishop, clerke, abbat, or layman shall doe contrarie to this inhibition, or will keepe the sentence of interdicting, the same incontinent to be thrust out of the land, with all their kinred, and to leaue all their goods behind them.

7 All the possessions, goods and chattels of such as fauour the pope or the archbishop of Canturburie, to be seized and confiscat for the king.

8 All such of the clergie as be out of the realme, hauing their rents and profits out of the land, to be summoned and warned through euery shire within three moneths to repaire home, or else their rents and goods to returne to the king.

9 That S. Peters pence should be no more paid to the apostolicall see, but to be reserued diligently in the kings coffers, and there to bee at his commandement. Atque hæc ex Quadrilogo.

10 That the bishops of Salisburie & Norwich be at the kings mercie, and be summoned by the shiriffe and bedels, that they before the kings iustices doe right to the king and his iustices, because (contrarie to the statutes of Clarendon) by commandement they interdicted the land of earle Hugh, and published the same in their diocesse without licence of the kings iustices.

¶ By these and such other lawes and decrees it may appeare, that the abolishing of the pope is no new thing in the realme of England. This only difference there is, that the pope being driuen out then, could not be kept out so long as now hee is. The cause is, that the time was not yet come that antichrist should so fullie be reuealed; neither was his wickednes then so fullie ripe in those daies, as it hath been now in our time. Now these premised, let vs returne where we left, to the matter betweene the king and Thomas Becket.

The communication and controuersie betweene the king and Thomas Becket with his clergie.

The bishop of Chichester.

The king (as is aforesaid) conuenting his nobles and clerks together, required to haue the punishment of certaine misdoers of the clergie; but Thomas Becket not assenting thereunto, the king came to this point, to know whether he would consent with his clergie, that the customs then set forth in the realme (meaning the first part of those decrees aboue specified) should be obserued. To which the archbishop, consulting together with his brethren, giueth answer againe; that he was contented the kings ordinances should be obserued, adding this withall, Saluo ordine suo, that is; Sauing his order. And so in like manner all the other bishops after, being demanded in order, answered with the same addition, Saluo ordine suo. Onelie Hilarius bishop of Chichester, perceiuing the king to be exasperat with that addition, in stead of Saluo ordine, agreed to obserue them Bona fide. The king hearing them not simplie to agree vnto him, but with an exception, was mightilie offended; who then turning to the archbishop and the prelats, said; that he was not well contented with that clause of theirs, Saluo suo ordine, which he said was captious and deceitfull, hauing some manner of venom lurking vnder; and therefore required an absolute grant of them without any exception to agree to the kings ordinances. To this the archbishop answered againe, that they had sworne vnto him their fidelitie, both life, bodie, and earthlie honor, Saluo ordine suo; and that in the same earthlie honor also those ordinances were comprehended, and to the obseruing they would bind themselues after Beckets addition, Saluo ordine suo.

Digitized by Google

after no other forme, but as they had sworne before. The king with this was moued, and all his nobilitie not a little. As for the other bishops, there was no doubt but they would easilie haue relented, had not the stoutnesse of the archbishop made them more constant then otherwise they would haue been. The day being well spent, the king (when he could get no other answer of them) departed in great anger, giuing no word of salutation to the bishops, & likewise the bishops euery one to his owne house departed. The bishop of Chichester (amongst the rest) was greatly rebuked of his fellowes for changing the exception contrarie to the voice of al the others. The nert day following the king tooke from the archbishop all such honors and lordships, as he had giuen him before, in the time that he was chancellor, whereby appeared the great displeasure of the king against him and the clergie. Not long after this, the king removing from London (vnknowne to the bishops) sailed ouer to Normandy, whither the bishop of London called Gilbert (not long after) resorted to craue the kings fauour, and gaue him counsell withall to ioyne some of the bishops on his side, lest if all were against him, peraduenture hee might sooner bee ouerthrowne. And thus the greatest number of the bishops were by this means reconciled againe to the king, only the archbishop with a few others remained in their stoutnes still. The king (thinking to trie all maner of waies) when he saw no feare nor threats could turne him, did assay him with gentlenesse; it would not serue. Many of the nobles laboured betwixt them both, exhorting him to relent to the king; it would not be. Likewise the archbishop of Yorke with diuers other bishops and abbats (especiallie the bishop of Chester) did the same. Besides this his owne houshold dailie called vpon him, but no man could perswade him. At length vnderstanding (partly by them that came to him) what danger might happen not only to himselfe, but to all the other clergie vpon the kings displeasure: partly considering the old loue and kindnesse of the king towards him in time past, was content to giue ouer to the kings request, and came to Oxford to him, reconciling himselfe about the addition, which displeased the king so much. Wherupon the king (being somewhat mitigated) receiueth him with a more cheerefull countenance, but yet not all so familiarlie as before, saying; that hee would haue his ordinances and proceedings after the forme confirmed in the publike audience and open sight of his bishops and all his nobles. After this the king (being at Clarendon) there called all his peeres and prelats before him, requiring to haue that performed, which they had promised, in consenting to the obseruing of his grandfathers ordinances and proceedings. The archbishop suspecting (I cannot tel what) in the kings promise, drew backward, and now would not that he would before, at last with much adoe he was inforced to giue assent. First, came to him the bishop of Salisburie and of Norwich, who (for old matters indangered to the king long before) came weeping and lamenting to the archbishop, desiring him to haue some compassion of them, and to remit his pertinacie to the king, lest if hee so continued (through his stoutnesse to exasperat the kings displeasure) happily it might redound to no small danger, not onely of them which were in ieopardie alreadie, but also of himselfe to be imprisoned, and the whole clergie to be indangered. Besides these two bishops, there went to him other two noble peeres of the realme, labouring with him to relent and condescend to the kings desire: if not, they should be inforced to vse violence, as neither would stand with the kings fame, and much lesse with his quietnesse; but yet the stout stomach of the man would not giue ouer. After this came to him two rulers of the temple called Templares, one Richard de Hall, another Tostās de Yeuerton with their companie, lamenting and bewailing their great perill which they declared vnto him to hang ouer his head: yet neither with their teares nor with their kneelings would he be remoued. At length came the last message from the king, signifying vnto him with expresse words (& also with teares) what he should trust to, if he would not giue ouer to the kings request.

By reason of which message, he (either terrified or els perswaded) was content to submit himselfe. Whereupon the king incontinent assembling the states together, the archbishop first before all others beginneth to promise to the king obedience, and submission vnto his customs, and that Cum bona fide, leauing out his former addition, Saluo ordine, mentioned before: in stead whereof he promised in Verbo veritatis, to obserue and kéep the kings customes and sweare to the same. After him the other bishops likewise gaue the like oth whereupon the king commanded incontinent certaine instruments obligatorie to be drawne, of the which the king should haue the one, the archbishop of Canturburie another, the archbishop of Yorke the third, requiring also the said archbishop to set to his hand & seale. To the which the archbishop (although not denying but that he was readie so to doe) yet desired respit in the matter, while that he (being but newlie come to his bishoprike) might better perus with himselfe the foresaid customes and ordinances of the king. This request as it séemed but reasonable, so it was lightlie granted; and so the day being well spent, they departed for that season and brake vp.

Alanus, one of the foure writers of the life of this Thomas Becket, recordeth; that the archbishop in his voiage towards Winchester, began greatly to repent that he had done before, partly through the instigation of certaine about him, but chiefly of his crosbearer, who going before the archbishop, sharplie and earnestly expostulated with him for giuing ouer to ỳ kings request, against the priuiledge and liberties of the church, polluting not onlie his fame and conscience, but also giuing a pernicious example to them that should come after, with many like words. To make the matter short the archbishop was so touched vpon the same with such repentance, that kéeping himselfe from all companie, lamenting with teares, with fasting, and with much penance macerating and afflicting himselfe, did suspend himselfe from all diuine seruice, and would not receiue comfort, before that (word being sent to his holy grandfather the pope) he should be assoiled of him, who tendering the teares of his déere chicken, directed to him letters againe by the same messenger which Thomas had sent vp to him before. In wh.ch letters not onlie hée assoiled him from his trespasse, but also with words of great consolation did incourage him to be stout in the quarell he tooke in hand. The copie of which letters consolatorie sent from the pope to bishop Becket, héere followeth vnder written.

A letter of pope Alexander to Thomas Becket.

ALexander bishop, &c. Your brotherhood is not ignorant that it hath been aduertised vs, how that vpon the occasion of a certaine transgression or excesse of yours, you haue determined to cease henceforth from saying of masse, & to abstaine from the consecration of the bodie & bloud of the Lord; which thing to doe, how dangerous it is (especially in such a personage) and also what inconuenience may rise thereof, I wil you aduisedly to consider, and discreetly also to ponder. Your wisdome ought not to forget what difference there is betweene them which aduisedly & willingly doe offend, & those which through ignorance & for necessitie sake do offend. For as you reade, so much the more greater is wilfull sinne, as the same not being voluntarie is lesser sinne. Therfore if you remember your selfe to haue done any thing that your owne conscience doth accuse you of, whatsoeuer it be, we counsell you (as a prudent and wise prelat) to acknowledge the same. Which thing done, the mercifull and pitifull God, who hath more respect to the heart of the doer then to the thing done, will remit & forgiue you the same according to his accustomed great mercie. And we trusting in the merits of the blessed apostles S. Peter and Paul doe absolue you from the offence committed, and by the authoritie apostolicall wee release you vnto your fraternitie, counselling you & commanding you, that henceforth you abstaine not (for this cause) from the celebration of the masse.

This letter with others more after like sort the pope then wrote to him, animating and comforting him in this quarell so nerely pertaining to the popes profit. By the occasion whereof, Becket toke no small heart and consolation: in so much that therof séemeth to me to proceed all the occasion that made him so stout and malapert against his prince, as hereafter followeth to be séene by his doings. What the other letters were that the pope wrote vnto him, shortlie after (when we come to the appellations made to the pope) shall appeare God willing. In the meane season (as he sat thus mourning at home) the king hearing of him, and how he denied to set his seale to those sanctions, which he condescended to before, toke no little displeasure against him: in so much that hee (threatning to him and his banishment & death) began to call him to reckonings, and to burthen him with paiments, that all men might vnderstand that the kings mind was sore set against him. The archbishop hereupon (whether more for the loue of the pope, or dread of his prince) thought to make an escape out of the realme, and so went about in the night (with two or three with him stealing out of his house) to take the sea priuilie. Now amongst others the kings ordinances and sanctions, this was one; that none of the prelacie or nobilitie without the kings licence (or of his iustices) should depart out of the realme. So Becket twice attempted the sea to flée to the sée of Rome, but the weather not seruing, was driuen home againe, and his deuice for that time frustrated. After his departure began to be knowne and noised abrode, the kings officers came to Canturburie to seize vpon his goods in the kings behalfe. But as it chanced the night before their comming, Becket being returned & found at home, they did not proceed in their purpose.

Upon this, the archbishop (vnderstanding the king sore bent against him, and the seas not to serue him) made hast to the court lying then at Woodstocke, where the king receiued him (after a certaine manner) but nothing so familiarlie as he was wont, taunting him iestinglie & merilie, as though one realme were not able to hold them both. Becket (although hee was permitted to go and come at his pleasure to the court) yet could not obtaine the fauour that hee would, perceiuing both in himselfe, and confessing no lesse to others, how the matter would fall out, so that either hee should be constrained to giue ouer with shame, or stoutly stand to that which he had so boldly taken in hand. The archbishop of Yorke in the meane time (going betwixt the king & the archbishop) labored to make a peace and loue betwixt them; but the king in no case would be reconciled, vnlesse the other would subscribe to his lawes.

So

The stubborne wilfulnesse of Tho. Becket.

Thomas Becket relenteth to the king.

Becket veeleth to the king.

Saluo ordine left out in the compolition.

Becket repenteth of his good deed.

Becket taunted of the king.

Becket enterpriseth against the kings lawes to flie out of the realme.

So the while, neither the king would otherwise agree, nor yet the archbishop in any wise would subscribe, there was a foule discord; where the fault was, let the reader here iudge betweene them both. The king for his regall authoritie thought it much that any subiect of his should stand against him. The archbishop againe (bearing himselfe bold vpon the authoritie, and especially vpon the letters of the pope lately written to him) thought him strong inough against the king & all his realme. Againe, such was his quarrell for the maintenance of liberties and glorie of the church, that hee could lacke no letters on and fauourers in that behalfe, in so sweet a cause amongst the clergie. Wherefore the archbishop (trusting to these things) would giue no place, but by vertue of his apostolike authoritie gaue censure vpon these lawes and constitutions of the king, condemning some, and other some approuing for good and catholike, as is before declared. Besides this, there came also to the king Rotrodus archbishop of Rothomage (sent from the pope) to make peace betweene the king and Canturburie: whereunto the king was well content, so that the pope would agree to ratifie his ordinances. But when that could in no wise be obtained at the popes hands, then the king being stopped and frustrat of his purpose by reason of Beckets apostolike legacie (being Legatus à latere) thought good to send vp to the pope, and so did, to obtaine of him, that the same authoritie of the apostolike legacie might bee conferred to another after his appointment, which was the archbishop of Yorke: but the pope denied. Notwithstanding at the request of the kings clergie, the pope was content that the king should bee legat himselfe; whereat the king tooke great indignation (as Houeden writeth) so that he sent the pope his letters againe. Here the pope was perplexed on both sides.

Ex Rogero Houed. pri. parte historiæ continuatæ post Bedam.

The king to be the popes legat.

If he should haue denied the king, that was too hot for him: for the pope vseth alwaies to hold in with kings howsoeuer the world spedeth. Againe, if he should haue forsaken such a churchly chaplen the cause being so sweet and so gainefull) that should haue been against himselfe. What did he then? Here now commeth in the old practise of popish prelacie, to play with both hands: primlie he conspireth with the one, and openly dissembleth with the other. First, he granted to the kings ambassadors their request, to haue the legat remooued, and to place in that office the archbishop of Yorke, after his owne contentation; and yet notwithstanding (to tender the cause of Thomas Becket) he addeth this promise withall, that the said Becket should receiue no harme or damage thereby. Thus the pope craftily conueying the matter betweene them both, glad to further the archbishop for his owne aduantage, and yet loth to denie the king for displeasure, writeth to the king openly, and also secretlie directeth another letter to Becket: the contents whereof here follow.

The craftie dissimulation of the pope.

Alexander the pope, to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie.

The popes secret letters to Becket.

ALthough wee condescending to the kings request, haue granted the gift of our legacie after his mind from you: yet let not your mind thereby be discomforted, nor brought into sighs of despaire. For before that we had granted that, or gaue our consent thereunto; the kings ambassadors firmely promised in the word of truth (readie also to bee sworne vpon the same, if I would so haue required) that their letters also which hee had obtained, should not be deliuered to the archbishop of York without our knowledge and consent therein. This is certaine, and so perswade your selfe boldly without any scruple, doubt or mistrust, that it was neuer my mind or purpose, nor euer shall be (God willing) to subdue you or your church vnder the obedience of any person, to be subiect, saue only to the bishop of Rome. And therfore we warne you & charge you, that if you shall perceiue the king to deliuer these foresaid letters, which we trust he will not attempt without our knowledge to do; forthwith by some trustie messenger or by your letters you will giue vs knowledge thereof: whereby wee may prouide vpon the same both for your person, your church, and also your city committed to you, to be clearely exempt by our authority apostolicall, from all power and iurisdiction of any legacie.

Vpon these letters and such others (as is said before) Becket seemed to take all his boldnesse to be so stout and sturdy against his prince as he was. The pope (beside these) sent secretlie this chaplen of his, and directed another letter also vnto the king, granting and permitting at his request, to make the archbishop of Yorke legat apostolicall.

The king (after he had receiued his letters sent from the pope) began to put more strength to his purposed proceedings against the archbishop, first beginning with the inferiors of the clergie, such as were offendors against his lawes: as fellons, robbers, quarellers, breakers of peace, & especially such as had committed homicide and murthers, whereof more then an hundred at that time were proued vpon the clergie (as witnesseth Guliel. Neuburgensis, in his booke De gestis Anglorum, lib. 2. cap. 16.) vrging and constraining them to be arraigned after the order of the law temporall, and iustice to bee ministred to them according to their deserts: as first to be depriued, and so to be committed to the secular hands. This seemed to Becket to derogat from the liberties of holy church, that the secular power should passe in causes criminall, or sit in iudgement against any ecclesiasticall person. This law, the rollers (then of the clergie) had picked and forged out of Anacletus & Euaristus, by whose falsitie alleaged and pretended authoritie they haue deduced this their constitution from the apostles, which giueth immunitie to all ecclesiasticall persons to be free from secular iurisdiction. Becket therefore like a valiant champion (fighting for his liberties, and hauing the pope on his side) would not permit his clerks infamed, otherwise to be conuented then before ecclesiasticall iudges, there to bee examined and depriued for their errelle, and no secular iudge to proceed against them: so that after their depriuation, if they should incurre the like offence againe, then the temporall iudge to take hold vpon them, otherwise not. This obstinat and stubborne rebellion of the archbishop stirred vp much anger and vexation in their king, and not only in him, but also in the nobles and in all the bishops (for the greater part) that almost he was alone a wonderment to all the realme.

More then an hundred murthers done by the clergie. Guliel. Neuburg. lib. 2. cap. 16.

The kings wrath daily increased more and more against him (as no maruell it was) and caused him to be cited vp to appeare by a certaine day at the towne of Northhampton, there to make answer to such things as should be laid to his charge. So when the day was come (all the peeres and nobles, with the prelats of the realme vpon the kings proclamation being assembled in the castel of Northhampton) great fault was found with the archbishop, for that hee (personally cited to appeare) came not himselfe, but sent another for him. The cause why he came not, Houeden assigneth to be this: for that the king had placed his horse and horsemen in the archbishops lodging (which was a house there of canons) wherewith he being offended, sent word againe that he would not appeare, vnlesse his lodging were voided of the kings horsemen, &c. Whereupon (by the publike sentence as well of all the nobles, as of the bishops) all his moueables were adiudged to be confiscat for the king, vnlesse the kings clemencie would remit the penaltie. The stubborne archbishop againe (for his part) quarelling against the order and forme of the iudgement, complaineth: alleaging for himselfe (seeing he is their primat, and spirituall father, not onely of all other in the realme, but also of the king himselfe) not to be conuenient, the father so to be iudged of his children, nor the pastor of his flocke so to be condemned: saying moreouer, that the ages to come should know what iudgement was done, &c. But especially he complaineth of his fellow bishops (when they should rather haue taken his part) so to sit in iudgement against their metropolitane. And this was the first daies action.

Becket cited to Northhampton.

The archbishop condemned in the councell at Northhampton in the losse of all moueables.

The next day following, the king laid an action against him in the behalfe of one that was his marshall (called John) for certaine iniuries done to him, and required of the said archbishop the repaying againe of certaine monie, which he (as is said) had lent vnto him being chancelor, the sum whereof came to 500. marks. This monie the archbishop denied not but hee had receiued of the king, howbeit, by the way and title of gift as he tooke it, though he could bring no probation therof. Whereupon, the king required him to put in assurance for the paiment therof: whereat the archbishop making delaies (not well contented at the matter) was so called vpon, that either he should be countable to the king for the monie, or elle he should incur present danger, the king being so bent against him. The archbishop being brought to such a strait, and destitute of his owne suffragans, could heere by no meanes haue escaped, had not fiue persons of their owne accord stepped in being bound for him, euery man for 100. marks a peece. And this was vpon the second day concluded.

Becket required to giue an account.

The morow after, which was the third day of the councel, as the archbishop was sitting below in a certaine conclaue with his fellow bishops about him, consulting together, the doores fast locked to them, as the king had willed and commanded, it was propounded vnto him in the behalfe of the king, that he had had diuers bishoprikes & abbaries in his hand which were vacant, with the fruits and reuenues therof due vnto the king for certaine yeeres, whereof he had rendered as yet no account to the king: wherfore it was demanded of him to bring in a full and a cleare reckoning of the same. This, with other such like, declared to all the councell, great displeasure to be in the king, and no lesse danger toward the archbishop.

The aduice of the bishops for Thomas Becket.

THus while the bishops and prelats were in counsell, aduising and deliberating what was to bee done, at length it came to voices, euery man to say his mind, and to giue sentence what were the best way for their archbishop to take. First began Henrie bishop of Winchester, who then tooke part with Becket so much as he durst for feare of the king, who said, hee remembred that the said archbishop, first being archdeacon, and then lord chancellor, at what time as he was promoted to the church of Canturburie, was discharged from all bonds and reckonings of the temporall court, as all the other bishops could not but beare record to the same.

The verdict of Winchester.

Next

Digitized by Google

The counsell of the bishop of London.

Next spake Gilbert bishop of London, exhorting and motioning the archbishop that he should call with himselfe to mind from whence the king toke him, and set him vp; what and how great things he had done for him; also that he should consider with himselfe the dangers and perils of the time, and what ruine he might bring vpon the whole church (and vpon them all there present) if he resisted the kings mind in the things he required. And if it were to render vp his archbishoprike (although it were ten times better then it is) yet he should not sticke with the king in the matter. In so doing it might happen, the king, seeing that submission and humilitie in him, would release him peraduenture of all the rest. To this the archbishop answering, Well, well (saith he) I perceiue well inough my Lord whither you tend, and whither about you go. Then spake Winchester, inferring vpon the same; This forme of counsell (saith he) seemeth to me very pernicious to the catholike church, tending to our subuersion, and to the confusion of vs all. For if our archbishop and primat of all England doe leane to this example, that euery bishop should giue ouer his authoritie & the charge of the flocke committed to him, at commandement and threatning of the prince; to what state shall the church bee brought then, but that all should be confounded at his pleasure and arbitrement, and nothing to stand certaine by any order of law, and so as the priest is, so shall the people be?

Canturburie.

Winchester.

Chichester.

Hilarie the bishop of Chichester replieth againe to this, saying: If it were not that the instance and the great perturbation of time did otherwise require and force vs, I would thinke this counsell here giuen were good to be followed. But now seeing the authoritie of our canon faileth, and cannot serue vs, I iudge it not best to go so strictlie to worke, but so to moderat our procedings, that dispensation with sufferance may win that which seuere correction may destroy. Wherfore my counsell and reason is, to giue place to the kings purpose for a time, lest (by ouer hastie proceeding wee exceede so far) that both it may redound to our shame, and also cannot rid our selues out againe when we would.

Moderat counsell.

Much to the same end spake Robert the bishop of Lincolne after this maner: Seeing (saith he) it is manifest that the life and bloud of this man is sought, one of these two must needs be chosen; that either he must part with his archbishoprike, or else with his life. Now what profit he shall take in this matter of his bishoprike, his life being lost, I doe not greatly see.

Lincolne.

Next followed Bartholomew bishop of Exceter with his aduice, who (inclining his counsell to the state of the time) confirmed their sayings before, affirming how the daies were euill and perillous; and if they might so escape the violence of that raging tempest vnder the couer of bearing & relenting, it were not to be refused. But that, he said, could not bee, except strict seueritie should giue place to tractabilitie; and so the instance and condition of time then present required no lesse, especially seeing that persecution was not generall, but personall & particular; and thought it more holy and conuenient, one head to run into some part of danger, then the whole church of England to be subiect and exposed to inconuenience ineuitable.

Exceter.

The answer of Roger bishop of Worcester was deuised in a double suspence, neither affirming the one, nor denying the other, whole saying was this: That he would giue no answer on neither part; for if I (saith he) shall say that the pastorall function and cure of soules ought to be relinquished at the kings will or threatning, then my mouth shall speake against my conscience to the condemnation of mine owne head. And if I shall giue againe contrarie counsell to resist the kings sentence, heere be they that will heare it, and report it to his grace, and so I shall be in danger to be thrust out of the synagogue, and for my part to bee accounted amongst the publike rebels (with them to be condemned:) wherefore neither do I say this, nor counsell that.

Worcester.

And this was the consultation of the bishops in that place, assembled together by the kings commandement. Against these voices and censures of the bishops, Becket the archbishop replieth againe, expostulating and checking them with rebukefull words. I perceiue (saith he) and vnderstand ye go about to maintaine and cherish but your owne cowardnesse, vnder the colorable shadow of sufferance: and vnder pretence of dissembling softnesse to choke the libertie of Christs church. Who hath thus bewitched you, O vnsatiable bishops? What meane yee? Why do yee so vnder the impudent title of forbearing, beare a double heart, and cloke your manifest iniquitie? What call yee this bearing with time, the detrument of the church of Christ? Let termes serue the matter. Why peruert you the matter that is good with vocables and termes vntrue? For that ye say we must beare with the malice of time, I grant with you: but yet we must not heape sinne to sinne. Is not God able to helpe the state and condition of his church, but with the sinfull dissimulation of the teachers of the church? Certes God is disposed to tempt you. And tell me (I pray you) whether should the gouernors of the church put themselues to dangers for the church in time of tranquillitie, or in time of distresse? Ye will be ashamed to denie the contrarie, but in distresse. And now then (the church lying in so great distresse and veration) why should not the good pastor put himselfe into perill therefore? For neither doe I thinke it a greater act or merit for the ancient bishops of the old time, to lay the foundation of the church then (with the bloud,) then now for vs to shed our bloud for the liberties of the same. And to tell you plaine, I thinke it not safe for you to swarue from an example which you haue receiued of your holy elders. After these things were spoken, they sat all in silence a certaine space being locked in together. At length (to find a shift to cause the doore to be opened) I will (saith the archbishop) speak with two earles which are about the king, and named them who they were. Who (being called) opened the doore and came in with hast, thinking to heare some thing which should appease the kings mind. To whom the archbishop spake in this manner: As touching and concerning the matters betweene the king and vs, we haue here conferred together. And forsomuch as we haue them not present with vs now, which knew more in the matter then we doe (whose aduice we would be glad also to follow) therefore wee craue so much respit as till the next day following, and then to giue our answer vnto the king. With this message two bishops were sent to the king, which was the bishop of London, and the bishop of Rochester.

A great distresse growne in the church, because that bishops may not be aboue kings and princes.

London (to helpe the matter, and to set quietnes, as I take it, adding something more to the message) said to the king, that the archbishop craued a little delay of time to prepare such writings and instruments, wherein he should set forth and declare his mind in accomplishing the kings desire, &c. Wherfore, two barons were sent to him from the king to grant him that respit or stay; so that he would ratifie that which the messengers had signified to the king. To the which the archbishop answereth, that he sent no message as was intimat in his name: but onelie, that the next day hee would come and giue answer to the king in that which he had to say. And so the conuocation of the bishops was dissolued and dismissed home: so that the most part of them that came with the archbishop and accompanied him before (for feare of the kings displeasure) seuered themselues from him. The archbishop thus forsaken and destitute (as his storie saith) sent about for the poore, the lame, and the halt, to come in and furnish his house, saying, that by them hee might sooner obtaine his victorie, then by the others which had so slipt from him.

Becket destitute and forsaken.

On the next day following, because it was sunday, nothing was done. So the day after, which was the second ferie, the archbishop was cited to appeare. But the night before (being taken with a disease called Passio iliaca, the colicke) as that day he kept his bed & was not able, as he said, to rise. Euery man supposing this to be but a fained sicknesse, as it seemed no lesse, certaine of the chiefe nobles were sent to trie the matter, and to cite him to the court: namely, Robert earle of Leicester, & Reginald earle of Deuonshire. To whom the archbishop answered, that as that day he was so diseased that he could not come, yea though he were brought in an horslitter. So that day passed ouer. The morrow after, certaine that were about him, fearing no lesse but that some danger would happen to him, gaue him counsell in the morning to haue a masse in the honor of the holy martyr S. Steuen, to keepe him from the hands of his enemies that day. When the morrow was come (being tuesday) there came to him the bishops & prelats, counselling and perswading him couertly by insinuation (for apertly they durst not) that he would submit himselfe with all his goods (as also his archbishoprike) to the will of the king, if peraduenture his indignation by that means might asswage. Adding moreouer, that vnles he would so doe, periurie would be laid against him: for that hee being vnder the oth of fidelitie to keepe the kings lawes and ordinances, now would not obserue them.

Becket taken with sicknesse when he should appeare.

A masse of S. Steuen to saue him from his enemies.

To this Becket the archbishop answereth againe: Brethren yee see and perceiue well how the world is set against me, and how the enemie riseth and seeketh my confusion. And although these things be dolorous & lamentable, yet the thing that grieueth me most of all, is this: The sonnes of mine owne mother be pricks and thornes against mee. And albeit I doe hold my peace, yet the posteritie to come will know and report how cowardly you haue turned your backes, and haue left your archbishop and metropolitane alone in his conflict, and how you haue sitten in iudgement against me (although vnguiltie of crime) now two daies together, and not onely in the ciuill and spirituall court, but also in the temporall court readie to do the same. But in generall this I charge and command (as the vertue of pure obedience, and in perill of your order) that ye be present personally in iudgement against mee. And that yee shall not faile so to do, I heere appeale to our mother (the refuge of all such as be oppressed) the church of Rome: and if any secular men shall lay hands vpon mee (as it is rumored they will) I straitly inioyne and charge you in the same vertue of obedience, that you exercise your censure ecclesiasticall vpon them, as it becommeth you to do for a father and an archbishop. And this I doe you to vnderstand, that though the world rage, and the enemie be fierce, and the bodie trembleth (for the flesh is weake) yet God so fauouring me, I will neither cowardlie shrinke, nor yet vilie forsake my flocke committed vnto my charge, &c.

Beckets answer to the bishops.

Becket appealeth to Rome.

But the bishop of London, contrarie to this commandement of the archbishop, did incontinent appeale from him. And thus the bishops departed from him to the court; saue onely two, Henrie of Winchester, and Joceline of Salisburie, who returned London appealeth from the archbishop.

Digitized by Google

returned with him secretly to his chamber and comforted him. This done, the archbishop (which yesterday was so sore sicke that he could not stir out of his bed) now addresseth him to his masse of S. Stephan with all solemnitie, as though it had been an high festuall day, with his metropolitan pall, which was not vsed but vpon the holy day to be worne, &c. The office of his masse began, Sederunt principes & aduersum me loquebantur: that is, Princes sat & spake against me, &c. (the kings seruants being also there and beholding the matter.) For this masse Gilbert bishop of London accused Becket afterward, both for that it was done Per artem magicam, & in contemptum regis (as the words of Houeden purport) that is, both by art magike, and in contempt of the king, &c.

A masse to charme away persecutors.

The masse being ended, the archbishop (putting off his pal, his miter and other robes) procéedeth to the kings court: but yet not trusting peraduenture so greatly to the strength of his masse (to make the matter more sure) he taketh also the sacrament priuilie about him, thinking thereby himselfe sufficiently defensed against al bugs. In going to the kings chamber (there to attend the kings comming) as he was entring the doore, he taketh from Alexander his crosier, the crosse with the crosse staffe, in the sight of all that stood by, and carieth it in himselfe, the other bishops following him, and saying he did otherwise then became him. Amongst others Robert bishop of Hereford offered himselfe to beare his crosse rather then he should so do, for that it was not comelie, but the archbishop would not suffer him. Then said the bishop of London vnto him: If the king shall see you come armed into his chamber, perchance hee will draw out his sword against you, which is stronger then yours, and then what shall this your account profit you? The archbishop answereth againe; If the kings sword doe cut carnallie, yet my sword cutteth spirituallie, and striketh downe to hell. But you my lord, as you haue plaied the fole in this matter, so you will not yet leaue off your follie for any thing I can see; and so he came into the chamber. The king hearing of his comming and of the maner therof, tarried not long, but came where Becket was set in a place by himselfe with his other bishops about him. First, the crier called the prelats and all the lords of the temporalitie together. That being done (and euery one placed in his seat according to his degrée) the king beginneth with a great complaint against the archbishop for his maner of entring into the court, not as (saith he) a subiect into a kings court; but as a traitor, shewing himselfe in such sort as hath not been séene before in any christian kings court, professing christian faith. To this all (there present) gaue witnesse with the king, affirming him alwaies to be a vaine & a proud man, and that the shame of his fact did not only redound against the prince himselfe, but also against his whole realme. Moreouer, they said that this had so happened to the king, for that he had done so much for such a beast, aduancing him so highly in such a place and rome next vnder himselfe. And so all together with one crie called him traitor on euery side, as one that refused to giue terren honor to the king, in keeping (as he had sworne) his lawes and ordinances, at whose hands also he had receiued such honor and great preferments, and therfore was well worthie (said they) to be handled like a periured traitor and rebell. Whereupon great doubt and feare was what should befal vpon him. The archbishop of York comming downe to his men, said he could not abide to see what the archbishop of Canturburie was like to suffer. Likewise, the tipstaues and other ministers of the assemblie comming downe with an outcrie against him, crossed them to see his hautie stubbornnesse, and the bustlenesse there was about him. Certaine there were of his disciples sitting at his feet, comforting him softly, and bidding him to lay his curse vpon them. Others (contrarie) bidding him not to curse, but to pray and to forgiue them; and if he lost his life in the quarell of the church and the libertie thereof, he should be happie. Afterward, one of them, named Iohannes Stephani, desired to speake something in his eare; but could not be suffered by the kings marshal, who forbad that any man should haue any talke with him. Then he (because he could not otherwise speak to him) wrought by signes, making a crosse, & looking vp with his eies, and wagging his lips, meaning that hee should pray and manfully stand to the crosse. In the meane time commeth to him Bartholomew bishop of Exceter, desiring him to haue regard and compassion of himselfe and also of them, or els they were all like to perish for the hatred of him: for there commeth out (saith he) a precept from the king that he shall be taken, and suffer for an open rebell that hereafter taketh your part. It is said moreouer that Iocelinus bishop of Salisburie, and William bishop of Norwich are to bée had to the place of execution, for their resisting and making intercession for the bishop of Canturburie. When he had thus said, the archbishop (looking vpon the said bishop of Exceter) Auoid hence from me, saith he, thou vnderstandest not, neither doest sauour those things that be of God.

Becket carieth with him the sacrament going to the king.

A blind zeale for the proud liberties of the church.

Houeden referreth not this saying to the bishop of London, but to the archbishop of Yorke.

Whoso taketh Beckets part, is counted a rebell.

Becket called traitor of the king and all his nobles.

The bishops and prelats then going aside by themselues from the other nobles (the king so permitting them to do) take counsell together what was to be done. Here the matter stood in a doubtfull perplexitie, for either must they incur the dangerous indignation of the king, or else with the nobles they must proceed in condemnation against the archbishop for resisting the kings sanctions; which thing, neither they themselues did fauor. In this strict necessitie, they (deuising what way to take) at length agreed vpon this: that they with a common assent should cite the archbishop to the sée of Rome vpon periurie; and that they should oblige and binde themselues to the king with a sure promise, to worke their diligence in deposing the archbishop (vpon this condition) that the king should promise their safetie, and discharge them from the perill of that iudgement which was towards them. So all the bishops obliging themselues thus to the king, went forth to the archbishop: of whom one speaking for the rest (which was Hilarie bishop of Chichester) had these words: Once you haue been our archbishop, and so long wee were bound to your obedience: but now forsomuch as you (once swearing your fidelitie to the king) doe resist him, neglecting his iniunctions and ordinances concerning and appertaining to his terren honor and dignitie; we here pronounce you periured, neither be we bound to giue obedience to an archbishop thus being periured; but putting our selues and all ours in the popes protection, doe cite you vp to his presence. And vpon the same, assigned him his day and time to appeare. The archbishop answering againe, said he heard him well inough, and vpon this sendeth vp to Rome in all hast to the pope, signifying to him by letters the whole matter, how and wherefore, and by whom he was cited. To whom the pope directed againe his letters of comfort (as he had done diuers before) the copie whereof heere insueth.

Becket cited to Rome vpon periurie by the bishops.

Becket condemned of periurie.

Becket cited to Rome.

Pope Alexander to Thomas archbishop of Canturburie.

YOur brotherly letters, which you directed to vs, and such other matters which your messenger by word of mouth hath signified vnto vs, we haue diligently heard the reading thereof: and thereby fully vnderstand the grieuous vexations and dolorous griefes wherewith your mind is daily incombred: by reason whereof, we hearing and vnderstanding, are not a little disquieted in our spirit for your sake: in whose prosperities we do both gladly reioyce, and no lesse do sorrow in your aduersities as for our most deare brother. You therefore (as a constant and wise man) remember with your selfe that which is written: The apostles departed away (reioycing) from the face of the councell, &c. With like patience doe you also sustaine that mans molestations, and let not your spirit bee troubled therein more then needeth, but receiue in your selfe consolation: that we also together with you may be comforted in the Lord, who hath preserued you to the corroboration of his catholike and christian veritie, in this distresse of necessitie: and from whom also it hath pleased him to wipe away the blot of such things which haue been vnorderly of you committed, and heere to punish the same through sundrie afflictions: whereby (in the strict iudgement of God) they might not be called to account hereafter. But henceforth let not this much grieue you: neither let your heart be so deiect or timorous in the matter (for that you are cited vp to the apostolike see) which to vs is both gratefull & accepted. And this we will you, that if they which haue cited you shall chance to come: draw not you backe, but follow the appeale (if you please) and spare not (al doubt and delay set apart:) for the authoritie of the church tendring this your constancy, may not doe that which may put you either in feare, or doubt. But our diligence shall be with all labour & studie, to conserue the right and prehemineince (God willing) of that church committed to you, so much as in vs lieth (sauing our iustice and equitie) as to one whom in working for the church, we find to be both a constant and a valiant champion. Further, this I brotherly require you, to repaire vnto the church of Canturburie: and retaining but a few clerks about you (such onlie as serue your necessitie) make no excurses out (as little as you can) in that countrie. But in this especially I thought to premonish you (that in no case) neither for feare or any aduersitie, whatsoeuer may happen, you be brought to renounce and giue vp the right and dignitie of your church. Written at Sene the seuenth before the kalends of Nouember.

As the archbishop was thus cited vp to Rome, sitting with his crosse waiting in the court, neither giuing place to the kings request, nor abashed with the clamor of the whole court against him, calling him traitor on euery side, neither following the aduertisement of his fellow bishops, at length the king by certaine earles and barons sent commandement to him, (Robert earle of Leicester doing the message) that hee should without delay come & render a full account of all things that he had receiued, as the profits and reuenues of the realme, in the time he was chancellor, & especially for the 30000. marks, for the which he was accountable to the king. To whom the archbishop answereth againe; the king knew how of he had made his reckoning of those things which now were required of him. Further and besides, Hentie his sonne & heire of his realme, with all his barons, and also Richard Lucie chiefe iustice of England told him, that he was free and quit to God & to holy church from all receits and computations, and from all secular exactions on the kings behalfe. And so hee taking thus his discharge at their hands, entred into his office; & therefore other

Becket called to a full account.

Ex Rogero Houedano.

accounts

Becket iudged to be laid in prison.

account besides this he would make none. When this word was brought to the king, he required his barons to do the law vpon him, who so doing, iudged him to be apprehended & laid in prison. This done, the king sendeth to him Reginald earle of Cornewall and Deuonshire, and Robert earle of Leicester, to declare to him what was his iudgement. To whom the archbishop answereth: Heare, my sonne & good erle, what I say vnto you: how much more pretious the soule is more then the body, so much more ought you to obay me in the Lord, rather then your terren king. Neither doth any law or reason permit the childrẽ to iudge or condemne their father. Wherefore, to auoid both the iudgement of the king, of you, & all others; I put my selfe onely to the arbitrement of the pope, vnder God alone to be iudged of him, and of no other; to whose presence here before you all I doe appeale, committing the ordering of the church of Canturburie, my dignitie, with all other things appertaining to the same, vnder the protection of God & him. And as for you my brethren and fellow bishops, which rather obay man then God, you also I call and cite to the audience and iudgement of the pope, and depart hencefoorth from you as from the enemies of the catholike church, & of the authoritie of the apostolike see.

Ex quadripartita hist. l. 6. cap. 28.

Becket appealeth to the pope.

Becket thinketh not sufficient the protection of God without the pope.

While the barons returned with this answer to the king, the archbishop passing through the throng, taketh vnto him his palfrey, holding his crosse in one hand, and his bridle in the other, the courtiers following after, and crying, Traitor, traitor, tarrie and heare thy iudgement. But he passed on till he came to the vttermost gate of the court, which being fast locked there had bẽ staied, had not one of his seruants called Peter, surnamed Demunctorio, finding there a bunch of keies hanging by, first prooued one keie, then another, till at last finding the true keie, had opened the gate, and let him out. The archbishop went straight to ẏ house of canons, where he did lie, calling vnto him the poore, where they could be found. When supper was done, making as though he would go to bed, which he caused to be made betwixt two altars, priuilie while the king was at supper, prepareth his iourne secretly to escape away; and changing his garment and his name, being called Derman, first went to Lincolne, from thence to Sandwich, where he tooke ship, and sailed into Flanders, and from thence iourned into France, as Houedenus saith. Albeit Alanus differing somewhat in the order of his flight, saith that he departed not that night; but at supper time came to him the bishops of London & Chichester, declaring to him, that if he would surrender vp to the king his two manors of Otford & Wingcham, there were hope to recouer the kings fauor, and to haue all remitted. But when the archbishop would not agree thereunto, forsomuch as those manors were belonging to the church of Canturburie; the king hearing thereof, great displeasure was taken, insomuch that the next day Becket was faine to send to the king two bishops and his chaplaine for leaue to depart the realme. To the which message the king answered, that he would take pause thereof till the next day, and then he should haue an answer. But Becket not tarrying his answer, the same day conueyed himselfe away secretly, as is aforesaid, to Ludouicus the French king. But before he came to the king, Gilbert the bishop of London, and William the earle of Arundell, sent from the king of England to France preuented him: requiring the said French king in the behalfe of the king of England, that he would not receiue, nor retaine in his dominion the archbishop of Canturburie. Moreouer, that at his instance, he would be a meanes to the pope, not to shew any familiaritie vnto him. But the king of England in this point seemed to haue more confidence in the French king, then knowledge of his disposition. For thinking that the French king would haue bẽ a good neighbour to him, in trusting him too much, he was deceiued. Neither considered he with himselfe enough the manner and nature of the Frenchmen at that time against the realme of England, who then were glad to seeke and take all maner of occasions to doe some act against England.

Becket flieth out of the court.

Becket changeth his name and is called Derman.

Histories differ some thing in the order of his flight.

The French king supporteth Becket against the king of England.

And therefore Ludouike the French king, vnderstanding the matter, and thinking (percase) thereby to haue some vantage against the king and realme of England by the occasion hereof, contrarie to the kings letters and request, not onely harboureth and cherisheth this Derman, but also (writing to the pope by his almoner & brother) intreateth him (vpon all loues as euer he would haue his fauour) to tender the cause of the archbishop Becket. Thus the kings ambassadors repulsed of the French king returned; at what time he sent another ambassage (vpon the like cause) to Alexander the pope then being at Sene in France. The ambassadors sent in this message, were Roger archbishop of Yorke, Gilbert bishop of London, Henry bishop of Winchester, Hilarie bishop of Chichester, Bartholomew bishop of Exceter, with other doctors and clerks: also William earle of Arundell, with certaine more lords and barons, who comming to the popes court, were friendly accepted of certaine of the cardinals: amongst the which cardinals rose also dissentiõ about the same cause. Some iudging the bishop of Canturburie in the defence of the liberties of the church (as in a good cause) to be maintained. Some thinking againg, that he (being a perturber of peace and vnitie) was rather to be bridelled for his presumption, then to be fostered & incouraged therein. But the pope partly bearing with his cause (which onely tended to his exaltation and magnificence) partly againe incensed with the letters of the French king, did wholy incline to Becket, as no maruel was. Wherefore the next day following, the pope sitting in consistorie with his cardinals, the ambassadors were called for to the hearing of Beckets matter; and first beginneth the bishop of London; next, the archbishop of Yorke; then Excester; and the other bishops euery one in their order to speak. Whose orations being not well accepted of the pope, and some of them also disdained; the earle of Arundell perceiuing that (and somewhat to qualifie and temper the matter to the popes eares) began after this maner.

Ambassadors sent to the pope.

The oration of the earle of Arundell to the pope.

ALthough to me it is vnknowne (saith he) which am both vnlettered and ignorant, what is that these bishops heere haue said, neither am I in that tongue so able to expresse my mind as they haue done: yet being sent and charged thereunto of my prince, neither can nor ought I but to declare (as well as I may) what the cause is of our sending hither: not (truly) to contend or striue with any person, nor to offer any iniurie or harme vnto any man (especially in this place) and in the presence here of such an one, vnto whose beck and authoritie all the world doth stoope and yeeld. But for this time is our legacie hither directed, to present here before you and in the presence of the whole church of Rome, the deuotion and loue of our king and master, which euer he hath had, and yet hath still toward you. And that the same might the better appeare to your excellencie, he hath assigned and appointed to the furniture of this legacie, not the least, but the greatest: not the worst, but the best and chiefest of al his subiects: both archbishops, bishops, earles, barons, with other potentates more, of such worthinesse and parentage, that if he could haue found greater in all his realme, he would haue sent them, both for the reuerence of your person, and of the holy church of Rome. Ouer and besides this, I might adde to more (which your sanctitude hath sufficientlie tried and prooued alreadie) the true and heartie fidelitie of this our king and soueraigne toward you, who (in his first entrance to his kingdome) wholly submitted himselfe with all that is his besides, to your will and pleasure. And truely, to testifie of his maiestie how he is disposed to the vnitie of the catholike faith: we beleeue there is none more faithfull in Christ then he, nor more deuout to God, nor yet more moderat in keeping the vnitie of peace whereunto he is called. And as I may be bold this to protest for our king and master, so neither doe I denie the archbishop of Canturburie to be a man destitute or vnfurnished with gifts and ornaments in his kind of calling, but to bee a man both sage and discreet in such things as to him appertaine, saue only that he seemeth to some more quicke & sharpe then needeth. This blot alone if it were not, and that the breach betweene our king and him had not so hapned, both the regiments together (of the temporaltie and spiritualtie) might quietly haue flourished one with the other in much peace and concord, both vnder a prince so worthie, and a pastor so vertuous. Wherefore (the case so standing as it doth) our message hither, and our supplication to your vigilant prudence is, that (through your fauour and wisdome) the necke of this dissension may be broken, and that reformation of vnitie and loue (by some good meanes) may be sought.

The pope tendereth Beckets cause against the king.

¶ This oration of his, although it was liked of them for the softnesse and moderation thereof, yet it could not so perswade the Romish bishop to condescend to their sute & request: which sute was, to haue two legats or arbitrers to be sent from his popish side into England, to examine & take vp the controuersie betweene the king and the archbishop. But the pope (incensed (as is said before) would not grant to their petition, forsomuch as it should be (saith he) preiudiciall and tending to the oppression of the archbishop to grant vnto it, hee being not present. And therefore he willed them to tarie his comming vp, otherwise (he being absent) he would not (he said in any case) proceed against him. But they (alleaging againe their time to be expired, appointed vnto them of the king, hauing besides other lets and causes as they alleaged) said that they could not there wait for the comming of Becket, but returned backe (their cause frustrated) without the popes blessing to the king. Within foure daies after Becket commeth to the popes court, where he prostrating himselfe at his feet, brought out of his bosome a scroll containing the customs & ordinances of the king, before mentioned. The pope receiuing the foresaid scroll, and reading it in the open hearing of his cardinals, condemned and accursed the most part of the said decrees of the king, which he called Consuetudines auitas, that is, his grandfathers ordinances. Besides this, the pope moreouer blameth Becket, for that he so much yeelded to them at the beginning, as he did: yet notwithstanding (because he was repentant for his vnaduised fact) he was content to absolue him for the same, and the rather because of his great troubles, which he for the liberties of holie church did sustaine, and so with great fauour for that day dismissed him.

Becket complaineth of the king to the pope.

Repentance for his well doing.

The next day (Alexander the pope assembling his cardinals together in his secret chãber) appeareth before them archbishop Becket, hauing this oration to the pope & his popelings, which heere I thought to set out in our vulgar English tongue (tran-

Digitized by Google

(translated out of Latine) to the intent that the posteritie hereafter may vnderstand, either the vaine superstition or vile slauerie of the churchmen in those daies: who, being not content with their owne naturall prince and king giuen them of God, must seeke further to the pope: thinking no ecclesiasticall liuing to be giuen, which is not taken at his hands. The words of his oration be noted rightly thus.

The oration of Becket resigning his bishoprike to the pope.

FAthers and lords, I ought not to lie in any place, much lesse before God, and in your presence here. Wherfore with much sighing and sorow of heart I grant and confesse, that these perturbations of the church of England be raised through my miserable fault. For I entred into the fold of Christ, but not by the doore of Christ, for that, not the canonicall election did call me lawfullie thereunto, but terrour of publike power droue me in. And albeit I against my will tooke this burden vpon me, yet not the will of God, but mans pleasure placed me in the roome. And therefore no maruell though all things haue gone contrarie and backward with me. And as for the resigning vp againe thereof; if I had so done, and giuen vp to their hands the priuiledge of my bishoplie authoritie, which I had granted to me at the commandement of the king (so as my fellow bishops did instantly call vpon me to do) then had I left a pernicious and dangerous example to the whole catholike church. By reason whereof I thought to defer that vnto your presence. And now therefore (recognising with my selfe my ingresse not to be canonicall, and therfore fearing it to haue the worse end; and againe pondering my strength and abilitie not to be sufficient for such a charge) lest I should be found to sustaine that roome to the ruine of the flocke, to whom I was appointed a pastor vnworthie: I render vp to your fatherly hands the archbishoprike heere of Canturburie, &c. ¶ And so putting off his ring from his finger, and offering it to the pope, desired a bishop for the church of Canturburie to be prouided: seeing he thought not himselfe meet to fulfill the same, and so (with teares, as the storie saith) ended his oration.

Becket's argument: The pope brought him not in but the king, Ergo, God brought him not in.

And why might ye not (M. Becket) resigne it as well to his hands of whom ye tooke it?

This done, the archbishop was bid to stand apart. The pope conferring vpon this with his cardinals, about the resignation of Becket what was best to be done: some thought it best to take the occasion offered, thinking thereby the kings wrath might easily be assuaged, if the church of Canturburie were assigned to some other person, and yet the said Becket otherwise to be prouided for notwithstanding. Contrarie, others againe thought otherwise, whose reason was: If he (which for the liberties of the church had ventured not onely his goods, dignitie and authoritie, but also his life) should now at the kings pleasure be depriued: like as it might bee a president hereafter to others in resisting their king in like sort, if his cause were maintained; so contrariwise if it quailed, it should be an example to all others hereafter, none to resist his prince in the like case. And so might it redound not onely to the weakening of the state of the catholike church, but also to the derogation of the popes authoritie. Briefely, this sentence at length preuailed: and so Becket receiueth his pastorall office of the popes hand againe, with commendation and much fauour. But for so much as he could not be well placed in England; in the meane while, the pope sendeth him with a monkes habit into the abbey of Pontiniake in France, where he remained two yeares; from thence he remoued to Senon, where he abode fiue yeares. So the time of his exile continued a seuen yeares in all, &c.

A consultation betweene the pope and the cardinals about Beckets matter.

Becket in banishment seuen yeares.

Upon this, the king being certified by his ambassadours of the popes answere, how his fauour inclined more to Becket then to him, was moued (and worthily) with wrathfull displeasure. Who vpon the same sailing from England vnto Normandie, directed ouer certaine iniunctions against the pope, and the archbishop of Canturburie, as were recited afore. The contents whereof were declared to be these.

If any person should be found to bring from the pope, or from the archbishop of Canturburie, &c.

Of these and such other iniunctions Becket specifieth partly in a certaine letter, writing to a friend of his in this maner.

THomas archbishop of Canturburie, to his well beloued friend, &c. be it knowne to your brotherly goodnesse, that we with all ours heere (by Gods grace) are safe and in good health. Hauing a good hope and trust to your faithfull amitie, I charge you and require you, that either by the bringer hereof, or by some other (whom ye know faithfull and trustie to our church of Canturburie, and to vs) you write with all speed what is done. As touching the kings decrees heere set out, these they be: That all hauens and ports should be diligently kept: that no letters of the popes interdict or curse be brought in. And if religious men bring them in, they shal haue their feet cut off: if hee be a priest or clerke, he shall lose his priuie members: if he be a lay-man, let him be hanged: if he be a leper, let him be burned. And if any bishop, for feare of the popes interdict, will depart, besides his staffe only in his hand, let him haue nothing else. Also the kings will is, that all scholars and students beyond the seas shall repaire home, or else lose their benefices. And if they yet shall remaine still, they shall lose the libertie of all returning. Further, if any such priests shall be found, that for the popes suspence or interdict will refuse to sing, they shall lose their priuie members. In summe, all such priests as shew themselues rebels to the king, let them be depriued of their benefices, &c.

The kings decrees.

Besides these and such like iniunctions, it was also set forth by the kings proclamation, An. 1166, that all manner of persons, both men and women, whosoeuer were found of the kindred of Thomas Becket, should be exiled, without taking any part of their goods with them, and sent to him where he was: which was no little vexation to Becket to behold them. Moreouer, for so much as he then was lying with Gwarine abbat of Pontiniake, to whom the pope, as is aforesaid, had commended him, therefore the king writing to the same abbat, required him not to retaine the archbishop of Canturburie in his house: for if he did, he would driue out of his realme all the monkes of his order. Whereupon Becket was inforced to remoue from thence, and went to Lewis the French king, by whom he was placed at Senon, and there found of him the space of fiue yeers, as is aboue mentioned.

{Anno 1166}

Beckets kindred banished.

These monkes were of the Cistertian order.

In the meane time, messengers went daily with letters betweene the king and the pope, betweene the pope again and him, and so betweene the archbishop and others. Whereof if the reader (peraduenture) shall be desirous to see the copies: I thought heere to expresse certaine of them, to satisfie his desire: first beginning with the epistle of Becket, complaining of his prince to the pope, in maner and forme as followeth.

Becket complaineth of his prince to the pope.

The copie of an epistle sent of Thomas Becket to pope Alexander.

TO your presence and audience I flie, most holy father, that you, who hath brought the libertie of the church with your so great danger, might the rather attend to the same (either being the only or chiefest cause of my persecution) vsing and following therein the example of you. It grieueth me that the state of the church should fall to any decay, and that the liberties thereof should be infringed through the auarice of princes. For the which cause I thought to resist betime that inconuenience beginning so to grow. And the more I thought my selfe obliged to the same my prince (vnto whom next vnder God I am most chieflie bound) the more boldnesse I tooke to me, to withstand his vnrightfull attempts; till such as were on the contrarie part, my aduersaries, preuailed, working my disquietnesse, and incensig him against me. Whereupon, as the manner is amongst princes, they raised vp against me citations and slanders, to the occasion of my persecution: but I had rather to be proscribed, then to subscribe. Besides this, I was also called to iudgement, and cited before the king to make answere there as a laie person, to secular accounts: whereas they whom I most trusted did most forsake me. For I saw my fellow brethren the bishops, through the instigation of some, readie to my condemnation. Whereupon all being set against me, and I thus oppressed on euerie side, tooke my refuge to appeale vnto your goodnesse, which casteth off none in their extremities: being readie to make my declaration before you, that I ought neither to be iudged there in that place, nor yet of them. For what were that (father) but to vsurpe to themselues your right, and to bring the spiritualtie vnder the temporaltie? Which thing (once begun) may breed an example to many. And therefore so much the more stout I thought to bee in withstanding this matter, how much more prone and procliue I saw the way to hurt, if they might once see vs to bee faint and weake in the same. But they will saie to mee heere againe: Giue to Cæsar that which belongeth to Cæsar, &c. But to answere againe thereunto, albeit we are bound to obey our king in most things, yet not in such manner of things, whereby he is made to be no king: neither were they then things belonging to Cæsar, but to a tyrant. Concerning the which points, these bishops should, not for me onelie, but for themselues, haue resisted the king. For if the extreme iudgement be reserued to him which is able to iudge both bodie and soule: is it not then extreme pride for men there to iudge, which iudge but by themselues? If the cause of the bishops and of the clergie, which I maintaine, be right: why be they set against me? why do they reprehend me? For if that I appealed to him, before whom either it was not lawfull, or els not expedient for me to do: what seeme they by this, but either to blame me causelesse, or else to distrust your equitie? For me to be conuicted before your holinesse, it had been a double confusion. Or wherein haue I deserued to be persecuted of them, for whose cause I haue set my selfe to stand in their behalfe? And if they had willed, I had preuailed; but it is ill with the head, when he is left of his members and forsaken: as if the eies should take the tongue to speake against the head. If they had had eyes to haue foreseene the matter, they might vnderstand themselues to speake their owne destruction: and that the princes did vse their helpe but to their owne seruitude. And what so great cause of hatred had they against me, to procure their

To keepe vnder the pride of prelats is no cause sufficient to vnking a prince.

Digitized by Google

owne vndoing, in vndoing of me? So while they neglected spirituall things in stead of temporall, they haue lost them both. What should I speake more of this, that I repugning them and appealing to your audience (yet notwithstanding) they durst presume to stand in iudgement and condemnation against me, as children against their father? Yea, and not against me only, but against the vniuersall church of God (conspiring together with the prince) being with me offended. And this suspection might also as well pertaine to you holy father. But to this they will say, that they owe their dutie and seruice vnto the king, as their lord: to whom they are bound, vpon their allegeance. To whom I answere, that to him they stand bound bodily, to me spiritually. But to whom ought they rather to stand bound, then to themselues? And were it not better to sustaine the losse of corporall, then of spirituall things? But heere they will say againe: At this time the prince was not to be prouoked. How subtillie doe these men dispute for their owne bondage? Yea, they themselues prouoke him by their owne excesse, ministring wings vnto him to fight against them; for he would haue rested if they had resisted. And when is constancie more to be required, then in persecution? Be not a mans chiefe friends most tried in persecution? if they giue ouer still, how shall they obtain the victorie? Sometimes they must needs resist. Condescend therefore (holy father) to my exile and persecution. And remember, that I also once was a great man, in the time when it was, and now for your sake thus iniuriously I am intreated. Vse your rigour and restraine them, by whose instigation the name of this persecution began. And let none of these things be imputed to the king, who rather is to be counted the repairer then the author of this businesse.

If ye meane by spirituall things, such as pertaine to the spirituall part of man, I grant; but your liberties be not such as which pertaine to the inward or spirituall man, but rather are things more corporall. Persecution trieth a true friend, but enuie cause maketh not a true persecution.

Besides this epistle sent vnto the pope, hee writeth also another letter, sent to the king in Latine: the tenour whereof hee that is disposed to reade, may peruse in our former edition, with the notes adioyned withall.

Besides which epistle to the king in Latine, he sent also one or two more to the said king Henrie the second, much after the like rate and sort: the one thus beginning: Loqui de Deo, liberæ mentis est & valde quietæ. Inde est quod loquar ad dominum meum, & vtinam ad omnes pacificum, &c. Which epistle, for that I would not ouercharge the volume of these histories with to much matter superfluous, I thought heere to omit. The other he sent afterwards, whereof the words be these.

Another letter of Becket archbishop of Canturburie sent to the king.

TO his lord and friend Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandie and Aquitane, earle of Anjou: Thomas by the same grace, humble minister of the church of Canturburie (sometime his temporally, but now more his in the Lord) health and true repentance with amendment. I haue long looked for, that the Lord would looke vpon you, and that you would conuert and repent, departing from your peruerse way; and cut off from you your wicked and peruerse counsellours, by whose instinction, as it is thought, you are fallen into that deepe, whereof the Psalme speaketh, A sinner when he cometh to the depth of mischiefes, is without care or feare. And albeit we haue hitherto quietlie suffered and borne; considering and earnestlie looking if there would anie messenger come that would say; Your soueraigne lord the king, which now a long time hath erred and been deceiued, and led euen to the destruction of the church, through Gods mercie with abundant humilitie doth now againe make speed for the deliuerance of the church, and to make satisfaction and amendment: Yet notwithstanding, we cease not, day by day continually to call vpon almightie God, with most humble deuotion: that, that which we haue long desired for you and by you, we may speedily obtaine with abundant effect. And this is one point: that the care of the church of Canturburie, whereunto God hath presently appointed vs (albeit vnworthie) you being king, doth specially constraine me (in that as yet we are detained in exile) to write vnto your maiestie letters commonitorie, exhortatorie, and of correction. But I would to God they were fully able to correct, lest that I be too great a cloker of your outrages (if there be anie) as indeed there are: for the which we are not a little sorie. I meane specially of them which are done by you in euery place, about the church of God and the ecclesiasticall persons, without any reuerence either of dignitie or person; and lest also that I appeare negligent to the great danger of my soule: for without doubt he beareth the offence of him which doth commit anie offence, who neglecteth to correct that, which another ought to amend. For it is written, Not onely they which doe commit euill, but also they which consent thereunto are counted partakers of the same. For they verily do consent, which when they both might and ought, do not resist, or at the least reproue. For the errour which is not resisted is allowed, and the truth when it is not defended is oppressed: neither doth it lacke a priuie note of societie in him, which ceaseth to withstand a manifest mischiefe. (2) For like as, most noble prince, a small citie doth not minish the prerogatiue of so mightie a kingdome as yours is: so your royall power ought not to oppresse or change the measure of the religious dispensation. For it is prouided alwaies by the lawes, that all iudgements against priests should proceed by the determination of priests. For whatsoeuer bishops they are, albeit that they doe erre as other men doe (not exceeding in any point contrarie to the religion of faith) they (3) ought not, nor can in any case be iudged of the secular power. Truely, it is the part of a good and religious prince to repare the ruinous churches, to build new, to honor the priests, and with great reuerence to defend them, after the example of the godly prince of most happie memorie (4) Constantinus, which said, when a complaint of the clergie was brought to him: You (said he) can be iudged by no secular iudge, which are reserued to the only iudgement of God. And for so much as we do reade that the holy apostles and their successours, appointed by the testimonie of God, commanded that no persecution nor troubles ought to be made, nor to enuie those which labour in the field of the Lord: and that the stewards of the eternall king should not be expelled and put out of their seats: who then doubteth, but that the priests of Christ ought to be called the fathers and masters of all other faithfull princes? Is it not a miserable madnesse then, if the sonne should go about to bring the (5) father vnder obedience? or the scholar his master? and by (6) wicked bonds to bring him in subiection, by whom hee ought to beleeue that hee may bee bound and loosed, not onely in earth, but also in heauen? If you bee a good and a catholike king, and will be such a one as we hope, or that we rather desire you should be, (if it be spoken vnder your licence) you are the child of the church, and not the ruler of the church. You ought to learne of the priests, and not to teach them: you ought to (7) follow the priests in ecclesiasticall matters, and not to goe before them, hauing the priuiledge of your power giuen you of God to make publike lawes: that by his benefit you should not be vnthankfull against the dispensation of the heauenly order, and that you should vsurpe nothing, but vse them with a wholesome disposition.

Wherefore, in those things which contrarie vnto that, you haue, through your malicious counsell, rather then by your owne minde, wickedly vsurped; with all humilitie and satisfaction speedily giue place, that the hand of the most high be not stretched out against you, as an arrow against the marke. For the most high hath bended his bow openly to shoote against him, that will not confesse his offences. Be not ashamed (whatsoeuer wicked men say vnto you, or that traytours doe whisper in your eare) to humble your selfe vnder the mightie hand of God. For it is he which exalteth the humble, and throweth downe the proud, which also reuengeth himselfe vpon princes: he is terrible, and who shall resist him? You ought not to haue let slip out of your memorie, in what state God did find you: how he hath preferred, honoured, and exalted you: blessed you with children, inlarged your kindome, and established the same in despite of your enemies. In so much that hitherto, in a manner, all men haue said with great admiration, that this is he whom God hath chosen. And how will you reward, or can you reward him for all these things which he hath done vnto you? Will you, at the prouocation and instance of those which are about you, that (8) persecute the church and the ecclesiasticall ministers, and alwaies haue according to their power persecuted them, rendring euill for good, bringing oppressions, tribulations, iniuries, and afflictions vpon the church and churchmen, do the like? Are not these they of whom the Lord speaketh: He that heareth you heareth me, he that despiseth you despiseth me, and he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of mine eye? Verily forsaking all that thou hast, take vp thy crosse, that thou maiest follow thy God our Lord Iesus Christ. Yet will it scarcely be, or not at all, that thou shalt appeare a thankefull recompencer of the benefits receiued at his hand. Search the scriptures of such as are learned, and you shall vnderstand: that (9) Saul, albeit he was the elect of the Lord, perished with his whole house, because he departed from the waies of the Lord.

Ozias also king of Iuda, whose name is spoken of and spread ouer all, through the manifold victories giuen him of God, his heart was so puffed vp to his destruction, because the Lord did helpe and strengthen him in euery place, that he contemning the feare and reuerence of the Lord, would vsurpe vnto himselfe that which was not his office, that is to say, the priesthood, and to offer incense vpon the altar of the Lord, for the which he was stricken with a leprosie, and cast out of the house of the Lord. Many other kings and holy men of great substance, because they haue walked aboue their estate in the maruels of the world, presuming to rebell against God in his ministeries, haue perished: and at the last, they haue found nothing of their substance in their power. Also king Achaz, because he did vsurpe the office of priesthood, was likewise stricken with a leprosie by God.

Oza also, albeit he was not king, yet for so much as he touched the arke and held it, when it would haue fallen by the vnrulinesse of the oxen, which thing pertained not vnto him, but vnto the ministers of the church, hee was stricken by the wrath wrath of God and fell downe by the arke. O king, it is a famous prouerbe: that A man forewarned by another mans misfortune, will take the better heed vnto himselfe. For euery man hath his owne businesse in hand, when his neighbours house is on fire.

Digitized by Google

Dearelie beloued king, God would haue the disposing of those things which pertaine vnto the church, to belong onlie vnto priests, and not vnto the secular power. Do not challenge vnto thy selfe therefore another mans right: neither striue against him, by whom all things are ordained, lest thou seeme to striue against his benefits, of whom thou hast receiued thy power. For by the common (10) lawes, and not by the secular power, and by the bishops and priests, almightie God would haue the clergie of the christian religion to be ordered and ruled. And christian kings ought to submit all their doings vnto ecclesiasticall rulers, and not to prefer themselues: for it is written, that none ought to iudge the bishops but only the church, neither doth it pertaine vnto mans law to giue sentence vpon any such. Christian princes are accustomed to be obedient vnto the statutes and ordinances of the church, and not to preferre their owne power. A prince ought to submit himselfe vnto the bishops, and not to iudge the bishops: for there are two things wherewith the world is chieflie gouerned (that is to say) the sacred authoritie of bishops and roiall power. (11) In the which, the bishops charge is so much the more weightie, in that they shall at the latter iudgement render account euen of the kings themselues. Truely you ought to vnderstand, that you depend vpon their iudgement, and cannot reduce them vnto your owne will: for many bishops haue excommunicated both kings and emperours. And if you require an especiall example thereof, Innocentius the pope did excommunicat Arcadius the emperour, because he did consent that Iohn Chrysostom should be expulsed from his seat: and Saint Ambrose also did excommunicat (12) Theodosius the great emperour for a fault (which seemed not so weightie vnto other priests) and shut him out of the church: who afterwards by condigne satisfaction was absolued.

There are manie other like examples. For Dauid when he had committed adulterie and murther, the prophet Nathan was sent vnto him by God to reproue him, and he was soone corrected. And the king (laying aside his scepter and diadem, and setting apart all princelie maiestie) was not ashamed to humble himselfe before the face of the prophet, to confesse his fault, and to require forgiuenesse for his offence. What will you more? He being stricken with repentance asked mercie, and obtained forgiuenesse. So likewise you (most beloued king and reuerend lord) after the example of this good king Dauid, of whom it is said, I haue found a man after mine owne heart; with a contrite and humble heart turne to the Lord your God, and take hold of repentance for your transgressions. For you are fallen and erred in manie things, which yet I keepe in store still, if (peraduenture) God shall inspire you to say with the prophet: Haue mercie on me ô God, according to thy great mercie, for I haue sinned much against thee, and done ill in thy sight. Thus much I haue thought good to write to you my deare lord at this present, passing other things in silence, til I may see whether my words take place in you, and bring forth fruits worthie of repentance: and that I may heare & reioyce with them that shal bring me word and say: O king, thy son was dead, and is aliue againe, was lost and is found againe. But if you will not heare me, looke where I was wont * before the maiestie of the bodie of Christ to pray for you in abundance of teares and sighes: there in the same place I wil crie against you, and say: Rise vp Lord and iudge my cause, forget not the rebukes and iniuries which the king of England doth to thee and thine: forget not the ignominie of thy church, which thou hast builded in thy blood. Reuenge the blood of thy saints which is spilt: reuenge, ô Lord, the afflictions of thy seruants, of whom there is an infinit number. For the pride of them which hate and persecute thee is gone vp so high, that we are not able to beare them any longer. Whatsoeuer your seruants shall do, all those things shall be required at your hands: for he seemeth to haue done the harme, which hath giuen the cause thereof. Doubtlesse, the Sonne of the most high, except you amend and cease from the oppressing of the church and clergie, and keepe your hand from troubling of them, will come in the rod of his furie, at the voices of such as crie to him, and at the sighes of them that be in bands: when the time shall come for him to iudge the vnrighteousnesse of men in equitie and seueritie of the holy Ghost. For he knoweth how to take awaie the breath of princes, and is terrible among kings of the earth. Your deare and louing grace I wish well to fare. Thus fare ye well againe and euer.

* Note the iudgement of God against this Becket, who was slaine at his masse making the bodie of Christ.

Certaine notes or elenchs vpon this epistle: which by the figures you may find out, and their places.

1 The scope of this epistle is this, to proue that bishops and priests ought not to come vnder the couert and controlement of temporall power.

2 This similitude holdeth not. For though the smalnesse of a citie blemisheth not the prerogatiue of a kingdome, yet the euilnesse and rebellion of a citty doth worthily blemish his owne prerogatiue.

3 So saith the popes decree, Dist. 10: but the scripture of God importeth otherwise. Abiathar the priest was deposed of king Salomon, not for any heresie, but for other causes: 3. Reg. 12. Ionathas toke his priesthood of king Alexander: and Simon of Demetrius, 1. Macch. 7. Christ offered tribute to Cesar for him and for Peter. Also Peter saith, Be ye subiect to euery humane creature: and it followeth, whether it be to the king as to the chiefe, &c. Item pope Leo submitted himselfe to Ludouicus the emperour with these words: And if we do any thing incompetently, and do swerue from the path of righteousnesse, we will stand to your reformation, or of them whom you shall send. Quæst. 2. Hos. 7.

4 Notwithstanding, the said Constantinus writing to the bishops congregated at Tirus, first chideth them, then commandeth them to resort vnto his presence, to haue their cause iudged and decided. Trip. hist. lib. 3. cap. 7.

5 The father vnder obedience, &c. If fatherhood go by age, I suppose that king Henrie was elder then Becket. If fatherhood consist in authoritie, I iudge the authoritie of a king, to be aboue the authoritie of an archbishop. If the see of Canturburie make the fatherhood, yet had Becket no cause to claime fatherhood ouer the king, seeing the sonne ordained the father (that is) seeing the king made him his archbishop, and not he made him his king.

6 By wicked bonds. All is wicked with the papists, that bringeth them in subiection to their princes.

7 Ecclesiasticall matters be such, as properly belong to doctrine and diuine knowledge, for the institution of the soule, and information of conscience. In which both princes and subiects ought to follow their pastor, so long as they go truly before them without error, or else not. But what maketh this for the lands and liberties of churchmen?

8 Punishment due to malefactors and rebels is not to be called persecution, but due correction.

9 Saul brake the commandement of God and was reiected. Dzias contrarie to the commandement of God toke the office of a priest, and was stricken. Dza against the expresse word of the law put his hand to the arke, and was punished. But what expresse word had king Henrie, why he should not correct and punish rebellious bishops, and wicked priests within his owne realme? wherefore these similitudes accord not. As for Achas, he was not so much punished for taking the priests office, as for spoiling the temple of the Lord, and offering to idols.

10 Common lawes. S. Augustine writing to Boniface, saith thus: Whosoeuer obeieth not the lawes of the emperour, being made for the veritie of God, procureth to himselfe great punishment. For in the time of the prophets, all the kings which did not forbid and subuert all such things as were vsed of the people against the law of God, are rebuked. And such as did withstand them, are commended aboue the rest. August.

11 Isidorus hath these words: Let temporal princes know that they must render account to God for the church, which they haue at the hands of God to gouerne, &c.

12 The case of Arcadius, Theodosius, Dauid, and of this king, as touching this matter, hath no similitude. In them was murther: this king doth nothing but claime that which is his due. And though by the spirituall sword those kings were resisted: yet it agreeth not therefore, that the persons of them which haue the vse of the spirituall sword, are aboue the persons of them which haue the temporall sword.

Besides these letters of the archbishop sent to the king, the pope also in the same cause writeth to the king, beginning after this sort: Alexander papa ad Henricum regem. Et naturali ratione, & forma iuris dictante, prouidentiam tuam credimus edoctam fuisse, quòd quanto quis ab aliquo maiora suscepisse dignoscitur, tanto ei obnoxior & magis obligatus tenetur, &c. The whole tenour of the letter as he wrote it to the king I would heere expresse, but for tracting of the time and straitnesse of rome, hauing so many things else in this storie (by the grace of Christ) to be comprehended. But the letter tendeth to this effect: to exhort and charge the king to shew fauour to Thomas Becket: Where, in the processe of the epistle, it followeth in these words: Ea propter seueritatem tuam per apostolica scripta rogamus, monemus, & exhortamur in Domino; necnon in remissionem peccatorum ex parte Dei omnipotentis, & beati Petri principis apostolorum autoritate nostra iniungimus, vt memoratum archiepiscopum pro Deo & ecclesia sua, & honore tuo, necnon & totius regni tui, in gratiam & fauorem tuum recipias, &c. That is: Therefore we do desire, monish, and exhort your honor by these our apostolicall writings, and also inioyne you vpon the remission of your sinnes, in the behalfe of almightie God, and of S. Peter, prince of the apostles, by our authoritie, that you will receiue againe the foresaid archbishop into your fauour and grace, for the honour of God, his church, and of your owne realme, &c. Thus haue you heard the popes intreating letter. Now heere is another letter sent vnto the foresaid king, wherein hee doth menace him, as in the tenour thereof heere followeth.

Digitized by Google

Biſhop Alexander, ſeruant of the ſeruants of God, to king Henrie, king of England, health and bleſſing apoſtolicall.

HOw fatherly and gently we haue oft times intreated and exhorted both by leagats and letters your princely honor, to be reconciled again with our reuerend brother Thomas archbiſhop of Canturbury, ſo that he and his may be reſtored againe to their churches and other poſſeſſions to them appertaining; your wiſedome is not ignorant, ſeeing it is notified and ſpread almoſt throughout all chriſtendome. For ſo much therfore, as hitherto we could not preuaile with you, neither moue nor ſtir your mind with faire and gentle words; it lamenteth vs not a little, ſo to be fruſtrat and deceiued of the hope and expectation which we had conceiued of you. Eſpeciallie ſeeing we loue you ſo dearely, as our owne dearely beloued ſonne in the Lord, and vnderſtanding ſo great ieopardie to hang ouer you.

But for ſo much as it is written: Crie out and ceaſe not, lift vp thy voice like a trumpe, and declare to my people their wickednеſſe, and their ſinnes to the houſe of Iacob. Alſo for ſo much as it is in Salomon commanded, that the ſluggiſh perſon ſhould be ſtoned with the dung of oxen: we haue thought good therefore, not to forbeare or ſupport your ſtubbornneſſe anie longer againſt iuſtice and ſaluation. Neither that the mouth of the foreſaid archbiſhop ſhould be ſtopped from henceforth any more: but that he may freely proſecute the charge of his office and dutie, to reuenge with the ſword of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, the iniuries both of himſelfe, and of his church committed to his charge.

And heere I haue ſent vnto you two legats, Petrus de ponte Dei, and Bernardus de Corilio, to admoniſh you of the ſame. But if yee will neither by vs be aduertiſed, nor giue eare vnto them in obeying: it is to be feared (doubtleſſe) leſt ſuch things as they ſhall declare to you from vs in our behalfe, may happen and fall vpon you. Dated at Beneuent, the ninth day before the kalends of Iune.

To anſwere theſe letters againe, there was another certaine writing drawne out and directed to the pope, made by ſome of the clergie, as it ſeemeth: but not without conſent of the king, as by the title may appeare, inueying and diſproning the miſbehauiour of the archbiſhop. The tenour whereof heere followeth, and beginneth thus.

An anſwere to the pope.

Anſwere to the popes letter.

TIme now requireth more to ſeeke helpe then to make complaints. For ſo it is now, that the holy mother church (our ſinnes deſeruing the ſame) lieth in a dangerous caſe of great decay, which is like to inſue, except the preſent mercie of the Lord ſupport her.

Frederike falſe compared to Pharao, but this was to claw the pope withall.

Such is the wickednеſſe now of ſchiſmatikes, that the father of fathers pope Alexander (for the defence of his faith, and for the loue of righteouſneſſe) is baniſhed out of his countrie: not able to keepe free reſidence in his owne proper ſee, by reaſon of the indurat heart of Frederike the Pharao.

Further and beſides, the church alſo of Canturburie is miſerablie impaired and blemiſhed, as well in the ſpirituall as in the temporall eſtate: much like to the ſhip in the ſea, being deſtitute of her guide, toſſed in the flouds, and wreſtling with the winds, while the paſtor being abſent from his prouince dare not there remaine through the power of the king. Who being ouer wiſe (to the ieopardie of himſelfe, his church, and vs alſo) hath brought & intangled vs likewiſe with himſelfe in the ſame partaking of his puniſhments and labours, not conſidering how we ought to forbeare, and not to reſiſt ſuperiour powers. And alſo ſheweth himſelfe to vs vnkind, which with all our affections beare the burden with him of his afflictions, not ceaſing yet to perſecute vs which ſtand in the ſame condemnation with him. For betwixt him and our ſoueraigne prince, the king of England, aroſe a certaine matter of contention, whereupon they were both agreed, that a day ſhould be appointed, to haue the controuerſie diſcuſſed by equitie and iuſtice.

The day being come, the king commanded all the archbiſhops, biſhops, and other prelats of the church to be called in a great ſolemne frequencie: ſo that the greater and more generall this councell was, the more manifeſt the detection of this ſtubborne malice ſhould appeare and be eſpied.

At the day therefore aboue mentioned, this troubler of the realme and of the church, preſenteth himſelfe in the ſight of our catholike king: who not truſting the qualitie and condition of his cauſe, armeth him with the armor of the croſſe, as one which ſhould be brought to the preſence of a tyrant. By reaſon whereof, the kings maieſtie, being ſomewhat aggrieued (yet becauſe he would be deliuered from all ſuſpicion) committeth the matter to the hearing of the biſhops. This done, it reſted in the biſhops to decide and ceaſe this contention, and to ſet agreement betweene them, remouing all occaſion of diſſenſion. Which thing they going about, commeth in this foreſaid archbiſhop, forbidding and commanding, that no man proceed in any ſentence of him before the king.

This being ſignified to the kings hearing, his mind was grieuouſly prouoked therby to anger: whoſe anger yet notwithſtanding had been eaſily aſſwaged, if the other would haue ſubmitted himſelfe, and acknowledged his default. But he adding ſtubbornneſſe to his treſpaſſe, through the quantitie and greatneſſe of his exceſſe, was the author of his owne puniſhment, which now by the law ciuill he ſuſtaineth, and yet ſhameth to craue pardon for his deſert at the kings hand: whoſe anger he feared not to ſtir vp, in ſuch a troubleſome time of the perſecution of the church, greatly againſt the profit of the ſame; augmenting and increaſing thereby the perſecution which now the church lieth vnder. Much better it had bin for him to haue tempered himſelfe with the bridle of moderation, in the higheſt eſtate of his dignity, leſt in exceeding too far, in ſtraining the ſtrict points of things by ouermuch preſumption, peraduenture through his preſumption being not in meane and tolerable things, might fall from higher. And if the detriments of the church would not moue him: yet the great benefits and preferments of riches and honors ought to perſuade him, not to be ſo ſtubborne againſt the king. But heere peraduenture his friend and our aduerſarie will obiect, that his bearing and ſubmitting to the king in this behalfe, were preiudiciall againſt the authoritie and ſee apoſtolicall. As though he did not or might not vnderſtand, that although the dignitie of the church ſhould ſuffer a little detriment in that iudgement: yet he might and ought to haue diſſembled (for the time) to obtaine peace vnto the church. He wil obiect againe, alleaging the name of father, that it ſoundeth like a point of arrogancie, for children to proceed in iudgement of condemnation againſt the father: which thing is not conuenient. But he muſt vnderſtand againe, that it was neceſſary that the obedience and humilitie of the children ſhould temper the pride of the father: leſt afterward, the hatred of the father might redound vpon the children. Wherefore, of theſe premiſſes your fatherhood may vnderſtand, that the action of this our aduerſarie ought to fall downe, as void and of none effect, who only vpon the affection of malice hath proceeded thus againſt vs, hauing no iuſt cauſe nor reaſon to ground vpon.

Becket a ſtubborne treſpaſſer. Ergo no martyr.

And for ſo much as the care and charge of all churches (as ye know) lieth vpon vs, it ſtandeth vs vpon, to prouide concerning the ſtate of the church of Canturburie, by our diligence and circumſpection: ſo that the ſaid church of Canturburie, by the exceſſe of his paſtor, be not driuen to ruine or decay.

¶ By this epiſtle it may appeare to the reader thereof, that Becket (being abſent from England) went about to worke ſome trouble againſt certaine of the clergy and the laity (belike) in excommunicating ſuch as he tooke to be his euill willers.

Now to vnderſtand further what his working was, or who they were whom he did excommunicat, this letter, ſent to William biſhop of Norwich, ſhall better declare the matter.

A letter of Becket to the biſhop of Norwich.

A letter of Becket to the biſhop of Norwich.

HE bindeth himſelfe to the penaltie of the crime, whoſoeuer receiuing power and authoritie of God, vſeth and exerciſeth not the ſame with due ſeueritie, in puniſhing vice: but winking and diſſembling, doth miniſter boldneſſe to wicked doers, maintaining them in their ſinne. For the blood of the wicked is required at the hand of the prieſt, which is negligent or diſſembleth. And as the Scripture ſaith, Thornes and brambles grow in the hands of the idle drunkard. Wherefore, leſt (through our too much ſufferance and diſſembling) the tranſgreſſions of manifeſt euill doers ſhould alſo be laid to our charge, and redound to the deſtruction of the church through our guiltie ſilence; we therefore following the authoritie of the popes commandement, haue laid our ſentence of curſe and excommunication vpon the earle Hugo: commanding you throughout all your dioceſſe publikelie to denounce the ſaid earle as accurſed, ſo that (according to the diſcipline of the church) he be ſequeſtred from the fellowſhip of all faithfull people. Alſo, it is not vnknowne to your brotherhood, how long we haue borne with the tranſgreſſions of the biſhop of London; who amongſt other his facts, I would to God were not a great doer and fautour of this ſchiſme, and ſubuerter of the rights and liberties of holie church. Wherefore we, being ſupported with the authoritie of the apoſtolike ſee, haue alſo excommunicated him, beſides alſo the biſhop of Salisburie, becauſe of his diſobedience and contempt: and others likewiſe, vpon diuers and ſundrie cauſes, whoſe names heere follow ſubſcribed: Hugo Bernards ſonne, Rodulph of Brock, Robert of Brock a clerke, Hugo de S. Cleare, and Letardus a clerke of Northfolke, Nigellus of Scacauill, and Richard Chapleine, William of Haſting, and the frier which poſſeſſeth my church of Monchot. Wee therefore charge and command you by the authoritie apoſtolicall and ours, and in the vertue of obedience, and in the perill of ſaluation; and of your order; that ye cauſe theſe openly to be proclamed excommunicat, throughout al your dioceſſe, and to command all the faithfull to auoid their companie. Fare ye well in the Lord. Let not your heart bee troubled, nor feare: for wee ſtand ſure through the aſſiſtance of the apoſtolike ſee, God being our borow, againſt the pretenſed ſhifts of the malignant ſort, and againſt all their appellations. Furthermore, all ſuch as haue been ſolemnelie cited of vs, ſhall ſuſtaine the like ſentence of excommunication, if God will, on the Aſcenſion daie: vnleſſe

The biſhop of London excommunicated. This biſhop was excommunicated becauſe he ſet in the Deane of Salisburie without the licence of him, being then beyond the ſeas.

Digitized by Google

vnlesse they shall otherwise agree with me. That is, to wit: Geffrey archdeacon of Canturburie, and Robert his vicar, Rice of Wilcester, Richard of Lucie, William Gifford, Adam of Cherings, with such others more: which either at the commandement of the king, or vpon their owne proper temeritie, haue inuaded the goods and possessions either appertaining to vs, or to our clerkes about vs. With these also we do excommunicat all such as be knowne either with aid or counsell, to haue incensed or set forward the proceeding of our king against the liberties of the church, and exiling of the innocents. And such also as be knowne to impeach or let by any maner of way the messengers (sent either from the pope, or from vs) for the necessities of the church. Fare you well againe and euer.

Hitherto hast thou seene (gentle reader) diuers and sundrie letters of Thomas Becket, whereby thou maist collect a sufficient historie of his doings and demeanor, though nothing else were said further of him, concerning his lustie and hautie stomacke, aboue that which beseemed either his degree or cause which he toke in hand. And heere peraduenture I may seeme in the storie of this one man to tarie too long, hauing to write of so many others better then it: yet for the weaker sort, which haue counted him, and yet do count him for a saint, hauing in themselues little vnderstanding to iudge or discerne in the causes of men, I thought to adde this letter more, wherein he complaineth of his king to a forren power; doing what in him did lie, to stir for his owne cause mortall war to the destruction of many. For suppose wrong had been offered him of his prince, was it not enough for him to flie? What cause had he for his owne priuat reuenge, to set potentats in publike discord? Now hauing no iust cause but rather offering iniurie in a false quarell, so to complaine of his prince: what is to be said of this, let euery man iudge which seeth this letter.

An epistle of Thomas archbishop of Canturburie to pope Alexander.

A Mantissimo patri & D. Alexandro, Dei gratia summo pont. Thomas Cant. ecclesiæ humilis minister, debitam & denotam obedientiam, &c. In English thus.

A seditious complaint of Becket to the pope againe his king.

To our most louing father and lord. Alexander by the grace of God bishop: Thomas the humble minister and seruant of the church of Canturburie due and reuerend obedience. Long enough and too long most louing father haue I forborne, still looking after the amendment of the king of England, but no fruit haue I reaped of this my long patience: nay rather, whilest that vnwisely I do thus forbeare, I augment and procure the detriment and diminishing of mine authoritie, as also of the church of God. For oftentimes haue I by deuout and religious messengers inuited him to make condigne satisfaction, as also by my letters (the copies whereof I haue sent you) intimat and pronounced Gods seueritie and vengeance against him, vnlesse he repent and amend. But he (that notwithstanding) groweth from euill to worse, oppressing and conculcating the church and sanctuarie of God: persecuting both me and those which take part with me: in so much that with fearefull threatning words his purpose is to terrifie such, as (for Gods cause and mine owne) seeke any way to relieue and helpe me. He wrote also the letters vnto the abbat of the Cistercian order, that as he fauored the abbasie of that his order (which was in his power said he) he would not accept me into the fellowship thereof, nor do any thing else for me. What should I vse many words? So much hath the rigor and seueritie as well of the king as of his officers, vnder our patience and sufferance shewed it selfe: that if a great number of men, yea and that of the most religious sort, should shew vnto you the matter as it is in deed (and that vpon their oth taken) I partly doubt whether your holines would giue credit vnto them or not. With heauinesse of mind therfore I considering these things, and beholding as well the perill of the king as of our selfe, haue publikely condemned not onlie those pernicious customes: but all those peruersities and wicked doings whereby the church of England is disturbed and brought to confusion: as also the writing whereby they were confirmed: excommunicating generallie as well the obseruers and exactors thereof, as also the inuentors and patrons of the same, with their fauourers, counsellours, and coadiutors whatsoeuer, either of the clergie or laitie: absoluing also our bishops from their oth, whereby they were so strictly inioyned to the obseruation of the same. These are the articles which in that writing I haue principally condemned. First, that it is inhibited to appeale vnto the see apostolicall, for any cause but by the kings licence. That a bishop may not punish any man for periurie, or for breaking of his troth. That a bishop may not excommunicate any man that holdeth of the king In capite, or else to interdict either their lands or offices without the kings licence. That clerkes and religious men may be taken from vs to secular iudgement. That the king or any other iudge may heare and decide the causes of the church and tithes. That it shall not be lawfull for any archbishop or bishop to go out of the realme, and to come at the popes call without the kings licence: and diuers others such as these. Namely also I haue excommunicated Iohn of Oxenford, who hath communicated with the schismatike and excommunicat person (Reginald Colonien sis) the which also contrarie to the commandement of the lord pope and ours, hath vsurped the deanrie of the church of Salisburie: and hath (to renew his schisme) taken an oth in the emperours court. Also I haue denounced and excommunicated Richard of Worcester, because he is fallen into the same damnable heresie, and communicated with that famous schismatike of Cullen: deuising and forging all mischiefe possible, with the schismatikes and Flemings to the destruction of the church of God, and especiallie of the church of Rome, by composition made by the king of England and them. Also Richard de Lucie, and Ioceline de Baliol, which haue furthered the fauourers of the kings tyrannie and workers of their heresies. Also Ranulph de Broc, and Hugo de Sancto Claro, and Thomas the sonne of Bernard, which haue vsurped the possessions and goods of the church of Canturburie without our licence and consent. We haue also excommunicated all those, which without our licence do stretch out their hands to the possessions and goods of the church of Canturburie. The king himselfe we haue not yet excommunicated personally, still waiting for his amendment: whom (notwithstanding) we will not defer to excommunicat, vnlesse hee quickely amend and be warned by that he hath done. And therfore that the authoritie of the see apostolike, and the libertie of the church of God, which in these parts are almost vtterly lost, may be by some meanes restored; it is meet and verie necessarie that what wee haue herein done, the same be of your holinesse ratified, and by your letters confirmed. Thus I wish your holinesse long to prosper and flourish.

Godly articles condemned by Becket.

1 2 3 4 5 6

By this epistle he that liketh to vnderstand of the doings and quarels of Becket, may partly iudge what is to be thought thereof. Which his doings although in some part may be imputed either to ignorance of mind, or blindnesse of zeale, or humane fragilitie: yet in this point, so vilely to complaine of his naturall prince, for the zeale of the pope, he can by no wise be defended. But such was the blindnesse then of the prelats in those daies, who measured and esteemed the dignitie and liberties of Christs church by no other thing, then only by goods and possessions flowing and abounding in the clergie: and thought no greater point of religion to be in the church then to maintaine the same. For the which cause they did most abominable abuse christian discipline and excommunication of the church at that time: as by this foresaid epistle may appeare. And what marueil if the acts and doings of this archbishop seeme now to vs in these daies both fond and strange: seeing the suffragans of his owne church and clergie writing to him, could not but reprehend him, as in this their epistle translated out of Latine into English may be seene.

Becket reprehended for complaining of his king.

Excommunication abused in priuat reuenge about lands and possessions.

An effectuall and pithie letter, full of reason and persuasion, sent from all the suffragans of the church of Canturburie to Thomas Becket their archbishop.

Quæ vestro (pater) in longinquo discessu inopinata rei ipsius nouitate turbata sunt: vestra sperabamus humilitate, &c. In English thus.

The letters of the bishops to Becket.

Such troubles and perturbations as happened through the strangenesse of your departure out of the realme, wee hoped by your humilitie and prudence should haue been reduced againe (Gods grace working withall) into a peaceable tranquillitie. And it was no little ioy to vs, to heare so of you in those parts where you are conuersant, how humblie you there behaued your selfe, nothing vanting your selfe against your prince and king, and to attempt no risings or wrestlings against his kingdome, but that you bare with much patience the burthen of pouertie, and gaue your selfe to reading and prayer, and to redeeme the losse of your time spent, with fasting, watchings, and teares: and so being occupied with spirituall studies, to tend and rise vp to the perfection of vertue, &c. But now through the secret relation of certaine, wee heare (that wee are sorie of) that you haue sent vnto him a threatning letter, wherein there is no salutatiõ premised. In the which also ye pretend no intreating nor prayers for the obtaining of fauour, neither do vse any friendly manner in declaring what you write, but manacing with much austeritie, threaten to interdict him, and to cut him from the societie of the church. Which thing if you shall accomplish with like seueritie as in words ye threaten to do, you shall not only put vs out of all hope of any peace, but also put vs in feare of hatred and discord without measure, and without all redresse amongst vs. But wisedome will consider before the end of things, labouring and indeuouring to finish that which shee wiselie beginneth. Therfore your discretion shall do well, diligently to forecast and consider whereto yee tend, what end may insue thereof, and whereabout ye go. Certes we (for our parts) hearing that we doe heare, are discouraged from that we hoped for, which before hauing some good comfort of trãquillitie to come, are cast from hope to despaire: so that while one is drawen thus against another, almost there is no hope nor place left to make intreaty or supplication. Wherfore writing to your fatherhood, we exhort and counsell you by way of charity, that you adde not trouble to trouble, and heape iniurie vpon iniurie: but ſo to behaue your ſelfe, that all menacies ſet aſide, yee rather giue your ſelfe to patience and humilitie, and to yeeld your cauſe to the clemencie of God, and to the mercie of your prince: which in ſo doing you ſhall heape coles of charitie vpon the heads of many. Thus charitie ſhall be kindled, and that which menacings cannot do (by Gods helpe and good mens counſell) pitie peraduenture and godlineſſe ſhall obtaine. Better it were to ſuſtaine pouertie with praiſe, then in great promotions to be a common note to al men. It is right well knowne vnto all men, how beneficiall the king hath been vnto you, from what baſeneſſe to what dignitie hee hath aduanced you, and alſo into his owne familiaritie hath ſo much preferred you, that from the north ocean, to the mount Perineus he hath ſubdued all things to your authoritie: in ſo much that they were amongſt all other accounted for men right fortunat, whoſoeuer could find any fauour with you.

Digitized by Google

And furthermore, leſt that your eſtimation ſhould bee ouermatched by any nobilitie, hee (againſt the mind of his mother, and of his realme) hath placed and ratified you ſubſtantially in eccleſiaſtical dignitie, and aduanced in this honor wherein ye ſtand: truſting through your helpe and counſell to raigne more ſafely and proſperouſly. Now, if he ſhall find diſquietneſſe, wherein hee truſted to haue quietneſſe; what ſhall all men ſay or thinke of you? What recompence or retribution ſhall this be thought to be for ſo many and great benefits taken? Therefore (if it ſhall pleaſe you) yee ſhall do well to fauour and ſpare your fame and eſtimation, and to ouercome your lord and ſoueraigne with humilitie and charitie. Whereunto if our aduertiſement cannot moue you, yet the loue and fidelitie you beare to the biſhop and holy church of Rome ought to incline you thereunto, and not to attempt any ſuch thing, whereby the troubles of the church our mother may increaſe; or whereby her dolour may be augmented in the loſſe of them, whoſe diſobedience now ſhe doth bewaile. For what if it ſo happen through prouocation, that the king (whom all his ſubiects and kingdomes obey) ſhould relinquiſh the pope, which God forbid: and ſhould denie all obedience to him, as he denieth to the king helpe or aid againſt you? what inconuenience would grow thereof? And thinke you, he hath not great inſtigations, ſupplications, gifts, and many faire promiſes ſo to do? Yet he (notwithſtanding) abideth firme hitherto in the rocke, deſpiſing with a valiant mind all that the world can offer. This one thing feareth vs, leſt his mind (whom no worldly offers can aſſaile, no glorie, riches, nor treaſure can ouerturne) onlie through indignation of vnkindneſſe be ſubuerted. Which thing if it chance to happen through you, then may you ſit downe and ſing the ſong of the lamentation of Ieremie, and weepe your bellie full.

Conſider therefore, if it pleaſe you, and foreſee well with your ſelfe, this purpoſe of yours, if it proceed, how hurtfull and perillous it will be: not only to the pope, and to the holy church of Rome, but alſo to your ſelfe moſt eſpecially. But ſome peraduenture about you, of haughtie and high minded ſtoutnes, more ſtout percaſe then wiſe, will not ſuffer you to take this way: but will giue you contrarie counſell, to proue rather and declare what ye are able to do againſt your lord and prince, and to practiſe againſt him and all his, the vttermoſt of your power and authoritie; which power and authoritie of yours, to him that offendeth, is fearefull; and to him that will not amend, terrible. Such counſell as this, ſome peraduenture will whiſper in your eare. But to theſe againe, this we ſay and anſwere for our king, whom notwithſtanding to be without fault we doe not affirme: but yet alwaies, that hee is readie to amend and make ſatisfaction, that we ſpeake confidently and proteſt in his behalfe.

The king appointed for the Lords annointed, prouideth for the peace of his ſubiects all that he is able: and therefore to the intent hee may conſerue this peace in his churches and amongſt his ſubiects committed to him; he willeth and requireth ſuch ordinances due to kings, and exhibited to them before time, alſo to be exhibited to him. Wherein if there hath any contradiction ſprung betwixt him and vs, he being thereupon conuented and admoniſhed from the pope by the reuerend biſhops of London and Hereford, braſt not out into any defiance: but meekely and humblie anſwered, that wherein ſoeuer the church or any eccleſiaſticall perſon can ſhew himſelfe grieued, hee would therein ſtand to the iudgement of the church of his kingdome. Which alſo he is readie no leſſe to performe in deed, thinking nothing more ſweet vnto him then to be admoniſhed of his fault, if he haue offended the Lord, and to reforme the ſame; and not only to reforme and amend his fault, but alſo to ſatisfie it to the vttermoſt, if the law ſhall ſo require him. Wherfore, ſeeing he is ſo willing to recompence & ſatisfie the iudgement of the church in all things appertaining to the church; refuſing no order that ſhall be taken, but in all things ſubmitting his necke to the yoke of Chriſt: with what right, by what canon or reaſon can you interdict him, or vſe excommunication againſt him? It is a thing laudable and a vertue of great commendation in wiſemen, wiſely to goe with iudgement and reaſon, and not to be caried with puffes of haſtie violence. Whereupon this is the only and common petition of vs all, that your fatherly care will diligently prouide for your flocke and ſheepe committed to you, ſo that they miſcarrie not, or runne to anie ruine through any inconſiderat or too much headie counſell in you: but rather through your ſoftneſſe and ſufferance, they may obtaine life, peace and ſecuritie. It doth moue vs all, that we heare of late to be done by you againſt the biſhop of Saliſburie, and the deane of the ſame church, proſperouſly, as ſome men ſuppoſe, againſt whom you haue giuen out the ſentence of excommunication and condemnation, before any queſtion of their crime was; following therein, as ſeemeth, more the heat of haſtineſſe then the path of righteouſneſſe. This is a new order of iudgement, vnheard of yet to this day in our lawes and canons, firſt to condemne a man and after to inquire of the fact committed. Which order leſt we ſhould hereafter attempt to exerciſe in like manner againſt our ſoueraigne and king, or againſt vs and our churches and pariſhes committed to vs, to the detriment of the pope, and the holy church of Rome, and to the no little confuſion of vs all: therefore we lay heere againſt you for our ſelues the remedie of appellation. And as before, openlie in the publike face of the church with liuely voice wee appealed to the pope for certaine perils that might haue happened: ſo now againe in writing we appeale to the ſame, aſſigning the tearme of our appellation the day of the Lords aſcenſion. Moſt humblie and reuerendly beſeeching your goodneſſe, that you, taking a better way with you in this matter, will let your cauſe fall: ſparing herein both the labours and charges, as well of your ſelfe, as ours alſo. And thus we wiſh you right well to fare, reuerend in the Lord.

The commendation of king Henrie the ſecond, for his meekeneſſe and moderation.

The reſcript or anſwere againe of Thomas Becket to all his ſuffragans, not obeying but confuting their counſell ſent.

FRaternitatis veſtræ ſcriptum (quod tamen prudentiæ veſtræ communi conſilio non facilè credimus emanaſſe) nuper ex inſperato ſuſcepimus, &c.

Your brotherly letters ſent, albeit not by the whole aſſent of your wiſedomes written, as I ſuppoſe, of late I receiued vpon a ſudden, the contents whereof ſeeme to containe more ſharpneſſe then ſolace. And would to God they proceeded more of ſincere zeale of godlineſſe or affection of charitie, then of diſobedience or froward wilfulneſſe. For charitie ſeeketh not the things that be her owne, but which appertaine to Ieſus Chriſt. It had been your dutie (if there be truth in the goſpell, as moſt vndoubtedly there is) and if you would faithfully haue accompliſhed his buſineſſe, whoſe perſon you repreſent, rather to haue feared him, which can caſt both bodie and ſoule to hell; then him whoſe power extendeth no further then to the bodie, rather to haue obeyed God then man, rather your father then your maſter or lord, after the example of him who was to his father obedient vnto the death, which died for vs; leauing vs example to follow his ſteps. Let vs die therefore with him, and lay downe our liues for the deliuerance of his church out of the yoke of bondage and tribu'ation of the oppreſſor. Which church he hath founded, and whoſe libertie he hath procured with his owne proper blood: leſt if we ſhall do otherwiſe, it may happilie fall vpon vs which is written in the goſpell; Who ſo loueth his owne life more then me, is not worthie of me. This yee ought to know, that if it be right which your captaine commandeth, your dutie requireth to obey his will; if not, ye ought then rather to obey God then men.

Scriptures in words rightly alleaged, but falſlie applied.

One thing I will ſay (if I may be ſo bold to tell it vnto you) I haue now ſuffered and abſtained a long ſpace, waiting if the Lord had giuen you to take a better heart vnto you, which haue turned away cowardly your backes in the day of battell, or if any of you would haue returned againe to ſtand like a wall for the houſe of Iſrael, at leaſt if he had but ſhewed himſelfe in the field, making but the countenance of a warriour againſt them, which ceaſe not daily to infeſt the lambe of God. I waited and none came, I ſuffered and none roſe vp, I held my peace and none would ſpeake, I diſſembled and none would ſtand with me in like ſemblance: wherefore ſeeing I ſee no better towardneſſe in you, this remaineth only, to enter action of complaint againſt you, and to cry againſt mine enemies, Riſe vp O Lord, and iudge my cauſe, reuenge the blood of the church which is waſted and oppreſſed. The pride of them which hate his libertie, riſeth vp euer, neither is there any that doth good, no not one. Would God, brethren beloued, there were in you any mind or affection to defend the libertie of the church! for thee is builded vpon a ſure rocke, that although ſhe be ſhaken, yet ſhe cannot be ouerthrowne. And why then ſeeke ye to confound me? Nay rather your ſelues in me, then me in you? A man which hath taken vpon me all the perill, haue ſuſtained all the rebukes, haue ſuſtained all the iniuries, haue ſuffered alſo for you all, to verie baniſhment.

I denie your minor, M. Becket.

The church of Chriſt cannot be ouerthrowne. Ergo, Becket ought not to be reſiſted.

And ſo it was expedient, one to ſuffer for that church, that thereby it might be releaſed out of ſeruitude. Theſe things diſcuſſe you ſimply with your ſelues and weigh the matter. Attend I ſay diligently in your minds for your parts, that God for his part remouing from your eies all maieſty of rule and imperie, as he is no accepter of perſons, may take from your hearts the veile, that ye may vnderſtand and ſee what ye haue done, what Seruitude and libertie of the church wrongfully defined. The words of holy Scripture clerkely applied.

Digitized by Google

what ye intend to doe, and what ye ought to doe. Tell me which of you all can ſay, I haue taken from him ſince the time of my promotion, either or or aſſe. If I haue defrauded him of any penie, if I haue miſiudged the cauſe of any man wrongfully, or if by the detriment of any perſon I haue ſought mine owne gaine, let him complaine, and I will reſtore him fourefold. And if I haue not offended you, what then is the cauſe that ye thus leaue and forſake me in the cauſe of God? Why bend yee ſo your ſelues againſt me in ſuch a cauſe, that there is none more ſpeciall belonging to the church?

Turne to thee? Nay turne thou to the Lord and thou ſhalt be ſaued.

Brethren ſeeke not to confound your ſelues and the church of God (ſo much as in you is) but turne to me and you ſhall bee ſafe. For the Lord ſaith, I will not the death of a ſinner, but rather he ſhould conuert and liue. Stand with mee manfully in the war, take your armor and your ſheeld to defend mee. Take the ſword of the word of the mightie God, that we all together may withſtand more valiantlie the malignant enemies, ſuch as go about to take away the ſoule of the church, which is her libertie: without which libertie ſhe hath no power againſt them that ſeeke to incroch to their inheritance the poſſeſſion of Gods ſanctuarie. If ye will heare and follow mee, knowe ye that the Lord will be with you, and with vs all in the defence of the libertie of his church. Otherwiſe if yee will not, the Lord iudge betwixt me and you, and require the confuſion of his church at your hands. Which church, whether the world will or no, ſtandeth firmely in the word of the Lord, whereupon ſhe is builded, and euer ſhall, till the houre come that ſhee ſhall paſſe from this world to the father: for the Lord euer doth ſupport her with his hand.

The ſoule of the church is the libertie of the church, ſaith Becket.

Wherefore to returne to the matter. Brethren remember well with your ſelues (which thing ye ought not to forget) what danger I was brought vnto, and the church of God alſo while I was in England, at my departing out of England, and after my departure from thence alſo; in what danger it ſtandeth at this preſent day; but eſpecially at that time, when as at Northhampton Chriſt was iudged againe in my perſon, before the iudgement ſeat of the high preſident. Who euer heard the archbiſhop of Canturburie (being troubled for iniuries done to him and to his church, and appealing to the pope of Rome) to be iudged, condemned, appealed, and put to his ſureties, and that of his owne ſuffragans? Where is this law ſeene, or the authoritie (nay rather peruerſitie) of this canon heard of? And why yet ſhame ye not at this your enormitie? Why are ye not confounded? Or why doth not this confuſion worke in you repentance, and repentance driue you to due ſatisfaction before God and men? For theſe and ſuch other iniuries done to God and to his church, and to me for Gods cauſe (which with a good conſcience I ought to ſuffer, becauſe that without danger of ſoule I ought not to diſſemble them) I chuſe rather to abſent my ſelfe for a ſeaſon, and to dwell quietlie in the houſe of my Lord, then in the tabernacle of ſinners, vntill the time that (their iniquity being complet) the harts of the wicked, and the cogitations of the ſame ſhall be opened. And theſe iniuries were the cauſe both of my appeale from the king and of my departure from thence, which yee doe terme to bee ſudden. But if yee will ſpeake the truth which ye know, it ought no leſſe then to be ſudden: leſt (being foreknowne) it might haue been preuented and ſtopped. And as God turned the matter, it hapned for the beſt, both for the honor of the king, and better ſafetie of them, which (ſeeking my harme) ſhould haue brought ſlander to the king. If ſuch troubles followed vpon my departing as yee ſay, let them bee imputed to him which gaue cauſe, the fault is in the worker, not in the departer, in him that purſueth, not in him that auoideth iniuries. What would yee more? I preſented my ſelfe to the court, declaring both the cauſes of my comming and of my appeale, declaring alſo the wrongs and iniuries done to mee and to my church, and yet could haue no anſwer: neither was there any that laid any thing againſt mee, before wee came to the king. Thus while wee ſtood waiting in the court, whether any would come againſt me or not, they ſent to my officials: charging them not to obay mee in my temporalties, nor to owe any ſeruice to me or to any of mine. After my appellation made in the court, my church was ſpoiled; we and they about vs depriued of our goods, outlawed both of the clergie and of the laitie, men, women and infants: the goods of the church, that is, the patrimonie of the crucifix, confiſcat, and part of the monie turned to the kings vſe, part to your owne coffers. Brother biſhop of London, if this be true that we heare of you, and that to the vſe of your owne church ye conuert this monie; we charge you and require you forthwith by vertue of obedience, that within fortie daies after the ſight of theſe letters, all delay and excuſe ſet aſide, yee reſtore againe within the time aforeſaid, all ſuch goods and parcels as you haue taken away: for it is vnmeet and contrarie to al law, one church to be inriched with the ſpoile of another church. If ye ſtand vpon the authoritie that ſet you a worke, you muſt vnderſtand, that in matters concerning the church goods, hee can giue no lawfull authoritie, which committeth violent iniurie, &c.

Vnbeſeeming words of high preſumption. Chriſt is not iudged in the perſon of any traitor.

What authoritie and what ſcripture giueth this prerogatiue to princes vpon church goods, which you would attribute to them? What? will they lay for them the remedie of appeale? God forbid. It were euill with the church of God, if when the ſacrilegious extortioner hath violentlie inuaded other mens goods (eſpecially the goods of the church) he ſhould after defend him with the title of appeale, &c.

Becket ſeemeth here more skilfull of his maſſe booke then of the booke of holy ſcripture, otherwiſe he might ſee it no new thing in the old law for kings to depriue prieſts, and to place whom they would. Kings in the old law did not intermeddle with the prieſts office in ſome things that were forbidden: but yet kings were officers ouer prieſts to correct them when they did amiſſe. If ye meane of Achas and Oze in the old teſtament, then we denie your minor.

But he leaueth out here the manner of his comming to the court, and the ſtrangeneſſe of his behauior.

Do not brethren ſo confound altogether the right of the church and of the temporall regiment: for theſe two are much different, one borrowing his authoritie of the other. Read the ſcriptures, and yee ſhall find what and how many kings haue periſhed for taking vpon them the prieſtly office. Therefore let your diſcretion prouide, leſt for this your doing, Gods puniſhment light vpon you: which if it come, it will bee hard for you very eaſily to eſcape. Prouide alſo and ſee to your king, whoſe fauour ye preſer before the wealth and profit of the church, leſt it happen (which God forbid) that he doth periſh with all his houſe, after the example of them which for the like crime were plagued. And if ye ceaſe not off from that ye begin, with what conſcience can I diſſemble or forbeare, but muſt needs puniſh you? Let him diſſemble with you who liſt (hauing authoritie ſo to doe, truſte I will not) there ſhall bee no diſſimulation found in mee. And where you write in your letters concerning my promotion, that it was againſt the voice of the whole realme, and that the church did reclaime againſt it; what ſhould I ſay to you, but that yee know right well: The lie which the mouth doth willingly ſpeake, killeth the ſoule? but eſpecially the words of a prieſts mouth ought euer to go with veritie. As touching this matter, I appeale to your owne conſcience, whether the forme of my election ſtood not fully with the conſent of them all to whom the election belonged, hauing alſo the aſſent of the prince by his ſonne, and of them which were ſent thereto. And if there were ſome that repugned the ſame, bee that was troubled and is guiltie, let him ſpeake.

We ſay moreouer, that I was exalted and promoted from a baſe and low degree to this dignitie by him. I grant that I came of no roiall or kinglie bloud: yet notwithſtanding I had rather be in the number of them, whom vertue of mind then of birth maketh noble. Peraduenture I was borne in a poore cottage, of poore parentage; and yet through Gods clemencie, which knoweth how to worke mercie with his ſeruants, & which cheriſheth the humble and lowe things, to confound the high and mightie, in this my poore and low eſtate, before I came to the kings ſeruice, I had abundantlie and wealthilie to liue withall (as ye know) amongſt my neighbours and friends. And Dauid euen from the ſheepfold was taken vp and made a king, Peter of a fiſher was made a prince of the church, who for his bloud being ſhed for the name of Chriſt, deſerued to haue in heauen a crowne, and in earth, name and renowne: would to God wee could do the like! We bee the ſucceſſors of Peter, and not of kings and emperors.

They be the ſucceſſors and ſons of ſaints, not that hold the places of ſaints, but that doe the works of ſaints. Hieroine.

Conſcience made where is none.

And where ye ſeeme to charge me (by inſinuation) with the blot of ingratitude: This I anſwer: There is no offence capitall or infamous, vnleſſe it proceed from the heart and intention. As if a man commit a murther vnwillingly, although he be called a murtherer, yet he is not thereby puniſhable: and ſo, although I owe my duty and ſeruice with reuerence to my king, yet if I haue forborne him as my lord, if I haue warned him and talked with him fatherlie and gently as with a ſonne, and in talking with him could not be heard: if therefore, I ſay, being inforced thereunto, & againſt my will, I do exerciſe vpon him the cenſure of due ſeueritie, in ſo doing I ſuppoſe I make rather with him then againſt him, and rather deſerue at his hand thanks for my correction, then note or ſuſpition of vnkindneſſe or puniſhment for the fact. Sometimes a man againſt his will receiueth a benefit. As when neceſſitie cauſeth a man to be reſtrained from doing that which he ought not: he that doth ſo reſtraine him, though he ſtop him, doth not hurt him, but rather profiteth him for his ſoules health. Another thing that defendeth vs from ingratitude, is our father and patron Chriſt; which in that he is our father, to whom we as children owe obedience, then are we bound as children by neceſſity to obay his commandement, in warning the euill doer, in correcting the diſobedient, and in bridling the obſtinat: which if we doe not, we run into danger to haue his bloud required at our hands. Yee ſet forth likewiſe and ſhew, what loſſe we thereby may ſuſtaine of our temporalties. But yee ſpake no word of the loſſe of our ſoules.

Moreouer, as concerning the departure of the king from the homage of the church of Rome, which in your letters yee ſeeme to pretend, or rather threaten: God forbid, I ſay, that the deuotion or faith of our king ſhould euer ſwarue away from the obedience and reuerence of the church of Rome, for any temporall commoditie or incommoditie: which thing to doe is very damnable in any priuat ſubiect, much more in the prince which draweth many other with him: therefore God forbid, that euer any faithfull man ſhould once thinke ſo hainous a deed. And you according to your diſcretion take heed, leſt the words of your mouth infect any perſon or perſons therein, occaſioning them by your words to ſuch dangerous and damnable matter, like to the golden cup which is called the cup of Babylon, which for the outward gold no man will refuſe to drinke of, but after they haue drunke thereof, they are poiſoned.

If the king had been an adulterer or tyrant againſt the true doctrine or preaching of Chriſt, then might this reaſon ſerue, and God more to be obayed then man. Now where did Becket learne that the king in his temporall right was not to be obayed? Take heed, ye marre al and ye open that doore.

And where yee lay to my charge for the ſuſpending of the reuerend father the biſhop of Saliſburie, and for excommunicating of John deane of the ſame church for a ſchiſmatike (by know-knowledge and processe had of the matter) to this I answer: that both these are iustlie and condignlie excommunicat, and if ye vnderstand perfectly the condition of the matter, and the right order of iudgements, yée will say no lesse. For this standeth with good authoritie (as ye know) that in manifest and notorious crimes, this knowledge and order of proceeding is not requisit. Perpend with your selues diligentlie, what the bishop of Salisburie did concerning the deanerie, after that he was prohibited of the pope and of vs, vnder paine of excommunication: and then shall you better vnderstand (vpon so manifest disobedience) suspension did rightlie follow, as ye read in the decrée of S. Clement, saying: If they doe not obay their prelats, all maner of persons of what order so euer they be, whether they shall be princes of high or low degrée, and all other people, shall not onely bee infamed, but also banished from the kingdome of God, and the fellowship of the faithfull. As concerning John of Oxford, this we say, that excommunication commeth diuers waies. Some are excommunicat by the law denouncing them excommunicat. Some by the sentence of the prelat. Some by communicating with them which are excommunicated. Now he that hath fallen into this damnable heresie, in participating with schismatiks, whom the pope hath excommunicat, he draweth to himselfe the spot and leprosie of like excommunication. Wherefore, séeing he (contrarie to the popes expresse commandement and ours, being charged vnder paine of excommunication to the contrarie) toke vpon him the deanerie of Salisburie, we haue denounced him, and hold him excommunicat, and al his doings we disanull by the authoritie of the eight synod, saying; If any man either priuilie or appertlie shall speake, or communicat with him that is excommunicated, he draweth vnto himselfe the punishment of like excommunication. And now, forsomuch as you brother (bishop of London) which ought to know that saying of Gregorie the seuenth; If any bishop shall consent to the fornication of priests, deacons, &c: within his precinct, for reward, fauor, or petition, or doth not by authoritie of his office correct the vice, let him bee suspended from his office. And againe that saying of pope Leo, which is this: If any bishop shall institute or consecrat such a priest as shall be vnmeet and vnconuenient, if hée scape with the losse of his owne proper dignitie, yet he shall lose the power of instituting any more, &c.

Digitized by Google

This John was called a schismatike, because he tooke part with Reginald archbishop of Cullen and the emperour against Alexander the pope.

Diuers waies of excommunication.

The councell speaketh of such which be worthily excommunicated.

This Gregorie otherwise called Hildebrand was he that first tooke away priests mariage, condemning all priests for fornicators which had wiues.

Therefore, forsomuch, I say, as you, knowing this, haue double wise offended against the sentence of these canons, wee command you, and in the vertue of obedience inioyne you, that if it be so; within three moneths after the receipt hereof, you will submit and offer your selfe to due correction and satisfaction to the councell of our fellow bishops, for these your so great excesses: lest others through your example run into the like offence, and we shal be constrained to proceed against you with seuerer sentence.

Finallie (in the closing vp of your letter) where ye bring in for your appellation against me, a safegard for you, which rather indéed is an hinderance to you, that we should not proceed against the inuaders of the church goods, nor against the king in like censure, as we haue done against the bishop of Salisburie (as yée say) and his deane. To this I answer: God forbid that we haue, or else should hereafter proceed or doe any thing against the king or his land, or against you or your churches, inordinatly or otherwise then is conuenient. But what if you shall exceed in the same or like transgression, as the bishop of Salisburie hath done? Thinke yée then your appellation shall helpe you from the discipline of our seueritie, that yée shall not be suspended? Marke ye diligentlie whether this bee a lawfull appeale, and what is the forme thereof. We know that euery one that appealeth, either doth it in his owne name, or in the name of another: if in his owne, either it is for some grieuance inferred alreadie, or else for that he feareth after to be inferred against him. Now concerning the first, I am sure there is no grieuance that you can complaine of as yet (God be thanked) that you haue receiued at my hand, for the which you should appeale from me: neither haue you (I trust) any cause speciall against mee so to doe. If ye doe it for feare that is to come, lest I should trouble you and your churches: consider whether this be the feare that ought to fall in constant men, or whether this bee the appeale which ought to suspend or stay our power and authoritie that wee haue vpon you and your churches. It is thought therefore of wise men (and we also iudge no lesse) your appeale to be of no force.

Clements decree.

Diuers waies of excommunication.

Discussing of a true appellation.

The forme of a true appellation.

First, for that it hath not the right forme of a perfect appellation, and also because it is not consonant to reason, and lacketh order and helpe of the law.

Furthermore, if your appellation bee in another mans name, either it is for the king (as most like it is) or for some other. If it be for the king, then you ought first to vnderstand, that appellations are wont to be made to repell, and not to inferr iniurie: or to release such as be oppressed, that they should not be oppressed any more.

Wherefore, if any man shall enter any appellation (not trusting to the suretie of his cause, but to delay the time, that sentence be not giuen vpon him) that appellation is not to be receiued. For what state will there be of the church, if the liberty thereof being taken away, the goods of the church spoiled, the bishops driuen from their places, or at least not receiued with full restitution of their goods, the inuaders and spoilers thereof may defend themselues by appealing, thereby to saue themselues from the penaltie of their desert?

What a ruine of the church wil this be? Sée what ye haue done, and what ye say. Bée you not the vicars of Christ representing him in earth? Is it not your office to correct and bridle ill doers, whereby they may ceale to persecute the church? And is it not inough for them to be fierce and to rage against the church, but that you should take their part, setting your selues against vs, to the destruction of the church? Who euer heard of so monstrous doings? Thus it shall be heard and said of all nations and countries, that the suffragans of the church of Canturburie (which ought to stand with their metropolitan vnto death in defence of the church) now go about by the kings commandement so much as in them doth lie, to suspend his authoritie, lest he should exercise his discipline of correction vpon them that rebell against the church. This one thing I know, that you cannot sustaine two sorts of persons at once, both to be the appeale makers, and to be appealed vp your selues. You be they which haue made the appellation, and you be they against whom the appellation is made. Is there any more churches then one, and the bodie of the same? And how meet were it then, that you being the members of the church should hold together with the head thereof? I am afraid, brethren, lest it may be said of vs: These be the priests which haue said, Where is the Lord? and hauing the law do not know the law. Furthermore, this I suppose you (being discréet men) are not ignorant of, that such as enter any appellation there, are not wont to be heard, vnlesse the matter of their appellation either belongeth to themselues, or except speciall commandement force them thereunto, or else vnlesse they take another mans cause vpon them. First, that it belongeth nothing vnto you, it is plaine: for so much as the contrarie rather pertaineth vnto your dutie; that is, to punish and to correct all such as rebel against the church. And if he which subuerteth the liberty of the church, and inuadeth the goods thereof (conuerting them to his owne vse) bee not heard appealing for his owne defence, much lesse is another to be heard appealing for him. Wherefore, as in this case neither he can appeale for himselfe, nor yet command you so to do, so neither may you receiue the commandement to appeale for him.

One person cannot both bee the appealemaker and the partie appealed.

Thirdly, as touching the taking of another mans cause or businesse vpon you: to this I say and affirme: that ye ought in no manner of wise so to doe, specially séeing the matter pertaineth to the oppression of the church, and whereupon insueth great damage to the same.

Wherefore, séeing it neither appertaineth to you, neither ought ye to receiue any such commandement, nor yet to take vpon you any such cause as that is, your appeale is neither to be heard, nor standeth with any law. Is this the deuotion and consolation of brotherly loue which you exhibit to your metropolitan, being for you in exile? God forgiue you this clemencie. And how now? Will ye looke for your letters and messengers to be gentlie receiued heere of vs? Neither doe I speake this, as though there were any thing in hand betwixt your part and ours; or that we haue done any thing inordinatly against the person of the king, or against his land, or against the persons of the church, or intend (by Gods mercie) so to doe. And therefore we say briefle and affirme constantlie, that our lord the king cannot complaine of any wrong or iniurie to be done vnto him, if he (being often called vpon by letters and messengers to acknowledge his fault, neither will confesse his trespasse, nor yet come to any satisfaction for the same) haue the censure of seueritie by the pope and vs laid vpon him: for no man can say that he vniustlie is intreated, whom the law doth iustlie punish. And briefle to conclude, know you this for certain, that extortioners, inuaders, detainers of the church goods, and subuerters of the liberties thereof, neither haue any authoritie of the law to maintaine them, neither doth their appealing defend them, &c.

Though the popes law will not defend them yet the law of the scripture will and doth.

A briefe censure vpon the former rescript of Becket to his suffragans, in the page before, with a generall resolution of the reasons there- in contained.

IF the king of England had been an idolater, couetous, an adulterer, an incest, a murtherer, with such like: then the zeale of this archbishop (threatning the king & such as took his part) had deserued praise in this epistle, and the scripture would haue borne him out therin. For these and such causes should bishops prosecute the authoritie of the gospell against all persons. But the matter standing onlie vpon church goods, libertie (or rather licentiousnesse of priests) making of deanes, titles of churches, superioritie, of crowning the king, with such other: to stand so stiffe in these, is not to defend the church; but to rebell against the king. Againe, if the principles which he here groundeth vpon, were true; to wit that the pope were to be obeyed before princes, that the libertie of the church standeth vpon the immunitie of priests exempted from princes lawes, or vpon ample possessions of the church; or that the popes law ought to preuaile preuaile in all forren countries, and to bind all princes in their owne dominions, or that the sentence of the pope and his popelings (how or by what affection soeuer it is pronounced) may stand by the vndoubted sentence of God: then all the arguments of this epistle doe proceed and conclude well. But if they stand not ratified vpon Gods word, but tottering vpon mans traditions: then whatsoeuer he inferreth or concludeth thereupon (his assumpt being false) cannot be true, according to the schoole saying: One inconuenience being granted in the beginning, innumerable follow therupō. So in this epistle it hapneth, as is aboue noted; that the maior of this man is true, but the minor is cleane false, and to be denied.

Digitized by Google

The letter of Matild the empresse and mother of the king, to Thomas Becket.

The letter of the empresse to Becket.

MY lord the pope commanded mee, and vpon the forgiuenesse of my sinnes inioyned me, that I should be a mediator and meanes of peace and concord betweene my sonne and you, by reconciling of your selfe to him, whereunto (as you know) you requested mee. Wherefore, the earnester and with more affection (as well for the diuine honor as for holy church) I tooke the enterprise vpon mee. But this by the way I assure you, that the king, his barons, and counsel, taketh it grieuously; that you, whom he intirelie loued, honored, and made chiefest in all his realme, to the intent to haue more comfort and better trust in you, should thus (as the report is) rebel, and stir his people against him. Yea and further, that as much as in you lieth, you went about to disherit him, and depriue him of his crowne. Vpon the occasion whereof, I sent vnto you our trustie and familiar seruant Laurence archdeacon, by whom I pray you that I may vnderstand your mind herein, and good will toward my sonne: and how you meane to behaue your self (if my prayer and petition may bee heard of him in your behalfe) toward his grace. But this one thing I assure you of, that vnlesse it bee through your great humilitie and moderation, euidently in you appearing, you cannot obtaine the fauour of the king. Herein what you meane to doe, I pray you send mee word by your proper letters and messengers.

Anno 1169

But to proceede further in the order of the historie. After these letters sent to and fro, the yeere of our Lord 1169. which was the fifteenth yeere of the raigne of king Henrie the second, the king misdoubting and fearing with himselfe, that the archbishop would proceed (or exceed rather) in his excommunication against his owne person (to preuent the mischiefe) made his appeale to the presence of the pope, requiring to haue certaine legats sent downe from Rome from the popes side, to take vp the matter betweene the archbishop and him; requiring moreouer that they might also be absolued that were interdicted. Whereupon two cardinals, being sent from Alexander the pope with letters to the king, came to Normandie: where they appointed the archbishop to meet them before the king vpon saint Martins day. But the archbishop, neither agreeing with the day nor the place, delayed his comming till the eight day after, neither would any further goe then to Gisortium, where the two cardinals and the archbishop with other bishops conuenting together, had a certaine intreatie of peace and reconciliation, but came to no conclusion. The contents of which intreatie or action, because it is sufficientlie contained in the cardinals letters, who were called Gulielmus and Otho, written to the pope, it shall require no further labour, but to shew out the words of the letter, where the summe of the whole may appeare. The words of the letter be these.

The copie of the epistle written and sent by two cardinals to the pope, concerning the matter of the archbishop Becket.

WIlliam and Otho, cardinals of the church of Rome, to Alexander the pope, &c. Comming to the land of the king of England, we found the controuersie betwixt him and the archbishop of Canturburie more sharpe and vehement then we would. For the king and the greater part of them about him said, that the archbishop had stirred vp the French king grieuouslie against him, and also the earle of Flanders his kinsman (who bare no displeasure to him before) he made his open aduersarie, readie to war against him, as is by diuers euidences most certaine. Thus when we came to Cadomus first to the kings speech, we gaue the letters of your fatherhood to his hands: which after that he had receiued and considered (bringing forth withall other letters receiued from you before, something diuers and altering from these which hee receiued of vs) was moued and stirred with no little indignation, saying: that the archbishop after our departure from you, had receiued of you other contrary letters, by the vertue whereof he was exempted from our iudgement, so that he should not be compelled to answer vs. Moreouer, the said king to vs added and affirmed, and so did the bishops there present, testifying the same, that concerning the old and ancient customs of his progenitors (whereof complaint was made to you) all that for the most part was false and vntrue which was intimat to you; offering further to vs, that if there were any such customs or lawes in his time, that seemed preiudiciall or disagreeable to the statutes of the church, hee would willingly be content to reuoke and disanull the same. Wherupon we with other archbishops, bishops, and abbats of the land, hearing the king so reasonable, labored by all the meanes we might, that the king should not vtterlie breake from vs, but rather should incline to vs to haue the matter brought before vs betwixt him and the forenamed archbishop. By reason whereof, we directed out our owne chapletns with letters vnto him, appointing him both time and place where safelie he might meet with vs in the feast of S. Martine. Neuertheless, he pretending certaine excuses, made his dilatories, driuing off the time from the day of S. Martin to the octaues following, which thing stirred the kings heart more then is to be thought.

A communication betweene Becket and the cardinals.

Thus, although wee offered to the archbishop safe comming, yet when hee refused to meet vs in the borders of the king: we to satisfie his mind, condescended to meet him within the land of the French king, in the place where he himselfe appointed, because there should bee no let in vs whereby to stop his profit. After we had entred communication, we began to exhort him all that wee could, to submit and humble himselfe to his soueraigne and king, who had heaped him with such benefits and dignities: whereby matter might bee giuen vs to further occasion of reconciling them together. Hee being thus moued and exhorted by vs, departed aside to consult with his counsell vpon the matter. At length after counsell taken, hee commeth againe answering in this manner; that hee would submit and humble himselfe to the king, Saluo honore Dei, & ecclesiæ libertate, salua etiam honestate personæ suæ & possessionibus ecclesiarum: & amplius, sua & suorum in omnibus salua iustitia, &c. That is: Sauing the honor of God, and libertie of the church, sauing also the honestie of his person, and possessions of churches: and moreouer, sauing the iustice of him and of all his in all things, &c. After which communication had amongst vs, we moued and required him more instantly, that he would come to the specialties, when as yet he had brought nothing in, either which was certaine or particular. Likewise we demanded of him, if hee would in all such things contained and comprehended in our letters, stand and submit himselfe to our letters, so as the king and the bishops before were contented to doe. To the which he answering againe, said: that he had receiued from you a commandement, not to answer before he and all his were restored full to all their possessions; and then he would so proceed in the matter, according as hee should receiue commandement from the see apostolicall.

Becket's addition.

Thus we breaking off communication, seeing that he neither would stand to iudgement, nor come to conformitie, thought to make relation thereof to the king, and so did: declaring that which he had expressed to vs: yet not vttering all, but keeping backe a great part of that which we had heard and seene. Which when the king and his nobles had vnderstanding of, affirmed to vs againe: that hee therein was cleared so much the more, for that the archbishop would not stand to their iudgement, nor abide their triall. After much heauinesse and lamentation of the king, the archbishop, bishops, and abbats of the realme requiring of vs, whether we had any such power by vertue of our commission, to withstand him and proceed against him; and perceiuing that our authoritie would not serue thereunto, and fearing lest the foresaid archbishop, refusing all order of iudgement, would worke againe disquietnesse to some noble personages of the realme; and seeing our authority could not extend so far to helpe them against him (taking a consultation among themselues) agreed together with one assent, to make their appellation to your audience, prefixing accordingly the terme of their appeale.

Becket would neither stand to iudgement nor triall.

¶ And this is the epistle of these two cardinals sent to the pope: wherein may sufficiently appeare all the discourse and manner of that assemblie (although particularlie euery thing not expressed) concerning the talke betwixt the cardinals and the archbishop. As when that William (who of the two cardinals was the more eloquent) amongst other communication had, reasoned long with him as concerning the peace of the church: which Becket said he preferred aboue all things. Well then (saith the cardinall) seeing all this contention betweene the king and you, riseth vpon certaine lawes and customs to be abrogat, and that you regard the peace of the church so much: then what say you: Will you renounce your bishoprike, and the king shall renounce his customs: The peace of the church now lieth in your hands, either to retaine or to let goe; what say you: To whom he answereth againe, that the proposition was not like. For I, saith hee, (sauing the honour of my church and my person) cannot renounce my bishoprike. Contrarie, it standeth the king vpon, for his soules health and honour, to renounce these his ordinances and customs. Which thing he thus prooued; because the pope had condemned those customs, and he likewise with the church of Rome had done the same, &c.

Becket louëth better his bishoprike then the peace of the church, for all his gaie talke.

Wecket stirring vp the French king against the king of England.

The

The talke betweene the French king, the king of England, and Becket.

AFter the cardinals were returned, the French king seeing the king of England disquieted and solicitous to haue peace (or at least wise pretending to set an agreement betweene them) brought the matter to a communication among them. In which communication the French king made himselfe as umpire betweene them. The king of England hearing that the archbishop would commit himselfe to his arbitrement, was the more willing to admit his presence. Whereupon, many being there present, the archbishop prostrating himselfe at the kings feet, declared vnto him kneeling vpon his knees, that he would commit the whole cause, whereof the dissension rose betweene them, vnto his owne arbitrement; adding thereto (as he did before) Saluo honore Dei: That is; Sauing the honor of God. The king, who (as is said before) being greatly offended at this word, hearing and seeing the stiffenesse of the man sticking so much to this word Saluo honore, &c. was highlie therwith displeased, rebuking him with many grieuous words as a man proud and stubborne, and also charging him with sundry and great benefits bestowed vpon him, as a person vnkind and forgetting what he had so gently done and bestowed vpon him.

Becket commeth in with his old addition, Saluo honore Dei.

Becket charged with vnkindnesse.

And speaking to the French king there present: See sir (if it please you, saith the king of England) what soeuer displeaseth this man, that hee saith to bee contrarie to the honour of God. And so by this meanes he will vendicat and challenge to himselfe both that is his and mine also. And yet notwithstanding, for that I will not seeme to do any thing contrarie or preiudiciall to Gods honor, this I offer him: There haue been kings in England before, both of greater and lesse puissance then I am: Likewise there haue been bishops of Canturburie many, both great and holie men: What the greatest and most holy of all his predecessors before him hath done to the least of my progenitors and predecessors before me, let him do the same to me and I am content. They that stood by, hearing these words of the king, cried all with one voice, The king hath debased himselfe enough to the bishop. The archbishop staying a little at this with silence, What (saith the French king to him) my lord archbishop, will you be better then those holy men? will ye be greater then Peter? what stand you doubting? Here now haue you peace and quietnesse put in your owne hands, if ye will take it. To this the archbishop answered againe: Truth it is (saith he) my predecessors before me were much both better and greater then I, and of them euery one for his time (although he did not extirpe and cut off all) yet something they did plucke vp and correct, which seemed aduerse and repugnant against Gods honor. For if they had taken all together away, no such occasion then had been left for any man to raise vp this fire of temptation now against vs, as is here raised to proue vs withall, that we being so proued with them, might also be crowned with them, being likewise partakers of praise and reward, as wee are of their labour and trauell. And though some of them haue been slacke, or exceeded in their dutie doing, in that wee are not bound to follow their example.

The kings offer to Becket both charitable and reasonable.

The words of the French king.

Peter, when he denied Christ, we therfore rebuke him; but when he resisted the rage of Nero, therein wee commend him. And therefore, because hee could not find in his conscience to consent vnto that he ought in no wise to dissemble, neither did he, by reason therof he lost his life. By such like oppressions the church hath alwaies grown. Our forefathers and predecessors, because they would not dissemble the name and honor of Christ, therefore they suffered. And shall I, to haue the fauour of one man, suffer the honor of Christ to be suppressed? The nobles standing by (hearing him thus speake) were greatlie grieued with him, noting in him both arrogancie and wilfulnesse, in perturbing and refusing such an honest offer of agreement. But speciallie one among the rest was most grieued, who there openlie protested: that seeing the archbishop so refused the counsell and request of both the kingdoms, he was not worthie to haue the helpe of either of them: but as the kingdome of England had reiected, so the realme of France should not receiue him.

This maior if it had been ioyned with a good minor had made a good argument.

Ex Quadrilogio

Alanus Herbertus and certain other of his chapleins that committed to storie the doings of Becket, doe record (whether truly or no I cannot say) that the French king sending for him, as one much sorrowing and lamenting the words that he had spoken, at the comming of Becket did prostrat himselfe at his feet, confessing his fault, in giuing counsell to him in such a cause (pertaining to the honor of God) to relent therein and to yeeld to the pleasure of man: wherefore declaring his repentance, hee desired to be absolued thereof. So that after this, the French king and Becket were great friends together, insomuch that king Henrie sending to the king to intreat him, and desire him that he would not support nor maintaine his enemy within his realme, the French king vtterly denied the kings request, taking part rather with the archbishop then with him.

Besides these quarels and grudges betwixt the king and the archbishop aboue mentioned, there followed yet moreouer another, which was this: Shortly after this communication recited betweene the king and Becket, the king of England returning againe from Normandie into England (which was the yeere of our Lord 1170, and the sixteenth yeere of his raigne) about Midsummer, kept his court of parliament at Westminster, in the which parliament he (through the assent both of the clergie, and the lords temporall) caused his sonne Henrie to be crowned king. Which coronation was done by the hands of Robert archbishop of Yorke, with the assistance of other bishops ministring to the same, as Gilbert of London, Joseline of Salisburie, Hugo of Durelme, and Walter of Rochester. By reason wherof Becket of Canturburie being there neither mentioned nor called for, tooke no little displeasure; and so did Ludouike the French king, hearing that Margaret his daughter was not also crowned with her husband: whereupon he gathering a great armie, forthwith marched into Normandie. But the matter was soone compassed by the king of England, who sending his son vnto him in Normandie, intreated there and concluded peace with him, promising that his sonne should be crowned againe, and then his daughter to be crowned also. But the archbishop not ceasing his displeasure and emulation, sent vnto the pope, complaining of these foure bishops, especiallie of the archbishop of Yorke, who durst be so bold in his absence and without his knowledge or his licence, to intermeddle to crowne the king, being a matter proper and peculiar to his iurisdiction. At the instance of whom the pope sent downe the sentence of excommunication against the bishop of London. The other three bishops with the archbishop of Yorke he suspended, whose sentence and letters thereof, for auoiding prolixitie, I here omit.

Anno 1170

The bishop of London excommunicated, with foure other bishops suspended.

Besides these foresaid bishops excommunicated, diuers other clerks also of the court he cited to appeare before him, by vertue of his large commission which hee gat from the pope, to whom they were bound to obay, by reason of their benefices. And some he commanded in vertue of obedience to appeare, in paine of forfetting their orders and benefices. Of which when neither sort would appeare, he cursed them openlie. And also some lay men of the court and the kings familiars, some as intruders, and violent withholders of church goods, hee accursed: as Richard Lucie, and Joseline Balliol, and Rafe Brocke which tooke bels & goods that belonged to the church of Canturburie, and Hugh Sentcleare, and Thomas the sonne of Barnard, and all that should hereafter take any church goods without his consent, so that almost all the court was accursed either by name, or as partakers.

This being done, the archbishop of Yorke with the foresaid bishops resorted to the king with a grieuous complaint, declaring how miserablie their case stood, and what they had sustained for fulfilling his commandement. The king hearing this, was highly moued, as no maruell was. But what remedie? The time of the ruine of the pope was not yet come; and what prince then might withstand the iniurious violence of that Romish potestat?

The cause of the kings wrath against Becket.

In the meane season the French king for his part, his clergie and courtiers slacke no occasion to incite and sollicit Alexander the pope against the king of England to excommunicat him also: seeking thereby and thinking to haue some vantage against the realme. Neither was the king ignorant of this, which made him more readie to apply some agreement of reconciliation. At length came downe from the pope two legats (the archbishop of Rothomage and the bishop of Nauern) with direction and full commission either to driue the king to be reconciled, or to be interdicted by the popes censures out of the church. The king vnderstanding himselfe to be in greater straits then he could auoid (at length through the mediation of the French king and of other prelats and great princes) was content to yeeld to peace & reconciliation with the archbishop, whom he receiued both to his fauour, and also permitted and granted him free returne to his church again. Concerning his possessions and lands of the church of Canturburie, although Becket made great labour therefore, yet the king (being then in Normandie) would not grant him before he should repaire to England, to see how he would there agree with his subiects.

Thus peace after a sort concluded betweene the king and him, the archbishop after six yeers of his banishment, returned to England, where he was right ioyfully receiued of the church of Canturburie, albeit of Henrie the young king he was not so greatlie welcommed. In so much that comming vp to London to the king, he was returned backe to Canturburie, and there bid to keepe his house. Roger Houeden maketh mention in his chronicle, that the archbishop (vpon Christmas day) did excommunicat Robert de Broke for cutting off the taile of a certaine horse of his the day before. In the meane time the foure bishops before mentioned, whom the archbishop had excommunicat, sent to him, humblie desiring to be released of their censure. To whom when the archbishop would not grant clearely and simplie without cautels and exceptions, they went ouer to the king, declaring vnto him and complaining of their miserable state and vncourteous handling of the archbishop. Whereupon the king conceiued great sorrow in his mind, and displeasure toward the partie. In so much that he lamented oft and sundrie times to them about him, that (among so many that he had done for) there was none that would reuenge him of his enemie. By occasion of which words, certaine that were about

Becket returneth out of banishment.

Ex Rogero Houedene.

The words of the king which were the cause of Beckets death.

Digitized by Google

about the king (to the number of foure) hearing him thus to complaine and lament, addressed themselues in great heat of hast to satisfie the grieued mind and quarell of their prince: who within foure daies after the said Christmasse day (sayling ouer into England, and hauing a forward and a prosperous wind in their iournie, being in the deepe of winter) came to Canturburie, where Becket was commanded to keepe. After certaine aduisements and consultations had among themselues, they prealed at length into the palace where the archbishop was sitting with his companie about him: first to assay him with words, to see whether he would relent to the kings mind, and come to some conformitie. They brought to him (said they) commandement from the king, which whether he had rather openlie there in presence, or secretly to be declared to him, they bad him chuse. Then the companie being bid to auoid, as he sat alone, they said, You are commanded from the king beyond the sea, to repaire to the king heere his sonne, and to doe your dutie to him, swearing to him your fidelitie for your baronage and other things, and to amend those things wherein you haue trespassed against him. Whereupon the archbishop denying to sweare, and perceiuing their intent, called in his companie againe, and in multiplying of words to and fro, at length they came to the bishops which were excommunicat for the coronation of the king, whom they commanded in the kings name hee should absolue and set free againe. The archbishop answered, that hee neither suspended nor excommunicated them, but the pope; wherefore, if that were the matter that grieued them, they should resort to the pope, hee had nothing to do with the matter.

If the papists will needs measure the successe of things by seasons and weather, then must they by that reason condemne the cause of Becket, his aduersaries hauing such forwardnesse of weather in doing their feat.

The talke betweene the foure souldiers and Thomas Becket.

Then said Reginald one of the foure; Although you in your owne person did not excommunicat them, yet through your instigation it was done. To whom the archbishop said againe; And if the pope (said he) tendring the iniuries done vnto mee & my church, wrought this reuenge for me, I confesse it offendeth me nothing. Thus then (said they) it appeareth wel by your owne words, that it pleaseth you right well (in contempt & contumelie of the kings maiestie) to sequester his bishops from their ministerie, who at the commandement of the king did seruice in the coronation of his sonne. And seeing you haue so presumed thus to stand against the exaltation of this our soueraigne, our new king, it seemeth likely that you aspired to take his crowne from him, & to be exalted king your selfe. I aspire not (said he) to the crowne and name of the king, but rather if I had foure crownes (to giue him more) I would set them all vpon him, such good will I doe beare him, that only his father the king excepted, there is none, whose honor I more tender and loue. And as concerning the sequestring of those bishops, this I giue you to vnderstand, that nothing was done in that behalfe without the knowledge & assent of the king himselfe. To whom when I had made my complaint, at the feast of Marie Magdalen, of the wrong and iniurie done to me and my church therein; he gaue me his good leaue to obtaine at the popes hand such remedie as I could, promising moreouer his helpe to mee in the same. What is this, quoth they, that thou saiest? Makest thou the king a traitor, and a betrayer of the king his owne sonne? that when hee had commanded the bishops to crowne his sonne, hee would giue thée leaue afterward to suspend them for so doing? Certes it had been better for you not to haue accused so the king of this proditio. The archbishop said to Reginald, that he was there present at that time, and heard it himselfe. But that he denied, & swore it was not so. And thinke you (say they) that wee the kings subiects will or ought to suffer this? And so approching nearer him, said he had spoken inough against his owne head: whereupon followed great exclamation and many threatning words. Then said the archbishop, I haue since my comming ouer sustained many iniuries and rebukes, concerning both my selfe, my men, my cattell, my wines, and all other goods: notwithstanding, the king (writing ouer to his sonne) required him that I should liue in safetie and peace, and now, beside all others, you come hither to threaten me. To this Reginald answering againe, said: If there be any ý worketh you any iniurie otherwise then right is, the law is open; why doe you not complaine? To whom, said Becket, should I complaine? To the young king, said they. Then said Becket, I haue complained inough if that would helpe, & haue sought for remedie at the kings hands, so long as I could bee suffered to come to his speech: but now seeing that I am stopt from that, neither can find redresse of so great vexations and iniuries as I haue and doe daily sustaine, nor can haue the benefit of the law or reason; such right and law as an archbishop may haue that will I exercise, and let for no man. At these words one of them bursting out in exclamation, cried, Hee threatneth, hee threatneth. What? will he interdict the whole realme and vs al together? Nay that he shal not, saith another, he hath interdicted too many already. And drawing more neere to him, they protested and denounced him to haue spoken words to the ieopardie of his owne head. And so departing in great furie, and many high words, rushed out of the doores; who by the way returning to the monks, charged them in the kings name to keep him forth comming, that he should not escape away. What, quoth the archbishop, think ye I will flée away? Nay, neither for the king, nor any man aliue, will I stir one foot from you. No, say they, thou shalt not auoid, though thou wouldest. And so they departing with many words, the archbishop followeth them out of the chamber doore, crying after them, Heere, heere, heere shall you find me; laying his hand vpon his crowne.

The stout heart of Becket.

The names of these foure souldiers aboue mentioned were these, the first Reginald Bereson, the second Hugh Morteuill, the third William Thracie, and the fourth Richard Brito; who going to harnesse themselues, returned the same day againe: but finding the hall doore of the palace of Canturburie shut against them, they went to an inward backe doore leading into the orchard, there brake they vp a windowe and opened the doore, and so issued into the place. The monks (being about euensong time) had got the archbishop into the church; who being perswaded by them, caused his crosse to be borne before him, & so through the cloister, by a doore which was broken vp for him, proceeded into the quire. The harnesse men following after, at length came to the church doore, which doore the monks would haue shut against them: but as the storie saith, the archbishop would not suffer them. So they approching into the church, and the archbishop meeting them vpon the staires, there was slaine, euery one of the foure souldiers striking him with his sword into the head; who afterward flying into the north, at length with much ado obtaining their pardon of the pope by the kings procurement, as some stories record, went to Jerusalem.

Anno 1171

The death of Thomas Becket.

¶ Thus you haue heard the life and death of this Thomas Becket, of whom what is to be iudged, let his owne acts and facts declare. And albeit the scripture ought to bee onlie the rule to vs to iudge all things by, yet if any shall require further testimonie, partlie to satisfie their minds therein, yee shall heare the iudgements of certaine men, in yeeres and times almost as ancient as himselfe, what they write & affirme of him.

What is to be thought or iudged of Thomas Becket.

And first to begin with the testimonie of one of his owne religion, and also not far (as it appeareth) from his owne time, who writing of his martyrdome and miracles, thus testifieth of the iudgement and sentence of diuers concerning his promotion and behauiour. The chronicle being written in Latine, and hauing the name of the author cut out, thus beginneth: Quoniam verò multi, &c. And in the first booke and eight chapter it followeth in this maner: Nonnullis tamen idcirco promotionem eius, visum est minùs canonicā, quòd ad eam magis operata est regis instātia, quā cleri vel populi vota. Præsumptionis quoque vel indiscretionis fuisse notatum est, quòd qui remum tenere vix idoneus videbatur, primum gubernaculi locum suscepit, &c. Et mox: Magis etiam secularia tum sapiens, tum sanctum tantæ dignitatis fastigium non horrens tenuisse, sed vltroneus ascendisse creditus. Aliter Dei amicus Moses, &c. With much more as in Latine insueth, which for the English reader heere followeth translated. Diuers notwithstanding there be, which as touching his promotion, suppose the same not to be canonicall. For that it was wrought rather by the instance of the king (thinking him to bee a man readie and inclinable to his vtilitie) then by the assent either of the clergie or of the people. Further it is noted in him for a point of presumption, and lacke of discretion, for that he being scarse worthie to take the ore in hand and play the boteswane, would take vpon him to sit at ý helme, and guide the ship: namely in that church, where the couent being in gesture and vesture religious, be wont to haue their prelat taken out of the same profession. Where as he, scant bearing the habit of a clerke, and going in his changes and soft apparell, is more conuersant among the delicat rufflers in the court, sauoring rather of worldly things, not refusing moreouer without any dread, to clime vp to the high preferment of such an holie dignitie, but rather willinglie of his owne accord to aspire it. Moses we read did otherwise, who being the friend of God, and sent of him to conduct his people Israel out of Egypt, trembled at the message, and said: Who am I Lord, that I should go to Pharao, and bring thy people Israel out of Egypt? And againe, I pray thee (saith he) O Lord, I am nothing eloquent, send him whom thou wilt send. Likewise Ieremias also being sent of the Lord to prophesie against Ierusalem, was abashed to take the office vpon him, answering againe with much dread of heart; A, a, a, Lord, I cannot vtter my mind, for I am a child.

What is to be thought, whether Thomas Becket died a saint or not.

The promotion of Becket iudged not canonicall.

Becket charged with presumption and lacke of discretion.

Ambition noted in Becket, in not refusing but taking his promotion.

After like manner we read of the saints of the new testament, whereof many were preferred oftentimes to their bishoprikes and functions of the church by meere forcement and compulsion rather of others then by their owne wils. So was blessed Gregorie after his flight & going away, brought backe againe, and placed in the see and chaire of Rome. Likewise S. Ambrose sore against his mind, who also of purpose accusing & confessing his owne defects, because he would be repealed: yet by the commandement of Valentinian the emperour was inforced to take the burthen vpon him, which he could by no wise shake off. S. Martin in like sort vnknowing of any such matter, was circumuented by a certaine godly traine and wile of the citizens, before hee could be brought to his consecration, which hee did not so much take, as he was thrust into it with much pensiuenesse and sorrow of heart. By these and such other examples this chancellor likewise should haue rather excused himselfe as vnworthie and vnmeet for that rome, shewing ing himselfe more willing to refuse then to take it. To the which this archbishop is iudged to doe cleane contrary, &c. Hæc ex chronico, cui titulus, De passione & miraculis beati Thomæ.

Bishops against their wils thrust into their bishoprikes.

And although scarslie any testimony is to be taken of that age (being all blinded and corrupted with superstition) yet let vs heare what Neuburgensis an ancient historiographer saith, who in the daies of the sonne of this king Henrie the second, prosecuting his historie vnto king Richard the first, hath these words, writing of Thomas Becket: Sanè cùm plerique soleant in his quos amat & laudant affectu quodam propensiori, sed prudentia parciori, quicquid ab eis geritur, approbare: planè ego in viro illo venerabili ea quæ ita ab ipso acta sunt, quũ nulla exindè proueniret vtilitas sed feruor tantum accenderetur regius, ex quo tot mala postmodum pullulasse noscuntur, laudanda nequaquam censuerim, licèt ex laudabili zelo processerint: sicut in beatissimo apostolorũ principe, quòd gentes suo exemplo iudaizare coegit: in quo eum doctor gentium reprehensibilem declarat fuisse, licèt eum constet laudabili hoc pietate fecisse, &c. That is in English.

Ex chronico Neuburgensis.

Acta Becketi improbata.

Wheras many be wont, in them whom they loue or praise (iudging them more by affection then prudence) to allow and approoue whatsoeuer they do, yet for me to iudge vpon this reuerend man, verely I thinke not his doings and acts to be praise worthie, or to be allowed; forsomuch as thereof came no vtilitie but onely the anger and stirring vp of the king: whereupon afterward sprung so great mischiefes (although the thing that he did, might proceed of a certaine laudable zeale:) like as in the blessed prince of the apostles, in that he taught the gentils by his example to play the Iewes, Paul the doctour of the gentils did declare him therein to be rebukeable, albeit it cannot be denied, but that he did it of a good affection, &c.

And in the same author, in another place it followeth to the like effect, in these words: Litteras has in Angliam ad suspensionem episcoporum præmissas ipse sequebatur, zelo iustitiæ feruidus; verùm an plenè secundum scientiã nouit Deus. Nostræ enim paruitati nequaquam conceditur, de tanti viri actibus temerè iudicare. Puto enim quòd in molli adhuc teneráque regis concordia minus prouidè egisset, & ea quæ sine fidei christianæ periculo tolerari potuissent, ratione temporis & compensatione pacis dissimulanda dixisset, iuxta illud propheticum: Prudens in tempore illo tacebit, quia tempus malum est. Itáque, quòd à venerabili pontifice tunc actum est, nec laudandum esse iudico, nec vituperare præsumo: sed dico, si vel modicè in huiusmodi a sancto viro per zeli immoderatiorem impetũ est excessum, hoc ipsum est sacræ, quæ consecuta noscitur, igne passionis excoctũ. Ita quippe sancti viri vel amandi vel laudandi sunt a nobis, qui nos illis longè impares esse cognoscimus, vt ea, in quibus homines fuerunt, vel fuisse noscuntur, nequaquam vel amemus vel laudemus: sed ea tantùm, in quibus eos sine scrupulo imitari debemus. Quis enim eos dicat in omnibus, quæ ab ipsis fiant, esse imitabiles? Non igitur in omnibus, quæ faciũt, sed sapienter & cautè debent laudari, vt sua Deo prærogatiua seruetur, in cuius vtique laudibus nemo potest esse nimius, quantumcunq; laudare conetur, &c. That is in English.

The letters which were sent before for the suspending of the bishops, he pursued with burning zeale of iustice; but whether according to knowledge God knoweth it. It is not for my rude and slender wit to iudge of the doings of such a person. But yet this I suppose: that he did not behaue himselfe so circumspectlie as he ought (considering the time;) and that the concord betweene him and the king as yet was but soft and tender. Who for the consideration of the time, and for the recompence of peace, might haue forborne or dissembled such things, which without any perill of christian religion might be tolerat well enough, according to the propheticall saying: A wise man in his time will keepe silence, because the time will not serue him. Wherefore, as the doings of that reuerend prelat I iudge in that behalfe not to be commended, so neither doe I presume to discommend them. But this I say, that if that holy man through immoderat violence of zeale, did exceed in a part therein, the same was excocted againe and purged by the fire of his suffring, which afterward insued. And so far holie men are to be loued or praised of vs, which know our selues much inferior to their vertues; that in such things wherein they haue been men, and also knowne to bee men, therein wee neither hold with them nor commend them: but onely such things wherin without al danger or scruple we ought to imitate them. For who is able to say, that they are to be imitated in all that they doe? and therefore are not to be esteemed and praised in all things generallie whatsoeuer they doe, but consideratelie and with aduisement, wherein they deserue praise, so that the onelie prerogatiue in this behalfe be reserued to God, in whose praise no man can exceed, how feruent soeuer hee bee in his praising, &c.

And heare yet more what the said author writeth in the same cause of the kings wrath and Beckets faults: Plusquam centum homicidia à clericis commissa sub Henrico secũdo dicuntur. In quibus plectendis rex aliquanto vehementior. Sed huius immoderationis regiæ, nostri temporis episcopos tantum respicit culpa, quantum ab eis processit & causa. Cùm enim sacri præcipiunt canones, clericos non solùm facinorosos & grauioribus irretitos criminibus, verùm etiam leuiorũ criminum reos degradari, & tot millia talium, tanquã innumeras inter pauca grana paleas ecclesia Anglicana contineat, tamẽ quàm paucos a multis retrò annis clericos in Anglia contigit officio priuari. Nempe episcopi dum defendendis magis clericorũ libertatibus vel dignitatibus, quàm eorum vitijs corrigẽdis resecandisque inuigilant; arbitrantur obsequiũ se præstare Deo & ecclesiæ, si facinorosos clericos, quos pro officij debito canonicæ vigore censuræ coercere debeant, cõtrà publicam tueantur disciplinã. Vndè clerici, qui in sortem Domini vocati, tanquã stellæ in firmamento cœli positæ, vita & verbo lucere deberent super terram, habentes pro impunitate agendi quodcũque libuerit, licentiam & libertatem, neq; Deum, cuius iudicium tardare videtur, neque homines potestatem habentes reuerentur, cùm & episcopalis circa eos solicitudo sit languida, & seculari eos iurisdictione sacri eximat ordinis prærogatiua. In English.

More then an hundred murthers are said to be committed by the clergie vnder king Henrie the second: in punishing of whom the king was somewhat too vehement. But the fault, saith he, of this immoderat dealing of the king resteth most in the bishops of our time, forsomuch as the cause thereof proceedeth of them. For where it is decreed and commanded by the canon law (concerning the spiritual men of the clergy) that not onely such as bee notorious, but such as be spotted with lighter crimes should be degraded, whereof haue wee so many thousands and whole swarmes of such now in England, as innumerable chaffe among the little good graine; and yet how few do we see these many yeeres in England depriued of their office? For why? the bishops while they labour more to maintaine the liberties and dignities of churchmen, then to correct their vices, thinke they do God and the church great seruice, if they rescue and defend the enormities of the churchmen against publik discipline, whom they ought rather to punish by the vertue of the censure ecclesiasticall. Whereupon the churchmen, such as be sorted peculiarly to the Lord, and ought like stars to shine in earth by word and example, taking licence and libertie to doe what they lust, neither reuerence God (whose iudgement seemeth to tarrie) neither men set in authoritie: when as both the bishops are slacke in their charge doing, and also the prerogatiue of their order exempteth them from the secular iurisdiction, &c. And thus much out of Neuburgensis.

To this matter also pertaine the words of Cesarius the monke in his eight booke of dialogues and sixty nunth chapter, about the eight and fortie yeere after the death of Thomas Becket, which was the yeere of God 1220. whose words in sum come to this effect: Quæstio Parisiis inter magistros ventilata fuit, vtrum damnatus an saluatus esset ille Thomas. Dixerat Rogerius tunc Normanus, fuisse illum morte ac damnatione dignum, quòd contumax esset in Dei ministrum regem. Protulit contrà Petrus Cantor Parisiensis, quòd signa saluationis & magnæ sanctitatis essent eius miracula: & quòd martyrium probasset ecclesiæ causa, pro qua mortem subierat, &c. In English.

Ex Cesario monacho lib. 8. dialo. cap. 69.

Whether Thomas Becket be saued or damned.

There was a question mooued among the masters of Paris, whether Thomas Becket was saued or damned. To this question answereth Roger a Norman, that hee was worthie death and damnation, for that he was so obstinat against Gods minister his king. Contrary, Peter Cantor a Parisian disputed, saying and affirming, that his miracles were great signes and tokens of saluation, and also of great holinesse in that man: affirming moreouer, that the cause of the church did allow and confirme his martyrdome, for the which church he died, &c.

If God in these latter daies giueth no miracles to glorifie his owne sonne: much lesse will he giue miracles to glorifie Thomas Becket.

And thus haue ye the iudgement and censure of the whole of Paris touching this question, for the sanctity of Thomas Becket. In which iudgement for so much as the greatest argument resteth in the miracles wrought by him after his death; let vs therefore pause a little vpon the same, to trie and examin these his miracles. In the triall whereof we shall find one of these two to be true, that either if they were true, that they were wrought not by God, but by a contrarie spirit, of whom Christ our Lord giueth vs warning in his gospell, saying; Whose comming shall be with lying signes and wonders, to deceiue if it were possible the elect, Matth. 24. or else wee shall find that no such were euer wrought at all, but fained and forged of idle monks and religious bellies, for the exaltation of their churches, & profit of their pouches, which thing indeed seemeth rather to be true, and no lesse may appeare by the miracles themselues, set forth by one of his owne monks, and of his owne time, who in fiue solemne books hath comprehended all the reuelations, vertues and miracles of the archbishop, the which books (as yet remaining in the hands of William Stephanson citizen of London) I haue seene and perused, wherein is contained the whole sum of all his miracles, to the number of 270. being so far off from all truth and reason, some ridiculous, some monstrous, vaine, absurd, some also blasphemous, and some so impudent, that not onelie they deserue no credit, (altogether sauoring of meere forgerie) but also for very shame will abash an honest pen to write of them. First, if miracles serue for necessitie and for infidels, what cause or necessitie was there (in a christian realme hauing the word of God) for God to worke such miracles after his death, who neuer wrought any in all his life? Then to consider the end of these miracles, whither doe they tend, but only to bring men to Canturbury, with their vowes and offrings to inrich the couent?

Liber de miraculis b. Thomæ, autore monacho quodam Cantuar.

Miracles of Becket considered.

Beside the number of these miracles, which be said to be so many that they lose their owne credit; what disease is there belonging longing to man or woman, in the curing whereof some miracle hath not been wrought by this δαιμόνιον; as feuers, fistula, the gout, toothach, palsie, consumption, falling sicknesse, leprosie, headach, broken armes, maimed legs, swelling throtes, the raising vp of the dead which haue been two daies departed, with infinite others. And as all these haue been healed (for the most part) by one kind of salue (as a certaine Panacea) which was, with the water onely of Canturburie, like as a cunning smith which would open with one key all maner of locks; so againe in reading of the storie of these miracles ye shall find the matter so conueied, that the power of this dead saint was neuer twice shewed on any one disease, but euery diuers disease to haue a diuers miracle.

Aqua Cantuariensis.

To recite in order all these prodigious reuelations and fantasticall miracles, fallie imagined and ascribed to this archbishop, were nothing else but to write a legend of lies, and to occupie the people with trifles. Which because it pertaineth rather to the idle profession of such dreaming monks and cloisterers, that haue nothing else to maintaine that religion withall: I will not take their profession out of their hands. Wherefore to omit all such vaine and lying apparitions and miracles, as how this angrie saint (three daies after his death) appeared by vision at the altar in his pontificalibus, commanding the quire not to sing, but to say this office of his masse: Exurge, quare obdormis Domine, &c. Which vision the author himselfe of the booke doth say he did see. To omit also the blasphemous lie, how in an other vision the said archbishop should say, that his blood did crie out of the earth to God, more then the blood of iust Abel. Item, in another vision it was shewed a monke of Lewis, how S. Thomas had his place in heauen appointed with the apostles, aboue Stephan, Laurence, Vincent, and all the other martyrs. Whereof this cause is rendred, for that S. Stephan, Laurence, and such others, suffered onely for their owne cause, but this Thomas suffred for the vniuersall church. Item, how it was shewed to a certaine yong man (Dunus by name) twelue yeares before the death of this Becket, that among the apostles and martyrs in heauen there was a vacant place left for a certaine priest, as he said, of England, which was credible supposed to be this Thomas Becket. Item, how a certaine knights sonne being two daies dead, was reuiued againe so sone as he had the water of Canturbury put in his mouth, and had by his parents foure pieces of siluer bended, to be offered in Canturburie in the childs behalfe. All these, I say, with such other like to omit (the number whereof commeth to an infinite varietie) onely this one storie or an other that followeth shall suffice to expresse the vanitie & impudent forgery of all the rest.

Singing at the masse forbidden by Thomas Becket after his death.

A blasphemous lie.

Becket aboue the martyrs in heauen.

A place prepared in heauen for Becket twelue yeares before his death.

In the fourth booke of this fabulous author, and in the third chapter, a miracle is there contained of a certaine countriman of Bedfordshire in kings Wellon, whose name was Eilwardus, which Eilwardus in his drunkennes bursting into another mans house which was his debter, tooke out of his house a great whetstone, & a paire of hedging gloues. The other partie seeing this value not sufficient for his condemnation (by the counsell of the towneclerke) entred an action of felonie against him for other things besides, as for stealing his wimble, his axe, his net, and other clothes. Whereupon Eilwardus being had to the gaole of Bedford, and afterward condemned for the same, was iudged to haue both his eyes put out, and also those members cut off which nature with secret shame hath couered. Which punishment by the malice of his aduersarie being executed vpon him, hee lying in great danger of death by bleeding, was counselled to make his prayer to this Thomas of Canturburie. Which done (saith ỳ miracle) there appeared one to him by night, in white apparell, bidding him to watch and pray, and put his trust in God and our ladie, and holy S. Thomas. In conclusion, the miracle thus fell out: The nert day at euening the man rubbing his eye lids, began to feele his eyes to be restored againe: first in a little, after in a greater measure, so that one was of a gray colour, the other was of blacke; and here was one miracle rung. After this followed an other miracle also vpon the same person: for going but the space of foure miles, when his eyes were restored, hee chanced (in like maner) to rub the place where his secret parts were cut off, and immediately on the same his Pendenda (to vse the words of my storie) were to him restored, Principio parua quidem valdè, sed in maius proficientia, which he permitted euery one to feele that would, and shamed not to denie. In so much that hee comming vp to S. Thomas, first at London was receiued with ioy of the bishop of Durham, who then sending to the burgers of Bedford for the truth of the matter, receiued from them againe letters testimoniall, wherein the cittizens there (saith this fabulous festiuall) confirmed first to the bishop, then to the conuent of Canturbury, the relation of this to be as hath been told. This one miracle (gentle reader) so shameles and impudent, I thought here to expresse, that by this one thou mightest iudge of all the residue of all his miracles (and by the residue therof mightst iudge moreouer of all the filthie wickednesse of all these lying monks and cloisterers, which count it a light sport so impudentlie to deceiue the simple soules of Christs church with trifling lies and dreaming fables. Wherfore (as I said) if the holy sainting of Thomas Becket standeth vpon no other thing but vpon his miracles, what credit is to be giuen thereto: and vpon what a

An impudent and a lying miracle.

Ex historia monachi Cant. de miraculis b. Thomæ.

A blasphemous vision.

A false and impudent miracle.

weake ground his shrine so long hath stood, by this may easilie be seene. Furthermore, an other fable as notable as this, and no lesse worthie of the whetstone, we reade in the storie of Geruasius: That Thomas Becket appearing to a certaine priest, named Thomas, declared to him that hee had so brought to passe, that all the names of the monks of the church of Canturburie with the names of the priests and clerks, and with the families belonging to that citie and church of Canturburie, were written in the booke of life. Ex Geruas. fol. 6.

But whatsoeuer is to be thought of his miracles, or howsoeuer the testimony of the schole of Paris, or of these ancient times went with him or against him: certaine it is, that this antheme or collect lately collected and primered in his praise, is blasphemous, and derogateth from the praise of him to whom all praise only and honor is due, where it is said:

Tu per Thomæ sanguinem, quem pro te impendit,
Fac nos Christe scandere, quò Thomas ascendit. That is:
For the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend,
Grant vs (Christ) to clime, where Thomas did ascend.

The blasphemous anthem of Thomas Becket.

Wherein is a double lie contained: first, that hee died for Christ; secondly, that if he had so done, yet that his bloud could purchase heauen. Which thing neither Paul nor any of the apostles durst euer challenge to themselues: for if any mans blood could bring vs to heauen, then the blood of Christ was shed in vaine.

And thus much touching the testimonie or censure of certaine ancient times concerning the cause of Thomas Becket. In the explication of whose historie I haue stood now the longer (exceeding peraduenture in ouermuch prolixitie) to the intent that his cause being fully opened to the world, & duely weighed on euery part, mens minds (thereby long deceiued by ignorance) might come vnto the more perfect certainetie of ỳ truth thecof, & therby to iudge more surely what is to be receiued, and what to bee refused. Where by the way is to bee noted out of the testimonie of Rob. Crikeladensis, which in him I find: that the peeres & nobles of this land neere about the king, gaue out in strait charge vpon paine of death and confiscating of all their goods, no man to be so hardie to name Tomas Becket to be a martyr, or to preach of his miracles, &c: Ex Crikeladensi.

After the death of Thomas Becket, the king fearing the popes wrath and curse to be laid vpon him (whereunto Ludouike ỳ French king also helped what he could to set the matter forward) sent to Rome the archbishop of Rothomage, with certaine other bishops and archdeacons vnto the pope with his excuse; which the pope would in no wise heare. And after other messengers being sent (whom some of the cardinals receiued) it was shewed to them that on Good friday (being then neere at hand) the pope of custome was vsed to assoile or to curse, and that it was noised how the king of England with his bishops should be cursed and his land interdicted, and that they should be put in prison. After this, certaine of the cardinals shewed the pope, that the messengers had power to sweare to the pope that the king should obey his punishment and penance: which was taken both for the king and the archbishop of Yorke. So that in the same day the pope cursed the deed doers with such as were of their consent, either that aided or harboured them. Concerning these deed doers it is touched briefly before how they fled vnto Yorkeshire lying in Gnaresborough, who after hauing in penance to go in their linnen clothes barefoot (in fasting and prayer) to Jerusalem, by reason of this hard penance are said to die in few yeares after.

The king sendeth to Rome.

Ex libro annotationum historicarum manuscripto I. Skeny.

The penance of the foure knights.

The kings ambassadors lying, as is said, in Rome, could find no grace nor fauor a long time at the popes hands. At length with much ado it was agreed, that two cardinals should be sent downe to inquire out the matter concerning them that were consenting to Beckets death. The king perceiuing what was preparing at Rome, neither being yet certain whereto the intent of the pope and comming downe of the cardinals would tend: in the meane time addressed himselfe with a great power to enter into Ireland, giuing in charge and commandement, as Houeden writeth, that no bringer of any briefe or letter should come ouer into England or passe out of the realme (of what degree or condition soeuer hee were) without speciall licence and assurance, to bring nothing that should bee preiudiciall to the realme.

Houedend.

This order being set and ordained, the king with 400 great ships taketh his iourney to Ireland, where he subdued in short time the whole land vnto him, which at that time was gouerned vnder diuers kings to the number of fiue: of whom foure submitted themselues vnto the said king Henrie, onely the fift, who was the king of Conacta, denied to bee subdued, keeping him in woods and marishes.

Ireland first subdued to England.

In the meane season while the king was thus occupied in Ireland, the two cardinals that were sent from the pope (Theodinus and Albertus) were come to Normandie. Vnto whom the king the nert yeere following resorted about the moneth of October, in the yeare 1172. But before (during the time of the kings being in Ireland) the bishop of London, and Joscline bishop of Salisbury had sent to Rome and procured their absolution from the pope. The king returning out of Ireland by Wales into England, & from thence to Normandy, there made his purgation before the popes legats, as touching the death of the foresaid Becket, to the which he sware hee was neither aiding or consenting, but onely that he spake rigorous words against him, for that his knights would not auenge him against the said Thomas; for the which cause this penance was inioyned him vnder his oth.

Anno 1172

Digitized by Google

The kings penance for the death of Becket.

First, that hee should send so much into the holy land, as would find two hundred knights or souldiers for the defence of that land.

Also that from Christmas day next following he should set forth his owne person to fight for the holy land, the space of three yeares together, vnlesse he should bee otherwise dispensed withall by the pope.

Item, that if he would make his iourney into Spaine (as his present necessitie did require) there he to fight against the Saracens, and as long time as hee should there abide, so long space might he take in prolonging his iourney toward Jerusalem.

Item, that he should not hinder nor cause to be hindred by him any appellations made to the pope of Rome.

Item, that neither hee nor his sonne should depart or dissever from pope Alexander, or from his catholike successors, so long as they should recount him or his sonne for kings catholike.

Item, that the goods and possession taken from the church of Canturburie should be restored againe (fully and amplie) as they stood the yere before Thomas Becket departed the realm, and that free libertie should be granted to all such as were outlawed for Beckets cause to returne againe.

Item, that the foresaid customs and decrees by him established against the church, should be extinct and repealed (such only except that concerned his owne person, &c.) besides other secret fastings and almes inioyned him.

All these former conditions the king with his son did both agree vnto, debasing himselfe in such sort of submission before the two cardinals: by the occasion whereof, the cardinall toke no little glorie, vsing this verse of the psalme; Qui respicit terram, & facit eam tremere; qui tangit montes & fumigant: That is: Which loketh vpon the earth, and maketh it to tremble; which toucheth the hils, and they smoke, &c. Moreouer, it is mentioned in histories of the said king, that a little after William king of Scots with his armie had made a rode into the realme, he returning out of Normandie into England, came first to Canturburie, who by the way (so soone as hee came to the sight of Beckets church) lighting off his horse and putting off his shoes went barefot to his tombe, whose steps were found bloody through the roughnesse of the stones. And not only that, but also receiued further penance by euery monke of the cloister certaine discipline of a rod. By which so great deiection of the king (if it were true) thou maiest see the blind and lamentable superstition and ignorance of those daies. If it were pretensed (as might so bee in time of war, to get the hearts of the people) yet maiest thou learned reader see what slauerie kings and princes were brought into at that time vnder the popes clergie. The same yeare (as Houeden writeth) which was 1174, the whole citie of Canturburie was almost all consumed with fire, and the said minster church cleane burnt.

Ex Quadrilogo.

King Henrie the second goeth on pilgrimage with bloodie steps to Thomas Beckets tombe.

Ex Rogero Houedeno, Quadrilogo, & alijs.

Anno 1174

The citie of Canturburie almost consumed with fire.

The next yeare insuing, which was 1175, a conuocation of bishops was holden at Westminster by Richard archbishop of Canturburie. In which conuenticle all the bishops and abbats of the prouince of Canturburie and of Yorke being present, determined (as it had done a little before in the daies of king Henrie the first, Anno 1113.) about the obedience that Yorke should do to Canturburie: that is, whether the archbishop of Yorke might beare his crosse in the diocesse of Canturburie or not, wherof some thing was touched before in the former processe of this historie. Also about the bishoprike of Lincolne, of Chichester, of Worcester, and of Herford, whether these churches were vnder the iurisdiction of the see of Yorke or not, &c. Upon these and other like matters rose such controuersie betweene these two sees, that the one appealed the other to the presence of the bishop of Rome.

Ex Houedeno, parte 1. continuatæ historiæ.

Anno 1175

Controuersie betweene the see of Canturburie and the see of Yorke. Archbishop of Yorke appealed the archbishop of Canturburie to the bishop of Rome.

In these and such like causes, how much better had it been if the supremacie had remained more neere in the kings hands at home, whereby not only much labor and trauell had been saued, but also the great and wastful expenses bestowed at Rome might with much more fruit and thanke haue been conuerted to their cures and flocks committed vnto them, and also percase their cause no lesse indifferently heard, at least more speedilie might haue been decided. But to the purpose againe. In this controuersie diuers of the bishop of Yorks clergie, such as were of Glocester, belonging to the church of S. Oswald, were excommunicate by the archbishop of Canturburie, because they being summoned, refused to appeare before him, &c. At length the same yere, which was 1175, there was a cardinal sent down from Rome by the kings procurement, who studied to set a peace betweene the two archbishops. Whereupon this way of agreement was taken (by the meanes of the king) at Winchester, that as touching the church of S. Oswald at Glocester, the archbishop of Canturburie should cease off his claime therof, molesting the see of Yorke no more therein: also should absolue againe the clerks thereof whom hee had excommunicated before. And as concerning the bearing of the crosse and all other matters, it was referred to the archbishop of Rothomage, and of other bishops in France: so that for fiue yeares a league or truce was taken betwixt them, till they should haue a full determination of their cause.

The clerks of S. Oswald in Glocester excommunicated.

Agreement betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and of Yorke.

The next yeare following, the foresaid king Henrie the second (diuiding the realme of England into six parts) ordeined vpon euery part three iustices of assise. The circuit or limitation of which iustices was thus disposed. The first vpon Northfolke, Suffolke, Cantebridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Essex, Hertfordshire. Two vpon Lincolneshire, Notinghamshire, Darbishire, Stamfordshire, Warwikeshire, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire. Three vpon Kent, Surrey, Southamptonshire, Southsex, Barkeshire, Oxfordshire. Foure vpon Herefordshire, Glocestershire, Worcestershire, Salopshire. Fiue vpon Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Summersetshire, Deuonshire, Cornewall. Six vpon Euerikeshire, Richmondshire, Lancaster, Copland, Westmerland, Northumberland, Cumberland.

Anno 1176

Iustices of assise diuided into six circuits.

In the which yeare also Richard archbishop of Canturburie made three archdeacons in his diocesse, whereas before there was but one. About which time also it was granted by the king to the popes legat, that a clerke should not bee called before a temporall iudge, except for offence in the forrest, or for his lay fee that he holdeth.

Ex epitome Matth. Paris. & aliarum historiarum.

Item, that no archbishoprike, bishoprike, or abbey should remaine in the kings hands ouer one yeare without great cause. It chanced the same yeare that this was done, there was at Canturburie one elected to be abbat in the house of S. Austin named Albert, who made great labor and sute vnto the archbishop that hee would come to his church, and there consecrate him abbat of S. Austins. To whom the archbishop sent word againe, that he was not bound to come to him, but rather the other should repaire to the metropolitan church of Canturburie, there to receiue his consecration. Wherupon (controuersie rising betweene them) the foresaid new elect appealed vp to the audience of the pope, and so laboured vp himselfe to Rome. Where he so handled the matter (by what meanes I cannot tell, vnlesse with his golden bottell, wherewith he quenched the popes thirstie soule, for abbats neuer trauell lightly without fat purses to Rome) that with short dispatch hee procured letters from Alexander the pope, to Roger bishop of Worcester, signifying to him, that he had giuen in charge and commandement to the archbishop of Canturburie (in the behalfe of his deare sonne Albert) that hee should consecrate him within his owne monasterie: which monasterie properly and soly without mediation belonged to the iurisdiction of Rome, and so likewise should doe to his successors after him, without any exaction of obedience of them. Which thing further hee said, if the archbishop would refuse to doe, within the terme appointed, that then he the foresaid bishop of Worcester should (by the authoritie committed vnto him) execute the same, all maner of appellation or other decree whatsoeuer should come, notwithstanding. This letter being obtained, the abbat that would be, returneth home, supposing with himselfe all things to be sure. The archbishop vnderstanding the cause, and seeing himselfe so straitly charged, and yet loth to yeeld and stoope to the abbat, toke to him policie where authoritie would not serue: and both to saue himselfe, and yet to disappoint the abbat, he watcheth a time when the abbat was about businesse of his house. And comming the same time to the monasterie, as hee was commanded to doe, with all things appointed, that to such a businesse appertained, called for the abbat, pretending no lesse but to giue him his consecration. The abbat being called for, was not at home: the archbishop faining himselfe not a little grieued at his labor and god will so lost, departed; as one in whom no readie diligence was lacking, if in case that the abbat had been at home. Whereupon the abbat being thus disappointed, was faine to fill his siluer flagons afresh, and make a new course to Rome to his father the pope, of whom hee receiued his consecration, and so came home againe, with as much wit as he went forth, but not with so much money peraduenture as he went withall.

A friuolous contention betweene the archbishop and the abbat of Canturburie. Where was here the precept of the gospell: He that will be greatest amongst you, let him be an vnderling to others?

The tenor of the popes letter to the bishop of Worcester.

We haue declared a little afore touching the acts and doings of this pope Alexander the third, how hee had brought the emperors head vnder his foot in S. Marks church at Venice: at which time and place peace was concluded, and a composition made betweene the pope and the said Frederike the emperor. Which pacification Rogerus Houedenus, and Gualterus Gisbergensis, referre to this time, being the yeare of our Lord 1177, bringing in two seuerall letters sent from the said pope to Richard archbishop of Canturburie, and to Roger archbishop of Yorke, and Hugh bishop of Dureme. Out of the which letters, so much as serueth to our purpose, I haue taken and here inserted.

Houedenus, Gisbergensis,

Anno 1177

The letter of pope Alexander, sent to Roger archbishop of Yorke, and to the bishop of Dureme.

ALexander seruant of the seruants of God, to his reuerend brethren Roger archbishop of Yorke, and Hugh bishop of Dureme greeting, and apostolicall blessing. The obsequie and seruice of your kind deuotion, which hitherto you are knowne to to haue giuen both deuoutly and laudablie to vs and to the church, requireth that we should describe to you as to our special friends, the prosperous successe of the church, and to let you know as spirituall children of the church what hath happened to the same. For meet it is, conuenient, and also honest, that you whom we haue had so firme and sure in our deuotion, should now be cherished and made ioyous in the prosperitie of vs and of the church. And about the end of the epistle it followeth thus:

A meeke emperor and a proud pope.

The next day following, which was the feast of S. Iames (the said emperor so requesting) we came to the foresaid church of S. Marke, there to celebrate our solemne masse; where (as we were comming in the way) the said emperor met vs without the church, and placing vs againe on his right hand, hee brought vs so into the said church. After the masse was done placing vs againe on his right hand, hee brought vs to the church dore. And moreouer, when we should take our palfrie, hee held our stirrup, exhibiting to vs such honor and reuerence as his progenitors were wont to exhibit to our predecessors. Wherefore these shal be to incite your diligence and studie towards vs, that you reioyce with vs and the church in these our prosperous successes, and also that you shall open the same effect of peace to other deuout children of the church: that such as be touched with the zeale of the house of the Lord, may congratulate and reioyce also in the Lord for the great working of peace which hee hath giuen. Giuen at Venice in the deepe riuer, the six and twentith of Iulie.

The emperor holdeth the popes stirrup.

This yere the contention reuiued againe spoken of a little before, betweene the two archbishops of Yorke and Canturburie, the occasion whereof was this: The maner and practise of the pope is, when he beginneth to lacke money, he sendeth some limitting cardinall abrode to fetch his haruest in. So there came this yeare into England (as lightly few yeers were without them) a certaine cardinall from Rome, called Hugo, or as Houedenus nameth him, Hugezim, who would needs keepe a councell at Westminster. To this councell resorted a great confluence (about middle of Lent) of bishops, abbats, priors, doctors, and such others of the clergie. As euery one was there placed in his order, and after his degrée, first commeth the archbishop of Yorke named Roger, who (thinking to preuent the other archbishop) came something sooner, and straightway placed himselfe on the right hand of the cardinall. Richard the archbishop of Canturbury following shortly after, and seeing the first place taken vp, refuseth to take the second, complaining of the archbishop of Yorke, as one preiudiciall to his see. So while the one would not rise, and the other part not sit downe, rose no small contention betweene them two. The archbishop of Canturburie claimed the vpper seat by the preheminence of his church. Contrarie, the archbishop of Yorke alleaged for him the old decrée of Gregorie, whereof mention is made before. By which this order was taken betweene the two metropolitans of Canturburie and Yorke, that which of them two should bee first in election, hee should haue the preheminence in dignitie, to goe before the other. Thus they contending to and fro, waxed so warme in words, that at last they turned to hote blowes. How strong the archbishop of Yorke was in reason and argument I cannot tell, but the archbishop of Canturburie was stronger at the armes end: whose seruants being more in number (like valiant men) not suffering their master to take such a foile, so preuailed against Yorke (sitting on the right hand of the cardinall) that they pluckt him downe from the hand to the foot of the cardinal vpon the ground, treading and trampling vpon him with their feet, that maruell it was hee escaped with life. His calule, chimer, and rochet were all to bee rent and torne from his backe. Here no reason would take place, no debating would serue, no praying could bee heard, such clamor and tumult was there in the house among them, much like to the tumult which Virgil describeth.

Contention betweene two archbishops who should sit on the right hand of the cardinall.

Ac veluti in magno populo, cùm sæpe coorta est
Seditio, sæuítque animis ignobile vulgus,
Iamque faces & saxa volant, furor arma ministrat.

Now as the first part of this description doth well agrée, so some peraduenture will looke againe, that according to the latter part also of the same, my lord cardinall with sagenesse and grauitie (after the maner of the old Romans standing vp) should haue ceased and allaied the disturbance, according to that which followeth in the poet:

Tum pietate grauem meritis si forte virum quem
Conspexêre, silent, arrectisque auribus astant:
Ille regit mentes dictis, & pectora mulcet, &c.

But what did the noble Roman cardinal? Like a prety man of his hands (but a better man of his feet) standing vp in the midst, and seeing the house in such a broile, committed himselfe to flight, and (as Houedenus writeth) Abscondit se à facie illorum. The next day after, the archbishop of Yorke bringeth to the cardinall his rochet, to beare witnesse what iniurie and violence he had sustained, appealing and citing vp the archbishop of Canturburie with certaine of his men to the bishop of Rome. And thus the holy councell (the same day it was begun) brake vp and was dissolued.

Under the reigne of this king Henrie the second, the dominion and crowne of England extended so far as hath not béene in this realme before him, whom histories record to possesse vnder his rule and iurisdiction: first, Scotland, to whom William king of Scots, with all the lords temporall and spirituall did homage both for them and for their successors (the seale whereof remaineth in the kings treasurie) as also Ireland, England, Normandie, Aquitan, Gaunt, &c. to the mountaines of Pirenete, which be in the vttermost part of the great ocean in the Brittish sée, being also protector of France, to whom Philip the French king yéelded both himselfe and his realme wholly to his gouernance, in the yeare of our Lord 1181. Moreouer, he was offered also to be the king of Ierusalem by the patriarch and maister of the hospitall there: who then being distressed by the Soldan, brought him the keyes of their citie desiring his aide against the infidels: which offer he then refused, alleaging the great charge which he had at home, and the rebellion of his sonnes, which might happen in his absence.

The large dominion of king Henrie the second.

Homage of Scotland in paine of interdiction.

King Henrie the second protector of France.

King Henrie chosen king of Ierusalem and refused it.

¶ And here the old histories find a great fault with the king for his refusall, declaring that to bee the cause of Gods plagues, which after insued vpon him by his children, as the patriarch (in his oration, being offended with the king) prophesied should so happen to him for the same cause. Which storie if it be true, it may be a lesson to good princes, not to denie their necessarie helpe to their distressed neighbors, especially the cause appertaining vnto God.

Aid not to be denied to our neighbours, the cause being godly.

The wisdome, discretion, manhood, and riches of this prince was so spread and renowned from all quarters, that messages came fro Emmanuel emperor of Constantinople, Frederike emperor of Rome, and William archbishop of Treuers in Almaine, the duke of Saxon, and from the earle of Flanders, and also from the French king (vpon determination of great questions and strifes) to aske counsell and determination thereof of this king Henrie, as of one most wise and schoolemaster of all wisedome and iustice, to haue solution of their questions and doubts. Moreouer, Alphonsus king of Castile, and Sancius king of Nauerne, being in strife for certaine castles and other possessions, submitted them (of their frée accord) and by their oth to abide the award of this king Henrie, who made award and pleased them both: whereby it is to bee presupposed that this king, to whom other princes did so resort, as to their arbiter and deciser, did not attend either to any sloth or vicious liuing. Wherefore it may séeme the acts of this prince not to be so vicious as some monkish writers doe describe.

Ex Polychron.
Ex Giraldo Cambrensi.

Among many other things in this king memorable, this one is to be noted (follow it who can) that he reigning fiue and thirtie yeares, and hauing such wars with his enemies, yet neuer vpon his subiects put any tribute or tax, nor yet vpon the spiritualtie, first fruits and appropriations of benefices. Belike they were not knowne, or else not vsed. And yet his treasure after his death (weighed by king Richard his sonne) amounted to aboue nine hundred thousand pounds, besides iewels, pretious stones, and houshold furniture. Of the which substance eleuen thousand pounds came to him by the death of Roger archbishop of Yorke, who had procured a bull of the pope, that if any priest died within his prouince without testament, then he should haue all his goods. And shortly after the archbishop died, and the king had all his goods, which extended (as is said) to eleuen thousand pounds besides plate, in the yeare of our Lord God 1181.

The treasure of king Henrie the second.

A couetous archbishop.

But as there is no felicitie or wealth in this mortall world so perfect, which is not darkened with some cloud of incumbrance and aduersitie: so it happened to this king, that among his other princely successors, this incommoditie followed him withall, that his sonnes rebelled and stood in armour against him, taking the part of the French king against their father. First, at the coronation of Henrie his sonne, whom the father ioyned with him as king, he being both father and king, tooke vpon him (that notwithstanding) as but a steward, and set downe the first dish as sewer vnto his sonne, renouncing the name of a king. At what time the foresaid archbishop of Yorke, sitting on the right hand of the yong king, said: Sir, yee haue great cause this day to ioy, for there is no prince in the world that hath such an officer this day, &c. And the yong king disdaining his words, said: My father is not dishonoured in this doing, for I am a king and a quéenes sonne, and so is not hee: and not onely this, but after he also persecuted his father; and so in his youth when he had raigned but a few yeares, died; teaching vs what is the price and reward of breaking the iust commandement of God.

Pride destroyeth all.

After him likewise Richard his sonne (who was called Richard cœur de lion) rebelled against his father, and also John his yongest sonne did not much degenerate from the steps of his brethren. Insomuch that this foresaid Richard (like an vnkind child, persecuting and taking part against his father) brought him to such distresse of body and mind, that for thought of heart he fell into an ague, and within foure daies departed, after he had reigned fiue and thirtie yeares: whose corps as it was caried to be buried, Richard his sonne comming by the way and meeting it, and beginning for compassion to weepe,

King Henrie the second persecuted by his sonnes.

The death of king Henrie the second.

Digitized by Google

How the king being dead, bled at the comming of his son.

the blod brast incontinent out of the nose of the king at the comming of his sonne; giuing thereby a certaine demonstration how he was the onely author of his death.

After the death and reigne of which king, his children after him (worthilie rewarded for their vnnaturalnesse against their father) lacking the succesle which their father had, lost all beyond the sea that their father had got before.

And thus much concerning the reigne of Henrie the second, and the death of Thomas Becket; whose death (as is aforesaid) happened in the daies of pope Alexander the third, which pope blurping the keyes of ecclesiasticall regiment one and twentie yeares (or as Gisburnensis writeth, three and twentie yeares) gouerned the church with much tumult: striuing and contending with Frederike the emperor, not shaming like a most proud Lucifer to tread with his foot vpon the necke of the said emperor, as is aboue described.

This pope among many other his acts had certaine councels (as is partly before touched) some in France, some at Rome in Lateran; by whom it was decreed, that no archbishop should receiue the pall, vnlesse he should first sweare. Concerning the solemnitie of which pall, for the order and maner of giuing and taking the same with obedience to the pope, as it is contained in their owne words: I thought it good to set it forth vnto thee, that thou maiest well consider and vnderstand their doings therein.

{Anno 1179}

The forme and maner how and by what words the pope is wont to giue the pall vnto the archbishop.

Giuing of the pall.

AD honorem omnipotentis Dei, & beatæ Mariæ virginis, & beatorum Petri & Pauli, & domini nostri N. papæ, & sanctæ Romanæ ecclesiæ, necnon N. ecclesiæ tibi commissæ, tradimus tibi pallium de corpore beati Petri sumptum, plenitudinem pontificalis officij, vt vtaris eo infra ecclesiam tuam certis diebus, qui exprimuntur in priuilegijs tibi ab apostolica sede concessis.

That is in English.

To the honor of almightie God, and of blessed Marie the virgin, and of blessed S. Peter and Paul, and of our lord pope N. and of the holy church of Rome, and also of the church of N. committed to your charge, we giue to you the pall taken from the body of S. Peter, as a fulnesse of the office pontificall, which you may weare within your owne church vpon certaine daies, which bee expressed in the priuiledges of the said church, granted by the see apostolike.

Notes vpon the same.

¶ To the honor, &c. With what confidence durst the pope couple the honor of almightie God, and the honor of Mary, of S. Peter, and of the pope, and of the Romish church all together, if he had not been a presumptuous Lucifer, equalling himselfe not only with such saints, but also euen with him which is God alone, to be blessed for euer?

Taken from the bodie, &c. If S. Peters bodie be not all consumed, let him shew it if he can. If he cannot shew it, how then is this pall taken from the bodie of S. Peter? Or if he meane it to be of S. Peters owne wearing, then belike S. Peter had a goodly wardrope of palls, when euery archbishop in all christendome receiueth from the pope a diuers pall.

As a fulnesse of the office, &c. Rather he might say, the fulnesse of his owne purse, when as archbishops paid so sweetly for it. Insomuch that Iacobus the archbishop of Mentz, as is aboue touched a little before in the councell of Basil, where the price was wont to be but a thousand florens, could not obtaine it without six and twentie thousand florens.

Ex libro grauaminum nationis Germanicæ.

Vpon certaine daies, &c. This difference there was betweene the pope and other archbishops: for the pope might were the pall at all times and in all places at his pleasure. Archbishops might not weare it but vpon certaine daies, and in their church onely within their prouince. Moreouer this pall should not be asked but with great instance, and within three months, without which pall he is not to be named archbishop, but may be deposed, hauing it not after three moneths: and the same pall must also be buried with him when he dieth; and when it is giuen, some priuiledge must be giuen withall, or the old renued.

In like maner proceedeth the oth of euery bishop swearing obedience to the pope, in like words as followeth.

The solemne oth of bishops made to the pope.

EGO N. episcopus N. ab hac hora in antea fidelis & obediens ero beato Petro, sanctæque apostolicæ Romanæ eccleſiæ, & domino meo D. N. papæ, suisque successoribus canonicè intrantibus. Non ero in consilio, seu auxilio, consensu, vel facto, vt vitam perdant, aut membrum, seu capiantur mala captione. Consilium verò quod mihi credituri sunt, per se aut per nuncium, seu literas eorum, me sciente nemini pandam. Papatum Romanum & regalia S. Petri adiutor eis ero ad retinendum & defendendum saluo meo ordine, contra omnem hominem. Legatum apostolicæ sedis in eundo & redeundo honorificè tractabo, & in suis necessitatibus adiuuabo. Vocatus ad synodum veniam, nisi præpeditus fuero canonica præpeditione. Apostolorum limina singulis triennijs visitabo, aut per me aut per meum nuncium, nisi apostolica absoluar licentia. Possessiones verò ad mensam mei episcopatus pertinentes non vendam, neque donabo, neque oppignorabo, neque de nouo infeudabo, nec aliquo modo alienabo, inconsulto Rom. pontifice: sic me Deus adiuuet, & sancta Dei euangelia.

Saluo meo ord. this was the clause that made Becket to be banished and to be slaine.

That is in english.

I N. bishop of N. from this houre henceforth, will be faithfull and obedient to blessed S. Peter, and to the holy apostolike church of Roune, and to my lord N. the pope. I shall bee in no counsell, nor helpe either with my consent or deed, whereby either of them or any member of them may be impaired, or whereby they may be taken with any euill taking. The counsell which they shall commit to me either by themselues or by messenger, or by their letters, wittingly or willingly I shall vtter to none to their hinderance and damage. To the retaining and maintaining the papacie of Rome, and the regalities of S. Peter, I shall be an aider (so mine order be saued) against all persons. The legat of the apostolike see both in going and comming I shall honourablie intreate and helpe in all necessities. Being called to a synod I shall be readie to come, vnlesse I bee let by some lawfull and canonicall impeachment. The palace of the apostles euery third yeare I shall visit either by my selfe or my messenger, except otherwise being licensed by the see apostolike. All such possessions as belong to the table and diet of my bishoprike, I shall neither sell, nor giue, nor lay to morgage, nor lease out, or remoue away by any maner of meanes without the consent and knowledge of the bishop of Rome: so God helpe me and the holy gospels of God.

And how he got those bishops then periured, which at the death of D. Marie, set and let out a great part of their possessions from their successors?

A note vpon the same.

¶ Hereby thou hast by the way (gentle reader) to note and consider, among other things which here may bee vnderstood, that since the time the oth began to be laid and thrust vpon bishops, all generall councels began to lose their libertie. For how could any freedome remaine for men to speake their knowledge in redresse of things, being by their oth so bound to the pope to speake nothing but on his side, to maintaine the papacie and the church of Rome in all times and places? Coniecture by thy selfe (christian reader) what is more hereby to bee considered.

BEsides this it was also decreed in the said councell at Rome of 310 bishops by pope Alexander, that no man should haue any spirituall promotion, except hee were of lawfull age, and borne in wedlocke. That no parish church should be void aboue six moneths. That none within orders should meddle with temporall businesse. That priests should haue but one benefice, and that the bishop should be charged to find the priest a liuing till he be promoted.

That open vsurers should not communicate at Easter, nor be buried within the church-yard.

That nothing should be taken for ministring sacraments, or burying.

Item, that euery cathedrall church should haue a master to teach children freely, without taking any thing for the same.

The vow of chastitie laid vpon priests.

In this councell the vow of chastitie was obtruded and laid vpon priests. Thomas Becket also and Bernard were canonized for saints.

During the reigne and time of this king Henry the second, the citie of Norwich was destroyed and burnt by the men of Flanders. Also the towne of Leicester. Nottingham walled and the burgesses slaine by the earle of Ferrers. The towne of Warwicke destroyed by the Scots. The king of Scots was taken in war by Englishmen in the yeer of our Lord 1174. The towne of Huntington taken and burned. The towne of Canturburie by casualtie of fire burnt with all the churches, specially with the Trinitie church where Becket was worshipped, An. eod. The yeare of our Lord 1170. William king of Scots with Dauid his brother and all the barons of the realme did homage to the king of England. Ireland made subiect to England. Decreed in a councell in Normandie, that no boyes or children should possesse any benefice. A councell of Lateran was holden at Rome, where were three and thirtie articles concluded, An. 1179. The French king came in pilgrimage to Tho. Becket, the king of England meeting him by the way, An. 1184. After the death of Richard archbishop of Canturburie, who followed after Tho. Becket, succeeded Baldwinus, who of a Cistercian monke being made a bishop, is said neuer to eate flesh in his life. To whom a certaine poore woman, bare & leane, meeting him in ꝑ streét, desired to know of him whether it were true that was said of him, that he neuer did eate flesh. Which thing when he had affirmed to bee true: Nay (saith she) that is false, for you haue eaten my flesh vnto the bone: for I had but one cow wherewith I was sustained, & that haue your deanes taken from me. True, true, said the bishop, and thou shalt haue another cow as good as that, &c: Iornalens.

Baldwinus archbishop of Canturburie.

Moreouer, in the reigne of the said king Henrie, about the yeare of our Lord 1178, I find in the storie of Roger Houeden and others, that in the citie of Tholouse was a great multitude of men and women, whom the popes commissioners, to wit, Peter cardinall of saint Chrysogon, and the popes legat, with with the archbishops of Narbon and Biturtensis, Reginald bishop of Bathe, John bishop of Pictauia, Henrie abbat Clarevallensis, &c. did persecute and condemne for heretiks; of whom some were scourged naked, some chased away, some compelled to abiure. Concerning whose articles and opinions I haue no firme ground to make any certaine relation, for so much as I see the papists many times so false in their quarelling accusations, vntruely collecting mens sayings, not as they ment, and meaning not as they said: but wresting and deprauing simple mens assertions after such a subtill sort as they lust themselues to take them. But this I find, how one of the said commissioners or inquisitors (Henrie the abbat) in a certaine letter of his wrote thus of them: Nam & panem sanctum vitæ æternæ sacerdotis ministerio in verbo Domini consecratum non esse corpus Domini, nouo dogmate contendebat asserere. That is: after a new opinion hee affirmed, that the holy bread of eternall life, consecrated by the ministerie of the priest, was not the body of the Lord, &c.

Waldenses seu pauperes de Lugduno, Leoniste, Insabbatati.

In the time of this Alexander sprang vp the doctrine and name of them which were then called Pauperes de Lugduno, which of one Waldus a chiefe senator in Lions, were named Waldenses; Item Leonistæ & Insabbatati: about the yeare of our Lord 1109. or (as Laziardus writeth) An. 1170.

Foure arch pillers of proud papistrie.

Not long before this time (as is expressed aboue) rose vp Gratianus master of the decrees, and Petrus Lombardus master of the sentences, both archpillers of al papistrie; after whom followed also two as euill, or worse then they, Franciscus and Dominicus, maintaining blind hypocrisie no lesse then the other maintained proud prelacie. As these laboured one way by superstition and worldly aduancement to corrupt the sincerity of christian religion: so it pleased Christ the contrarie way labouring against these, to raise vp therefore the said Waldensians, against the pride and hypocrisie of the others.

Thus we neuer see any great corruption in the church, but that some sparkle of the true and cleare light of the gospell yet by Gods prouidence doth remaine, whatsoeuer doctor Augustinus, Reinerius, Syluius, Cranzius, with others in their popish histories do write of them (defaming them through misreport) and accusing them to magistrats, as disobedient to orders, rebels to the catholike church, and contemners of the virgin Mary: yet they that carie iudgement indifferent, rather trusting truth then wauering with times, in weighing their articles, shall find it otherwise: that they maintained nothing else but the same doctrine which is now defended in the church. And yet I suppose not contrarie, but as they did with the articles of Wickliffe and Hus, so the papists did in like maner with their articles also, in gathering and wresting them otherwise then they were ment.

The historie of the Waldenses, concerning their originall and doctrine, with their persecutions.

The historie of Waldenses or Albingenses.

THe first originall of these Waldenses came of one Waldus, a man both of great substance, and no lesse calling in the citie of Lions: the occasion whereof is declared of diuers writers thus to come: About the yeare of our Lord 1160, it chanced that diuers of the best and chiefest heads of the citie of Lions, talking and walking in a certaine place after their old accustomed maner, especially in the summer time, conferred and consulted togither vpon matters either to passe ouer time, or to debate things to be done. Amongst whom it chanced one (the rest looking vpon) to fall downe by sudden death. In the number of whom this foresaid Waldus there being amongst them was one, who beholding the matter more earnestly then the other, and terrified with so heauie an example, being (as is said) a rich man, and Gods holy spirit working withall, was stricken with a deepe and inward repentance, whereupon followed a new alteration with a carefull studie to reforme his former life. In so much that first hee began to minister large almes of his goods to such as needed. Secondly, to instruct himselfe and his familie with the true knowledge of Gods word. Thirdly, to admonish all that resorted to him by any occasion, to repentance and vertuous amendment of life. Whereby partly through his large giuing to the poore, partly through his diligent teaching and wholesome admonitions, more resort of people daily frequented about him, whom when he did see readie and diligent to learne, began to giue out to them certaine rudiments of the scripture, which he had translated himselfe into the French tongue: for as he was a man wealthie in riches, so he was also not vnlearned.

Although Laziardus, Volateranus, with others, note him vtterly vnlearned, and charge him with ignorance, as who should procure others to write and translate for him: by others that haue seene his doings yet remaining in old parchment monuments, it appeareth he was both able to declare and translate the bookes of scripture, and also did collect the doctors mind vpon the same.

The true nature of antichrist, neither himselfe to further the word, nor suffer other men to do it.

But what soeuer he was (lettered or vnlettered) the bishops and prelats seeing him so to intermeddle with scriptures, and to haue such resort about him, albeit it was but in his owne house vnder priuate conference, could not abide, either that the scriptures should be declared of any other, neither would they take the paines to declare it themselues. So being moued with great malice against the man, threatened to excommunicate him if he did not leaue so to doe. Waldus seeing his doing to be but godly, and their malice stirred vp vpon no iust nor godly cause, neglecting the threatnings and frettings of the wicked, said that God must be obeyed more then man. To be briefe, the more diligent hee was in setting forth the true doctrine of Christ against the errors of antichrist, the more maliciously their fierceneile increased. In so much that when they did see their excommunication to be despised and would not serue, they ceased not with prison, with sword and banishment to persecute, till at length they had driuen both Waldus and all the fauourers of his true preaching out of the citie.

Whereupon came first their name, that they were called Waldenses, or Pauperes de Lugduno, not because they would haue all things common amongst them, or that they professing any wilfull pouertie, would imitate to liue as the apostles did (as Syluius did falsly belie them) but because they being thrust out both of countrie and goods, were compelled to liue poorely whether they would or no. And thus much touching the first occasion and beginning of these men, and of the restoring and maintaining of the true doctrine of Christs gospell, against the proud proceedings of popish errors. Now concerning their articles, which I find in order and in number to be these.

The articles of Waldenses.

SOlis sacris literis credendum esse in ijs, quæ ad salutem, &c. That is; Only the holy scripture is to be beleeued in matters pertaining to saluation, and no mans writing, or man beside.

2 All things to be contained in holy scripture necessarie to saluation, and nothing to be admitted in religion, but what onely is commanded in the word of God.

3 To be one alonely mediator, other saints in no wise to be made mediators, or to be inuocated.

4 To bee no purgatorie, but that all men either by Christ are iustified to life, or without Christ to bee condemned: and besides these two neither any third or fourth place to be.

5 That all masses, namely such as be sung for the dead, to be wicked, and to be abrogate.

6 All mens traditions to be reiected, at least not to be reputed as necessarie to saluation, and therefore this singing and superfluous chanting in the chancell to be left: constrained and prefixed fasts bound to daies and times, difference of meates, such varietie of degrees and orders of priests, friers, monks, and nuns, superfluous holy daies, so many sundrie benedictions and hallowing of creatures, vowes, peregrinations, with all the rabblement of rites and ceremonies brought in by man, to be abolished.

7 The supremacie of the pope vsurping aboue all churches, and especially aboue all politike realmes and gouernments, or for him to occupie or vsurpe ỹ iurisdiction of both the swords, to be denied, neither that any degree is to be receiued in the church, but onely priests, deacons and bishops.

8 The communion vnder both kinds to be necessary to all people, according to the institution of Christ.

9 Item, the church of Rome to be the very Babylon spoken of in the Apocalypse: and the pope to bee the fountaine of all error, and the very antichrist.

10 The popes pardons and indulgences they reiect.

11 The marriage of priests, and of ecclesiasticall persons, to be godly and also necessarie in the church.

12 Such as heare the word of God, and haue a right faith, to be the right church of Christ. And to this church the keyes of the church to be giuen, to driue away wolues, and to institute true pastors, to preach the word, and to minister the sacraments.

These be the most principall articles of the Waldenses, albeit some there be, that ad more to them: some againe diuide the same into more parts; but these bee the principall to which the rest be reduced.

 This article seemeth to be giuen vp of them in Bohemia long after, for indulgences came not in before Bonifacius the eight.*

The same Waldenses at length exiled, were dispersed in diuers and sundrie places, of whom many remained long in Bohemia, which writing to their king Uladislaus, to purge themselues against the slanderous accusations of one doctor Aukin, gaue vp their confession with an apologie of their christian profession: defending with strong and learned arguments the same which now is receiued in most reformed churches, both concerning grace, faith, charitie, hope, repentance, and workes of mercie. As for purgatorie, they say that Thomas Aquinas is the author thereof.

Thomas Aquinas first finder of Purgatorie. Ex Orthuino Gratio.

Concerning the supper of the Lord, their faith was, that it was ordained to be eaten, not to be shewed and worshipped; for a memorial, not for a sacrifice; to serue for the present ministration and not for reseruation; to be receiued at the table, not to be caried out of the doores: according to the ancient vse of the primitiue church, when they vsed to communicate sitting. And this they proue both by an old chronicle called Chronica gestorum, as also by ancient Origen vpon the third booke of Moses, bringing in his words, which be these, proouing that this sacramentall bread ought not to be reserued: Quicunque hunc panem cœnæ Christi, secunda vel tertia die sumpserit, non benedicitur anima eius, sed inquinabitur. Propterea Gabaonitæ, quia antiquos panes, &c. i. Whosoeuer receiueth this bread of ỹ supper

Chronica gestorum. Origen. super tertium librum Mosis.

Digitized by Google

The sacramentall bread ought not to be kept or reserued.

of Christ vpon the second or third day after, his soule shall not be blessed, but polluted. Therefore the Gabaonits because they brought old bread to the children of Israel, it was inioyned them to carie wood and water, &c.

Part of the disputation betweene doctor Austin and the Waldenses.

Doctor Austin (of whom mention is made before) disputing against them about this matter of the holy Eucharist, vrgeth them with this interrogation; whether it be the same Christ (present in the sacrament) which is present at the right hand of the father? If it be not the same Christ, how is it true in the scripture, Vna fides, vnus Dominus noster Iesus Christus, One faith, one Lord Iesus Christ? If it be the same Christ, then how is hee not to bee honoured and worshipped here as well as there?

Dilemma, That is, a captious question in conferring on both sides an inconuenience.

The answere of the Waldenses.

To this the Waldenses answere againe, and grant that Christ is one, and the same with his naturall bodie in the sacrament, which he is at the right hand of his father, but not after the same existence of his body. For the existence of his bodie in heauen is not personall and locall, to bee apprehended by the faith and spirit of men. In the sacrament the existence of his bodie is not personall or locall, to bee apprehended or receiued of our bodies, after a personall or corporall maner, but after a sacramentall maner; that is, where our bodies receiue the signe, and our spirit the thing signified. Moreouer, in heauen the existence of his bodie is dimensiue, and complet with the full proportion and quantitie of the same body wherewith hee ascended. Here the existence of his complete body with the full proportion, measure, and stature therof, doth not, neither can stand in the sacrament. Briefly, the existence of his body in heauen is naturall, not sacramentall: that is, to be seene, and not remembred. Here it is sacramentall, not naturall: that is, to be remembred, not to be seene.

What it is to receiue after a sacramentall maner.

Naturall. Sacramentall.

An other Dilemma against transubstantiation.

That answere being made to the captious proposition of D. Austin, the Waldenses (retorting the like interrogation to him againe) demand of him to answere them in the like obiection: whether it be all one Christ substantially and naturally, which sitteth in heauen, and which is vnder the formes of bread and wine, and in the receiuers of the sacrament? If hee grant to them they bid him say, seeing Christ is as well in the sacrament as in heauen, and as well in the receiuer as in the sacrament, and all one Christ in substance and nature; why then is not the same Christ as well in the breast of the receiuer to bee worshipped, as vnder the formes of bread and wine in the sacrament: seeing he is there after a more perfect maner in man, then in the sacrament: for in the sacrament he is but for a time, and not for the sacraments sake, but for the mans cause. In man he is not for the sacraments cause, but for his owne, and that not for a season, but for euer, as it is written: Qui manducat hunc panem viuet in æternum, that is: Hee that eateth this bread shall liue for euer, &c.

Moreouer and besides, seeing transubstantiation is the going of one substance into an other; they question againe with him, whether the formes of bread and wine remaining, the substance thereof be changed into the whole person of our Lord Christ Iesus: that is, both into his body, soule, and diuinitie, or not into the whole Christ? If he grant the whole; then say they, that is impossible (concerning the diuinitie) both to nature and to our faith, that any creature can be changed into the creator. If he say the bread is changed into the body and soule of Christ, not to his diuinitie, then he separateth the natures in Christ. If he say into the body alone and not the soule, then hee separateth the natures of the true manhood, &c: and so cannot bee the same Christ that was betrayed for vs, for that hee had both body and soule. To conclude, to what part soeuer hee would answere, this doctrine of transubstantiation cannot bee defended without great inconuenience of all sides.

Æneas Syluius Bohemica historia de Waldensium dogmatibus.

Euer and besides, Æneas Syluius writing of their doctrine and assertions (perchance as he found them, perchance making worse of them then they taught or ment) reporteth them after this maner, wich I thought here to set out as it is in the Latine.

Romanum præsulem reliquis episcopis parem esse. Inter sacerdotes nullum discrimen. Presbyterum non dignitatem sed vitæ meritum efficere potiorem. In English.

The bishop of Rome to be equall with other bishops. Amongst priests to be no difference of degree. No priest to be reputed for any dignitie of his order, but for the worthinesse of his life.

The soules of men departed, either to enter into paine euerlasting, or euerlasting ioy. No fire of purgatorie to bee found. To pray for the dead to be vaine, and a thing only found out for the lucre of priests.

The images of God (as of the trinitie and of saints) to bee abolished. The hallowing of water and palmes to bee a meere ridicle. The religion of begging friers to bee found out by the diuell. That priests should not incroch riches in this world, but rather follow pouerty, being content with their tithes, and mens deuotion. The preaching of the word to be free to al men called thereunto.

That no deadly sinne is to be tollerated, for what soeuer respect of a greater commoditie to insue thereupon. The confirmation which bishops exercise with oyle, and extreme vnction, are not to be counted amongst the sacraments of the church. Auricular confession to be but a toy; to suffice for euery man to confesse himselfe in his chamber to God. Baptisme ought to be ministred onely with pure water, without any mixture of hallowed oyle. The temple of the Lord to be the wide world. The maiesty of God not to be restrained more within the wals of temples, monasteries and chapels, so that his grace is rather to be found in one place then in another.

The temple of the Lord, that is, the proper habitation wherein God most properly dwelleth and worketh. That is, the very place maketh not the ministration of holy things either more or lesse holy.

Priests apparell, ornaments of the high altar, vestiments, corporaces, chalices, patins, and other church plate, to serue in no stead. For the difference & respect of the very place, to make no matter, where the priest doth consecrate, or doth minister to them which doe require. To be sufficient to vse onely the sacramentall words without all other superfluous ceremonies.

The suffrages of saints reigning with Christ in heauen, to be craued in vaine, being not able to helpe vs. In saying or singing the houres and matins of the day, the time to bee but lost. A man ought to cease from his labor no day, but only vpon the sunday.

The feasts and festiuals of saints ought to be reiected. Item, such fasts as be coacted and inioyned by the church, haue no merit in them.

These assertions of the Waldenses being thus articuled out by Eneas Syluius, I thought to giue them abrode in English as they are in Latine: to the intent that as they are the lesse to be doubted, being set out of a popes pen; so wee may the better know both them hereby what they were, and also vnderstand how this doctrine now preached and taught in the church, is no new doctrine, which here we see both taught and persecuted almost 400 yeares agoe. And as I haue spoken hitherto sufficiently concerning their doctrine; no now we will briefly somewhat touch of the order of their life and conuersation, as wee find it registred in a certaine old written booke of inquisition.

Ex inquisitorio quodam libello.

De moribus & consuetudine Waldensium.

Modus autem Waldensium talis est, &c. The whole processe commeth to this effect in English. The maner of the Waldenses is this, They kneeling vpon their knees, leaning to some banke or stay, do continue in their prayers with silence so long as a man may say thirtie or fortie times Pater noster. And this they doe euery day with great reuerence, being amongst themselues, and such as be of their owne religion, and no strangers with them, both before dinner and after; likewise before supper and after, also what time they go to bed, and in the morning when they rise, and at certaine other times also, as well in the day as in the night. Item, they vse no other prayer but the prayer of the Lord, and that without any Aue Maria, and the creed, which they affirme not to be put in for any praier by Christ, but onely by the church of Rome. Albeit they haue and vse the seuen articles of faith concerning the diuinitie, and seuen articles concerning the humanity, and the ten commandements, and seuen works of mercy, which they haue compiled togither in a compendious booke, glorying much in the same, and thereby offer themselues ready to answere any man for their faith.

Their maner of grace before meat.

Before they goe to meat they haue their grace, Benedicite, Kyrie eleyson, Christe eleyson, Kyrie eleyson, Pater noster. Which being said, then the elder amongst them beginneth thus in their owne tongue; God which blessed the fiue barlie loues and two fishes in the desert before his disciples, blesse this table and that is set vpon it, or shall be set vpon it. In the name of the father, of the sonne, and of the holy ghost, Amen. And likewise againe when they rise from meate, the senior giueth thanks, saying the words of the Apocalypse: Blessing, and worship, and wisedome, and thanksgiuing, honor, vertue, and strength to God alone for euer and euer, Amen. And addeth moreouer, God reward them in their bosomes, and bee beneficiall to all them that be beneficiall to vs, and blesse vs. And the God which hath giuen vs corporall feeding, grant vs his spirituall life, and God be with vs, and wee alwaies with him. To which they answere againe, Amen. And thus saying grace, they hold their hands vpward, loking vp to heauen. After their meate and grace said, they teach and exhort amongst themselues, conferring togither vpon their doctrine, &c.

Their grace after meat.

Reinerius an old inquisitor against Waldenses.

In their doctrine and teaching they were so diligent and painefull, that Reinerius a writer about their time (an extreme enimie against them) in a long processe, wherein hee describeth their doctrine and teaching; testifieth, that he heard of one which did know the partie, that a certaine heretike (saith he) onely to turne a certaine person away from our faith, and to bring him to his (in the night and in the winter time) swam ouer the riuer called Ibis, to come to him and to teach him. Moreouer, so perfect they were then in the scriptures, that the said Reinerius saith, he did heare and see a man of the countrie vnlettred, which could recite ouer the whole booke of Job word by word, without booke, with diuers others which had the whole new testament perfectly by heart.

Plus videtur locus in laicos, quam sacerdotes.

And although some of them rather merily then vnskilfully expounded the words of 1. Ioan. Sui non receperunt eum, Swine did not receiue him; yet were they not so ignorant and void of learning, nor yet so few in number, but that they did mightily mightily preuaile, in so much that Reinerius hath these words; Non erat qui eos impedire auderet propter potentiam & multitudinem fautorum suorum. Inquisitioni & examinationi sæpe interfui, & computatæ sunt 40 ecclesiæ, quæ hæresi infectæ fuerunt, ac in vna parœcia Cammach fuerunt decem eorum scholæ, &c. That is, There was none durst stop them for the power and multitude of their fauourers. I haue often beene at their inquisition and examination, and there were numbred fortie churches infected with their heresie, in so much that in one parish of Cammach, were ten open scholes of them, &c. Hæc ille.

The power and multitude of Waldenses.

And the said Reinerus, when he hath said all he can in depraising and impugning them, yet is driuen to confesse this of them, where he doth distinct their sect from other sects, and hath these words: Hæc verò Leonistarum secta magnam habet speciem pietatis, eò quòd coram hominibus iustè viuant, & bene omnia de Deo credant, & omnes articulos, qui in symbolo continentur; solam Romanam ecclesiam blasphemant, & oderunt. That is; This sect of Leonists hath a great shew of holinesse, in that both they liue iustly before men, and beleeue all things well of God, and hold all the articles contained in the creed; onely they doe blaspheme the Romish church and hate it, &c.

Waldenses in all other points sound, but only for holding against the church of Rome. Ex Orthuino Gratio.

Now to touch somewhat their persecutions. After they were driuen out of Lions, they were scattered into diuers and sundry places (the prouidence of God so disposing) that the sound of their doctrine might bee heard abrode in the world. Some, as I said, went to Bohemia, many did flee into their prouinces of France, some into Lombardy, others into other places, &c. But as the crosse commonly followeth the veritie and sincere preaching of Gods word, so neither could these be suffered to liue in rest. There are yet to be seene the consultations of lawyers, archbishops, and bishops of France, as Narbonensis, Arelatensis, Aquensis, and Albanensis, deuised amongst themselues, and yet remaine in writing, for the abolishing and extirping of these Waldenses, written aboue three hundred yeres ago; whereby it appeareth that there was a great number of them in France.

The crosse commonly followeth the word.

Waldenses persecuted more then 300 yeres ago by antichrist.

Besides, there was a whole councell kept in Tholouse about three hundred fifty and fiue yeres before, and all against these Waldenses, the which also were condemned in another councell at Rome before that.

What great persecutions were raised vp against them in France by these foure archbishops before mentioned, it appeareth by their writings, whereof I will recite some of their words, which towards the end be these; Quis enim est solus ille peregrinus, qui condemnationem hæreticorum Waldensium ignoret à longe retrò annis factam, tam famosam, tam publicam, tot & tantis laboribus, expensis & sudoribus fidelium insecutam, & tot mortibus ipsorum infidelium solenniter damnatorum, publicéq; punitorum tam fortiter sigillatam? &c. That is, Who is such a stranger that knoweth not the condemnation of Waldenses the heretikes, done and past so many yeres ago, so famous, so publike, followed vpon with so great labors, expences, and trauell of the faithfull, and sealed with so many deaths of these infidels, so solemnly being condemned and openly punished? Whereby wee may see persecution to be no new thing in the church of Christ, when antichrist so long before (euen 300 yeres) began to rage against these Waldenses. In Bohemia likewise after that, the same called by the name of Thaborits (as Syluius recorderh) suffered no little trouble. But neuer persecution was stirred vp against them, or any other people more terrible, then was in these latter yeres in France by the French king, in the yere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred forty fiue, which lamentable story is described in Sleidan, and hereafter, in the procesle of his book, as we come to the order of yeres, shall bee set forth (by the grace of Christ) more at large. In the which persecution is declared in one towne Cabriera, to bee slaine by the captaine of Sathan Minerius, eight hundred persons at once, without respect of women or children of any age, of whom forty women, and most of them great with child, thrust into a barne, and the windowes kept with pikes, and so fire set to them, were all consumed. Besides, in a caue not far from the towne Mullium, to the number of fiue and twenty persons, with smoke and fire were the same time destroied. At Merindolum the same tyrant (seeing all the rest were fled away) finding one young man, caused him to be tied to an oliue tree, and to be destroied with torments most cruelly: with much other persecution, as may appeare hereafter, in the historie translated out of Sleidane into English.

Antichrist with whom he first began his persecution.

An horrible murther of Christs holy martyrs.

Minerius an horrible persecutor.

But to returne againe to higher times, from whence we digressed. Besides that, Reinerius aboue mentioned speaketh of one in the towne of Cheron, a glouer, which was brought in this time to examination, and suffered. There is also an old monument of procesle, wherein appeareth foure hundred forty and three, brought to examination in Pomerania, Marchia, and places thereabouts, about the yere of our Lord one thousand three hundred ninetie and one.

A glouer suffered martyrdom in Cheron.

443 brought to examination.

And thus much touching the origin, doctrine, and the lamentable persecutions of the Waldenses: who, as is declared, first began about the time of this king Henry the second of that name.

Other incidences happening in the raigne of this Henry the second.

Incidences in the raigne of king Henry the second.

COncerning the first origin of the Waldenses, springing in y daies of this king, is sufficiently hitherto declared. Now remaineth in the like order of time, to story also such other incidences as chanced vnder the raigne of the said king, not vnworthy to be obserued, keeping the order of the time so neere as we may, and as authors doe giue vnto vs.

Becket a diuorcer of marriages.

Mary, the daughter of king Stephan, being the abbesse of Ramsele, was maried in this kings daies to Matthew earle of Bullen, which marriage Thomas Becket did worke against, and did dissolue; by reason whereof he procured himselfe great displeasure with the said earle, &c. An. 1161. Ex chronico bibliothecæ Carienſis.

Two children crucified by the Iewes.

The same yere a certaine child was crucified of the Iewes in the towne of Glocester, An. 1161. Iornalens. After the same maner the wicked Iewes had crucified another child before in the citie of Norwich, in the daies of king Stephan, in the yere of our Lord 1145.

A collection was gathered through all England & France, two pence of euery pound, for the succour of the east christians against the Turkes, in the yere of our Lord 1167. Ex eodem.

Babylon vtterly destroied.

Babylon was taken and destroied, and neuer since repaired, by Almaricus king of Hierusalem, An. 1170. Ex vetusto manuscripto exemplari historiæ Carienſis.

In the yere 1173, almost all England was diseased with the cough. Ex vetusto chron. acephalo. About which yere also, William king of Scots was taken in battell and imprisoned in England.

The holy crosse taken with the city of Hierusalem by the Saracens.

Great warre happened in Palestina, wherein the citie of Jerusalem with the crosse and king of the citie, and others of the temple, was taken of the Saracens, and most part of the christians there either slaine or taken. Cruell murther and slaughter there was vsed by the Turke, who caused all the chiefe of the christians to bee brought forth, and beheaded before his face. In so much, that pope Urbanus the third for sorrow died, and Gregory the eighth, next pope after him, lined not two moneths. Then in the daies of pope Clement the third, newes and sorrow growing daily for the losse of Palestina and destruction of the christians, king Henry of England, & Philip the French king, the duke of Burgundy, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Campania, with diuers other christian princes with a generall consent, vpon Saint Georges day, tooke the marke of the crosse vpon them, promising togither to take their voyage into the holy land. At which time, the stories say the king of England receiued first the red crosse, the French king tooke the white crosse, the earle of Flanders tooke the Greene crosse, and so likewise other princes diuersly diuers colours, thereby to be discerned euery one by his proper crosse. But king Henry (after the three yeres were expired, in which he promised to performe his voyage) sent to the pope for further delay of his promise, offering for the same to erect three monasteries. Which thing he thus performed: In the church of Waltham he thrust out the secular priests, and set in monks for them. Secondly, he repaired againe and brought in the nuns of Amesbury, which before were excluded for their incontinent life. And thus performed he his promise made before to the pope, An. 1173.

A voyage against the Turks.

How the difference of the crosses first came in among christian princes.

The kings promises fulfilled to the pope.

The king of Scots did his homage and allegiance to the king of England and to his sonne, and to his chiefe lords, promising that all the earles and barons of Scotland should doe the like with their posterity. Item all the bishops and abbats of the church of Scotland, promised subiection and submission to the archbishop of Yorke, in the yere of our Lord 1175. Nicol. Triuet.

King of Scots doing homage to the king of England.

The church of Scotland ordered by the church of York.

The cuſtome was in this realme, that if any had killed any clerke or priest, he was not to be punished with the temporall sword, but onely excommunicated and sent to Rome for the popes grace and absolution. Which cuſtome in the daies of this king began first to bee altered by the procurement of Richard archbishop of Canturbury, in the yeer of our Lord 1176. Triuet.

Murtherers could not be punished by the popes decrees.

London bridge first began to be made of stone by one Peter, priest of Colechurch, in the yere 1176. Ex chron. cuius initium: In diebus sanctissimi regis Edouardi, &c. Ex Biblioth. Carienſi.

London bridge of stone.

Saint William of Paris was slaine of the Iewes on Maundy thursday, wherefore the Iewes were burned, and he counted a saint, An. 1177.

S. William of Paris.

Ireland subdued to the crowne of England by this king: An. 1177. Ex varijs chron.

Ireland subdued to England.

Vnder the raigne of the said king Henry, about the fiue and twentith yere of his raigne, Ludouicus the French king, by the vision of Thomas Becket appearing vnto him in his dreame, and promising to him the recouery of his sonne, if hee would resort vnto him at Canturbury, made his iourny into England to visit Saint Thomas at Canturbury with Philip earle of Flanders: where he offered a rich cup of gold, with other pretious Iewels, and one hundred vessels of wine yerely to Pilgrimage to Canturbury sprang by a lying vision.

Digitized by Google

to be giuen to the couent of the church of Canturbury, notwithstanding the said Philip in his returne from England, taking his iourny to Paris to visit S. Denis, in the same his pilgrimage was stricken with such cold, that he fell into a palsie, and was benummed of the right side of his body, An. 1178. Iornalensis & alij.

A iust reward for an idolatrous voyage.

Stephanus episcopus Redomensis was wont to make many rimes and gaudish prose to delight the eares of the multitude; to whom a little before his death this verse was sounded in his eare: Desine ludere temerè, nitere properè surgere de pulvere: An. 1178. Nic. Triuet.

Albingenses denied transubstantiation in the sacrament of Christs body and bloud, about the citie of Tholouse; also that matrimony was not a sacrament, &c: in the yeere of our Lord 1178. Ibidem.

Transubstantiation gainsaid.

King Henry separated himselfe from his wife Eleonor, and held her many yeeres in prison, as some thinke for the loue of Rosamund. Which seemeth to me to be the cause why God afterward stirred all his sonnes vp to war against him, and to worke him much sorrow, in the yeere 1179. Nic. Triuet. Notwithstanding the said Eleonor was shortly after reconciled to him.

Queen Eleonor imprisoned.

Saint Fridelwide was translated vnto Oxford, in the yeere 1179.

In the yeere 1180, there came to the councell of pope Alexander one Pisanus Burgundio, a man very cunning both in Greeke and Latine, which brought and presented to the councell the homilies of Chrysostome vpon the Gospell of S. Iohn, translated out of Greeke into Latine, and said that he translated likewise a great part of his exposition vpon Genesis; saying moreouer, that the said Chrysostome had made expositions in Greeke vpon the whole old testament and also the new, in the yeere 1180.

Expositions made by Chrysostome both of the old and new Testament.

The monks of Charterhouse first entred into this land, in the yeere 1180.

The Charterhouse monks.

In the yeere 1181, Richard Pech bishop of Couentry, before his death renounced his bishopricke, and became a canon in the church of S. Thomas by Stafford. Ex chronico peruetusto, cui initium, In diebus sanctiss. regis, &c.

The bishop of Couentry voluntarily renounceth his bishopricke.

About the latter time of this king Henry, one Hugo, whom men were wont to call S. Hugh of Lincolne, borne in Burgundy, and prior of the monks of Charterhouse, was preferred by the king to the bishopricke of Lincolne, who after his death is said to do great miracles, and therefore was counted a saint: An. 1186. Flores hist.

S. Hugh of Lincolne.

Baldwinus archbishop of Canturbury, began the building of his new house and church of Lambeth, but by the letters of Clement the third, he was forbidden to proceed in the building thereof: An. 1187. Triuet.

Lambeth first begun to be built.

I do finde likewise in the foresaid written chronicle remaining in the hands of one William Carie citizen of London, that this forenamed king Henry the second, gaue to the court and church of Rome for the death of T. Becket, forty thousand marks of siluer, and fiue thousand marks of gold, in the yeere of our Lord 1187.

K. Henries gift to the church of Rome for the death of Becket.

Mention was made a little aboue of Almarike king of Hierusalem, which destroied Babylon, so that it was neuer after to this day restored, but lieth waste and desolat; wherein was fulfilled that, which in the prophets in so many places was threatned to Babylon before. This Almarike had a sonne named Baldwin, and a daughter called Sibylla. Baldwin from the beginning of his raigne was a leper, and had the falling sicknesse, being not able for feeblenesse of body (although valiant in heart and stomacke) to satisfie that function.

A worthy story of Sibylla and Guido, in Ierusalem.

Sibylla his sister was first married to one Willermus, marquesse of mount Ferrat, by whom she had a son called also Baldwinus. After him, she was married to another husband, named Guido de Lizimaco earle of Ioppe and of Ascalon. Vpon this befell, that the foresaid Baldwin the leper, sonne of Almaricus, being thus feeble and infirme, as is said, called his nobles togither, with his mother & the patriarke, declaring to them his inability, and by the consents of them committed the vnder-gouernement of the citie vnto Guido the husband of Sibylla his sister. But he being found insufficient, or else not luckie in the gouernement thereof; the office was translated to another named Raimundus earle of Tripolis. In the meane time, the Soldan with his Saracens mightily preuailed against the christians, and ouerran the country of Palestina, in which meane time, Baldwin the king departed. Whereby the kingdome fell next to Baldwinus, the sonne of Sibylla by her first husband Willermus; the which Baldwinus being but fiue yeeres old, was put to the custody of Raimundus aforesaid. Who also in his minority, before he came to his crowne, died: whereby the next succession by descent fel to Sibylla the wife of Guido aboue mentioned. To whom the peeres and nobles ioining togither in counsell, offred vnto the said Sibylla, as to the lawfull heire to the crowne, to be their queene, with this condition, that she should sequester from her by solemn diuorcement the foresaid Guido her husband; but she refused the kingdome offered to her on that condition, till at last the magistrats with the nobles in generall, granted vnto her, and by their oths confirmed the same, that whomsoeuer shee would chuse to be her husband, all they would take and obey as their king. Also Guido her husband with like petition among the rest, humbly requested her, that the kingdom not for his sake, or for his priuat losse, might be destitute of gouernment. At length shee with teares consenting to their intreaty, was contented, and solemnly was crowned their queene, who after the maner again receiued their fidelity by their oth. Whereupon Guido without all hope both of wife and kingdome, departed home quietly to his owne. This done, the queene assembling her states and prelats togither, entred talke with them about the chusing of the king, according to that which they had promised and sworne vnto her, and to obey him as their king, whom she would name to be her husband. Thus, whilest they were all in great expectation, waiting euery man whom she would nominat; the queene with a loud voice said to Guido that stood amongst them: Guido my lord, I chuse thee for my husband, and yeelding my selfe and my kingdome vnto you, openly I protest you to be the king. At these words all the assembly being amazed, wondred that one simple woman so wisely had beguiled so many wise men. And worthy was she no doubt, to be commended and extolled for her singular vertue, both of faithfull chastitie and high prudence: so tempering the matter, that both she obtained to her husband the kingdome, and retained to her selfe againe her husband, whom she so faithfully loued: An. 1186. Ex historia manuscripta, cui initium, Rex Pictorum; ex bibliotheca Carensi mutuata.

A worthy example in Guido of a true subiect to the common wealth.

A singular example of prudence in a princesse, and fidelity in a wife.

As I haue hitherto described the publike acts of king Henry, so now I meane to touch something of his priuat conditions. He was of meane stature, eloquent and learned, manly and bold in chiualry, fearefull of the mutability and chance of warre, more lamenting the death of his souldiers dead, then louing them aliue; none more courteous and liberall for the obtaining of his purpose; in peace & tranquillity none more rough, stubborne against the stubborne, sometimes mercifull to those whom he had banquished, strict to his houshold seruants, but liberall to strangers; publikely of publike things liberall, sparing of his owne, whom once hee tooke a displeasure against, hardly or neuer would he receiue againe to fauor, somewhat lauish of his tongue, a willing breaker of his promise, a louer of his ease, but an oppressor of his nobilitie, a seuere reuenger and furtherer of iustice, variable of word, and craftie in his talke, an open adulterer, a nourisher of discord amongst his children: moreouer, the papists bearing him (for Thomas Becket's quarrell, and such like, as may be gathered) no good will, terme him to be an aduersary of the faith, the mall and beetle of the church.

Also in the chronicle intituled Scala mundi, I finde of him, that he followeth the steps, manners, and conditions of Henry the first his grandfather, in euery point. He preserued firme peace, and executed strict iustice through all his dominions. He loued maruellous well his forrests: and againe, those that were transgressors either to his crowne or person, he most seuerely punished.

Moreouer, in a certaine history intituled De regibus Angliæ, I find that this king was sundry times admonished to reforme and amend his life, and first by one that was an old man in the castell of Cardik in Wales, at that time of the yeere called Dominica in albis, the eighth day after Easter: where also after that he had heard masse, and was going to take his horse, there stood a certaine man by him, somewhat yellowish (his haire being rounded, leane and ill fauored) hauing on a white cote, and being barefoot, loked vpon the king, and spake on this wise: God old king: (that done, thus he proceedeth:) the king saluteth you and his blessed mother, Iohn Baptist, and Peter, straitly charging you, that vpon the sundaies throughout all your dominions there be no buying and selling or other seruile businesse (those only except which appertaine to the preparation of meat and drinke: which thing if thou shalt obserue, whatsoeuer thou takest in hand, thou shalt happily finish and bring to passe. Then spake the king in French vnto the knight that held his horse by the bridle; Aske of this churle whether he dreamed this or not. And in the meane while that the knight should haue interpreted the kings words and message, he spake before and said; Whether this be a dreame or not, marke well what day this is, for vnlesse that thou do these things and amend thy life, such newes shalt thou heare within these twelue months, that will make thee lament and mourne till thy dying day. And when these words were spoken, the man vanished out of his sight; and within one yeere nert after, Henry, Gaufrid, and Richard his sonnes, forsoke him their father, and tooke part with the French king. The king of Scots, the earle of Chester, and earle of Leicester, made an insurrection against the king. Many other premonitions were giuen also to the king, but all these did he little esteeme. The second which did admonish him, was a certaine Irishman, giuing him certaine secret signes. And thirdly, a certaine knight of Findesleie, named Philip de Easterbie, sailing with him ouer into France, declared vnto the king in Normandy seuen articles, which he should amend. Which thing if he would doe, hee should raigne seuen yeeres most honorably, and should take the holy crosse from his enemies: or else he, in the fourth yeere should die in a great ignominie. The three first things were these, which he at his coronation sware

The king admonished to amend his life.

Sunday to be free from buying and selling.

The second and third admonition vnto the king to reforme his life.

A worthy example of a true wife to her husband.

Digitized by Google

sware to obserue, that is, to defend the church, to maintain good lawes, and to condemne no man to death without iudgement. The fourth was, for the restoring of inheritance wrongfully taken; the fifth was to doing iustice without reward; the sixth was of ministers and officers wages and stipends; the seuenth was of expelling the Iewes, leauing them some mony to depart withall. But the king not amending his life, there rose vp against him three strong enemies; that is to say, his three sons with the French king. But after that, the king forsooth had gone on pilgrimage to the martyrs tombe barefoot, William king of Scots, and the earles of Chester and Leicester were taken at Alnewike.

The kings victory was falsly imputed to the cause of his pilgrimage.

In the fiue and thirtith yeere of his raigne, being in the castell of Chiuen in Normandy, he died; at whose death those that were present were so greedy of the spoile, that they left the body of the king naked, and not so much could be found as a cloth to couer it, till that a page comming in, and seeing the king so ignominiously to lie, threw his cloke vpon his nether parts: wherin, saith the author, was verified the surname which from his youth he bare, being called Henry Court mantill.

The death of K. Henry the second.

King Richard.

{Anno 1189} King Richard crowned.

IN this yeere of the Lord aboue recited, which was 1189, king Richard the eldest sonne of Henry the second succeeding his father, entred his crowne; at which time pope Clement sat at Rome, succeeding after Gregory, which died a little before with sorrow for the losse of the holy crosse.

The kings restraint, that no Iew should enter the palace nor church during his coronation.

During the time of whose coronation it befell, that notwithstanding the king the day before his coronation, and by publike edict commanded both the Iewes and their wiues not to presume either to enter the church, or else his palace, during the solemnization of his coronation amongst his nobles and barons, yet (whilest the king was at dinner) the chiefraine of the Iewes, with diuers other of his Iewish affinity and superstitious sect, against the king his prohibition, together with other preasle, entred the court gates. Whereat a christian man being offended, stroke one of them with his hand or fist, and bad him stand further from the court gate, as the king had giuen in commandement: whose example others also following, being displeased against the Iewes, offered them the like contumely. Others also, supposing that the king had so commanded indeed, as vsing the authority of the king, fell vpon all the Iewes that stood by without the court gate. And first they beat them with their fists, but afterwards they take vp stones and such other things as they could get, and threw at them, and beat them therewith: and thus driuing them from the court gates, some of them they wounded, some they slew, and some they left for dead.

A Iew through feare was baptised.

There was amongst this number of the Iewes, one which was called the blessed Iew of Yorke, which was so sore wounded and beaten with the rest, that for feare of his life, he said he would become a christian, and was indeed of William the prior of the church of S. Mary of Yorke baptised, whereby he escaped the perill of death he was in, and the persecutors hands. In the meane while, there was a great rumor spread throughout all the citie of London, that the king had commanded to destroy all the Iewes. Whereupon as well the citizens as innumerable people more, being assembled to see the kings coronation, armed themselues and came together. The Iewes thus being for the most part slaine, the rest fled into their houses, where for a time, through the strong and sure building of them, they were defended. But at length their houses were set on fire, and they destroied therein.

The Iewes in London slaine, and their houses set on fire.

These things being declared to the king, whilest he with his nobles and barons were at dinner, he sendeth immediatly Ranulph de Glanuile, the lord high steward of England, with diuers other noble men to accompany him, that they might stay and refraine these so bold enterprises of the Londoners: but all was in vaine: for in this so great a tumult, none there was that either regarded what the nobility said, or else any whit reuerenced their personages, but rather with sterne lokes and threatning words aduised them (and that quickly) to depart. Whereupon they with good deliberation thinking it the best so to doe, departed, the tumult and insurrection continuing till the next day. At which time also the king sending certaine of his officers into the citie, gaue them in commandement to apprehend and present some such as were the chiefest of the malefactors: of the which, three were condemned to be hanged, and so were; the one, for that he had robbed a christians house in this tumult, and the other two for that they fired the houses, to the great danger of the citie. After this, the king sent for him that from a Iew was conuerted to christianity, and in the presence of those that saw where hee was baptised, the king asked him whether he was become a christian or not: He answering the king, said, No: but to the intent he might scape death, he promised to do what soeuer the christias would haue him. Then the king asked the archbishop of Canturbury (other archbishops and bishops being present) what were best to be done with him: who vnaduisedly answering, said: If he will not be a man of God, let him be a man of the diuell: and so reuolted he againe to Iudaisme.

The small regard of nobility had in tumults and insurrections.

A new christian reuolteth to an old Iew.

An vnaduised answer of an archbishop.

Then the king sent his writs to the shiriffes of euery country, to inquire for the authors and stirrers of this outrage. Of whom three were hanged, diuers were imprisoned. So great was then the hatred of Englishmen against the Iewes, that as soone as they began to be repulsed in the court, the Londoners taking example thereof, fell vpon them, set their houses on fire, and spoiled their goods. The country againe, following the example of the Londoners, semblably did the like. And thus the yeere which the Iewes tooke to be their iubile, was to them a yeere of confusion: in so much, as in the cite of Yorke, the Iewes obtaining the occupying of a certaine castell for their preseruation, and afterward not willing to restore it vnto the christians againe, when they saw no other remedy but by force to be vanquished, first they offered much mony for their liues; when that would not be taken, by the counsell of an old Iew amongst them, euery one with a sharpe rasor cut anothers throte, whereby a thousand and fiue hundred of them were at that present destroied. Neither was this plague of theirs vndeserued; for euery yeere commonly their custome was to get some christian mans child from the parents, and on Goodfriday to crucifie him in despite of our religion. Ex chron. Westm.

Ex chron. Westm. cui initium, Acneas cum Ascanio &c.

A miserable and deserued destruction of the Iewes.

King Richard after the death of his father comming vnto remembrance of himselfe, and of his rebellion against his father, sought for absolution of his trespasse, and in part of satisfaction for the same, agreed with Philip the French king about Easter next ensuing, to take his voiage with him for the recouery of Christ his patrimony, which they called the holy land. Whereupon the said king Richard immediatly after his coronation, to prepare himselfe the better towards his iourny, set to sale diuers of his manors, whereof Godfrey Lucy then bishop of Winchester bought a couple for two thousand marks, to wit, Wergraue and Welenge. The abbat of Bury bought another for a thousand marks, called Middlesay. Hugh Pusaz bishop of Durham bought the lordship of Seggefield, or Sedberga with the wapentake, and all the appurtenance thereto belonging: hee bought also the earldome of Northumberland; whom when the king should solemnize after the maner of secular earles, merily with a mocking iest, Lo (said hee) of an old bishop I haue made a young earle. And because the said bishop had professed before by a solemne vow to visit the holy land, to be released of his vow, he compounded with the pope for a great sum of mony therefore, and moreouer gaue to the king a thousand marks to remaine at home, as the chiefe iustice of England. Muer and besides, the king set out all that he had to sale, woods, castels, townships, lordships, earledoms, baronages, &c. ordaining also diuers new bishops, & not without some aduantage (as appeared) to his purse, fayning moreouer his old seale to be lost, that they which had lands to hold, might be driuen to renew their writings againe by the new seale, whereby great substance of mony was gained.

{Anno 1189}

The couetous greedinesse of bishops noted in buying great lordships.

Sleights to get mony.

Aboue all this, by the commandement of pope Clement the third, a tenth also was exacted of the whole realme, in such sort, as the christians should make to the king 70000 pounds, the Iewes 60000: Ex Geru. fol. 134. King Richard after his coronation, sent certaine earles and barons vnto Philip the French king in the time of his parliament at S. Denis, desiring him to remember his promise made for the recouery of Christ his holy patrimony out of the Saracens hands. Vnto whom he sent word againe in the moneth of Nouember, certifying him how he had bound himselfe by solemne oth, depositing vpon the euangelists, that he the next yeere following about the time of Easter, had certainly prefixed to addresse himselfe towards that iourny, requiring him likewise not to faile but to be ready at the terme aboue limitted, appointing also the place where both the kings should meete together.

A tenth gathered through all England.

King Philip and king Richard conclude to trauell to the holy land.

The next yeere then ensued, which was 1190, in the beginning of which yeere, vpon Twelfe euen, fell a foule northerne brawle, which turned well neere to a fray, betweene the archbishop new elected of the church of Yorke, and his company on the one side, and Henry deane of the said church with his catholike partakers on the other side, vpon occasion as followeth: Gaufridus or Geffry, sonne to king Henry the second, and brother to king Richard, whom the king had elected a little before to the archbishoprick of Yorke, vpon the euen of Epiphany, which we call Twelfe day, was disposed to heare euensong with all solemnity in the cathedrall church, hauing with him Hamon the chanter, with diuers other canons of the church. Who tarying something long, belike in adorning and attiring himselfe, in the meane while Henry the deane and Bucardus the treasuror, disdaining to tarry his comming, with a bold courage lustily began their holy euensong, with singing their psalmes, rusling of descant, and merry piping of organs. Thus this catholike euensong with as much deuotion begun, as to Gods high seruice proceeding, was now almost halfe compleat, when as at length (they being in the midst of their mirth) commeth in the new elect with his traine and gardeuians, all full of wrath and indignation, for that they durst be so bold, not waiting for him, to begin Gods seruice, and so eftsones commanded the quier to stay and hold their peace. The chanter likewise by vertue of his office commandeth the same,

{Anno 1190}

A northerne brawle in the cathedrall church of Yorke, betweene the new archbishop and the deane.

Henry deane of Yorke and Bucard begin seruice, not tarying for their archbishop.

Digitized by Google

The deane and treasurer would not cease euensong at the archbishops commandement.

same. But the deane and treasuror on the other side willed them to proceed; and so they sung on and would not stint. Thus the one halfe crying against the other, the whole quire was in a roze, their singing was turned to scolding, their chanting to chiding; and if in stead of the organs they had had a drum, I doubt they would haue solefaed by the eares together.

The archbishop beginneth euensong againe being halfe done before.

At last, through the authority of the archbishop and of the chanter, the quier began to surcease and giue silence. Then the new elect not contented with that had been sung before, with certaine of the quier began the euensong new againe. The treasuror vpon the same, caused by vertue of his office the candles to be put out: whereby the euensong hauing no power further to proceed, was stopped forthwith. For like as without the light and beames of the Sun there is nothing but darknes in all the world, euen so you must vnderstand the popes church can see to doe nothing without candle light, albeit the Sun doe shine neuer so cleere and bright. This being so, the archbishop thus disappointed on euery side of his purpose, made a greeuous plaint, declaring to the clergy and to the people, what the deane and treasuror had done, and so vpon the same suspended both them and the church from all diuine seruice, till they should make to him due satisfaction for their trespasse.

The treasurer putteth out the candles at euensong.

The popes church can doe nothing without candle light.

The deane and church of Yorke suspended by the archbishop from diuine seruice.

The next day, which was the day of Epiphany, when all the people of the citie were assembled in the cathedrall church, as their maner was, namely in such feasts, deuoutly to heare diuine seruice (as they call it) of the church, there was also present the archbishop, & the chanter, with the residue of the clergy, looking when the deane and treasuror would come and submit themselues, making satisfaction for their crime. But they still continuing in their stoutnesse, refused so to doe, exclaiming and vttering contemptuous words against the archbishop and his partakers. Which when the people heard, they in a great rage would haue fallen vpon them: but the archbishop would not suffer that. The deane then and his fellowes perceiuing the stir of the people, for feare, like pretie men were faine to flee, some to the tombe of S. William of Yorke, some ran vnto the deans house, and there shrowded themselues, whom the archbishop then accursed. And so for that day the people returned home without any seruice. Ex veteri chronico manuscripto, cui initium, Anno gratiæ millesimo, &c.

The stoutnesse of the deane and treasurer, in not submitting themselues to the archbishop.

The people incensed against the deane of Yorke and his canons.

Ex chron. anonymo, cui initium: Anno gratiæ.

After this, king Richard preparing to set all things in an order before his going, committed the whole gouernment of the realme principally to William, bishop of Ely, his chancellor, and to Hugh bishop of Durham, whom he ordained to be the cheefe iustice of all England in his absence; the one to haue the custody of the tower, with the ouersight of all other parts of the land on this side of Humber: the other (which was the bishop of Durham) to haue charge vpon all other his dominions beyond Humber, sending moreouer vnto pope Clement in the behalfe of the foresaid William bishop of Ely, to be made the popes legat through all England and Scotland; which also was obtained. Thus the bishop being aduanced in high authority, to furnish the king towards his setting forth, prouideth out of euery citie in England two palfreies, and two sumpters, and also out of euery abby one palfrey and one sumpter.

King Richard prepareth towards his iournie.

William bishop of Ely the kings chancelor, and Hugh bishop of Durham made chiefe ouerseers of the realme in the kings absence.

William bishop of Ely made the popes legat in England and Scotland.

These things and other thus set in a stay, the king according to his former appointment, about the time of Easter, sailed into France, where the French king and he conferring together, because they could not make ready at that time of Easter, concluded to take a longer day, proroging their voyage till after Midsummer. In which meane time, the king occupying himselfe in redressing & stablishing such things as further were to be ordered, there determined that Gaufridus and John his brethren, should not enter into England in three yeeres after his departure; neuertheless hee released that bond afterward to his brother John. Then he appointed the captaines and constables ouer his nauie, and set lawes to be obserued in his iournie vpon the seas; but especially his care was to make vnitie and concord betweene parties that were at variance, and to set them together at one. At which time the long contention began also to be appeased, which so many yeers had continued betweene Baldwinus archbishop of Canturbury, and his monks of Christs church: the discourse whereof, although it be somwhat tedious to be set forth at large, being enough to make a whole tragedy; yet to the intent this age now present may see what great conflicts and disquietnesse, vpon what little trifles haue been stirred vp, what little peace and vnity hath bin not only in this church, but commonly in all other churches vnder the popes catholike regiment, I thought it labor not ill bestowed, somewhat to intermeddle in opening to the eies of the reader the consideration of this matter. Wherin first is to be vnderstood, that the archbishops of Canturbury, commonly being set vp by the pope, especially since the time of the conquest, haue put the kings of this land to much sorrow and trouble, as appeared by William Rufus and Lanfranke, and also Anselme; by Henry the first and Anselme, king Stephan and Theobald, Henry the second and Becket, &c. For which the kings of this land haue vsed the more care and circumspection, to haue such archbishops placed in the sea, as either should stand with them, or at the least should not be against them.

Captaines and constables of the kings nauie appointed.

The long contention betwixt Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury and the monks of Christs church.

Archbishops of Canturbury commonly were wont to worke the kings of England much sorrow.

Kings of England euer carefull about the chusing of the archbishop, and wherefore.

Ex chron. Geruas.

Now to the purpose of our matter intended. First, after Lanfrancus, who was archbishop twenty yeeres, the sea standing vacant fiue yeeres, succeeded Anselmus, and sat seuenteen yeeres; after whom the sea standing vacant foure yeeres, succeeded Radulphus and continued nine yeeres: then followed William, who sat twelue yeeres, and died in the yeere 1137: after whom came Theobaldus in the time of king Stephan. This Theobaldus being no great fauorer of the monkish generation, fell out with Jeremias prior of the house of Canturbury for certains causes betweene them, for which the archbishop taking stomacke against the prior, would lay the sentence of interdiction against him. The prior seeing that, to saue himselfe, made his appeale to pope Innocent. The archbishop prouoked the more by that, deposed him from the priorship, & placed one Walter in his roome. Jeremias notwithstanding making his complaint and appeale to Rome, obtained letters from the pope to Henry bishop of Winchester being the popes legat, by the vertue whereof, he against the heart of the archbishop was restored, and Walter displaced. Neuertheless, the said Jeremy, not willing there to cõtinue with displeasure of the archbishop, shortly after of his owne accord renounced his priory, and Walter againe was receiued in his stead. Not long after this followed the generall councell of Rhemes, in the yeere 1140. To the which councell Theobald contrary to the commandement of the king would needs resort, to shew his obedience to the pope. Wherefore at his returning home againe, the king tooke such displeasure with him, that within a while after the archbishop was driuen to auoid the realme, and flie into France, where he by censure of interdiction, suspended diuers churches and religious houses which refused to come to the councell; and also hearing how the king had seized vpon all his goods, he interdicted likewise all the kings lands, what soeuer belonged to the crowne: so that the king in conclusion was faine to compound with him, and fall to agreement, which was about the yeere 1148. Ex Geruasio.

Dijs, as some reckon.

Jeremy the prior of Canturbury appeaseth to pope Innocent.

Jeremy the prior deposed by the archbishop.

Jeremy restored to his place againe by the pope.

Concilium Rhemense. an. 1140.

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1151, after the death of Hugh abbat of S. Aultens in Canturbury, Siluester was elected by the couent to be their abbat in the raigne of king Stephan. Which Siluester when he came vnto Theobald the archbishop to make his profession of subiection vnto him, and to receiue of him consecration; the archbishop was contented, so that the abbat would come to Christs church in Canturbury, and there make his profession. But to this Siluester in no case would grant to take his consecration there, but else in any other church, wheresoeuer the archbishop would, he was contented. Whereunto when the archbishop in no wise would agree, Siluester making a great bag of mony, went to Rome, where he obtained of the pope for mony (for what cannot mony doe at Rome?) letters that the archbishops should consecrat the abbat in his owne church of S. Aultsen, and also not exact of him any profession of canonicall subiection. Whereupon the archbishop was compelled against his will to come to the abbats church, and there at the popes commandement to consecrat him simply, and without any further profession to be required.

A friuolous strife betwen Theobald archbishop, and Siluester abbat of saint Aultens about the place, in what church the abbat should take his consecration.

Siluester goeth vp to Rome.

Then Walter prior of Christs church in Canturbury seeing that, and perceiuing how preiudiciall and derogatory the example thereof would be to the honour and maiesty of their church, through counsell of his brother went thither: and notwithstanding the doores were straitly watched and kept; yet by meanes he at last got in. And as he saw the archbishop attired in his pontificalibus, ready to minister consecration to the abbat, he stepped straight to the archbishop, & eftsones appealeth him to Rome, for the great iniury wrought against the church of Canturbury; forbidding him in the name of him to whom he appealed, not to proceed any further. And so this holy consecration was for ỳ present time staid. For the which Siluester with a new purse of mony was faine to trauell and trot againe to Rome, where he complaining of the archbishop, and accusing him of contempt of the pope, in not executing the commandement sent downe, obtaineth againe new letters with more effectuall charge to the foresaid archbishop, that hee without any profession, simply should giue to Siluester his consecration in his owne church, Omni occasione & appellatione remota, All maner of stay, or let, or appellation to the contrary notwithstanding. And so in conclusion, the abbat contrary to whatsoeuer the archbishop and all the monks of Canturbury would doe, was in his owne church made abbat, and had the victory for that time. Notwithstanding, the archbishop left not the matter so, but within fiue yeers after obtained of pope Adrian, that Siluester should make profession of his obedience to the archbishop, and so did. Ex Geruas.

The monks of Christs church striue against the monks of S. Aultsen in Canturbury for the honor of their house.

Walter prior of Christs church appealeth the archbishop vnto Rome.

Siluester trudgeth againe to Rome.

Siluester consecrated abbat in his owne church, whether the archbishop would or not.

In few yeeres after this, died king Stephan, An. 1154, and after him Theobald the archbishop, An. 1159, after he had sat three and twenty yeeres: after whom through the instant procurement of king Henry the second, was placed Thomas Becket, the kings chancellor, An. 1162, of whose sturdy rebellion against the king, because sufficient hath been said before, it shall not need to make a double labor now about the same.

After the death of Becket, much ado there was betweene king Henry and Odo prior of Canturbury about the election of a new archbishop. For the king seeing the realme so oftentimes incumbred by those popish archbishops, and fearing lest the the monks of Canturbury should elect such another as would follow the steps of Thomas Becket, most humbly with cap in hand and curteſie of knee, desired Odo the prior, that at his requeſt, and for contentation of his mind, such a one might be elected whom he would appoint (appointing and naming a certaine bishop, which was a good simple man after the kings liking) but the prior dissemblingly answering the king againe, that he neither could nor would without the consent of his couent giue promise to any man: in fine, contrary to the kings so humble requeſt, agreed to the election of another, which was the prior of Douer, called Richard, An. 1173, who continued in that sea eleuen yeeres.

Odo prior of Canturbury.

Richard prior of Douer eleted archbishop of Canturbury, An. 1173.

And here was renewed againe the like variance betweene this archbishop and Roger abbat of the Auſten monks in Canturbury, as was before mentioned betweene Theobaldus and Siluester. For when the said Roger after his election to be abbat, must needs take his consecration at the archbishops hand, neither would the archbishop grant it vnto him, vnleſſe hee made profession of obedience, according to the ancient custome of his predeceſſors: then Roger consulting with his monks, first denied so to doe, but at length was contented, so it might not be done in the archbishops church, but in any other church where he would, vnderwriting this clause withall, Saluis vtriuſque eccleſiæ priuilegijs: that is, Sauing the priuileges of both churches. To this the archbishop said againe; first that he should make his due and canonicall profession, and that hee should not come to him with writing or vnderwriting, but should say in his heart, Salue ſancta parens, or Salue feſta dies, not Saluis priuilegijs, or any such like thing. Whereunto when the Auſten monks in no case would consent, nor the archbishop otherwise would grant his benediction: Roger the abbat was faine to post to Rome, and there to bring the archbishop in hatred in the court of Rome, made his abby tributary to pope Alexander.

Another frinolous contention betweene Richard archbishop, and Roger abbat of the Auſten monks in Canturbury about profeſſion of obedience.

Roger abbat of S. Auſtens, maketh his house tributary to pope Alexander, An. 1177.

The pope well contented with this, not only granteth the abbat his desire, but also in contumely of the archbishop, dubbeth the abbat with all such ornaments as to a prelat appertained; and so in the yeere 1178, sent home the abbat triumphantly with his ring and miter, and other ensignes of victory, with letters also to the archbishop, inioyning him immediatly vpon the sight thereof to consecrat the abbat in his owne church, and without making any profession. Although with these letters the archbishop was shrewdly pressed, yet notwithstanding his stout heart would not stoope for this, but laid his appeale against the same, and so the consecration for that time was suſpended.

Roger the abbat returneth home with triumph.

Appellation of the archbishop.

Then Roger for his more defence, getting the kings letters, trauelled vp the second time to Rome, where grieuously he complained to pope Alexander of the archbishop. At the same time a generall councell was summoned to be kept at Lateran, where Richard the foresaid archbishop was also loked for amongſt other bishops to be present. Who then came as far as Paris; but being there, durſt approch no further, and so retired home againe. Whereupon the pope being offended with his contempt, without any more delay exalted the abbat with his owne consecration, and inuested him with all pompe and glory; howbeit prouiding before that the said consecration should redound to no preiudice againſt the liberties of the mother church of Canturbury, and so vpon the same wrote to the archbishop his letters of certificat, with this additiõ annexed, Saluo iure & dignitate Cant. eccleſiæ: that is to say, Sauing the liberties and dignitie of the church of Canturbury, &c.

Concilium Lateranum ſub Alexandro papa.

Roger abbat of saint Auſten trauelleth vp again to Rome.

Roger abbat consecrated at Rome by the pope.

After the councel ended, Roger the abbat returneth home, although with an empty purſe, yet full of victory and triumph. The archbishop againe thinking to worke some greeuance to the Auſten monks, had procured in this meane time letters from pope Alexander vnto the bishop of Durham, and abbat of saint Albons, that they should cauſe the said Roger abbat of the Auſten monks, to shew vnto the archbishop all the old priuileges of his house; which indeed being shewed, ſeemed to be raced & new written, with buls of lead, not after the maner nor ſtile of that age, nor pretending any such antiquity as should ſeeme to reach from the time of Auſten, but rather newly counterfet.

The house of the Auſten monks in Canturbury not able to shew for them any deeds or writings of antiquity.

All this notwithſtanding, the abbat bearing him bold vpon the popes fauor, ceaſed not still to diſquiet and ouercrow the archbishop by all waies he could, in exempting all his prieſts and lay men belonging to his iuriſdiction, from the archbishops obedience, forbidding also that none of his should come to his chapters or synods, nor to feare any sentence of his curſe or excommunication. Whereupon the archbishop about the moneth of November the same yeere, sailing ouer to Normandy where the king was, thought to take his iourny to the pope to complaine of the abbat: but being staied by the king, was not suffered to paſſe any further, the king laboring what he could, to bring them to agreement. Neuertheleſſe the pope and his Romans (saith my story) Aurum & argentum magis quàm iuſtitiam ſitientes, ſeditiones inter eos & litigia commouebant: that is, Carting more for gold and siluer, then for iuſtice, ſtill ſtirred coles of ſedition and debate betweene them. Ex hiſtoria Geruaſij.

Ex hiſt. Geruaſij. Richard the archbishop going towards Rome to complaine of the abbat, was staied by the king.

A catholike practiſe of the Romiſh court to set men together at variance that they might get their mony.

The next yeere after this ensuing, which was the yeere of our Lord 1184, died Richard the archbishop aforesaid, in the eight and thirtith yeere of king Henry the second. After whose decease much trouble happened about the election of a new archbishop, betweene the king and monks of Canturbury. And now to enter here into the story of Baldwin aboue mentioned: firſt the king sent to the monks, that they should consider with themselues about the election of their archbishop, and to be ready againſt the time that hee would send for them to the court. Vpon this the couent gladly assembling together, agreed in themselues vpon one, whom they thought chiefly to prefer; yet naming foure more, that if the king would refuse one, the other yet might stand. Now the practiſe in the monks was, firſt to keepe the election onely in their owne hands, as much as they could. And secondly, ruer to giue the election either to some prior or monke of their owne house, or to some abbat or bishop, which sometimes had been of their company. Whereby, as much inconuenience and blind superſtition was hyed in the church of England; so the same diſliked both the king and the bishops not a little.

Trouble in chuſing the archbishop of Canturbury after the death of Richard.

Monks of Canturbury sent for by king Henry the second about chuſing of their archbishop.

Monks of Canturbury partiall in chuſing their archbishop.

As this paſſed on, the king when he saw his time, willed the monks of Canturbury to bee cited or sent for, to vnderſtand what they had concluded in their election. Whereupon the monks sent vp their prior called Alanus, with certaine other monks to Reading, where the king then lay, about the moneth of Auguſt. Who at firſt were courteously entertained; but after the king had intelligence whom they had nominated & elected, they were sent home againe with cold chéere, the king willing them to pray better, and to aduiſe more earneſtly vpon the matter amongſt themselues. Alanus the prior with his fellowes thus departed, who comming home, in concluſion, so concluded amongſt themselues, that they would remit no iot of their liberties to the king, without the popes consent and knowledge. The king vnderſtanding hereof, sent his ambaſſadors likewise to the pope, for the fortifying of his cauſe, being in the meane time greeuously offended with the prior, saying, that hee was proud, and would make archbishop whom he liſted, and would be the second pope in England, &c.

Monks of Canturbury againe sent for to the king about their election.

Alanus prior of Canturbury.

The king offended with the prior and monks of Canturbury.

The ſtubbornneſſe of the monks againſt the king.

Not long after this, as these letters were sent vp to Rome, the king sent for Alanus the prior, and more of the monks to come to him; whom he intreated, deſiring them in gentle ſpeech, that they would shew so much gentlenes and fauor to him being their lord and king, as becommeth his friends and subiects to do, as to conferre with the bishops of the realme about this matter, and to take some better counſell, so as might redound to Gods glory, his honor, and wealth of the publike ſtate: with other like words to the same effect.

The king ſendeth to Rome againſt the monks.

The kings gentle words to the monks.

To whom when the prior had answered againe with thanks and due reuerence, according to the kings requeſt, the bishops and monks went to conferre together about the matter. And firſt, the bishops maruelled why the monkes should exclude them out of the election, ſeeing they were profeſſed and ſuffragans to the said church of Canturbury: Neither is there any prince, quoth the bishop of Bathe, that will refuſe our counſell. There be some councels, said the monks, whereat you may be called: but as touching the doing of this election, it pertaineth not vnto you, further then to publiſh onely & denounce the party whom we haue chosen. The bishop of London then asked, if they had already made any election. No election, said the prior, as yet, but onely wee haue denominate the perſons. Then haue ye proceeded further, quoth he, then ye ought, hauing commandement from the pope, not to proceed without vs. And with that was brought forth the popes letter, commanding that within forty daies the bishops of England and the prior, and couent of Canturbury should elect an able and fit perſon to their archbishop. About the scanning of these letters was much adoe. The bishops said, they were firſt named, and therefore ought to haue moſt intereſt in this election. The monks said againe, that they also were not excluded, and required to haue a tranſcript of the letter, whereof much doubt was made.

Bishops of England claim to haue intereſt in the election of the archbishop of Canturbury.

The popes letter, commanding the bishops of the realme with the prior and couent, to chuſe the archbishop.

After long concertation, when they could not agree, the king comming betweene them both, called away the bishops from the monks, ſuppoſing by ſeparating one from the other, to draw both parties to his ſentence. But that would not be, for the monks ſtiffly ſtanding to their liberties, would loſe no preheminence of their church, ſtill alleaging how by the ancient priuileges of the church of Canturbury, the couent ſhould chuſe their paſtor and bishop, and the prior to publiſh and denounce the perſon. The bishops againe replied, that it was their right to appoint their archbishop and metropolitan, which were bishops and ſuffragans, and namely the bishop of London also being deane of the said church of Canturbury. The king then as vmpire betweene them, yet fauoring rather the ſide of the bishops, deſired them to agree together in peace. When that would not preuaile, hee ſet the lord Steward, and other noble men to intreat the prior to draw to some agreement: at leaſt to be contented with this forme of election, which was, that the bishop of London or some other bishops should declare the election in these words:

The king ſeparateth the biſhops from the monks.

The monks will loſe no preheminence of their church.

We biſhops, and the prior and couent of Chriſts Church in Canturbury, with the aſſent of our lord the king, doe chuſe ſuch

The forme of election of the archbishop set betweene the bishops and the monks of Canturbury.

such a person to be archbishop, &c. Or else thus; that the prior should pronounce forth the election in these words, saying: The bishops of England, and I prior, and the couent of Canturburie, with the assent of our lord and king, doe chuse such a person, &c.

The bishops & monks could not agree about the forme of election.

Upon this, the prior said hee would conuent with his couent. Who with much adoo were content to grant to the kings desire; but afterward being required to put downe the same in writing, that they refused to doe: yet notwithstanding relented at last to the king. But when the bishops made excuses for the absence of their fellow bishops, so the matter for that time staid; and the king sending home the monks againe to their house in peace, deferred that businesse to a further day, which was til the first day of December; commanding the prior with his fellowes the same day not to faile, but to be at London about the chusing of the archbishop.

The election of the archbishop deferred to the moneth of December, An. 1184.

As the day prefixed came, the prior with his companie were also present, who giuing attendance all that day and the next day also following, so were driuen off till the third day after. At length the lord Steward, with other nobles of the realme, were sent vnto them from the king, to declare, that whereas the king before had diuided the bishops from the monkes, that they both might haue their election by themselues, after the forme of a bill which was put downe in writing: now the mind of the king was, that the monks taking another way, should ioyne with the bishops, and so hauing the matter in talke together, should proceed iointly in the election.

The kings message to the monks of Canturbury to agree and ioine with the bishops.

Against this, many things were alleaged by the prior and his mates, complaining much vpon the bishops, which said that the bishops had euer holden with the kings against the liberties of their church and archbishops. As first they stood against Anselme for king William; then against Theobald for king Stephan; after that, against Thomas Becket for king Henry; and after him, did supplant the election of Richard their archbishop; and now againe went about to practise and worke against this their election present, &c. At last the prior with his fellowes concluding, desired they might speake with the king himselfe. Who eftsoones comming vnto them, willed them as good men to be contented, and goe talke with the bishops about the election, promising that whom they agreed vpon, he also would grant his assent vnto the same. To whom when the prior againe had obiected the writings that before were made: Truth it is (said the king) such writings were made, but I neither may nor will goe against the counsell of my realme; and therefore agree, said he, with my bishops and abbats, and remember that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

The kings words to the monks of Canturbury.

Upon this the prior with his monks, seeing no other remedie, went to the bishops to confer, according to the king his request, about the election, who then were willed by the bishops to nominat whom they would, and the bishops would likewise name theirs. So that when the prior with his complices had named three after their chusing, the bishops said they would nominat but one; and so did, which was the bishop of Worcester, willing the prior to go home, and to cõfer with his couent about the same. To whom shortly after, the bishops sent certaine priests to signifie to the couent, that they according to the popes letters, should repaire to the bishops concerning the election of the archbishop; also to declare moreouer to them, that the persons whom they had named were good men: but he whom they had nominated was a more worthy man, whom they both had nominated, and also would elect. The monks maruelling hereat, sent two monks with the archdeacon of Canturbury to the king.

The monks of Canturbury compelled against their wils to ioine with the bishops touching the election of the archbishop.

This done, immediatly after the returne of the priests, the bishops caused all the bels of the city to be rung, and Te Deum to be sung for the archbishop new elect. Whereof when the two monks brought tidings to the couent at Canturbury what was done at London, they were all in a maruellous dumpe. The king hearing this, & perceiuing the stiffnes of the monks, in al hast sent messengers to Canturbury with gentle words, to will the prior to come to the king, and certifie him of the purpose of his monks. Vnto whom the prior eftsoones being come, declareth in the name of the whole couent, that in no case he nor the monks would euer while the world stood, agree to that election of the bishops, vnlesse the king in his owne person would come to Canturbury, and there openly before the whole couent, protest by his owne mouth the foresaid election to be nought and void, and so returning to London againe, openly likewise before the clergy and the people would repudiat and reiect the same: and furthermore, that the partie also elected, should openly in the same place protest and say, that he neither would nor ought to take that function vpon him, vnlesse he entred by the consent of the prior and couent of Canturbury: and all this to be done in the same place where the bishops had made their election before: and so peraduenture (said they) at the kings so earnest sute and request, they would gratifie his will, and ratifie the said election with the voices of their consent. To make the story short, after great hold betweene the secular clergy on the one side, and the regular order on the other side, and after the kings indignation against the prior, and the swounding of the prior before the king, at length the king to take vp the matter, and to saue the priors life, was faine to performe in his owne person all those conditions aboue prescribed by the monks. Ex Geruas. fol. 100.

Bishops of the realme make their election of the archbishop without the monks of Canturbury.

Conditions prescribed to the king by the monks of Canturbury, for the ratification of the archbishop made by the bishops.

Baldwin bishop of Worcester elected archbishop of Canturbury, An. 1184.

And thus haue ye heard the tragicall election of the bishop of Worcester, named Baldwin, made archbishop of Canturbury. Now what a troublesome time the said Baldwin had with the monks in gouerning the church of Canturbury, here followeth likewise not vnworthy to be considered.

The troubles betweene Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury, and the monks of the same Church.

IN the first yeere the archbishop shewed himselfe friendly and louing to the monks, the next yeere following he began to appeare somewhat rough vnto them. The maner then was of the house of Christs church towards the time of the Natiuity and of Easter, to receiue certaine presents or gifts of their farmers or tenants, which the cellarer should take and lay vp. Those presents the archbishop began first to intercept from the monks, and to bestow them vpon his secular clerks. After this he tooke three churches or benefices (which the monks claimed as proper to themselues) and placed in them three of his chaplens. After this, hee incroacheth to his hands certaine tenements, reuenewes, and victuals, belonging before to the monks (as they said) and committed the custody thereof to certaine of his own clerks and houshold seruants.

The great trouble and contention betweene Baldwin archbishop and the monks of Canturbury.

The monks which had borne so much with the archbishop before, seeing this, could forbeare him no longer, but needs would make their appeale against him. The archbishop not much regarding that, wared therby more fierce against them, in so much that such farmes and tenements as he before had let alone, now he receiued to his own occupying, with many other grieuances wherewith hee greatly vexed the monks, so that three abbats were faine to come and reconcile the archbishop and the monks: which reconciliation was this, that the monks should let fall their appeale, and the archbishop should restore againe to them their farmes and tenements. But as touching the benefices and the presents, the archbishop still kept them in his hands for a further triall of their obedience and patience. Neuertheless, some there were of the ancient monks, which in no case would giue ouer the foresaid appeale, before the archbishop made a full restitution of all together.

The monks of Canturbury appeale to the pope against their archbishop.

Reconciliation betweene the archbishop and the monks, which did not long hold.

After this agreement, such as it was, betweene the monks and him, the archbishop soone after sent vp to Rome one of his chaplens (vnto whom he had giuen one of the benefices afore mentioned) partly for confirmation of his benefice, partly also to obtaine licence for the archbishop to build a church, which he intented to erect of secular priests neere vnto the town of Canturbury. Which being obtained of the pope, the archbishop not a little glad thereof, began now more and more to war fierce against the monks, not onely in taking from them their churches and oblations, but also in aggrauating the whole state of their house, which he intended either to subuert, or greatly to diminish to plucke downe the pride & stubbornes of the monks. Wherefore taking with him certaine other bishops (whom he knew bare no good will to that monkish generation) he went to the king, declaring how he had a good purpose in his mind to erect a new and a solemne church in the honor of S. Thomas of Canturbury, of secular priests or canons; and therefore desired of the king to haue his fauorable licence to the same. The king right well perceiuing the purpose of the archbishop whither it tended, as to the bridling of the stifnecked monks, was the more willing to giue assent, if he were not also the chiefe worker of that matter himselfe.

The archbishop sendeth to the pope.

The archbishop goeth about to plucke downe the pride of the monks of Canturbury.

Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury about to build a new church on the north side of Canturbury.

The intent of the archbishop in planting of that new church, was to found there diuers prebends, & to make both the king and euery bishop being his suffragans, prebendaries thereof, so that euery one of them should confer one prebendship to the same foundation, minding there to consecrat bishops, to make his chrismatory, to celebrat his synods, and to administer all other things belonging vnto the function of his sea, and the same to be called Hakington church. The monks not ignorant how the archbishop priuily intended the desolation and subuersion of their house and liberties, consulting vpon the matter, determined at length among themselues to appeale to the sea of Rome, namely for these three causes against the archbishop: First, for spoiling them of their gifts and oblations: secondly, for depriuing them of their churches and benefices: and thirdly, for erecting a new foundation of secular canons, to the derogation and ouerthrow of their religious order, giuing admonition to the archbishop before by their monks sent to him of this their appellation. To whom the archbishop answered, that the foundation which hee went about, was to no derogation, but rather to the fortification and honor of their house. Who answered againe, that it was, & could not otherwise be, but to their subuersion. And what should let me then (said the archbishop) but I may build in mine owne ground what I will? No (said they) no ground of yours, but your ground is our ground, as all other things that you haue by right are ours, for

The purpose of the archbishop in building his new church at Canturbury.

Hakington church.

The monks of Canturbury make their appeale against Baldwin their archbishop.

Three causes alleaged against the archbishop by the monks.

The monks of Canturbury claime all the goods of the archbishop to be their owne.

for so much as you haue them not of your selfe, but of the church and for the churches cause. All which things haue ben giuen neither to you, nor to the archbishops, but vnto the church of Christ: and therefore (said they) all such as apperteine vnto vs inwardly and outwardly, with the persons also, and the whole state of our church we submit vnder the popes protection: and now here make our appeale to the see apostolike, assigning also the terme when to prosecute the same.

The monks put themselues and their house in the popes protection.

Appellation against the archbishop.

The archbishop receiuing this appellation, and saying that he would answere to the same either by himselfe, or by his sonsall, so within three daies after, which was the sixteenth of December, he came to Canturburie: where the monks vnderstanding how he was in mind to place new secular priests in the church of S. Stephan, where the monks had serued before, came to the church to stop the proceeding of the archbishop by way of appeale. Whereof the archbishop hauing warning before, deferred the matter till the next day after. On which day the monks againe being sent by Honorius the prior into the church, charged the archbishop in the name of almightie God, and by vertue of their appeale made to the apostolike see, to forcease those his doings, forbidding also the parson of the church in no wise to suffer those secular clerks to bee admitted into the church. All which yet notwithstanding the archbishop proceedeth in his businesse. And first placing in his clerks hee suspendeth the prior from his administration. Then he adiureth the porters of the gate vpon their oth to let none of the monks passe out of the house without his licence. The monks likewise he commanded by vertue of obedience, not to stray any where abrode without his leaue. And furthermore, one of the foresaid monks, which serued the appeale against him, hee vterly banished from that couent. Vpon this, the day next following, Honorius the prior trusting (saith the storie) on God, and S. Thomas, toke his way to Rome, sent in commission by the couent, to prosecute the appeale against the archbishop.

Businesse betweene the monks and the archbishop for placing secular clerks in the church of S. Steyhans in Canturburie.

The prior of Canturburie suspended.

In this meane season a new iar began betweene the said archbishop and the monks, about their rents and reuenues, which the archbishop would haue committed to the receiuing and keeping of three monks; but the supprior Geffrey, with the couent, in no ease would suffer that: whereabout there was a foule stir. The archbishop craning the aid of the king, first had three bishops sent downe to him, of Couentrie, Norwich and Worcester. Who being instant with the monks to submit their cause into the kings hands, like as the archbishop had done, they vtterly refused it; especially seeing they had already referred the whole state of their cause to the determination of the apostolicall see. The king seeing no other remedie came himselfe with the archbishop into the chapter house, where hee commanded first the doores to be kept fast, that none should enter but which by name were called for. Amongst whom were two bishops, to wit, of Norwich, and Durham, and one Petrus Blesensis a learned man (whose epistles be yet extant in libraries) a chiefe worker in this matter against the monks. Then was called in Geffrey the supprior, with a few other monks whom he brought with him. The king then first talking with the archbishop, and his companie, and afterwards with the monks, laboured to intreate them that they would let fall their appeale, and so stand to the arbitrement of him and of the bishops, concerning the cause which was betweene the archbishop and them in trauerse.

An other garboile betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop.

The king commeth into the chapter of Canturburie.

Petrus Blesens. a great doer against the monks.

The king intreateth peace betweene the monks and the archbishop.

To this the monks answered, that these were good words, but serued not for that time, for so much as their cause was alreadie translated to the court of Rome, and now was presently in hearing before the popes holinesse: and therefore they could not, ne would do that iniurie to their lord pope, to refuse him, and to put the matter vnto the iudgement of any other. Then was it required of the monks, that they would put the matter in compromise, in case the prior would consent thereto; vpon this intent, that if the prior consented and the monks not, then should they run in contempt and disobedience: or if the monks would consent, and the prior not, then should the prior be excluded the realme. The wilie monks being not vnprouided of this subtiltie, made their answere, that seeing they had sent their prior forth in their commission, it stood not with their honestie to giue any determinate consent, without the knowledge and before the returne of the said prior, vnlesse the archbishop first would promise to make full restitution of all that he had wrongfullie wrested from them. When the king could get no other answere of the monks, neither could mone the archbishop to release the sentence of their suspension, vnlesse they would confesse and knowledge their fault, hee so parting from them passed ouer into France.

The monks denie to put their matter from the pope to the kings hearing.

The monks excuse to the king.

Not long after this came a messenger from Rome, bringing letters from pope Urban to the archbishop, wherein the pope considering and tendering (as hee said) the enorme greeuances done against the monks, straitly inioined and commanded him, within ten daies after the receiuing thereof, to release the sentence of his suspension against the prior and others of the said couent, and also to retract and restore againe to the monks whatsoeuer he plucked from them since the time of their appeale first made. Who in case hee should denie, or forslacke the doing hereof, commission was giuen to three abbats, of Battell, of Feuersham, and of S. Aulkins, with ample authoritie to performe the same, &c. The archbishop receiuing these letters brought to him by a monke of the foresaid house, first made his excuse, that the pope was misinformed. But the monks not contented with that excuse, when they would needs know what answere he would make to the popes Nuncio: his answere was, that he had yet ten daies giuen him of the pope. In which meane time the archbishop went to London, and there in the church of S. Paul consecrated his holy oyle and creame (making one of the popes seuen sacraments) which was grieuouslie taken in the church of Canturburie. At last the ten daies being ended, when the archbishop refused to accomplish that was in the popes letter inioyned him, the three abbats aforesaid to execute the popes commandement, came at their day assigned, to Canturburie, and there assoiled all such as the archbishop before had suspended, and in the end certified pope Urban by letters what they had done.

The first letter of pope Urban sent to Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury.

The answere of the archbishop to the popes letter.

The archbishop maketh his oyle and creame at London.

Three abbats assoile the monks of their suspension.

The archbishop hearing this, within foure dayes after sent two of his clerks, which appealed the three abbats aforesaid vp to Rome, and hee himselfe in the meane time prepared busilie for the building vp of his church, sending to all churches in England, vpon releasement of their sinnes, to conser vnto the same: and to make the more haste, for lacke of free stone hee made vp his building with timber, and such other stuffe as hee could get.

The archbishop appealeth vp the three abbats to Rome.

The archbishops new church made of wood.

The prior Honorius all this while remained still at the court of Rome, giuing attendance vpon the pope, who hauing intelligence of the archbishops doings, procured another letter of pope Urban to the whole clergie of England, straitly inioyning them, that none should conser to the new fraternitie of Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie. To these letters the archbishop shewed such reuerence, that where before hee had planted his chapell of wood and boords, now hee prouided the same to be builded of lime and stone.

A letter of pope Urban against the archbishop.

By this time Petrus Blesensis, with other messengers of the archbishop, seeing Honorius the prior to be gone from the court of France, resorted to the court of Rome, bringing with them letters of credit from the king, from the archbishop, and also from other bishops of the realme: but the pope reading onely the kings letters and the archbishops, the residue he cast into a windowe by, saying hee would reade them at further leisure. Then the pope giuing audience in his consistorie to heare their cause: first came in Petrus Blesensis with the agents of the archbishop, exhibiting their letters and propounding their requests to the pope, which were, that restitution should be made by the monks to the archbishop, wherein they had iniuried him. Item, that the things which had beene granted before to the prior in that court, might bee called in againe. Thirdly, that the archbishop might haue licence to proceed in building his colledge of canons, &c. After this was called in M. Pilleus, the atturney for the monks of Canturburie. Who alleging many great things against the archbishop for his contempt and disobedience to the popes precepts, required that hee should make restitution to the monks for his iniuries done to them: and also that his new foundation of secular canons, tending to the ouerthrow of the conuentuall church of Canturburie, should bee vtterly raced and throwne downe to the ground. Thus betweene these parties pleating & repleating one against the other, much hard hold there was, but in conclusion for all the kings letters, and for all that the archbishop and bishops could doe, the matter went on the monks side. So that there was no remedie, but the pope would needs haue the archbishops new bulding come downe, and the monks to be restored againe to their full possessions. The execution whereof was committed to the three abbats aforesaid, to wit, of Battell, of Feuersham, of S. Aulkins in Canturburie, and to Geffrey supprior of Canturburie.

The pope sendeth a letter of pope Urban to Baldwin archbishop of Canturbury.

The popes holdeth on the monks side against the king, the archbishop, and the bishops of the realme.

Letters of the king, the archbishop and of other bishops to the pope.

M. Pilleus atturney in the popes court for the monks of Canturburie.

Petrus Blesensis agent for the archbishop of Canturburie.

Which things being thus determined at Rome, then Radulph Glanuile lord steward of England writing to the said abbat of Battell, and to the supprior and couent of Canturburie, commandeth them in the kings name, and vpon their oth and fealtie giuen vnto him, that they nor any of them doe proceed in this controuersie betweene the monks and the archbishop of Canturburie, before they come and talke with him, there to know further of the kings pleasure: and furthermore charging the couent of Canturburie not to enter further in any examinations as concerning the archbishops matters, and also citing the supprior of the said house, to appeare before him at London, at the feast of S. James the same yeare, which was 1187. Notwithstanding hee excusing himselfe by sicknesse, sent two monks in his stead, and so kept himselfe at home. To whom commandement was giuen, that the monks of Canturburie within fifteene daies should saile ouer to Normandie to the king, and there to shew the tenor and euidences of their priuiledges: and also that such stewards and bailiffes whom they had placed in their farmes and lordships, contrarie to the will of the archbishop, should be remoued. And likewise the three abbats in the kings name were commanded, in no wise to execute the popes commandement against the archbishop. Not long after this the archbishop toke shipping at Douer, and went ouer to the king, where hee ordeined three principall officers ouer the monks of Christs church; the sacrist, the cellarer, and the chamberlaine, contrarie to the

The popes executors commanded by R. Glanuile in the kings name not to proceed against the archbishop.

Monks of Canturburie commanded to shew their priuiledges to the king.

Certaine officers put in the house of Christs church against the monks will.

Digitized by Google

Another appellation of the monks against the archbishop.

full of the couent, with other grieuances more, whereby the monks were not a little offended; so that vpon the same they made a new appellation to the pope. Whereupon pope Urban, by the setting on of Honorius the prior, who was now come againe to the court, wrote to him another letter after a sharper and more vehement sort, to the effect as followeth.

The tenor of pope Vrbans letters to Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie.

VRbanus episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, Baldwino Cantuar. archiepiscopo & apostolicæ sedis legato, salutem & apostolicam benedictionem, &c.

The copie of pope Vrbans letter to the archbishop of Canturburie.

In that we haue borne with your brotherhood hitherto, and haue not proceeded in such grieuous maner against you, as wee might, although being thereto greatly prouoked: the chiefest cause was this, that we supposed your heart would haue relented from the oppression of the conuentuall church of Canturburie committed vnto you; if not for our reuerence, which you seeme to haue contemned more then became you, yet at least for feare of Gods iudgement. For well wee hoped, our conscience persuading vs to the same, that after you had obtained that high state and dignitie in the church of England, you would haue been an example to others of obedience and reuerence to be giuen to the see apostolike, of all ecclesiasticall persons. Wherefore at the first beginning both of our and also of your promotion, we did not spare to aduance and honor you as wee haue done few others besides, thinking no lesse, but that we had found a faithfull friend of the church, for our honour. Wherein we perceiue now (which maketh vs not a little to maruell) our expectation greatly deceiued. And whom we well trusted to be a sure stay for the maintenance of our estate, him now we find a persecutor against vs in our members.

Note how the popes stand all vpon their honor.

The popes expectation deceiued in the archbishop of Canturburie.

The pope expostulateth with Baldwin for contempt of his see.

For whereas we sundrie times haue written to you in the behalfe of our brethren, and the church committed to your charge, that you should desist from disquieting them, and not to vex or disturbe their liberties, at least for reuerence of vs: you not onely in this, but in other things more (as commonly is reported of you in all places) setting at light our letters and appellations made vnto the apostolicall see, what you haue wrought against them after their so manifold appellations laid vnto vs, and our inhibitions againe vnto you, we are ashamed to vtter. But reuolue and consider in your mind, if ye haue well done, and aduise in your owne conscience what you haue done. We for our part, because we may ne ought not with deafe eares to passe ouer the clamors of the brethren, and such contempt of the apostolike see, although our biddings and warnings giuen to you seeme to be all in vaine: yet notwithstanding we send our mandates againe vnto your brotherhood, in these apostolicall writings, districtly and in vertue of obedience commanding you, that whether you bee present in your church, or absent; all that notwithstanding, whatsoeuer you haue done in building of your chapell (which you to the destruction of the monasterie of Canturburie haue erected) after the time of their appeale made to vs, or our inhibition sent to you, you faile not of your proper costs and charges to demolish, vndoing againe, and making voide, whatsoeuer ye haue begun and innouated concerning the institution of the canons, and other things belonging to the erection of the said chapell: accounting moreouer and reputing the place where the chapell was, to bee accursed and prophane: and also that all such whosoeuer haue celebrated in the same place, shall stand suspended till the time they appeare before our presence. Commanding furthermore, that all those monks, whom you haue presumed to remoue from their office or to excommunicate, since the time of their appeale made, you shall restore and assoile againe, rendering also and restoring all such farmes, manors, tenements, and oblations, as you after their appeale made, haue inueagled from them; and finally, that you innouate nothing touching the state of that monasterie, during the time of this controuersie depending before vs. Giuing you to vnderstand, that in case you shall continue in your stubbornesse and rebellion vpon this present warning, or defer the execution of this precept thirtie daies after the receiuing hereof, wee shall appoint others to execute the same; inioyning also your suffragans, that as you shall shew your selfe disobedient and rebelling to vs, so they all shall refuse likewise to giue any obedience or reuerence vnto you, &c.

The archbishop commanded by the pope to throw downe the building of his new church, of his owne costs and charges.

The archbishop commanded to restore and assoile the monks whom he did deprime and excommunicate.

The archbishop threatned by the pope.

Giuen at Ferraria, 5. non. Octob.

The pope writeth to the abbats, and also to the king.

Another letter besides this the pope also sent to the three abbats aforesaid for the correction of these enormities. Likewise an other letter was sent to king Henrie the second, wherein the poe inioyneth and requireth him vpon remission of his sinnes, not to dissemble and beare with the archbishop in his oppression of his monks, but to helpe those things to bee amended, where he hath trespassed against them.

Pope Vrban dieth. Baldwinus king of Jerusalem with many nobles taken of the Saracens, and the citie won.

These pontificall letters were written An. 1187: the third day of October, & in the nineteenth day after, the same moneth, the said pope Vrban died. In the which yeare, and about the which moneth, Baldwin king of Jerusalem was taken with many noble men of Soldan the Saracen: and Jerusalem lost, after that it had been in the possession of the christians, and so continued the space of eightie eight yeres, and eightie daies, from the time that Godfridus Bolonius did first win it from the infidels.

The king and archbishop glad to agree with the monks. The monks got the vpper hand ouer the archbishop.

After the receiuing of those letters of pope Vrban aboue specified, both the king and archbishop, with all the bishops of the realme were maruellouslie quailed, glad now to please, and speake faire to the monks, promising all things to be done and restored to them after the best sort. Neither was the king now and archbishop so submisse; but the monks on the other side were as brag and vocant, being fully assured that all now was their owne. In the narration of which historie (as it is set in Geruasius at large) this we haue to note by the way, in what feare and thraldome kings in those daies were vnder the pope, who could not be maisters ouer their owne subiects, but that euery pild monke, or pelting prior, vpon vertue of their appeale to the court of Rome, and making their house tributarie to the pope, was able not onely to match, but to giue checkemate vnto the best king christened, as not in this story onely may appeare.

The miserable subiection of kings vnder the pope to be noted.

It followeth then in the storie of these monks, that as they were thus in the midst of their ioy and iollity, suddenly commeth newes of the death of pope Vrban their great Calipha, and also how that Gregory the eight was placed in his roome, who was a speciall friend and fauourer of the archbishop; which as it did greatly incourage the king and the archbishop, so the monks on the other side were as much discomforted, so that now all was turned vpside downe. For whereas the king and the archbishop before thought they had lost all, and were glad to compound with the monks, and to seeke their fauour: now were the monks on the contrarie side faine to crouch to the king, and glad to haue a good countenance; who then resorting to him, and finding him altered both in word and gesture, desired he would confirme and grant that which of late before he had promised. To whom it was answered againe by the king, that seeing the archbishop had granted to them their sacrist, their chamberlaine, and their cellerar, they should haue no more restored of him; neither would he suffer the liberties and priuiledges of the archbishop to bee impaired or take any wrong. And touching the new chapell of S. Thomas (said hee) whereabout ye striue so long, with the canonships and other buildings belonging thereto, the same I receiue into my hands, so that none shall haue any thing to doe therein but my selfe, &c. In like maner of the archbishop such an other like answere they receiued, and of bishops little better. So the monks sent away with a flea in their eare, went home againe out of Normandie to their cell.

Calipha is the high priest of the Saracens sitting in Damascus, vnto whom all the Soldans were subiect, as our princes now are to the pope.

The kings answere to the monks of Canturburie.

Now the archbishop hauing the monks where as he would, wrought them much grieuance; but that continued not verie long. For within two moneths after, and lesse, died pope Gregorie the eight, about the sixteenth day of December following. After whom succeeded pope Clement the third, who following the steps of Vrban bent all his power with the monks against the archbishop, sending diuers precepts and mandats in the nert yeare following, which was the yeare 1188: with an imperious letter, willing and commanding him to desist from his oppression of the monks, and to throw downe his new chapell. Whereupon the archbishop made his appeale and minded to go to Rome, but was called backe of the king being readie to saile ouer. In the which yeare Honorius the prior died at Rome of the plague, which was some helpe and comfort to the archbishop, for whom the archbishop made Roger Norris prior, against the wils of the couent. After this, about the latter end of the same yeare, pope Clement sent downe his legat called Radulphus a cardinall, to Canturburie with another letter more sharpely written to the same effect vnto the archbishop. Ex hist. Gerual.

Pope Gregorie the eight dieth. Pope Clement the third.

Pope Clements letters to the archbishop.

Honorius prior of Canturburie died at Rome.

The second letter of pope Clement to the archbishop.

Furthermore, in the yeare next after, which was 1189: he wrote also the third letter to him. In the which yeare also died king Henrie the second, after whom succeeded king Richard his sonne, who ioyning likewise with the archbishop, tooke his part strongly against the said monks. At last, after much adoe on both parts, and after great disturbance, and imprisoning diuers of the monks, king Richard preparing his voyage towards Jerusalem, and studying first to set peace betweene them, consulted and agreed with the bishops and abbats about a finall concord in this matter, betweene the archbishop and monkes of Canturburie; which at length on both parts was made, vpon these conuentions as follow.

K. Henrie the seconds death.

King Richard the first ioyned with the archbishop.

Agreement betweene the archbishop and monks of Canturburie vpon what conditions.

1 First, that Roger Norris should bee deposed, whom the archbishop had made prior against their wils: whom the king then at the request of the archbishop promoted to bee abbat of Eusham. 2 Item, that the archbishop should plucke downe his chapell, which he builded in the suburbs of Canturburie, against the minds of the monks. 3 Item, that the foresaid monks should make profession of their obedience and subiection to the archbishop, as they had done to his other predecessors before him. 4 Item, as touching all other complaints and iniuries (except onely the chapell, and deposition of Roger Norris the prior) the monks should stand to the arbitrement of the king, of the archbishop, and the prelats. 5 Item, that the monks kneeling downe before the king in the chapter house, should aske the archbishop forgiuenesse. Which being done, they they went all togither to the church, and sang Te Deum for this reformation of peace. Ex veteri chronico manuscripto, & ex Gervasio.

Ex libr. anonymo, & ex hist. Gervasij monachi Cantuarien sis.

The next day after the archbishop comming into the chapter, restored to the couent their manors and farmes againe: also discharged the prior which he had made before; desiring them likewise, that if he had offended them either in word or deed, they would from their heart remit him. This reconciliation being made betweene the archbishop and the couent, then the archbishop going about to dissolue the building of his new church, though he changed the place, yet thought not to change his intent, and therfore making exchange of lands with the bishop and monks of Rochester, purchased of them their ground in Lambeth, An. 1191. Which done, hee came to his clerks whom he had placed to be canons in his new college of Hakington, and also willed them to remoue all their goods and furniture to Lambeth ouer against Westminster, where hee erected for them another church, and there placed the said canons. About which colledge of Lambeth afterwards much trouble likewise ensued, by the stirring of the said monks of Canturburie, in the time of Hubert the archbishop in the reigne of the said king Richard, and in the yeare of our Lord 1196. Furthermore, after the deposing of Roger Norris prior of Canturburie aforesaid, Baldwin the archbishop inforced to grant them another prior by the assent of the king and of the couent, assigned Osbernus to bee their prior, who had taken part before with the archbishop; but the monks not pleased with him, after the death of Baldwin the archbishop remoued him againe.

Archbishop of Canturburie purchaseth of the bishop of Rochester land in Lambeth to build his house vpon.

Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie buildeth his house at Lambeth.

And thus haue you the tedious discourse of this catholike tragedie, betweene the monks of Canturburie and their archbishop, scarce worth the rehearsall: notwithstanding, this I thought to giue the reader to see of purpose, first to shew forth vnto the world the stout sturdinesse of this monkish generation, who professing profound humilitie in their cote, what little humilitie they had in their heart, what pride and arrogancie in their conuersation, and what hypocrisie in their religion, this one example among a thousand others may giue some experience. Secondly, that the posteritie now may see, how little kings could then doe in their owne realmes for the pope. And thirdly, to the intent it may more notoriously appeare to all readers, what strife and debate, what dissension and diuision, what little vnitie and concord hath alwaies followed the popes catholike church, wheresoeuer the corrupt religion and vsurped ambition of the pope preuailed. For, not to speake onely of this monkish house of Canturburie, what church cathedrall, collegiat, or conuentuall; what see, church, monasterie or chapell was vnder all the popes gouernment, but euer there happened some variance, either betweene the king and the archbishop. as betweene king William and Lanfranke, king Henrie the first and Anselme, king Stephan & Richard, king Henrie the second and Becket, king John and Stephan Langton, king Henrie the third and Boniface, &c: or else betweene archbishop and archbishop, for making profession, for carrying the crosse, for sitting on the right hand of the popes legat, &c: or else betweene archbishops and their suffragans, or betweene archbishops and their couents, or betweene bishops and monks, betweene deane and chapter, betweene monks and secular priests, monks of one sort against another, friers of one order against another, students against friers, townesmen against scholars, &c: As for example: What discord was betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and Richard archbishop of Yorke, betweene Lanctrancus and archbishop Thomas, betweene Theobald archbishop of Canturburie, and Silvester abbat of S. Aultins, betweene Walter of Ophitis church and Silvester abbat aforesaid, betweene William archbishop of Canturburie, and Jeremias prior of Canturburie, Anno 1144. betweene the monks of Canturburie and Odo their prior for translating the relikes of Dunstan, betweene king Stephan and Roger bishop of Salisburie, the bishop of Lincolne and Roger bishop of Elie his sonne, Anno 1138. betweene pope Innocent and Anacletus the space of seuen yeares, the cardinals for money (saith Gervasius) sometime holding with the one, sometime with the other; at last the election was determined by a sore battell betweene Lotharius emperor and Rogerius duke of Apulia, Anno 1137. also betweene pope Innocent the fourth and Frederike emperor the second, betweene king Henrie the third and William Kale bishop of Winchester, when the king bad the gates of Winchester towne to be shut against him, An. 1250. betweene Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, and canons of S. Paul; item betweene the said Boniface and monks of S. Bartholomew, who sat there in harnesse in his visitation, Anno 1256. betweene the abbat of Westminster and monks of the same house, Anno 1251. Item, betweene the foresaid William Kale bishop of Winchester and Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, for a priest of the hospitall in Southworke, Anno 1252. betweene the said Boniface and canons of Lincolne after the death of Robert Grosthead, for giuing of prebends, Anno 1253. betweene the monks of Couentrie and canons of Lichfield, for chusing their bishop in the time of king Henrie the third:

Three things to be obserued in this storie of Canturburie monks aboue rehearsed.

Hypocrisie in monkerie.

Kings made slaues vnder the pope.

No concord nor vnitie in popish churches.

Examples proouing what discord and how little vnitie is in the popes church.

Ex Matth. Paris.

And what should I speake of the discord, which cost so much money betweene Edmund archbishop of Canturburie, and the monks of Rochester, for chusing Richard Wando to bee their bishop, An. 1328. betweene Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne and canons of the same house, for which both hee and they were driuen to trauell to Rome, An. 1244. betweene Gilbert bishop of Rochester, delegat to archbishop Baldwin, and Robert the popes legat for sitting on the right hand of the legat in his councell at Westminster, An. 1190. betweene the abbat of Bardenie and the said Grosthead about the visitation of their abbey, An. 1243. item betweene the couent of Canturburie and the said Robert bishop of Lincolne, Anno 1243: betweene Hugo bishop of Durham and Hubert bishop of Sarum and Geffreie archbishop of Yorke, Anno 1189: betweene William bishop of Elie the kings chancellor and the canons of Yorke, for not receiuing him with procession, Anno 1190: betweene the abbat of Westminster and his couent of blacks monks, whom king Henrie the third had much adoe to still and agree, Anno 1249. item betweene the foresaid bishop of Lincolne and the abbat of Westminster; likewise betweene Nicolas bishop of Durham and John abbat of S. Albons, Anno 1246: also betweene Hubert archbishop of Canturburie and the monks there for the house of Lambeth, An. 1146: And what a stir was betweene the preaching friers and the gray friers mentioned in Matthew Paris for superioritie, An. 1243: Also betweene the said grey friers, and the prelats and doctors of Paris about nine conclusions, condemned of the prelats to be erroneous:

No vnitie in the popes church.

Conclusions of the friers condemned for erroneous by the prelats of Paris.

Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 167.

1 Concerning the diuine essence, that it cannot be seene of the angels or men glorified.

2 Concerning the essence of the holy Ghost.

3 Touching the procéding of ỹ holy Ghost, as he is loue.

4 Whether men glorified shall be In cœlo empyreo, or In cœlo crystallino.

5 That the euill angell at his first creation was euill and neuer good.

6 That there haue been many verities from the beginning which were not of God.

7 That an angell in one instant may be in diuers places.

8 That the euill angell neuer had wherby he might stand, no more had Adam in his state of innocencie.

9 That he which hath Meliora naturalia, ỹ is to say, More perfect strength of nature working in him, shall haue more full measure of necessitie to obteine grace and glorie. To the which article the prelats answering, did excommunicate the same as erroneous, affirming that grace and glorie shall bee giuen according to that God hath elected and predestinate, &c. Ex Matth. Paris. fol. 167.

Contention betweene friers about the conception of our ladie.

In like maner betweene the said Dominike friers, and the gray friers, what a brall and tumult was about the conception of our ladie, whether she was without originall sin conceiued or not, in the reigne of king Henrie the seuenth and king Henrie the eight, in the yeare of our Lord 1509. Adde moreouer to these the 24 hainous schismes, & not so few, which happened betweene pope and pope in the church & see of Rome. But what doe I stand to recite the diuisions and dissensions of the popes church, which is as much almost as to reckon the sands of the sea: For what church, chapter, or couent was in all that religion, which either had not some variance with themselues or with others: Upon which continuall strife & variance among them, the readers hereof may iudge of them and their religion as pleaseth them: in the meane time, my iudgement is this: that where such dissension dwelleth, there dwelleth not the spirit of Christ.

Continuall variance in the popes church.

Anno 1190

These things thus discoursed touching the tragicall dissension betweene Baldwin the archbishop, and the monks of Canturburie; now let vs proceed, by the Lords assistance, in continuing of our storie. After king Richard had thus, as is declared, set the monks and the archbishop in some agreement, and had composed such things as were to bee redressed within the realme, he aduanced forward his iourney, and came vnto Turon, to meet with Philip the French king: and so after that went to Vizeliace, where the French king and he ioyning togither, for the more continuance of their iourney, assured themselues by solemne oth, swearing fidelitie one vnto the other; the forme of whose oth was this: That either of them should defend and maintaine the honour of the other, and beare true fidelitie vnto him of life, members, and worldly honour, and that neither of them should faile one the other in their affaires: but the French king should aid the king of England in defending his land and dominions, as hee would himselfe defend his owne citie of Paris if it were besieged: and that Richard king of England likewise should aid the French king in defending his land and dominions, no otherwise then hee would defend his owne citie of Rone, if it were besieged, &c. But how slenderly this oth did hold betweene these two kings, and by whose chiefe occasion first it fell asunder, the sequell of the historie (the Lord willing) shall declare hereafter.

King Richard taketh his iourney toward the land of Jerusalem.

The oth and fidelitie betweene Philip the second French king, and king Richard the first, going to the holy land.

Furthermore, touching the lawes and ordinances appointed by this king Richard for his nauie, the forme thereof was this:

Discipline and orders set by king Richard for malefactors.

Digitized by Google

1 That whosoe killed any person on shipboord, should be tied with him that was slaine, and throwne into the sea.

2 And if he killed him on the land, he should in like maner be tied with the partie slaine, and bee buried with him in the earth.

3 He that shall be convicted by lawfull witnesse to drawe out his knife or weapon, to the intent to strike any man, or that hath stricken any to the drawing of blood, shall lose his hand.

4 Also, he that striketh any person with his hand, without effusion of blood, shall be plunged three times in the sea.

5 Item, who so speaketh any opprobrious or contumelious words, in reuiling or cursing one an other, for so oftentimes as he hath so reuiled, shall pay so many ounces of siluer.

6 Item, a theefe, or felon that hath stolne, being lawfully convicted, shall haue his head shorne, and boiling pich powred vpon his head, and feathers or downe strowed vpon the same, whereby he may be knowne; and so the first landing place they shall come to, there to be cast vp, &c.

The French king and king Richard come to Lions.

These things thus set in a readinesse, king Richard sending his navie by the Spanish seas, and by the straits of Jubaltarie betweene Spaine and Africa, to meet him at Marsilia, he himselfe went (as is said) to Vizeliace, to the French king. Which two kings from thence went to Lions, where the bridge ouer the floud Rhodanus for presse of people brake, and many both men and women were drowned. By reason whereof the two kings for the cumbrances of their traines, were constrained to dessever themselues for the time of their iourney, appointing both to meet together in Sicilia, and so Philip the French king toke his way to Genua, and king Richard to Marsilia, where he remained eight daies, appointing there his navie to meet him. From thence crossing ouer to Genua, where the French king was, hee passed forward by the coast of Italie, and entred into Tyber not far from Rome, where meeting with Ottomannus the cardinall and bishop of Hostia, hee did complaine greatly of the filthie simonie of the pope and the popes court, for receiuing seuen hundred markes for consecrating the bishop Cenomanensis: also a thousand and fiue hundred markes of William the bishop of Elie for his office legantine: and likewise an infinite summe of money of the bishop of Burdeaur, for acquitting him when he should bee deposed for a certaine crime laid to his charge by his clergie, &c.

King Richard commeth to Marsilia.

King Richard complaineth of the filthie simonie of the popes court.

King Richard departeth from Marsilia.

The seuenth day of August, in the yeare aforesaid, king Richard departed out of Marsilia, after he had there waited seuen daies for his navie, which came not, and so hiring twentie gallies, and ten great barkes, to ship ouer his men, sailed by the sea coast of Italie, and came to Naples, and so partly by horse and wagon, partly by the sea passing to Salernum, he came to Calabria, where after that hee had heard his ships were arriued at Messana in Sicilia, hee made the more speed; and so the three and twentith of September sent to Messana, with such a noise of trumpets and shalms, with such a rout and shew, that it was to the great wonderment and terror both of the Frenchmen, and all others that did heare and behold the sight.

The kings ships arriue at Messana.

The comming of king Richard to Messana.

The French king lodged in Messana.

To the said towne of Messana the French king was come before the sixteenth day of the same moneth of September, and had taken vp the palace of Tancredus king of Sicilia for his lodging. To whom king Richard after his arriuall oftsones resorted, and when the two kings had communed togither, immediately the same day the French king tooke shipping and entred the seas, thinking to saile toward the land of Jerusalem. But after he was out of the hauen, the wind arising contrarie against him, returned him backe againe to Messana.

The French king driuen backe againe by the wind to Messana.

King Richard obtaineth his sister Joane queen sometime of Sicilia to be sent vnto him.

King Richard getteth the monasterie of Griffons.

Then king Richard (whose lodging was prepared in the suburbs without the citie) after he had resorted againe, and talked with the French king, and also had sent to Tancredus king of Sicilia for deliuerance of Joane his sister (who had ben sometimes queen of Sicilia) and had obtained hir to bee sent vnto him, the last day of September passed ouer the floud of Delfar, and there getting a strong hold called de la Bagmare, or le Bamre, and placing therein his sister with a sufficient garrison, he returned home againe to Messana. The second of October king Richard wan an other certaine strong hold called Monasterium Griffonum, situated in the midst of the riuer of Delfar, betweene Messana and Calabria, from whence the monks being expulsed, hee reposed there all his store and prouision of victuals, which came from England or other places.

Discord betweene the citizens of Messana, and the English armie.

The king could not stay the rage of the people.

The citizens of Messana, seeing that the king of England had won the castle and iland in de la Bagmare, and also the monasterie of the Griffons, and doubting lest the king would extend his power further to inuade their citie, and if hee could all the whole ile of Sicilia, began to stirre against the kings armie, and to shut the Englishmen out of the gates, and keepe their wals against them. The Englishmen seeing that, made to the gates, and by force would haue broken them open, in so much that the king riding among them with his staffe, and breaking diuers of their heads, could not allwage their fiercenesse: such was the rage of the Englishmen against the citizens of Messana. The king seeing the furie of the people to bee such as he could not stay them, toke bote, and went to the palace of king Tancred to talke of the matter with the French king. In which time the matter was so taken vp by the wise handling of the ancient of the citie, that both parties laying downe their armour went home in peace.

The fourth day of the said moneth of October came to king Richard the archbishop of Messana, with two other archbishops also with the French king, and sundry other earles, barons, and bishops, for intreatance of peace. Who as they were togither consulting, and had almost concluded vpon the peace, the citizens of Messana issuing out of the towne, some went vp vpon the mountaines, some with open force inuaded the mansion or lodging of Hugh Bzun an English captaine. The noise whereof comming to the eares of the king, hee suddenly breaking off talke with the French king and the rest, departed from them; and comming to his men, commanded them forthwith to arme themselues; who then with certaine of his souldiers making vp to the top of a mountaine (which seemed to passe their power to climbe) there put the citizens to flight, chasing them downe the mountaine, vnto the very gates of the citie, whom also certaine of the kings seruants pursued within the citie, of whom fiue valiant souldiers, and twentie of the kings seruants were slaine, the French king looking vpon, and not once willing to rescue them, contrarie vnto his oth and league before made with the king of England. For the said French king with his men being there present, rode in the midst of them safely and without harme, to and fro, and might well haue ealed the kings partie, more then hee, if it had so liked him.

Communication about peace among the kings.

A skirmish betweene the citizens of Messana and the Englishmen.

The French king a bearer with straungers against the Englishmen.

This being knowne to the English host, how their fellowes were slaine, and the Frenchmen permitted in the citie, and that they were excluded, and the gates barred against them, being also stopped from buying of victuals and other things, they vpon great indignation gathered themselues in armes, brast open the gates, and scaled the wals, and so winning the citie, set vp their flags with the English armes vpon the wals. Which when the French king did see, hee was mightily offended, requiring the king of England, that the armes of France might also bee set vp and ioyned with his: But king Richard to that would in no case agree. Notwithstanding, to satisfie his mind, hee was well contented to take downe his armes, and commit the custodie of the citie to the Hospitalaries and Templaries of Jerusalem, till the time that Tancred king of Sicilia and hee should agree togither vpon conditions.

Englishmen win the citie of Messana in Sicilia.

English armes set vp at Messana.

These things being done, the fifth and sixth day of October, it followed then vpon the eight day of the same moneth of October, that peace among the kings was concluded. In which peace first king Richard and Philip the French king renewed againe their oth and league before made concerning their mutuall aid and societie during all the time of that peregrination. Secondly, peace also was concluded betweene king Richard and Tancred king of Sicilia aforesaid with this condition, that the daughter of Tancred (in case king Richard should die without issue) should marrie to Arthur duke of Britaine the kings nephue and next heire to his crowne, &c: whereof a formall chart was drawen and letters sent thereof to pope Clement, being dated the ninth day of November.

The league renued betweene king Richard and the French king.

Peace concluded betweene king Richard and Tancred king of Sicilia.

In this meane time as these two kings of France and England were thus wintring at Messana, Frederike emperor first of that name (the same on whose necke pope Alexander did tread in the church of Uenice, saying the verse of the psal. Super aspidem & basiliscum ambulabis, &c: whereof read before) and his sonne Conradus, with a mightie armie of Almans and others, were comming vp likewise toward the land of Jerusalem to the siege of Achon: where by the way the good emperour through a great mischance falling off his horse into a riuer called Salef, was therein drowned. After whose decease Conradus his sonne taking the gouernment of his armie, came to the siege of Achon, in which siege also hee died. Vpon whose comming such a dearth followed in the campe which lasted two moneths, that a lose of bread, which before their comming was sold for one pennie, was afterward sold for three pounds: by reason whereof many christian souldiers did there perish through famine. The chiefest food which the princes there had to feed vpon was horse flesh. This famine being so miserable, some good bishops there were in the campe, namely Hubert bishop of Salisburie, with certaine other good bishops, who making a generall collection through the whole campe for the poore, made such a prouision, that in this penurie of all things, yet no man was so destitute and needie, but somewhat he had for his relefe, till within a few daies after by the mercifull prouidence of God (who is the feeder of all creatures) ships came vnto them with abundance of corne, wine, and oyle.

Frederike the first emperor with his son Conrad come vp toward the siege of Achon.

Frederike the emperor drowned in a riuer going to the siege of Achon.

A miserable famine in the siege of Achon.

Gods prouidence in time of need.

The siege of this towne of Achon indured a long season, which as it was mightily oppugned by the christians, so it was strongly defended by the Saracens, specially by the helpe of wild fire, which the Latins call Græcum ignem, so that great slaughter there was on both sides. During the time of which siege, many noble personages & also bishops died, among whom was

The siege of Achon.

Ignis Græcus, much vsed of the Saracens.

Digitized by Google

was Conradus the emperors sonne, Radulph earle of Fougiers, the earle of Pericio, Robert earle of Leicester, Baldwin archbishop of Canturburie, with foure archbishops, and diuers other bishops, abbats, earles, and also barons to the number of foure and thirtie, and not so few. All this while king Richard and king Philip of France, still kept at Messana in Sicilia, from the moneth of September till Aprill, for lacke (I suppose) of wind or weather, or else for necessitie of repairing their ships. In which meane time king Richard hearing of Joachim abbat of Curacio a learned man in Calabria (who was then thought to haue the spirit of prophecie, and told many things of a people that should come) sent for him, with whom hee and his bishops had much conference about the comming and time of antichrist. This Joachim belike in his booke and reuelations vttered some things against the see and pride of Rome: for the which he was lesse fauoured of the popes, and iudged an enemie to their see, and so by pope Innocent the third was condemned with his bookes for an heretike, in his idolatrous generall councell of Lateran, An. 1815, as ye may read in Antoninus.

King Richard conferreth with Joachim abbat about the comming of antichrist.

Abbas Joachim condemned in the councell of Lateran, by Innocent the third.

After this Henricus king of Almans, sonne of Frederike the emperor hearing of the decease of his father, standing now to be emperor, first restoreth to Henrie duke of Saronie, and to others, what soeuer his father before had taken from them. That done, he sent vnto Clement and his cardinals, promising in all things to confirme the lawes and dignities of the church of Rome, if they would grant him their assent to bee emperor. Whereupon pope Clement by aduice of the Romans assigned him the tearme of Easter in the next yeare insuing for his coronation. But before the Easter came, pope Clement died, after he had sit three yeares, and about foure moneths: after whom succeeded Celestinus the third; of whom more hereafter, God willing.

Henricus sonne of Frederike standeth to the emperor.

Pope Clement dieth. Celestinus the third pope.

{Anno 1191}

The time thus passing ouer in the moneth of February, the next yeare following, which was of the Lord 1191, king Richard sent ouer his gallies to Naples, there to meet his mother Elenor, and Berengaria the daughter of Sanctius king of Nauar, whom he was purposed to marrie. Who by that time were come to Brundusium, vnder the conduct of Philip earle of Flanders, and so proceeding vnto Naples, there found the kings ships, wherein they sailed to Messana. In this meane space king Richard shewed himselfe exceeding bounteous and liberall vnto all men. To the French king first hee gaue diuers ships: vpon others likewise hee bestowed rich rewards, and of his goods and treasure hee distributed largely vnto his souldiers and seruants about him. Of whom it was reported that hee distributed more in one moneth, then euer any of his predecessors did in a whole yeare: by reason whereof he purchased great loue and fauor, which not onely redounded to the aduancement of his fame, but also to his singular vse and profit, as the sequell afterward proued.

The bountifull liberalitie of king Richard.

To proceed then in the progresse of king Richard, it followeth: In the first day of the moneth of March, he leauing the citie of Messana, where the French king was, went to Cathmensium, a citie where Tancredus king of Sicilia then lay, where he was honorably receiued, and there remained with king Tancredus three daies and three nights. On the fourth day when hee should depart, the foresaid Tancredus offered him many rich presents in gold and siluer, and precious silks, whereof king Richard would receiue nothing, but one little ring for a token of his good will. For the which king Richard againe gaue him a rich sword. At length when king Richard should take his leaue, king Tancredus would not so let him part, but needs would giue him foure great ships, and fifteene gallies: and furthermore, hee himselfe would needs accompanie him the space of two daies iourney to a place called Tauernium.

King Richard goeth from Messana, and commeth to Cathmensium.

The honorable entertainment of king Richard by Tancredus.

Then the next morning when they should take their leaue, Tancredus declared vnto him the message, which the French king a little before had sent vnto him by the duke of Burgundie, the contents whereof was this: That the king of England was a false traitor, and would neuer keepe the peace that was betweene them. And if the said Tancredus would war against him, or secretly by night would inuade him, hee with all his power would assist him, and ioyne with him to the destruction of him and all his armie, &c. To whom Richard the king protested againe, that he was no traitor, nor neuer was: and as touching the peace begun betweene them, the same should neuer be broken through him: neither could hee beleeue, that the French king, beeing his good lord and his sworne companeuer in that voyage, would vtter any such words by him. Which when Tancredus heard, hee bringeth forth the letters of the French king sent to him by the duke of Burgundie, affirming moreouer, that if the duke of Burgundie would denie the bringing of the said letters, he was readie to trie with him by any of his dukes. King Richard receiuing the letters and musing not a little vpon the same, returneth againe to Messana. The same day that king Richard departed, the French king commeth to Tauernium to speake with Tancredus, and there abode with him that night, and on the morrow returned to Messana againe.

Philip the French king traiterously seeketh the destruction of king Richard by secret letters sent to the king of Sicilia.

A faithfull part of Tancredus king of Sicilia towards king Richard.

From that same time king Richard moued in stomacke against king Philip, neuer shewed any gentle countenance of peace and amitie, as hee before was wont. Whereat the French king greatly marueling, and inquiring earnestly what should be the cause thereof, word was sent him againe by Philip earle of Flanders, what words hee had sent to the king of Sicilia: and for the testimony thereof the letters were shewed which he wrote by the duke of Burgundie to the king of Sicilia. Which when the French king vnderstood, first hee held his peace, as guiltie in his conscience, not knowing well what to answere. At length returning his tale to another matter, he began to quarrell with king Richard, pretending as though he sought causes to breake with him, and to maligne him, and therefore hee forged these lies (said hee) vpon him, and all because he by that meanes would boide to marrie with Alice his sister, according as hee had promised: adding moreouer, that if hee would so doe, and would not marrie the said Alice his sister, according to his oth, but would marrie an other, hee would be an enimie to him and his, while hee liued.

The first occasion of discord betweene the French king and king Richard.

King Richard charged by the French king with falsehood.

The French king quarrelleth with king Richard about marrying his sister.

To this king Richard said againe, that hee could by no meanes marrie that woman, for so much as his father had carnall copulation with hir, and also had by hir a sonne: for proofe whereof hee had there presently to bring forth diuers and sundrie witnesses to the kings face, to testifie with him. In conclusion, through counsell and persuasion of diuers about the French king, agreement at last was made, so that king Philip did acquit king Richard from his bond of marrying his sister; and king Richard againe should be bound to pay to him euery yeare for the space of fiue yeares, two thousand markes, with certaine other conditions besides, not greatly materiall in this place to bee deciphered. Thus peace being betweene them concluded, the eight and twentith day of the said moneth of March, the French king lanching out of the hauen of Messana, on the two and twentith day after in Easter weeke came with his armie to the siege of Achon.

Causes alleaged why king Richard could not marrie with the French kings sister.

Agreement betweene the two kings, with the conditions touching the same.

The French king commeth to Achon.

After the departure of the French king from Messana, (king Richard with his armie yet remaining behind) arriued queen Elenor the kings mother, bringing with hir Bernegera the king of Nauars daughter to bee espoused to king Richard. Which done, Elenor leauing Bernegera behind hir, departed, taking hir iourney toward Rome, to intreate the pope for Gaufridus hir other sonne aboue mentioned, to bee consecrated in the archbishoprike of Yorke, being before elected by the procurement of king Richard his brother, as ye heard. In which meane time, as queen Elenor was trauelling toward Rome, pope Clement aboue mentioned died about the sixth day of Aprill, in whose rome succeeded pope Celestinus the third. Who the next day after his consecration came from Lateran to S. Peters church, where in the way meeteth him Henricus the emperor, and Constantia his wife, with a great rout of armed souldiers: but the Romans making fast their gates would not suffer them to enter their citie. Then pope Celestine standing vpon the staires before the church dore of S. Peter, receiued an oth of the said Henricus king of the Almans (his armie waiting without) that hee should defend the church of God and all the liberties thereof, and maintaine iustice; also to restore againe the patrimonie of S. Peter full and whole, whatsoeuer hath been diminished thereof; and finally, that he should surrender to the church of Rome againe the citie of Tusculanum, &c. Upon these conditions and grants, then the pope tooke him to the church and there anointed him for emperor, and his wife for empresse, who there sitting in his chaire pontificall, held the crowne of gold betweene his feet, and so the emperor bowing downe his head to the popes feet, receiued the crowne, and in like maner the empresse also. The crowne thus beeing set vpon the emperors head, the pope eftsoones with his foot strooke it off againe from his head vnto the ground, declaring thereby that he had power to depose him againe, in case he so deserued. Then the cardinals taking vp the crowne, set it vpon his head againe. Ex veteri chronicho manuscripto anonymo, de gestis Richardi regis, cui initium: Anno gratiæ, &c. Item ex alio vetustatis chronicho manuscripto, cui initium: Aeneas cum Ascanio, &c.

Pope Celestinus the third.

Conditions required of Henricus king of Almans, before he should be made emperor by the pope.

The pope of Rome in the full top of his pride.

Pope Celestine croweth Henricus the emperor with his feet.

The pope striketh off the emperors crowne with his foot.

King Richard moueth from Messana to Achon.

Not long after the departure of king Philip from Messana, which was in the moneth of March, king Richard in Aprill following, about the twentith day of the said moneth, sailing from the hauen of Messana with an hundred and fiftie great ships, and three and fiftie great gallies well manned & appointed, tooke iourney towards Achon; who being vpon the seas on Good friday, about the ninth houre rose a mightie southwind with a tempest, which disseuered and scattered all his naule, some to one place, and some to an other. The king with a few ships was driuen to the ile of Creta, and there before the hauen of Rhodes cast at anchor. The ship that carried the kings sister queen of Sicilia, and Bernegera the king of Nauars daughter, with two other ships were driuen to the ile of Cyprus. The king making great mone for the ship of his sister, and Bernegera his wife that should be, not knowing where they were become, after the tempest was ouerblown, sent forth his gallies diligently to search the rest of his naule dispersed, but especially for the ship wherin his sister was, and the maiden whom he should marrie, who at length were found safe and merrie at the port of Limizem in the ile of Cyprus. Notwithstanding the two other ships, which were in their company before in the same hauen, were drowned, with diuers of the kings seruants and men of worship, amongst whom was M. Roger, called Malus Catulus, the kings vicechancellor, who was found hauing the kings seale hanging about his necke. The king of Cyprus was then Isakius (called also the emperor of the Grikkons) who toke and imprisoned all Englishmen which by shipwracke were cast vpon his land: also inueigled into his hands the goods and prises of them which were found drowned about his coasts, neither would suffer the ship wherein the two ladies were to enter within the port.

King Richard ouertaken with a tempest on the seas going to Achon.

Digitized by Google

Isakius king of Cyprus a cruell enemie to Englishmen.

The tidings of this being brought to king Richard, hee in his great wrath gathering his gallies and ships togither, boarded the land of Cyprus, where hee first in gentle wise signifieth to king Isakius, how hee with his Englishmen, comming as strangers to the supportation of the holy land, were by distresse of weather driuen vpon his bounds; and therefore with all humble petition besought him in Gods behalfe, and for reuerence of the holy crosse, to let goe such prisoners of his which he had in captiuitie, and to restore againe the goods of them which were drowned, as be deteined in his hands, to bee imployed for the behoofe of their soules &c. And this the king once, twice, and thrice, desired of the emperor. But he proudly answering againe, sent the king word, that hee would neither let the captiues goe, nor render the goods of them which were drowned, &c.

King Richard maketh suit to the king of Cyprus for his souldiers in captiuitie.

The disdainefull and proud answere of Isakius to king Richard.

When king Richard heard this, how little the emperor Isakius made of his so humble and honest petition, and how nothing there could be gotten without violent force, eftsoones giueth commandement through all his host, to put themselues in armour and to follow him, to reuenge such iniuries receiued of that proud and cruell king of Cyprus, willing them to put their trust in God, and not to mistrust but the Lord would stand with them, and giue them the full victorie. The emperor in the meane time with his people stood warding the sea coasts, where the Englishmen should arriue, with swords, bils, and lances, and such other weapons as they had, setting boords, stooles, and chests before them in stead of a wall. Howbeit but few of them were harnessed, and for the most part all vnexpert, and vnskilfull in the feats of war. Then king Richard with his souldiers issuing out of their ships, first set his bowmen before, who with their shot made a way for others to follow. The Englishmen thus winning the land vpon them, so fiercely prossed vpon the Grikkons, that after long fighting and many blowes, at last the emperor was put to flight, whom king Richard valiantly pursued, and slue many, and diuers he toke aliue, and had gone neere also to haue had the emperor, had not the night come on and parted the battell. And thus king Richard with much spoile and great victorie returning to the port towne of Limizem, which the townesmen had left for feare, found there great abundance of corne, wine, oyle, and victuals.

King Richard exhorteth his men to fight against Isakius.

King Richard setteth vpon Isakius king of Cyprus.

The battell betweene the emperor of Cyprus and king Richard.

Isakius emperor of the Grikkons put to flight.

The towne of Limizem taken by king Richard.

The same day after the victorie got, Joane the kings sister, and Bernegera the maiden, entered the port and towne of Limizem, with fiftie great ships, and foureteene galliots, so that all the whole nauie there meeting togither, were two hundred fiftie foure tall ships, and aboue threescore galliots. Then Isakius the emperor seeing no way for him to escape by the sea, the same night pitched his tents fiue miles off from the English armie, swearing that the third day after hee would sure giue battell to king Richard. But hee preuenting him before, suddenly the same morning before the day of battell should bee, setteth vpon the tents of the Grikkons early, they being vnwares and asleepe, and made of them a great slaughter, in so much that the emperor was faine naked to run away, leauing his tents and pauillions to the Englishmen, full of horses and rich treasure, also with the imperiall standard, the lower part whereof with a costly streamer was couered and wrought all with gold. King Richard then returning with victorie and triumph to his sister, and Bernegera, shortly after in the moneth of May next following, and the twelfth day of the same moneth, married the said Bernegera daughter of Rancon king of Nauar, in the ile of Cyprus, at Limizem.

The king of Cyprus againe put to flight.

King Richard marrieth Bernegera daughter of the king of Nauar in the ile of Cyprus.

The king of Cyprus being on king Richard beseeging the land of Cyprus round about with ships and gallies, did in such sort preuaile, that the subiects of the land were constrained to yeeld themselues to the king, and at length the daughter also of the emperour, and at last the emperor himselfe, whom king Richard caused to bee kept in fetters of siluer and gold, and to be sent to the citie of Tripolis.

King of Cyprus againe submitteth himselfe, and is kept in golden fetters.

These things thus done, and all set in order touching the possession of the ile of Cyprus, the keeping whereof hee committed vnto Radulph sonne of Godfrey lord chamberlaine, being then the first day of June; vpon the fifth of the said moneth, king Richard departed from the ile of Cyprus with his ships and gallies towards the siege of Achon, and on the next morrow came vnto Tyrus, where by procurement of the French king he was constrained by the citizens to enter. The next day after, which was the sixth day of June, crossing the seas he met with a great barke fraught with souldiers and men of war, to the number of one thousand and fiue hundred, which pretending to be Frenchmen, and setting forth their flag with the French armes, were indeed Saracens, secretly sent with wild fire and certaine barrels of vnknowne serpents, to the defence of the towne of Achon. Which king Richard at length perceiuing, eftsoones set vpon them and so vanquished them, of whom the most were drowned, and some taken aliue. Which being once knowne in the citie of Achon, as it was a great discomfort vnto them, so it was a great helpe vnto the christians for winning the citie. The next day after, which was the seuenth of June, king Richard came to Achon, which at that time had been long besieged of the christians; after whose comming it was not long, but the pagans within the citie seeing their wals to be vndermined, and towers ouerthrowne, were driuen by composition to escape with life and limme, to surrender the citie vnto the two kings. Another great helpe to the christians in winning the citie was this: In the said citie of Achon where was a secret christian among the Saracens, who in time of the siege there vsed at sundrie times to cast ouer the wals into the campe of the christians, certaine bils written in Hebrue, Greeke, and Latine, wherein hee disclosed vnto the christians from time to time the doings and counsels of the enemies, aduertising them how and by what way they should worke, and what to beware: and alwaies his letters began thus, In nomine patris, & filij, & spiritus sancti, Amen. By reason whereof, the christians were much aduantaged in their proceedings. But this was a great heauinesse vnto them, that neither he would vtter his name, or when the citie was got they could euer vnderstand who he was. Ex chronico manuscripto, de gestis Richardi.

King Richard taketh his iourney to Achon.

A thousand and fiue hundred Saracens sent to the rescue of Achon, vanquished on the sea by king Richard.

The citie of Achon yeelded to the christians.

An honest part of a secret christian in the citie of Achon.

To make of a long siege a short narration, vpon the twelfth day of Julie in the yeare aforesaid, the princes and captaines of the pagans vpon agreement resorted vnto the tent of the templaries, to common with the two kings touching peace and giuing vp of their citie; the forme of which peace was thus: That the kings should haue the citie of Achon freely and fully deliuered vnto them, with all which was within, and fiue hundred captiues of the christians should bee restored vnto them, which were in Achon; also the holy crosse should bee to them rendred, and a thousand christian captiues, with two hundred horsmen, whosoeuer they themselues would chuse out of all them which were in the power of Saladine; ouer and besides they should giue to the kings two hundred thousand Bisants, so that they themselues would remaine as pledges in the kings hands for the performance hereof, that if in fortie daies these foresaid couenants were not accomplished, they would abide the kings mercie touching life and limme. These couenants being agreed vpon, the kings sent their souldiers and seruants into the citie, to take one hundred of the richest and best of the citie, to close them vp in towers vnder strong keeping, and the residue they committed to be kept in houses and streets, ministring vnto them according to their necessities: to whom notwithstanding this they permitted, that so many of them as would bee baptised and receiue the faith of Christ, should be free to go whither they would. Whereupon many there were of the pagans, which for feare of death pretended to bee baptised; but afterward so soone as they could, reuolted againe to the Saladine. For the which it was afterwards commanded by the kings, that none of them should bee baptised against their wils.

The forme of peace concluded betweene the kings and the princes of Achon.

Couenants made in giuing vp the citie of Achon.

Religion would be taught and not coacted.

The king of Cyprus breaketh conditions with king Richard.

The thirteenth day of the said moneth of Julie, king Philip of France, and king Richard, after they had obteined the possession of Achon, diuided betweene them all things therein conteined, as well the people as gold and siluer, with all other furniture whatsoeuer was remaining in the citie: who in diuiding the spoile, were so good caruers vnto themselues, that many knights and barrons with other souldiers, who had there sustained the whole trauell two yeares togither, about the siege, seeing the kings to take all vnto themselues, and their part to bee but little, retracted themselues without the vttermost trench, and there after consultation had togither, sent word to the kings that they would leaue and forsake them, vnlesse they were made partakers also of the gaines for the which they had so long trauelled. To whom answere was sent againe by the kings, that their wils should bee satisfied. Howbeit because

The two kings diuide the citie of Achon, with all the spoile thereof betweene themselues.

Commonly seene, who so taketh most paines, their part to bee the least.

Many of the christian souldiers for need were constrained to depart from Achon.

Digitized by Google

cause of long deferring of their promise, many constrained by pouerty, departed from them.

King Richard requireth of the French king to remaine three yeeres with his army, but he would not.

The twentith day of July king Richard speaking with the French king, desired him that they two with their armies would bind themselues by oth to remaine there still in the land of Hierusalem the space of three yéeres, for the winning & recouering againe of those countries. But he would sweare (he said) no such oth: and so the next day after king Richard with his wife and sister entreth into the citie of Achon, and placed there himselfe in the kings palace, the French king remaining in the houses of the templaries, where he continued till the end of the month. So about ỳ beginning of the month of August, Philip the French king, after that he & king Richard had made agréement betweén Guido and Conradus the marques, about the kingdom of Hierusalem, went from Achon to Tyrus, notwithstanding king Richard and all the princes of the christian army with great intreaty desired him to tary, shewing what a shame it were for him to come so far, and now to leaue vndone that for which he came; and on the third of August from Tyrus departed, leauing his halfe part of the city of Achon in the hands of the foresaid Conradus marques. After whose departure the pagans refused to kéepe their couenants made, who neither would restore the holy crosse nor the mony, nor their captiues, sending word to king Richard, that if he beheaded the pledges left with him at Achon, they would chop off the heads of such captiues of the christians, which were in their hands. Shortly after this, the Saladine sending great gifts to king Richard, requested the times limitted for beheading of the captiues to be proroged: but the king refused to take his gifts, and to grant his request. Whereupon the Saladine caused all the christian captiues within his possession forthwith to be beheaded, which was the eightéenth day of August. Which albeit king Richard vnderstood, yet would not hee preuent the time afore limitted for the execution of his prisoners, being the twentith of August. Upon which day hee caused the prisoners of the Saracens, openly in the sight of the Saladines army to lose their heads: the number of whom came to 2500, saue only that certaine of the principall of them he reserued for purposes and considerations, especially to make exchange for the holy crosse, and certaine others of the christian captiues.

Christian captiues slaine by the Saladine.

The Saracen captiues slaine by K. Richard.

After this, king Richard purposed to beséege the citie of Ioppe, where, by the way betweéne Achon and Ioppe, néere to a towne called Assur, Saladine with a great multitude of his Saracens came fiercely against the kings rearward: but through Gods mercifull grace, in the same battell the kings warriors acquitted them so well, that the Saladine was put to flight (whom the christians pursued the space of three miles) and lost the same day many of his nobles and captaines in such sort (as it was thought) that the Saladine was not put to such confusion forty yéeres before: and but one christian captaine, called James Auernus, in that conflict was ouerthrowne. From thence, king Richard proceéding further, went to Ioppe, and then to Ascalon, where he found first the citie of Ioppe forsaken of the Saracens, who durst not abide the kings comming. Ascalon the Saladine threw downe to the ground, and likewise forsooke the whole land of Syria, through all which land the king had free passage without resistance, neither durst the Saracen prince incounter after that with king Richard. Of all which his atchieuances the said king Richard sent his letters of certificat as well into England, as also to the abbat of Clara Valle in France, well hoping that he (God willing) should bee able to make his repaire againe to them by Easter next.

The Saladine put to flight.

A noble victory by Gods power gotten by king Richard against the Saracens.

King Richard in possession of Syria.

A briefe story of William bishop of Ely the kings chancellor.

The story of William the proud bishop of Elie.

And now to leaue king Richard a while in the field, let vs make a step into England, and looke a little what is done at home while the king was abrode, and so returne to the king againe. Yée heard before how king Richard at his setting forth, committed the gouernment of the realme to Hugo bishop of Durham, and to William bishop of Ely; so that to the bishop of Durham was committed the kéeping of the castell of Windsor. The other, which was the bishop of Ely, had the kéeping of the tower of London, about which hee caused a great ditch with a rampire to be cast, which is yet remaining. Furthermore, to these two bishops the king also assigned foure other chiefe iustices, which iointly with them should haue the hearing and ouersight of all causes, as well to the clergy as the laitie appertaining: to wit, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marshall, Geffrey Peterson, and William Bruer. But the bishop of Ely was the principall, or at least he that tooke most vpon him, who both was the kings chancellor, and bought with his mony to be the popes legat through England, Ireland and Scotland, as is before specified. Touching the excessiue pride and pompe of which bishop, his ruffilings outragious, and fall most shamefull, it would make a long tragedy to discourse the whole circumstances at full: onely to demonstrate certaine specialties thereof for our present purpose, it may suffice.

Vt inste iudicarent clerum & populum, verba hist.

Foure chiefe iustices with two bishops appointed ouerseers of the realme in the kings absence.

First, this William called Longchampe, being thus aduanced by the king to be his high chancellor, and chiefe iustice of the realme, and also the popes legat, to shew abrode the authority of his legatship, began to suspend the canons, clerks, and vicars of the church of S. Peter in Yorke, because they receiued him not with procession: vnder which inderdition hee held them, till they were faine at last both canons, clerks and vicars to fall downe at his foot, causing all their bels to be let downe out of the steeple. After this commeth Hugo bishop of Durham, whom the king sent home out of Normandy with his letters, who meeting with the foresaid William bishop of Ely in the towne of Ely, shewed him the kings letters, wherein was granted to him the kéeping of Windsor castell, & to be the kings iustice frō the riuer of Humber, to the borders of Scotland. To the which letters the chancellor answered, that the kings commandement should be done, and so brought him with him to Sulwell, where he tooke him and kept him fast, till he was forced at last to surrender to him the castell of Windsor, and other things which the king had committed to his custody; and moreouer was constrained to leaue with the said chancellor, Henry de Puteaco his own sonne, and Gilbert Leie for pledges and hostages of his fidelity, to be true to the king and the realme. And thus the bishop of Durham being set at libertie, went to his towne of Houeden, where after he had made his abode a few daies, commeth thither Osbert Longchampe the chancellors brother, and William Stutuill, with a great company of armed men sent by the chancellor to apprehend him. But the said bishop of Durham putting in sureties not to depart that towne without licence of the king and of the chancellor, there still remained till hee got letters to be sent to the king, signifying how he was vsed. Whereupon the king writing his letters from Marsilia to the bishop of Ely, set the said bishop of Durham frée, and confirmed to him all the possessions and grants that he before had giuen him.

William Longchampe bishop of Ely, lord chancellor and the popes legat.

The church and bels of Yorke suspended, because the lord legat was not set in with procession.

Bishop of Ely getteth the castell of Windsor from the bishop of Durham.

Hugo bishop of Durham vexed by William bishop of Ely.

It is almost incredible to thinke how intemperatly this bishop and chancellor misused himselfe, after the kings departure into Syria, in excesse of pride, and in cruel exactions and oppressions of the kings subiects. First his fellow iustices whom the king ioined with him for gouernment of the realme, he vtterly reiected and refused to heare their counsell, reputing none to be equall with him in all the realme. Neither was he contented with the authority of a prelat, but plaied both king and priest in the realme. All castels, lordships, abbies, churches, and all other appropriations belonging to the right of the king, he claimed to himselfe. And by vertue of his legatship when he came to any bishops house, abby, priory, or any other religious house, he brought with him such a superfluity of men, horses, dogs, and hawkes, that the house was worse for it three yéeres after. For commonly he rode neuer vnder 1500 horses, of chaplens, priests, and other seruing men waiting vpon him. From the clergy and laity he tooke away their churches, their bowsons, their liuings and lands, to bestow vpon his nephewes and other waiting chaplens to serue his vain glory, or els conuerted them to his own vse, to maintaine his pompe and vanity. In getting and gathering of treasures hee had no measure, in misspending the same he kept no order. And that no vice should be wanting where such auarice taketh root, the mony which he wrongfully got, he committed to the banke to be increased by vsury. What wantonnesse and lasciuiousnesse was vsed in that so riotous life, the stories doe shame to declare it. All ruffianly runnagates, idle bellies, and light persons whersoeuer hee went, hanged vpon his court. To increase the vaine iollity of this rotall prelat, there was lacking no kind of musical instruments and melodious noise, to refresh belike his wearied senses, too much beaten and macerated with continuall labor and study of hunting, hawking, and gaming; of preaching and reading I should haue said.

The excessiue pride and enormities of William bishop of Elie.

Bishop of Ely neuer rode vnder 1500 horse.

His vanity.

His vsury.

His riotous and delicat life.

Briefly, this foresaid prelat, bearing the authority both of the king and of the pope, kept such a stir in England, that the whole realme was at his becke with cap and knée crouching to him; neither durst any man rich or poore displease him, yea none in all the realme so noble or worshipfull, but was glad to please him, accounting themselues happy if they might stand in his fauor. At his table all noblemens children did serue and wait vpon him, with whom hee coupled in mariages his néeces and kinswomen. And when any that stood waiting before him durst once cast vp his eies, or did not demurely looke downeward vpō the ground, he had a staffe in his hand with a prickle wherewith he vsed to pricke them; learning belike by the carter his father, which vsed at the plough or cart to driue his oxen. Furthermore, as kings vse to haue their gard about them, so he because he would not also be vngarded, refusing men of the English nation, had his waiters and warders most of Frenchmen and Flemmings.

The bishop of Elie plaieth both king and priest.

William bishop of Ely garded with Frenchmen and Flemmings.

It happened after this, in the yéere 1191, that a great discord rose betweén John earle of Morton the kings brother, with other states of the realme, and the said William bishop of Ely; so that vniuersally they al wrote ouer to the king concerning the misgouernment and enormities of the said bishop. Who vnderstanding of the case, sent from Messana into England, Walter archbishop of Rone, & William Marshall earle, vnto the bishop of Ely with letters, commanding him that in all his doings he should associat vnto him the said archbishop of Rone, William Marshall, Geffrey Peterson, William Bruer,

Anno 1191

A generall complaint to the king of William bishop of Elie.

Digitized by Google

Bruer, and Hugo Bardolfe aboue mentioned. Who when they came into England, durst not deliuer their letters, dreading the displeasure of the chancellor; for he despised all the commandements of the king, nor would suffer any fellow to ioine with him in his kingdome.

Another dissension betweene Iohn the kings brother, and William bishop of Ely.

Hitherto haue you heard of the glorious vanity of this lordly legat and chancellor of the realme: now yee shall heare of his shamefull fall, after his shamelesse exaltation. For shortly after this followeth another breach betweene the said earle Iohn the kings brother and him, about the besieging of the castell of Lincolne. Concerning the which castell the said Iohn sent him word, that vnlesse he raised his siege the sooner from thence, he would send him away by force of sword. The bishop either not able to make his party good, or not daring to resist, thought best to fall to some composition with the earle, and so did. In which composition, he was contented against his will, by mediation of diuers bishops and others, to make surrender not only of the castell of Lincolne, but also of Nottingham, of Tickhill, Wallingford, and many more, which were then committed to the custody of sundry men of worship and honour. And thus was that controuersie agreed, wherein the bishop of Ely began a little to be cut shorter.

Another broile betweene the chancellor and Geffery archbishop of Yorke the kings brother.

It followed then not long after in the same yeere, that another like businesse began to kindle betweene Geffrey the archbishop of Yorke the kings brother, and the foresaid glorious bishop of Ely vpon this occasion. Ye heard before how the king at his setting out, left order that earle Iohn and Geffrey his brethren should not enter into the realme the space of three yeers after his departure (howbeit his brother Iohn was shortly after released of that bond:) and also after that, how king Richard being at Messana, sent his mother Elenor to the pope for his brother Geffrey (elected before to the sea of Yorke) to be consecrated archbishop. Whereupon the said Geffrey being consecrated through licence of pope Celestine, by the archbishop of Turon, the said Geffrey eftsones after his consecration deferred no time, but would needs come into England. Whereof the bishop of Ely hauing intelligence, sent him word being at Willand in Flanders, not to presume to aduenture into the realme, contrary to his oth made to king Richard before; commanding moreouer, that if he came, he should be apprehended. All which notwithstanding, the archbishop letted not for all that, but needs would repaire to his sea, and so arriued at Douer in the month of September, where the chancellors men stood on the sea side to apprehend him; but he by changing his apparel, & swiftnes of his horse, escaped their hands, & came to the monks house of Douer. But the chancellors men whom he sent to take him, beset the church of the monks round about; so that in no wise he could auoid their hands.

The cruell handling of Geffrey archbishop of Yorke, by the bishop of Ely the popes legat and chancellor of England.

To make the story short: As the archbishop on a day, when he had said masse, was standing at the altar with his garments yet about him, the rude souldiers hauing little good maners, & lesse deuotion, spared not boldly to rush into the church, and there laid hands vpon the archbishop as hee stood; tooke him, bound him, and dragged him through dirt and mire, and (as we vse to say) through thicke and thin, and so committed him to Matthew Clerke their constable to be kept: whereat the people greatly disdained, seeing him that was a kings sonne, and the brother of a king so to be intreated. The hearing whereof, when it came to the eares of earle Iohn his brother, hee being not a little offended therewith, sent to know of the chancellor, whether this was his doing or not. To whom when the chancellor sent answer againe, and stoutly confessed the fact to be his; then the earle sent commandement that his brother should be deliuered, and so he was. Who then comming to Lond̄, made his complaint to the earle his brother, and to other nobles of the realm, of the iniuries done to him by the chancellor. Whereupon the earle sent for the said chancellor, and appointed a day peremptory for him to appeare before the whole body of the counsell, to make answere to such iniuries as he had done, both to the archbishop of Yorke, and also to the bishop of Durham aboue mentioned. But the chancellor driuing off the time with delaies, would neither come nor send. Then the earle with the bishops about him, made their iourny towards London, to haue the matter there handled in great audience.

Geffrey archbishop of Yorke deliuered out of prison by commandement of earle Iohn his brother.

A skirmish betweene the seruants of the bishop of Ely, and the seruants of earle Iohn.

The chancellor seeing that, withdrew himselfe from Windsor to the city of London, where by the way it happened that the seruants of the earle and of the chancellor meeting, did skirmish togither. In which fray one of the earles family was slain; but yet his men had the better, and the chancellor with his men were put to flight, and so fled to the tower, where they did hide themselues. The next day after (which was about the twelfth day of October) earle Iohn the kings brother, and the archbishop of Rone, with all the bishops, earles and barons, and citizens of London assembled togither in Pauls church; where many and great accusations were laid against the said chancellor; so that in fine it was agreed in that assembly, that the said chancellor should be deposed, and in his place was substituted the archbishop of Rone, according to the tenor of the kings letters sent from Messana; which was, that certaine other persons should bee associated with the chancellor for the gouernement of the realme; by whose counsell if he would not be directed, the archbishop of Rone should be set in his place, and he to be deposed. The third day after this, the chancellor firmely promised not to depart out of the realme before hee had deliuered out of his hands all such castels, the keeping whereof he committed to certaine forreners and strangers: and for assurance thereof, he gaue his two brethren and chamberlain for pledges, and so went to Canturbury, where he said he would take the crosse of a pilgrim, and leaue the crosse of his legatship.

The bishop of Ely resigneth his castels.

Now when he was come to the castell of Douer, and there had remained a few daies, contrary to his promise made, his purpose was to take ship, and to passe ouer the seas. And because he durst not doe it openly, he deuised a new kind of disguising, decking himselfe in the apparel of a woman, and so as goodly as he was, went to the sea side in his womans weed, hauing in his hand a metyard, and on his arme a peece of linnen cloth. And thus as he was sitting vpon a rocke waiting for his ship to come and conuey him ouer, a certaine fisherman espying him, and supposing him to be an harlot, came to him, and so with strugling with him, found him as hee was indeed to be a man in likenes of a woman: whereat he wondered and began to make an outcry vpon him. But the bishops seruants being not far off, came running and stilled him as well as they could.

The bishop of Ely clotheth himselfe in womans apparell.

A fisherman taketh the bishop of Ely to be a woman.

The fisherman then going to the next village, and there belike declaring what he had seene, to try out the matter further, came out certaine women, who seeing the linnen cloth hanging at his arme, began to question with him of the price of his cloth, and what he would take for it: but to this he would answer neuer a word, but smiled vpon them. Whereat they musing with themselues, and whispering one with another, at last with their hands were so bold as to plucke downe his mufler, and there by his beard new shauen found him indeed to be a man, and so with a loud exclamation, raised the village vpon him, and would haue fallen vpon him with stones. Then came running a great multitude both of men and women, who wondering at him as birds are wont at an owle, laid hands vpon him, and pluckt him downe to the ground, haling and drawing him by the sleeues and collar of his gowne through stones and rocks, whereby he was shrewdly hurt. His seruants once or twice made out to rescue their old maister, or new mistris, but could not for the preasse of the people, who beating him with their fists, and spitting at him, drew him thorow the whole towne, and so with shame enough at length laid him in a darke cellar in stead of a prison, at whom all the country about wondered and cried out. In conclusion, earle Iohn hearing thereof, within eight daies after sent word, that they should deliuer him and let him goe.

The bishop of Ely is put in womans apparell found to be a man.

Baited of women by the sea side.

Cast into a darke cellar in stead of a prison.

Set at liberty by Iohn earle of Morton.

The bishop then set at libertie, sailed ouer as he could to Flanders, where he had but cold welcomming: from thence he went to Paris, where he gaue Mauricius their bishop three score marks of siluer to be receiued in with procession, & so he was. Then returned he into Normandie. But the archbishop of Rone there gaue commandement ẏ the church doores should be locked, and no seruice said so long as he there remained. The bishop seeing that, directed his letters and messengers to pope Celestine, and also to king Richard into Syria, signifying to them how Iohn the earle of Morton and his complices had handled him, and expulsed him out of the realme, requiring that he might be restored againe to that was taken from him, and also offering himselfe to be tried by the law for that he had done; so that if the king should dislike in any thing that he had done, he was readie to satisfie the kings contentation in all things wherein iustlie he could be charged.

The bishop of Ely giueth threescore marks to be receiued with procession.

The bishop of Ely complaineth to the king and the pope.

Vpon this pope Celestine inflamed with an apostolicall zeale in the behalfe of the said bishop of Ely his legat, wrote a sharp and thundering letter to the archbishops, bishops, and prelats of England, commanding them by his authoritie apostolicall, that for so much as the iniuries done to his legat, did redound to the contumelie of the whole mother church of Rome, they should not faile therefore, but with seuere censures of the church, that is, with booke, bell, & candle, proceed as well against the said Iohn earle of Morton, as also all other who so euer had, or should attempt any violence or iniurie against the said his legat bishop of Ely, with no lesse seueritie then if the said iniurie should be offered to the person of the pope himselfe, or any other of his brethren the cardinals, &c.

The letter of pope Celestine in the behalfe of the bishop of Ely his legat.

The bishop of Ely bold vpon the popes fauour.

The bishop of Ely hauing intelligence, sent him word being at Willand in Flanders, not to presume to aduenture into the realme, contrary to his oth made to king Richard before; commanding moreouer, that if he came, he should be apprehended.

The bishop of Ely the popes legat and chancellor of England.

The nobles assembled in counsel against the bishop of Ely.

The bishop of Ely chancellor of the realme & legat deposed.

The bishop of Ely complaineth to the king and the pope.

The bishop of Ely bold vpon the popes fauour.

The names of many which stood against the bishop of Ely, appointed to be excommunicate.

The bishop of Ely the popes legat and chancellor of England.

The bishop of Ely chancellor of the realme & legat deposed.

The bishop of Ely clotheth himselfe in womans apparell.

The bishop of Ely in womans apparell found to be a man.

The bishop of Ely resigneth his castels.

Another dissension betweene Iohn the kings brother, and William bishop of Ely.

Another broile betweene the chancellor and Geffery archbishop of Yorke the kings brother.

A fisherman taketh the bishop of Ely to be a woman.

Baited of women by the sea side.

Cast into a darke cellar in stead of a prison.

Set at liberty by Iohn earle of Morton.

The bishop of Ely giueth threescore marks to be receiued with procession.

The bishop of Ely complaineth to the king and the pope.

The letter of pope Celestine in the behalfe of the bishop of Ely his legat.

The bishop of Ely bold vpon the popes fauour.

The names of many which stood against the bishop of Ely, appointed to be excommunicate.

The nobles assembled in counsel against the bishop of Ely.

The bishop of Ely chancellor of the realme & legat deposed.

Geffrey archbishop of Yorke deliuered out of prison by commandement of earle Iohn his brother.

A skirmish betweene the seruants of the bishop of Ely, and the seruants of earle Iohn.

The cruell handling of Geffrey archbishop of Yorke, by the bishop of Ely the popes legat and chancellor of England.

Another dissension betweene Iohn the kings brother, and William bishop of Ely.

Another broile betweene the chancellor and Geffery archbishop of Yorke the kings brother.

Digitized by Google

said

ſaid biſhop his chancellor. In like ſort the ſaid chancellor alſo complaining of them, wrote his letters to the king, ſignifying how earle John his brother went about to vſurpe his kingdome, and would alſo ſhortly ſet the crowne vpon his owne head, vnleſſe he made the more ſpéed homeward. The king then was buſie in repulſing the Saladine, and prepared to lay ſiege againſt Hieruſalem, and got Sclauonia, with diuers other townes from the Saracens, which was in the yéere 1192, hauing diuers conflicts in the meane ſpace with the Saladine, & euer put him to the worſe. As the king was thus preparing to lay his ſiege againſt Hieruſalem, the Saladine glad to fall to ſome cõpoſition with ỹ king, ſent vnto him, that if he would reſtore to him againe Sclauonia in as good ſtate as it was when he toke it, he would grant to him & to all chriſtians in the land of Hieruſalem truce for three yéeres, and offered himſelfe thereunto to be ſworne. The king ſéeing the duke of Burgundie and the Frenchmen to ſhrinke from him, and his own men to decay, and alſo his money and health to diminiſh, but eſpecially for that he vnderſtood by the biſhop of Elie his chancellor, the French king to ſet vp John his brother to poſſeſſe his kingdome, being counſelled thereto by the Templaries, toke the truce offered of the Saracens, & ſo began to draw homeward.

The biſhop of Elie complaineth to the king of the earle of Morton his brother.

Anno 1192

In this meane while much grudge and ſtrife increaſed more and more betwéene the biſhop of Elie and the archbiſhop of Rone aboue ſpecified, inſomuch that the archbiſhop being excommunicate, ſent vp his clerks to pope Celeſtine to complaine of the biſhop: but the pope euer ſtood in his purgation. At laſt he ſent two of his cardinals, to wit, Octomannus biſhop of Oſtia, and Iordanus De foſſa noua, to breake the ſtrife betwéene the biſhop of Elie, and the archbiſhop of Rone.

Strife betwéen the biſhop of Elie and the archbiſhop of Rone.

Pope Celeſtine ſtandeth in excuſe of the biſhop of Elie.

After this, king Richard being taken, and in the cuſtodie of Henry the emperor, the biſhop of Elie reſorting to him, was ſent by him into England to Elenor his mother, and other nobles. Who then returning into England againe, not as chancellor, nor as legat (as he ſaid) but as a ſimple plaine biſhop, ſo by that meanes was receiued. Ex Matth. Pariſ. Et ex alijs incerti nominis manuſcriptis codicibus.

The biſhop of Elie with the kings letters commeth againe into England.

But of this vaineglorious prelat inough and too much. Now to returne again to Richard: concerning whoſe worthie acts done abrode in getting of Cyprus, Achon and Ptolemaida, in pacifying Ioppe, &c. partlie is ſpoken of before. Many other valiant & famous acts were by him and the French king atchieued, and more ſhould haue béen, had not thoſe two kings falling into diſcord diſcouered themſelues: by reaſon whereof Philip the French king returned home againe within ſhort ſpace. Who being returned againe eſtſones inuaded the country of Normandy, exciting alſo John the brother of king Richard, to take on him the kingdome of England in his brothers abſence. Who then made league (vpon the ſame) with the French king, and did homage vnto him, which was about the fourth yéere of king Richard. Who then being in Syria, and hearing thereof, made peace with the Turks for three yéeres. And not long after king Richard the next ſpring following returned alſo. Who in his returne driuen by diſtreſſe of weather about the parts of Hiſtria, in a towne called Synaca, was there taken by Limpold duke of the ſame country, and ſo ſold to the emperor for 60000 marks, who for no ſmall ioy thereof, writeth to Philip the French king theſe letters following.

What diſcord doth.

The French king returneth from Paleſtina.

Anno 1193

King Richard returneth from Paleſtina.

The letter of the emperor to Philip the French king concerning the taking of king Richard.

HEnricus Dei gratia Romanorum imperator, & ſemper Auguſtus, dilecto & ſpeciali amico ſuo Philippo, illuſtri Francorũ regi ſalutem, & ſinceræ dilectionis affectũ. Quoniam imperatoria celſitudo non dubitat regalem magnificentiam tuam lætiorem eſſici, de vniuerſis quibus omnipotentia creatoris noſtri nos ipſos & Romanũ imperium honorauerit & exaltauerit, nobilitati tuæ tenore præſentiũ declarare duximus, quòd inimicus imperij noſtri & turbator regni tui rex Angliæ, quum eſſet in tranſeundo mare ad partes ſuas reuerſurus, accidit vt ventus rupta naui ſua in qua ipſe erat, induceret eum in partes Hiſtriæ, ad locũ qui eſt inter Aquileiam & Venetias. Vbi rex Dei permiſſione paſſus naufragiũ, cum paucis euaſit. Quidam itaq; fidelis noſter comes Mainardus de Gooxce, & populus regionis illius, audito quòd in terra erat, & conſiderato diligentius qualem nominatus rex in terra promiſſionis proditionem & traditionem, & proditionis ſuæ cumulũ exercuerat, inſecuti ſunt, intendentes eum captiuare. Ipſo autem rege in fugam conuerſo, ceperunt de ſuis octo milites. Poſtmodum proceſſit rex ad Burgũ in archiepiſcopatu Salſeburgenſi, qui vocatur Friſorum, vbi Fredericus de Beteſow, rege cum tribus tantũ verſus Auſtriam properante, noctu ſex milites de ſuis cepit. Dilectus autem conſanguineus noſter Limpoldus dux Auſtriæ, obſeruatà ſtrata, ſæpe dictum regem iuxta Denam in villa viciniori in domo deſecta captiuauit. Cùm itaq; in noſtra nunc habeatur poteſtate, & ipſe ſemper tua moleſtauit & turbationis operam præſtiterit, ea quæ præmiſimus nobilitati tuæ inſinuare curauimus, ſcientes eà dilectioni tuæ beneplacita exiſtere, animo tuo vberrimam importare lætitiam. Datum apud Ritheountum 5. calendas Ianuar.

King Richard thus being traiterouſly taken and ſold to the emperour by the duke of Auſtrige for 60000 marks, was there kept in cuſtody a yéere and three months. In ſome ſtories it is affirmed, that king Richard returning out of Aſia, came to Italy with proſperous wind, where he deſired of the pope to bee abſolued from an oth made againſt his will, and could not obtain it. And ſo ſetting out from thence towards England, paſſing by the country of Conradus the marques, whoſe death (he being ſlaine a little before) was falſly imputed by the French king to the king of England, and there traiterouſly was taken, as is before ſaid, by Limpoldus duke of Auſtrige. Albeit in another ſtory I find the matter more credible ſet forth, which ſaith thus; That king Richard ſlew the brother of this Limpoldus, playing with him at cheſſe in the French kings court. And Limpoldus taking his aduantage, was more cruell againſt him, and deliuered him, as is ſaid, to the emperor, in whoſe cuſtody he was deteined during the time aboue mentioned, a yéere and three months. During the which time of the kings indurance, the French king in the meane ſeaſon ſtirred war in Normandy. And earle John the kings brother made ſtir and inuaded England; but the barons and biſhops of the land mightily withſtood him, and beſieged him in the caſtell of Windſor, where they toke from him all the caſtels and munitions which before he had got. Thus the earle ſéeing no hope to preuaile in England, and ſuſpecting the deliuerance of the king his brother, made into France, and kept with the French king: at length it was agréed & concluded with the emperor, that king Richard ſhould be releaſed for an hundred thouſand pounds, of the which mony part ſhould remaine to the duke of Auſtrige, the reſt ſhould be the emperors. The ſum of which mony was here gathered and made in England of chalices, croſſes, ſhrines, candleſticks, and other church plate, alſo with publike contribution of frieries, abbies, and other ſubiects of the realme. Whereof part was preſently paid, and for the reſidue remaining hoſtages and pledges were taken, which was about the fifth yéere of his raigne. And then it was obtained of the pope, that prieſts might celebrat with chalices of latin and tin, and ſo was granted and continued long after, which mine author in his chronicle intituled Eulogium, doth teſtifie himſelfe to haue ſéene. At what time this foreſaid mony was paid, and the hoſtages giuen for the ranſome of this king. I haue an old ſtory that ſaith, how the foreſaid duke of Auſtrige ſhortly after was plagued by God with fiue ſundry plagues: firſt, with burning of his chiefe townes: ſecondly, with the drowning of ten thouſand of his men in a great flood, happening no man could tell how: thirdly, by turning all the eares of his corne-field into wormes: fourthly, by taking away almoſt all the nobles of his land by death: fifthly, by breaking his owne leg falling from his horſe, which leg he was compelled to cut off with his own hands, and after died vpon the ſame: who then is ſaid at his death to forgiue king Richard fiftie thouſand marks, and ſent home the hoſtages that were with him. Ex varijs chron. The book intituled Eulogium before mentioned, declareth thus; that the ſaid Limpoldus duke of Auſtrige fell in diſpleaſure with the biſhop of Rome, and died excommunicat the next yéere after, being the yéere one thouſand one hundred ninety ſix.

Confederacy of the French king and earle John againſt K. Richard.

Earle John beſieged at Windſor.

Anno 1195

Ex chronico cuiuſdam Eulogiũ.

The iuſt puniſhment of God vpon the duke of Auſtrige.

Thus the ſaid king Richard being ranſomed, as hath been declared, from the couetous captiuity of the emperor, was reſtored againe, and made his repaire into England. At whoſe returne, earle John his brother reſorting vnto him with humble ſubmiſſion, deſired to be pardoned of his tranſgreſſions. To whom king Richard anſwering againe; Would God (ſaith he) this your treſpaſſe as it dieth with me in obliuion, ſo it may remaine with you in remembrance, and ſo gently forgaue him. And after he had again recouered his holds and caſtles, cauſed himſelfe to be crowned againe. Which done, he made his power againſt the French king, and draue him out of Normandy. After that, he turned his voiage againſt the Welſhmen, and ſubdued them.

Anno 1196

The anſwer of King Richard to his brother.

The next yéere following, which was the yéere 1197, Philip the French king brake the truce made betwéene him and king Richard, whereupon the king was compelled to ſaile ouer againe to Normandy to withſtand the malice of his enemie. About which time, my ſtory recordeth of one called of ſome Fulco; ſome ſay he was the archbiſhop of Rone called Gualter. This Fulco being then in England, and comming to the kings preſence, ſaid vnto him with great courage and boldneſſe, Thou haſt, O mighty king, three daughters very vicious and of euil diſpoſition; take good héed of them, and betimes prouide for them good huſbands, leſt by vntimely beſtowing of the ſame, thou ſhalt not onely incur great hurt and damage, but alſo vtter ruine and deſtruction to thy ſelfe. To whom the king in a rage ſaid; Thou lying and mocking hypocrit, thou knoweſt not where thou art, or what thou ſaieſt: I thinke thou art mad, or not well in thy wits; for I haue neuer a daughter, as all the world knoweth, and therefore thou open lier get thée out of our preſence. To whom Fulco anſwered, No, and like your grace, I lie not, but ſay truth: for you haue three daughters which continually frequent your court, and wholly poſſeſſe your perſon, and ſuch three whores and naughty packs as neuer the like hath been heard of: I meane, miſchieuous pride, greedy couetouſneſſe, and filthy luxurity; and therfore againe I ſay, O king, beware of them, and out of hand prouide mar-

Anno 1197

Three daughters of the king noted.

riages

Digitized by Google

riages for them, lest in not so doing, thou vtterly vndo both thy selfe and all the whole realme.

The which his words the King toke in good part, with correction of himselfe, and confession of the same. Whereupon incontinently hee called his lords and barons before him, vnto whom hee declared the communing and monition of Fulco, who had willed him to beware of his three daughters, pride, auarice, and luxurity, with counsell out of hand to marry them, lest further discommodity should ensue both to him and to the whole realme; whose good counsell (my lords) I intend to follow, not doubting of all your consents thereunto. Wherefore here before you all, I giue my daughter swelling pride to wife vnto the proud Templars; my greedy daughter auarice to the couetous order of the Cistercian monks; and last of all, my filthy daughter luxurity to the riotous prelats of the church, whom I thinke to be very meete men for her; and so seuerally well agreeing to all their natures, that the like matches in this our realme are not to bee found for them. And thus much concerning Fulco.

Not long after this, it befell that a certaine noble personage (lord of Lemonice in little Britaine, Widomarus by name) found a great substance of treasure both of gold and siluer hid in the ground, whereof a great part he sent to King Richard, as chiefe lord and prince ouer the whole country. Which the King refused, saying; he would either haue all, or none, for that he was the principal chiefetain ouer the land. But the finder would not condiscend to that. Wherefore the King laid siege to a castell of his called Galuz, thinking the treasure to lie there. But the keepers and warders of the castell, seeing themselues not sufficient to withstand the King, offered to him the castell, desiring to depart with life and armor. To this the King would in no wise grant, but bid them to reenter the castell againe, and to defend it in all the forcible wise they could. It so befell, that as the king with the duke of Brabant went about the castel, viewing the places thereof, a souldior within, named Bertandus Cordoun, stroke the King with an arrow in the arme, whereupon the yron remaining and festering in the wound, the King within nine daies after died; who because he was not content with the halfe of the treasure that another man found, lost all his own treasure that he had. The King being thus wounded, caused the man that stroke him to be brought vnto him, and asked the cause of him why he so wounded him: Who answered him againe (as the story saith) that he thought to kill rather then to be killed: and what punishment soeuer he should sustaine, he was content, so that he might kill him which had before killed his father and brethren. The King hearing his words, freely forgaue him, and caused an hundred shillings to be giuen him. Albeit (as the story addeth) after the death of the King, the duke of Brabant, after great torments, caused him to bee hanged. Ex historia regis Richardi secundi, cui initium, De patre istius Bruti, &c. The story of Gisburne saith, that the killer of King Richard comming to the French King, thinking to haue a great reward, was commanded to be drawne asunder with horses, and his quarters to be hanged vp.

He that all would haue, shall all forgoe.

Couetous greedinesse plagued.

The death of King Richard the first.

King Richard forgiueth him that killed him.

Ex bibliotheca Carienſi.

Ex Gualtero Hemingford monacho Giſburnenſi.

Another story affirmeth, and Gisburne partly doth testifie the same, that a little before the death of king Richard, three abbats of the order Cistercian came to him, to whom he was confessed. And when he saw them somewhat stay at his absolution, had these words: that he did willingly commit his body to the earth to be eaten of wormes, and his soule to the fire of purgatory, there to be tormented till the iudgement, in the hope of God his mercy. Ex Iornalenſ. Gisburn. & alijs.

Maine feare of purgatory.

Ex Iornal. Giſburnenſi, & alijs.

About the raigne of this King, the said Iornalensis maketh mention of Roger archbishop of Yorke, which put out of his church the monks, and placed for them secular priests, saying, that he would rather wish ecclesiasticall benefices to be giuen to wanton priests, then to abominable monks; and that Thurstinus did sinne neuer worse in all his life, then in building that house for monks, &c. Another story I haue which saith, that this was the bishop not of Yorke, but of Couentry.

Monks put out and secular priests receiued.

The King not long after departed without issue, and John his brother raigned after him: in whom, although some vices may worthily be reprehended, especially for his incontinent and too much licentious life, yet was he farre from that deserning, for the which hee hath been so ill reported of diuers writers: who being led more with affection of popery, then with true iudgement and due consideration, depraued his doings more then the sincere truth of the history will beare them. Concerning which history, after so many writers, we thought also to bestow a little labor, although in this matter we cannot be so long as I would, and as the matter requireth.

King Iohn.

King John.

AFter the death of King Richard, called Coeur de lion, raigned his brother John earle of Morton. Afterward the archbishop put the crowne on his head, and sware him to defend the church, and to maintaine the same in her good lawes, and to destroy the ill. And except he thought not in his mind to doe this, the archbishop charged him not to presume to take on him this dignity. And on S. John Baptists day next following, King John sailed into Normandy and came to Rone, where he was royally receiued, and truce concluded betweene him and the French King for a time. And thither came to him the earle of Flanders, and all other lords of France that were of King Richards band and friendship, and were sworne vnto him.

Not long after this, Philip the French King made Arthur knight, and toke his homage for Normandy, Britaine, and all other his possessions beyond the sea, and promised him helpe against King John. After this, King John and the French King talked togither with their lords about one houres space, and the French King asked so much land for himselfe and knight Arthur, that King John would grant him none; and so departed in wrath.

Arthur of Britaine.

A communication betwen the king of England and the French king.

The same yeere a legat came into France, and commanded the King in paine of interdiction to deliuer one Peter out of prison, that was elect to a bishoprick, and thereupon he was deliuered.

And after that the legat came into England, and commanded King John vnder paine of interdiction, to deliuer the archbishop whom he had kept as prisoner two yeeres; which the king denied to do, till he had paid him six thousand marks, because he toke him in harnesse in a field against him, and sware him vpon his deliuerance, that hee should neuer weare harnesse against any christian man.

This time diuorce was made betweén King John and his wife, daughter of the earle of Glocester, because they were in the third degree of kinred. And after, by the counsell of the French King, King John wedded Isabel, daughter of the earle of Angulla: and then Arthur of Britaine did homage to King John for Britaine and others.

Marriage in the third degree forbidden by the pope.

Anno 1200

At this time fell strife betwéen King John and Geffrey the archbishop of Yorke for diuers causes: first, because he would not suffer & permit the shiriffe of Yorke in such affaires as hee had to do for the King within his diocesse: secondly, because he did also excõmunicat the said shiriffe: thirdly, because he would not saile with him into Normandy, to make the marriage betweén Lewis the French Kings sonne, and his néece, &c.

After this, in the yéere of our Lord 1202, Philip the French King (in a communication betwéen King John and him) required that the said king John should part with all his lands in Normandy and Pictauia which he had beyond the sea, vnto Arthur his Nephew, and that incontinent, or else he would war against him, and so did. For when King John denied that request, the next day following the French King with the said Arthur set vpon certain of his townes and castels in Normandie, and put him to much disquietnesse. But he (the Lord so prouiding, which is the giuer of all victory) had such repulse at the Englishmens hands, that they pursuing the Frenchmen in their flight, did so follow them to their hold, and so inforced vpon them, that not only they took the said Arthur prisoner with many other of the Frenchmen, but also gaue such an ouerthrow to the rest, that none was there left to beare tidings home. This Arthur was nephew to King John, and son to Geffrey which was the elder son to John. For King Henry the second (to make the matter more euident) had eight children, one William, which died in his childhood: the second, Henry, which died also his father being yet aliue: the third Geffrey earle of Britaine, which likewise deceased in his fathers daies, leauing behind him two children, Arthur and Eleonora: the fourth, Richard Coeur de lion King: the fift John now raigning, and three other daughters besides. The same Arthur being thus taken in war, was brought before the King at the castell of Falesie in Normandy, who being exhorted with many gentle words to leaue the French king, and to incline to his vncle, answered againe stoutly and with great indignation, requiring the kingdome of England with all the other dominions thereto belonging, to be restored to him, as to the lawfull heire of the crowne. By reason whereof, he (prouoking the Kings displeasure against him) was sent to the tower of Rone, where at length (whether by leaping into the ditch, thinking to make his escape, or whether by some other priuy hand, or by what chance else, it is not yet agréed vpon in stories) hee finished his life. By occasion whereof, the foresaid King John was had after in great suspition, whether iustly or vniustly, the Lord knoweth.

Anno 1202

Nat. Paretti in vita Ioannis regis.

Arthur.

Anno 1203

The yéere following, historiographers write, that King John for lacke of rescue, lost all his holds and possessions in Normandy, through the force of the French King.

Normandy lost, and gotten by the French men.

After these losses, came other troubles vpon him, with other as great or more great enemies (that is, with the pope and his popelings) by occasion of chusing of the archbishop of Canturbury, as in this history following by Christ his grace is to be declared.

The yéere of our Lord 1205, about the month of July, Hubert the archbishop of Canturbury deceased: whose decease after it was in Canturbury to the monks knowne, and afore his body was yet committed to the earth; the younger sort of the monks there gathered themselues togither at midnight, and elected their superior Reignold, & without the kings licence, or yet knowledge priuily placed him in the metropolitical seat, singing Te Deũ at midnight. And because the king should not make their election void, they charged him by vertue of his oth

Anno 1205

Striuing for the election of the archbishop of Canturbury.

Digitized by Google

oth to keepe all ſecret by the way, and to ſhew nothing what was done before he came to the pope: but he cõtrary to his oth, ſo ſone as he came into Flanders opened al abrode all the matter, and vttered their counſell: whereupon the monks being not a little grieued with him, ſent him priuily vnto the court of Rome out of hand. The next day the elder monks ſent to the king, deſiring him of his gracious licence canonically to chuſe their archbiſhop. The king moſt gently and fauourably granted their petition, requiring them inſtantly, and deſiring that for his ſake they would ſhew fauor to John Gray, then biſhop of Norwich, as they did indeed, erecting him into that ſea of their high primacy. Moreouer, becauſe the authority of kings and princes was then but ſmall in their owne dominion, without the popes conſent and confirmation to the ſame: hee ſent alſo to Rome of his owne charges to haue the foreſaid election ratified by the pope. The ſuffragans of Canturbury then (being not a little offended at theſe two elections) ſent ſpeedily to Rome to haue them both ſtopped, for that they had not been of counſell with them. And hereupon at the laſt grew a moſt prodigious tumult.

✻ In this yeere the clergy grew ſo vnruly, that they neglected their charge, and thereby incenſed the kings diſpleaſure ſo ſore againſt them, that he toke order about the goods of ſuch as in that caſe were faulty: as ſhall appeare more manifeſtly by that which followeth.

A letter of king Iohn touching the lands and goods of ſuch clerks as refuſe to celebrat diuine ſeruice.

R Ex omnibus de epiſcopatu Lincolniæ clericis & laicis ſalutem. Sciatis quòd à die lunæ proximè ante Floridum paſchatis commiſimus, &c. In Engliſh.

Turris Lond. Some thinke that Floridum paſchatis is Palmeſunday: but Eaſter is rather thought to be meant thereby, ſith the Spaniards at this day call the ſame Florida.

The king to all clerks and lay people within the biſhoprick of Lincolne, greeting. Know ye that from monday next before the feaſt of Eaſter, we haue committed to William of Cornehill archdeacon of Huntington, & to Ioſeline of Canuil all the lands and goods of the abbats and priors, and of all the religious perſons, and alſo of all clerks within the biſhopricke of Lincolne, which will not from that time celebrat diuine ſeruice. And we command you, that from thence you aſsiſt them as our bailiffes, and belieue them in thoſe things which they ſhall tell you priuatly on our behalfe. Witneſſe our ſelfe at Clarendon the eighteenth day of March, in the ninth yeere of our raigne.

The like was written to all within the biſhopricke of Ely. So that hereby we ſee the diſſolutenes and wilfulnes of thoſe popiſh churchmen, whom conſcience of diſcharging their duty did ſo little moue, as that they thought vpon nothing leſſe; ſith the king was driuen to vſe ſuch auſterity and ſharpnes againſt them. But to proceed in this troubleſome election: you ſhall vnderſtand, that the next yeere after, the ſuffragans of the prouince of Canturbury on the one ſide, and the monks of Canturbury on the other ſide, came afore the pope with their brawling matter. Firſt the monks preſenting Reginald their ſuperior, deſired that their election might be confirmed. The ſuffragans likewiſe complained that the monks would preſume to chuſe the archbiſhop without their conſent, and therefore deſired by diuers reaſons the firſt election to be of none effect. The pope deciding the matter betweene both, pronounced with the monks, charging the ſuffragans and biſhops to meddle no more with that election, but to let the monks alone. The monks of Canturbury now hauing the whole election in their owne hands, fell alſo at ſquare among themſelues, the younger ſort with the elder. The yonger ſort which had choſen Reginald their ſuperior, would that election to ſtand. The elder ſort of the monks replied againe, ſaying: That the firſt election was done by ſtealth, and by night, and by the younger part; alſo without the counſell of other monks. Ouer and beſides, it was done without the kings licence or appointment, and without the due ſolemnity thereunto belonging.

{Anno 1206} Prelats of the church had then mony enough belike, that they could keepe play at Rome againſt their prince, which thing cauſed the princes after to ſeek ſuch means to cut them ſhort.

{Anno 1207}

Diſſenſion amongſt the monks of Canturbury about the election of the archbiſhop.

And as concerning our election (ſaid they) it was done in the cleere light of the day, by which it had authority in preſence of our liege lord the king, and his counſell being willing to the ſame.

This allegation thus proponed, the ſuffragans procter or man of law ſtood forth, and proued the former election to be good, and this latter to be void and of no value, after this ſort. Whether the firſt election (ſaith he) were iuſt or vniuſt, ye ought firſt by the law to haue condemned it afore ye ſhould haue preſumed to the ſecond; but thus ye did not: therefore is this your latter doing no election at al, and the firſt therefore is rather to be ratified then yours. When they had thus multiplied talk on both ſides, with many friuolous allegations a long time, and could not agree vpon one perſon, pope Innocent condemned both their elections, commanding them to chuſe Stephan Langton, then cardinall of S. Chryſogon for their archbiſhop. The monks then anſwered, that they durſt not ſo doe without conſent of their king, and for that it was preiudiciall to their ancient liberties. The pope by and by (ſaith the text) as one in a furie, taking the words out of their mouthes, ſaid thus vnto them: We will ye to know, that we haue full power and authority ouer the church of Canturbury; neither are we wont to tary the conſent of princes: therfore we command you in paine of our great curſe, that ye chuſe him only whom we haue appointed.

The pride and tyranny of the pope.

The monks at theſe words abaſhed and terrified, though they much murmured in their hearts, yet conſented they all in one, and thereupon ſang Te Deum. Only doctor Helias Brantfield withdrew himſelfe from that election, whom the king had ſent for the admiſſion of the biſhop of Norwich.

Thus was Stephan Langton (in the high church of Vterbie, by the popes hand) made archbiſhop of Canturbury. Stephan Langton made archbiſhop of Canturbury.

✻ This election thus paſt with the popes grace & fauor, the ſaid Stephan had in England, amongſt others that ſolicited his cauſe to the king, a brother named Maſter Simon Langton, who in tract of time alſo became archbiſhop of Yorke, as appeareth in the courſe of this ſtory, in the raigne of Henry the third, An. 1228. In this behalfe the king ſeemed tractable, ſo he might haue his ſouereignty entire. Againſt the which, becauſe the ſaid Stephan had vowed to oppoſe himſelfe, and the king miſliking of ſuch demeanor, he ſent abrode his letters certificatory about the realme, therein giuing intimation to all people of proud Stephan Langtons contumacie: the forme of the ſaid letters followeth.

Letters certificatory of king Iohn, touching the contumacie of Stephan Langton archbiſhop of Canturbury by the popes election.

R Ex omnibus hominibus, &c. Sciatis quòd magiſter Simon de Langton venit ad nos apud Winton die Mercurij proximè ante mediam quadrageſimæ, &c. Turris Lond. In Engliſh.

The king to all men, &c. Know ye that Maſter Simon Langton came to vs at Wincheſter, on the wedneſday next before midlent, and in preſence of our biſhops beſought vs that wee would receiue his brother Maſter Stephan Langton to be archbiſhop of Canturbury. And when we ſpake vnto him touching the reſeruation & ſauing of our dignity vnto vs, he told vs that he would do no ſuch thing for vs, vnleſſe we would wholly relie our ſelues vpõ his courteſie and gentlenes. This therefore we command, that you know euill and wrong to be done vnto vs in this behalfe: and we charge you, that you belieue thoſe things which Reginald of Cornhill ſhall tel you on our part, touching the foreſaid deed betweene vs and the biſhops aboue named, &c. Witneſſe the king at Wincheſter the fourteenth day of March, in the ninth yeere of his raigne.

Now, albeit the king toke indignation at this proceeding in the election of Stephan, yet from thenceforth (ſaith Matthew Paris) the pope could do no leſſe but mightily defend him from all veration and danger, conſidering that hee was his owne deare darling, and a child of his owne creation.

Furthermore, vpon this occaſion king John conceiued an exceeding diſpleaſure againſt the clergy and monks of Canturbury (as he had good cauſe) they doing ſo many euils againſt his princely prerogatiue. Without his licence they elected their archbiſhop, and put by the biſhop of Norwich, whom he had appointed. They walked a great part of his treaſure for the wars, and to bring all to the diuell they made Stephan Langton their high metropolitan, whom he toke for a grieuous enemy to the whole realme, being alwaies ſo familiar with the French king. Wherfore in his anger he baniſhed them out of the land, to the number of threeſcore and foure, for this their contumacie and contempt of his regall power.

The king doth expoſtulat with the pope for conſecrating Stephan Langton archbiſhop of Canturbury.

The monks of Canturbury thus being expulſed, the king forthwith ſendeth meſſengers to the pope with his letters, wherein he doth charply and expreſly expoſtulat with the pope. Firſt, for that ſo vncurteouſly he repulſed the election of the biſhop of Norwich, and ſet vp one Stephan Langton, a man vnknowne to him, and brought vp amongſt his enemies a long time in the kingdome of France, conſecrating him archbiſhop of Canturbury, and letting the other goe. Alſo (which is more) it redoundeth to the ſubuerſion and derogation of the liberties appertaining to his crowne: for notwithſtanding his conſent paſt (being before of the monks not made priuie, which ſhould ſo haue done) yet he rathly preſumed to promote and prefer another. Wherefore he cannot maruell (he ſaith) enough, that neither the ſaid pope nor the court of Rome doth conſider and reuolue with themſelues, how neceſſary his loue and fauor hath been alwaies hitherto to the ſea of Rome, and that they conſider not what great profit and reuenewes haue proceeded hitherto to them out of the realme of England: the like whereof hath not been receiued out of any other country beſides on this ſide the Alps. He addeth moreouer and ſaith, that for his liberties he will ſtand (if need be) vnto death, neither can he be ſo remoued and ſhaken off from the election of the biſhop of Norwich, which he ſeeth to be ſo commodious to him and profitable. Finally, hee thus concludeth, ſaying: that in caſe in this his requeſt he be not heard, he will ſo prouide by the ſeas, that there ſhall be no ſuch gadding and courſing any more ouer to Rome, ſuffering the riches of the land no more to be tranſported ouer, whereby he ſhould be himſelfe the leſſe able to reſiſt his enemies. And ſeeing he hath of his owne at home, archby-

Digitized by Google

archbishops, bishops, and other prelats of the church (both of Englishmen and of others) sufficiently prouided and instructed in all kind of knowledge: therefore he shall not need greatly to seeke for iudgement and iustice further abrode.

When these came to the popes intelligence, he directeth letters againe to the king in this forme.

The popes letters answering king John.

INnocentius pope, seruant of the seruants of God, to our welbeloued sonne in Christ the king of England, health, and apostolicall blessing. Whereas we haue written to you heretofore, exhorting and intreating you after an humble, diligent, & gentle sort (concerning the Church of Canturbury) you haue written to vs againe after a threatning sort and vpbraiding manner: both spitefully and also frowardly. And whereas we more and aboue that our right and duty required, haue borne and giuen to you: you againe for your part haue giuen to vs not so much as by right & duty you are bound to do. And though your deuotion, as you say, hath bin to vs very necessary, yet consider againe that ours also is not a little opportune and expedient for you. And whereas we in such like cases haue not shewed at any time the like honour to any prince as we haue vnto you, you againe haue so much derogated our honor, as no prince else hath presumed to doe besides you alone, pretending certaine friuolous causes & occasions I cannot tell what, why you would not condescend to the election of Stephan Langton, cardinall of S. Chrysogono, chosen by the monks of Canturbury, for that the said Stephan (as you say) hath been conuersant and brought vp amongst your enemies, and his person to you vnknown. But you know what is the prouerbe of Salomon: The net is cast, but in vaine in the sight of the flying birds, &c.

It is pitie but this pope should be honoured of kings & princes.

A pitifull case that a king cannot constitute an archbishop within his own realme, whom he most liketh.

With much other matter in the same epistle, wherein he falleth into the commendation of Stephan Langton his cardinall, declaring how learned he was in the liberall arts; and in diuinity, insomuch that he was prebendated at Paris; also come of an honest stocke, and an Englishman borne, and not vnknowne to the king, seeing the king had written his letters thrice to him before. Declaring moreouer in the said letter, how the messengers of the king had specified to him another cause; which was, for that the monks of Canturbury which had to do in the election, came not to him before for his consent. Declaring moreouer in the said letter, how the said messengers of the king, intreated in the kings behalfe, that forsomuch as the popes letters (wherein the king was commanded to send his procters to Rome for the same matter) came not to the kings hand, neither did the monks direct any such letters or message to the king to haue his consent: therfore the pope considering the same, would grant so much for the regard of the kings honor, that the monks of Canturbury should not proceed without the kings assent therein. And forsomuch as that hath not bin done as yet, therefore they desired some delay therein to be giuen, sufficient for the doing thereof. Whereunto he said, that he had granted and fulfilled their request, in sending his letters and messengers once or twice to the king for the same purpose, although he said it was not the maner of the sea apostolike (who had the fulnesse of power ouer the church of Canturbury) to wait for princes consents in such elections, who then could not be suffered to do that which they came for. Wherefore in knitting vp his letter, he thus concludeth in these words.

And therefore seeing the matter so standeth, we see no cause why we should require or tary for the kings fauour or consent any more therin, but intend so to proceed in this matter, neither inclining on the right hand, nor on the left, according as the canonicall ordinances of the holy fathers shall direct vs, that is, (that all impediments and delaies set aside) so to prouide that the church of Canturbury be not any longer destitute of her pastor. Wherefore be it known to your discretion or kingly prudence, that forsomuch as this election of Stephan Langton hath orderly & concordly thus proceeded without fraud or deceit, vpō a person meet for the same; therefore we will not for no mans pleasure, neither may we without danger of fame and of conscience defer or protract any longer the consummation of the said election. Wherefore my welbeloued sonne, seeing we haue had respect to your honour, aboue that our right and duty required: study to honor vs so much as your duty requireth againe, so that you may the more plentifully deserue fauor, both at Gods hand and ours; lest that by doing the contrary, you bring your selfe into such a pecke of troubles, as afterwards you shall scarse rid your selfe of againe. For this know for a certaine, in the end it must needs fall out, that he shal haue the better, vnto whō euery knee (of heauenly, earthly, and infernall creatures) doth bow, whose turne I serue in earth, though I be vnworthy. Therefore settle not your selfe to obey their perswasions, which alwaies desire your vnquietnesse, whereby they may fish the better in the water whē it is troubled; but commit your selfe to our pleasure, which vndoubtedly shall turne to your praise, glory, and honor. For it should not be much for your safetie in this cause to resist God and the church, in whose quarrel that blessed martyr and glorious bishop Thomas hath of late shed his bloud, especially seeing your father and your brother of famous memory, then kings of England, did giue ouer those three wicked customes into the hands of the legats of the sea apostolike. But if you yeeld your selfe humbly into our hands, wee will looke that you and yours shall bee sufficiently prouided for, that no preiudice may arise hereupon to you ward. Giuen at Lateran the tenth yeere of our popedome.

Note the proceedings of this ambitious pope.

Tho. Becket be meaneth.

Princes must be subiect to the pope.

Thus hast thou (gentle reader) the glorious letter of the proud pope; I beseech thee marke it well. Now to the story.

After this letter was sent out, not long after proceedeth a charge and commandement sent into England vnto certaine bishops there, requiring them by authority apostolicall, that if the said king would not receiue the said prior of Canturbury, and his monks, then they should interdict him throughout all his realme. For the executing whereof, foure bishops were appointed by the vsurped power of the popes buls: namely, William bishop of London, Eustace bishop of Ely, Walter bishop of Winchester, and Giles bishop of Hereford. Which said foure bishops went vnto the king, and shewed their commission from the pope as is aforesaid, willing him to consent thereto, &c. But the said king refused the same, and would by no meanes grant to their request. Whereupon they departing from his grace, went the morrow after the Annunciation of our lady, and pronounced the said general interdiction throughout all England, so that the church doores were shut vp with keies, and other fastenings, and with wals, &c.

Foure bishops appointed to interdict the realme.

England interdicted by the pope.

Now when the king heard of this, he began to be moued against them, and tooke all the possessions of the foure bishops into his hands, appointing certaine men to keep the liuings of the clergy throughout the realme, and that they should inioy no part thereof. Which being done, the bishops (seeing the same) cursed all them that kept, or should meddle with church goods, against the will of them that ought them: and vnderstanding for all that, that the king nothing regarded their doings, they went ouer sea to the bishop of Canturbury, and informed him what had happened: who hearing the same, willed them againe to returne to Canturbury, and he would come thither to them, or else send certaine persons thither in his stead that should do as much as if he were there himself. Then when the bishops heard this, they returned againe to England, to Canturbury, which tidings came shortly to the king that they were come againe thither. And because he might not himselfe trauell to them, he sent thither bishops, earles and abbats to intreat them, that the archbishop Stephan, whom he had chosen, might be admitted; promising the prior and all the monks of Canturbury in his behalfe, that he should neuer take any thing of the church goods against the will of them that owe them; but would make amends to them of whom hee had taken any such goods, and that the church should haue all her franchises in as ample maner as in S. Edwards time the Confessor it had.

Discipline of the church abused for priuat reuenge.

When the forme of agreement was thus concluded, it was ingrossed in a paire of indentures, which the foresaid foure bishops to the one part thereof set their seales, and the other part the said bishops, earles, & abbats caried to shew the king. When the king saw the order thereof, he liked it well; sauing he would not agree to make restitution of the church goods. So he sent to the foure bishops againe that they should put out that point of restitution. But they answered stoutly that they would not put out one word. Then the king sent word to the archbishop by the foure bishops, that hee should come to Canturbury to speake with him, and for his safe conduct to come and go againe at his will, he sent his iustices as pledges, Gilbert Petteuin, William de la Bereuar, and John Letfitz. Which thing thus done, the archbishop Stephan came to Canturbury, and the king (hearing thereof) came to Chilham: from whence he sent his treasurer the bishop of Winchester to him, to haue him put out of the indentures the clause of restitution aforesaid: who denying to alter any word of the same, moued the king in such sort, that immediatly it was proclaimed throughout England at the kings comandement, that all those that had any church liuings, and went ouer sea, should come againe into England by a certaine day, or else lose their liuings for euer more. And further in that proclamation, hee charged all shiriffes within the realme, to inquire if any bishops, abbats, priors, or any other churchman (from that day forward) receiued any commandement that came from the pope, and that they should take his or their body and bring it before him: and also that they should take into their hands for the kings vse, all the church lands that were giuen to any man through the archbishop Stephan, or by the priors of Canturbury from the time of the election of the archbishop: and further charged that al the woods that were the archbishops, should be cut downe and sold.

The inconsiderate stoutnesse of the prelats against the king.

Stephan Langton stout against his king.

The king moued against the archbishop Langton.

When tidings came to the pope that the king had thus done, being moued therby with fiery wrath, he sent to the king two legats (the one called Pandulph, and the other Durant) to warne him in the popes name that he should cease his doings to the holy church, and amend the wrong hee had done to the archbishop of Canturbury, to the priors and the monks of Canturbury, and to all the clergy of England. And further, that he should restore the goods againe that hee had taken of them against their will, or else they should curse the king by name: and to doe this, the pope tooke them his letters in buls patent. These two legats comming into England, resorted to

Two legats sent from the pope.

Digitized by Google

Restitution required of the king.

to the king to Northhampton, where he held his parlament, and saluting him, said they came from the pope of Rome, to reforme the peace of holy church. And first, said they, we admonish you in the popes behalfe, that ye make full restitution of the goods and of the lands that ye haue rauished holy church of: and that ye receiue Stephan the archbishop of Canturburie into his dignitie, and the prior of Canturburie and his monks; and that ye yéld againe vnto the archbishop all his lands and rents without any withholding. And sir, yet moreouer that ye shall make such restitution to them, as the church shall thinke sufficient.

Then answered the king: As touching the prior and his monkes of Canturburie, all that ye haue said I would gladly do, and all things else that you would ordaine; but as touching the archbishop, I shall tell you as it lieth in my heart. Let the archbishop leaue his bishoprike, and if the pope then shall intreat for him, peraduenture I may like to giue him some other bishoprike in England: and vpon this condition I will receiue and admit him.

Then said Pandulph vnto the king; Holy church was wont neuer to disgrade archbishop without cause reasonable: but euer she was wont to correct princes that were disobedient to her.

What? How now (quoth the king) threaten ye me? Nay, said Pandulph, but ye haue now openly told vs as it standeth in your heart: and now we will tell you what is the popes will, and thus it standeth: He hath wholy interdicted and cursed you, for the wrongs you haue done vnto the holy church and vnto the clergie. And for so much as yée will dwell still in your malice, and will come to no amendment, you shall vnderstand, that from this time forward the sentences vpon you giuen haue force and strength. And all those that with you haue communed before this time, whether that they be earles, barons, or knights (or any other what soeuer they be) we assoile them safely from their sinnes vnto this day. And from this time forwards (of what condition soeuer they be) we accurse them openly: and specially by this our sentence that we do commune with you. And we assoile moreouer earles, barons, knights, and all other manner of men of their homages, seruices, and fealties that they should do vnto you. And this thing to confirme, we giue plaine power vnto the bishop of Winchester, and to the bishop of Norwich, and the same power we giue against Scotland vnto the bishop of Rochester and of Salisbury: and in Wales we giue the same power to the bishops of Saint Dauid and of Landaffe, and of S. Asse.

Sentence of the popes curse pronounces against the king.

The pope author of rebellion and disobedience of subiects towards their prince.

Also sir king (quoth Pandulph) all the kings, princes, and the great dukes christened, haue laboured to the pope to haue licence to crosse themselues, and to warre against thée, as vpon Gods enemie, and winne thy land, and to make king whom it pleaseth the pope. And we héere now assoile all those of their sinnes, that will rise against thée héere in thine owne land.

Then the king hearing this, answered: What shame may ye do more to me then this?

Pandulph againe: We say to you in Verbo Dei, that neither you nor any heire that you haue, after this day shall bee crowned. So the king said; By him that is almightie God, if I had knowne of this thing before ye came into this land, and that ye had brought me such newes, I should haue made you tarrie out these twelue moneths.

Like master, like man.

Then answered Pandulph; Full well we thought, at our first comming, that ye would haue béen obedient to God and to holy church, and haue fulfilled the popes commandement, which we haue shewed and pronounced to you, as we were charged therewith. And now ye say, that if ye had will the cause of our comming, ye would haue made vs tarrie out a whole yeare: who might as well say, that yée would haue taken a whole yeares respit without the popes leaue: but for to suffer what death that ye can ordaine, we shall not spare to tell you all the popes message and will that he gaue vs in charge.

In another chronicle I find the words betwéene the king and Pandulph something otherwise described, as though the king should first threaten him with hanging if he had foreknowne of his comming. To whom Pandulph againe should answere, that he looked for nothing else at his hand, but to suffer for the churches right. Whereupon the king being mightily intensed, departed. The king the same time being at Northhampton willed the shiriffes and baliffes to bring forth all the prisoners there, that such as had deserued should be put to death: to the intent (as some thinke) to make Pandulphus afraid. Among whom was a certaine clerke, who for counterfeiting the kings coine, was also condemned to be hanged, drawne, and quartered; and moreouer, by the king was commanded (thereby to anger Pandulphus the more, as may be thought) to be hanged vp highest aboue the rest. Pandulphus hearing thereof, notwithstanding he somewhat began to feare lest he should be hanged himselfe, yet with such courage as he had, he went to the church to set out booke, bell, and candle, charging that no man vnder paine of accursing, should lay hands vpon the clerke. Upon this the king and the cardinall departed in no little anger. And Pandulph went to Rome, and reported to the pope and the cardinals what had béen done.

Pandulph woxe afraid then hurt.

Then the pope summoned all the bishops, abbats, and clerkes of England to come and repaire vnto Rome, to consult what was to be done therein. This councell began the first day of October. In the which councel it was decreed by the pope and his assembly, that John king of England should be accursed with all such as held with him, euery day so long as that councell endured. Albeit this was not yet granted, that the people should be crossed to fight against him, because as yet he had shed no blod. But afterwards the said pope Innocent, séeing that king John by no means would stoope vnder his subiection, nor vnder the rule of his popish see, he sent vnto the French king, vpon remission of all his sins, and of all that went with him, that he should take with him all the power he might, and so to inuade the realme of England to destroy king John.

The popes great curse.

This occasion giuen, pope Innocent yet once againe commanded in paine of his great curse, that no man should obey king John, neither yet keepe company with him: he forbad all persons to eat and drinke with him, to talke with him, to commune or counsell with him; yea, his owne familiar houshold to do him any kind of seruice, either at bed or at bord, in church, hall or stable. And what followed thereof? The greater part of them, which after such sort fled from him (by the ordinance of God) of diuers and sundrie diseases the same yeare died. And betwéene both nations (English and French) fell that yeare great amitie; but secret, subtill, and false, to the bitter betraying of England. Neither was the pope content only with this, but moreouer the said pope Innocent gaue sentence definitiue (by counsell of his cardinals) that king John should be put from his seat regall and deposed, and another put in his Rome. And to the speedie execution thereof he appointed the French king Philip, promising to giue him full remission of all his sins, and the cleare possession of all the realme of England, to him and his heires, if he did either kill him or expell him.

The iust punishment of God vpon disobedient subiects.

The pope found a murtherer.

The next yeare the French king began his attempt in hope of the crowne of England; being well manned with bishops, monkes, prelats, and priests, and their seruants to maintaine the same: bragging of the letters which they had receiued from the great men there. But behold the worke of God; the English nauie tooke three hundred of the French kings ships well loden with wheat, wine, meale, flesh, armour, and such other like, meet for the war: and one hundred they burnt within the hauen, taking the spoiles with them. In the meane time the priests within England had prouided them a certain false counterfeit prophet called Peter Wakefield of Pomfret; who was an idle gadder about, and a prating merchant. This Peter they made to prophecy lies, rumoring his prophecies abroad, to bring the king out of all credit with his people. They noised it daily among the commons of the realme, that Christ had twice appeared to this prophet of theirs in shape of a child betwéene the priests hands, once at Pomfret, another time at Pomfret; and that he had breathed on him thrice, saying: Peace, peace, peace, and teaching many things which he anon after declared to the bishops; and bid the people amend their naughty liuing. Being rapt also in spirit (they said) he beheld the ioyes of heauen, and sorrowes of hell. For scant were there three (saith the chronicle) among a thousand that liued christianly. This counterfet soothsaier prophesied of king John, that he should raigne no longer then the Ascension day, within the yeare of our Lord 1213, which was the fourteenth from his coronation; and this (he said) he had by reuelation. Then was it of him demanded whether he should be slaine or expelled, or should of himselfe giue ouer the crowne? He answered, that he could not tell. But of this he was sure (he said) that neither he, nor any of his stocke or linage should raigne, that day once finished. The king hearing of this, laughed much at it, and made but a scoffe thereof. Truly (saith he) it is but an idiot knaue, and such a one as lacketh his right wits. But when this foolish prophet had so escaped the danger of the kings displeasure, and that he made no more of it, he gat him abroad and prated thereof at large (as he was a verie idle vagabond) and vsed to tattle and talke more then enough; so that they which loued the king, caused him anon after to be apprehended as a malefactor, and to be throwne into prison, the king not knowing thereof.

Peter the false prophet.

The false prophet found a lier.

Anon after, the fame of this phantasticall prophet went all the realme ouer, and his name was knowne euery where (as foolishnesse is much regarded of people, where wisedome is not in place) specially because he was then imprisoned for the matter, the rumor was the larger, their wondrings were the wantoner, their practising the foolisher, their busie talkes and other idle occupyings the greater. Continually from thence (as the rude manner of people is) old gossips tales went abroad, new tales were inuented, fables were added to fables, and lies grew vpon lies: so that euerie day new slanders were raised on the king, and not one of them true; rumors arose, blasphemies were spread, the enemies reioyced, and treasons by the priests were maintained, and what likewise was surmised, or other subtiltie practised, all was then fathered vpon this foolish prophet. As, Thus saith Peter Wakefield, Thus hath he prophesied, and This shall come to passe: yea many times when he thought nothing lesse. When the Ascension day was come, which was prophesied of before, king John commanded his regall tent to be spread abroad in the open field, passing that day with his

The false prophet proued a lier by K. John.

Digitized by Google

noble counsell and men of honor, in the greatest solemnitie that euer he did afore, solacing himselfe with musicall instruments and songs, most in sight amongst his trustie friends. When that day was past in all prosperitie and mirth, his enemies being confounded, turned all to an allegoricall vnderstanding, to make the prophecie good, and said; He is no longer king, for the pope raigneth, and not he: yet raigned he still and his sonne after him, to proue that prophet a lier. Then was the king by his counsell persuaded that this false prophet had troubled all the realme, peruerted the hearts of the people, and raised the commons against him. For his words went ouer the sea by the helpe of his prelats, and came to the French kings eare, and gaue vnto him a great incouragement to inuade the land, he had not else done it so suddenly. But he was most foully deceiued, as all they are and shall be that put their trust in such darke drowsie dreames of hypocrites. The king therefore commanded that he should be drawne and hanged like a traytor.

The false prophet hanged.

After that the popish prelats, monkes, canons, priests, &c. saw this their craftie iugling by their fained prophet would not speed, notwithstanding they had done no little harme thereby; to helpe the matter more forward, they began to trauell and practise with pope Innocent of the one side, and also with the French king on the other side, besides subtill treasons which they wrought within the realme, and by their confessions in the eare, whereby they both blinded the nobilitie and commons.

King John submitteth himselfe to the pope.

The king thus compassed about on euery side with enemies, and fearing the sequell thereof, knowing the conspiracies that were in working against him, as well by the pope (in all that euer he might) as also by Philip the French king by his procurement: and moreouer his owne people, specially his lords and barons being rebelliously incited against him, as by the popes curses and interdictions against such as toke his part, and by his absolutions and dispensations with all those that would rebell against him, commanding them to detaine from him such homage, seruice, duties, debts, and all other allegeance that godly subiects owe and are bound to yeeld and giue to their liege lord and prince. All which things considered, the king in the thirteenth yeare of his raigne, for that the French king began to make sharpe inuasion vpon him within his owne realme, sent speedie ambassadors to the pope (as to the fountaine of all this his mischiefe pretensed) to worke and intreat his peace and reconciliation with him, promising to do what soeuer the pope should will him, and command him in the reformation of himselfe, and restitution of all wrongs done to holy church, and to make due satisfaction therefore vnto all men that could complaine.

King John intreateth for peace with the pope.

Then sent the pope againe into England his legat Pandulph with other ambassadors: the king also at Canturburie (by letters, as it should seeme, certified from his owne ambassadors) waited their comming. Where the thirteenth day of May the king receiued them, making vnto them an oth, that of and for all things wherein he stood accursed, he would make ample restitution and satisfaction. Vnto whom also all the lords and barons of England (so many as there were with the king attending the legats comming) sware in like manner, that if the king would not accomplish in euery thing the oth which he had taken, that then they would cause him to hold and confirme the same whether he would or not (or by strength) to vse the authors words.

King John submitteth himselfe and resigneth his crowne.

Then submitted the king himselfe vnto the court of Rome, and to the pope, and resigning gaue vp his dominions and realmes of England and Ireland from him and from his heirs for euermore that should come of him. With this condition, that the king and his heires should take againe these two dominions of the pope to farme, paying yearely therefore to the court of Rome 1000 markes of siluer. Then toke the king the crowne from his head, kneeling vpon his knees in the presence of all his lords and barons of England, to Pandulph the popes chiefe legat, saying in this wise; Here I resigne vp the crowne of the realme of England to the popes hands, Innocent the third, and put me wholly in his mercie and ordinance. Then toke Pandulph the crowne of king John, and kept it fiue daies as a possession and seizon-taking of these two realmes of England and Ireland; confirming also all things promised by his charter obligatorie as followeth.

The copie of the letter obligatorie that king Iohn made to the pope, concerning the yeelding vp of the crowne and the realme of England into the popes hands, for a certaine summe of money yearely to be paid.

The maught or instrument obligatory, wherein K. John resigneth his kingdome to the popes hand. Christ was offered a kingdome and would none of it, but the pope doth not refuse it.

TO all christian people throughout the world dwelling, Iohn by the grace of God king of England, greeting. To your vniuersitie knowne be it, that for so much as wee haue grieued and offended God and our mother church of Rome, and for so much as we haue need of the mercie of our Lord Iesus Christ: and we may nothing so worthy offer, and competent satisfaction make to God and to holy church (but if it were our owne body) as with our realms of England and of Ireland, then by the grace of the holy Ghost we desire for to meeke vs for the loue of him, that meeked him to the death vpon the crosse. And through counsell of the nobles, earles, and barons, we offer and freely grant to God, and to the Apostles S. Peter and Paul, and to our mother church of Rome, and to our holy father pope Innocent the third, and to all the popes that come after him, all the realme, patronages of churches of England and of Ireland, with all the appurtenances, for remission of sins, and helpe and health of our kings soules, and of all christian soules. So that from this time afterward, we will receiue and hold of our mother church of Rome as in farme, doing fealtie to our holy father the pope, Innocent the third, and to all the popes that come after him, in the maner aboue said. And in the presence of the wiseman Pandulph the popes soothdeacon, we make liege homage, as it were in the popes presence and we before him were, and that he himselfe should haue done all manner of things aboue said, and thereto we bind vs, and all that come after vs, and our heires for euermore, without any gain-saying to the pope, and eke the ward of the church vacant. And in token of this thing euer for to last, we will, confirme, and ordaine, that he be our special renter of the foresaid realmes (sauing S. Peter pence) in all things. To the mother church of Rome paying by a yeare 1000 marks of siluer at two times of the yeare for all maner customes that we should do for the said realmes: that is to say, at Michaelmas and at Easter, that is, for England 700 markes, and 300 marks for Ireland: sauing to vs and to our heires, our iustices and our other franchises. And all these things that before been said, we will that it be firme and stable without end: and to that obligation, we and all our successors, and our heires in this manner, been bound, that if we or any of our heires through any presumption fall in any point againe these things aboue said (and hee been warned and will not right amend him) he shall then leese the foresaid realmes for euermore: and this charter of obligation and our warrant for euermore be firme and stable without gain-saying. We shall from this day afterward be true to God and to the mother church of Rome, and to thee Innocent the third, and to all that commen after thee, and the realmes of England and of Ireland we shall mainteine truelich in all maner points, against al maner mē by our power through Gods helpe.

Upon this obligation the king was discharged the second day of July, from that tyrannicall interdiction, vnder which he continued six yeares and three months. But before the releasement thereof, first he was miserably compelled (as hath been declared) to giue ouer both his crowne and scepter to that antichrist of Rome for the space of fiue daies, and as his client, vassall, feudary, and tenant to receiue it againe of him at the hands of another cardinall, being bound obligatorie, both for himselfe and for his successors to pay yearely (for a knowledge thereof) 1000 markes for England and Ireland. Then came they thither from all parts of the realme, so many as had their consciences wounded for obeying their liege king, as blind idiots, and there they were absolued, euery one of his owne bishop, except the spirituall fathers, and ecclesiasticall souldiers, for they were compelled to seeke to Rome, as captiues reserued to the popes owne fatherhood. In this new ruffling the king easily granted, that abbats, deanes, and curats should be elected freely euerie where, so that the lawes of the realme were truly obserued. But against that were the bishops, alleaging their canonicall decrees and rules synodall, determining the king therein to haue nothing to do, but only to giue his consent after they had once elected. But among this shauen rabble, some there were which consented not to this wicked error: a sort also there were of the prelats at that time, which were not pleased that the lands interdiction should cease, till the king had paid all that which their clergie in all quarters of the realme had demanded, without reason: yea, what euery saucie sir John for his part demanded, euen to the very breaking of their hedges, the stealing of their apples, and their other occasionall damages, which grew to an incredible summe, and impossible to be answered. Such was the outragious cruell noise of that mischieuous progenie antichrist, against their naturall king.

The vnreasonable displeasure of the clergie against their naturall prince.

Notwithstanding that which is vttered afore, concerning the bitter malice of the clergie against their prince, yet did the popes legat and cardinall Nicolaus Tusculanus much fauour his doings, and allow of his procéedings. Wherefore they reported of him that he was exceeding partiall, and regarded not their matters ecclesiasticall, as he should haue done. For leauing the account of their restitutions, hée went with the kings officers, as the kings pleasure was, to the cathedrall minsters, abbeyes, priories, deanries and great churches vacant; and there for the next incumbent alwaies he appointed two, one for the king, another for the parties. But vpon him only whom the king nominated, he compelled most commonly the election to passe: which vexed them wonderfully. Vpon this therefore they raised a new conspiracie against the kings person by helpe of their bishops, seditious prelats, and such noble men as they had drawne to their parties. Wée beheld (saith Houeden) about the same time many noble houses and assemblies diuided in many places. The fathers and the aged men stood vpon the kings part, but the yonger sort contrarie. And some there were that for the loue of their kindred, and in other sundrie respects forsoke the king againe. Yea the fame went that time, saith he, that they were confederated with Alexander the the Scotish king and Leolin the prince of Wales to worke him an vtter mischiefe. A councell at Oxford the archbishop called; whereat some would not tarrie, considering the confusion thereof: the other sort hauing verie obstinat hearts, reuiled the king most spitefully behind his backe, and said that from thenceforth he ought to be taken for no gouernour of theirs. Their outragious and frantike clamours so much preuailed in those daies, that it grew to a grieuous tumult, and a most perillous commotion.

Digitized by Google

{Anno 1215} In the yeare of our Lord 1215, as witnesseth Paulus Aemilius and other histories, pope Innocent the third held a generall synod at Rome, called the councell Lateran. The chiefe causes of that councell were these: In the daies of this Innocent, heresie (as he calleth the truth of God, or the doctrine that rebuketh sinne) began to rise vp verie high, and to spread forth his branches abroad, by reason whereof many princes were excommunicated, as Otho the emperour, John the king of England, Peter king of Aragon, Raimund the earle of Tholouse, Aquitania, Sataloni, and such other like, as is aforesaid. So that it could be no otherwise, saith Houeden, but with the sharpe are of the Gospell (so called the pope his excommunications) they ought of necessitie to haue been cut off from the church. Therefore was this councell prouided, proclamed, and prelats from all nations thereunto called. And to colour those mischiefes which he then went about, hee caused it by his legats and cardinals (verie craftie merchants) to bee noised abroad, that his intent therein was only to haue the church vniuersally reformed, and the holie land from the Turkes hands recouered. But all this was craft and falsehood, as the sequell thereof hath manifestly declared. For his purpose thereby was to subdue all princes, and to make himselfe rich and wealthie. For there he made this antichristian act, and established it by publike decree, that the pope should haue from thenceforth the correction of all christian princes, and that no emperor should be admitted, except he were sworne before, and were also crowned of him. Hee ordained moreouer, that whosoeuer he were that should speake euill of the pope, hee should be punished in hell with eternall damnation: Conradus, Vrspergensis, Hieronymus, Marius. He prouided confession to helpe these matters, he allowed their bread a pix to couer him, and a bell when he goeth abroad, and made the masse equall with Christs Gospell.

The councell of Lateran holden by pope Innocent.

The pope to haue iurisdiction of all churches.

Ioannes Scotus.

In this councell was first inuented and brought in transubstantiation, of which Ioannes Scotus, whom we call Duns, maketh mention in his fourth booke, writing in these words: The words of the Scripture might be expounded more easilie and more plainly without transubstantiation. But the church did chuse this sense, which is more hard; being moued thereunto, as it seemeth, chiefly, because that of the sacraments, men ought to hold as the holy church of Rome holdeth, &c. And in the same place maketh mention of Innocentius the third.

Transubstantiation first brought in.

Moreouer, in the said councell was established and ratified the wretched and impious act, compelling priests to abiure lawfull matrimonie. Whereupon these meeters or verses were made the same time against him which heere follow vnder written.

Non est Innocentius, imò nocens verè,
Qui, quod facto docuit, verbo vult delere:
Et quod olim inuenis voluit habere,
Modò vetus pontifex studet prohibere.
Zacharias habuit prolem & vxorem,
Per verum quem genuit adeptus honorem;
Baptizauit etenim mundi saluatorem:
Pereat qui teneat nouum hunc errorem.
Paulus cœlos rapitur ad superiores,
Vbi multas didicit res secretiores;
Ad nos tandem rediens instruensque mores,
Suas, inquit, habeant quilibet vxores.
Propter hæc & alia dogmata doctorum,
Reor esse melius & magis decorum,
Quisque suam habeat & non proximorum,
Ne incurrat odium vel iram eorum.
Proximorum fœminas, filias, & neptes,
Violare nefas est, quare nil deceptes:
Verè tuam habeas, & in hac delectes,
Diem vt sic vltimum tutius expectes.

Marriage of priests forbidden by pope Innocent.

Nocent, not Innocent he is, that seeketh to deface,
By word the thing, that he by deed hath taught men to imbrace;
Which being now a bishop old, doth studie to destroy
The thing, which he a yong man once did couet to inioy.
Priest Zacharie both had a wife, and had a child also,
By meane of whom there did to him great praise & honor grow;
For he did baptise him which was the sauer of mankind:
Ill him befall that holdeth this new error in his mind.
Into the higher heauens good Paul was lifted from below,
And many secret hidden things he learned there to know;
Return'd at length from thence to vs, and teaching rules of life,
He said, Let each man haue his owne and only wedded wife.
For this and other documents of them that learned be,
Much better and more comely eke it seemeth vnto me,
That ech should haue his own alone; & not his neighbors wife,
Least with his neighbour he doe fall in hate and wrathfull strife.
Thy neighbours daughters or their wiues, or neeces to defile,
Vnlawfull is, therefore beware do not thy selfe begile.
Haue thou thine owne true wedded wife, delite in her alway,
With safer mind that thou maist looke to see the latter day.

Now let vs returne to king John againe, and marke how the priests and their adherents were plagued for their humble handlings of his maiesties will. In the foresaid councell of Lateran, and the same yeare, was Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie excommunicated of pope Innocent, with all those bishops, prelats, priests, barons, and commons, which had been of counsell with him in the former rebellion. And when the said archbishop had made instant suite, of him to be absolued, anon he made him this answere with great indignation: Brother mine, I sweare by saint Peter thou shalt not so soone at my hand obtaine the benefit of absolution: for why? thou hast not only done harme to the king of England, but also thou hast in a great many of things iniured the church of Rome heere, and therefore thou shalt tarie my leasure. The archbishop was also at that time suspended out of the church, and commanded to say no masse at all, neither yet to exercise any other ecclesiasticall office, because he would not at time conuenient execute the popes curse vpon the rebellious barons. With them the said pope had been so deepely offended and angred a little before, that the great charter of the liberties of England (with great indignation and countenance most terrible) he rent and destroied, by sentence definitiue condemning it for euer; and by and by thereupon cursed all the other rebels, with booke, bell, and candle. The greater captaines of them (with the citizens of London) for that allay were pronounced excommunicat by name, and remained still interdicted. They appealed then to the councell generall.

Stephan Langton suspended out of the church.

In the same yeare 1215, were those great men also summoned to appeare at Rome in that generall synod: which would not consent to their kings expulsion, nor yet tyrannicall deposing. Though they were called (they said) thereunto by the archbishop of Canturburie and others, and required by oth to subscribe vnto the same: yet could they not of their conscience doe it, because he had humbled himselfe, and also granted to keepe peace with all men. Thus was the whole realme miserablie then diuided into two factions through malice of the clergie, so strifes increased in the land euery where. Yet were there of the lords and gentlemen a great number at that time, that followed the king and allowed his doings. But they which were on the other side (not a little suspecting the state that they were in) fled speedily to the French king Philip: desiring him that he would grant to them his eldest son Ludouike, and they would elect him to be their king, and that without much tarriance. They besought him moreouer, that he would send with him a strong and mightie power, as were able to subdue him vtterly, that they might (they said) be deliuered of such a wicked tyrant. Such was the report that those most wicked papists gaue their christian gouernour, appointed to them of God: whom they ought to haue obeyed, though he had been euill, euen for verie conscience sake: Rom. 13. And as certeine of the lords and barons were busie to chuse the said Ludouike for their king, the pope sent thither one Gualo the cardinall of S. Martin to stay those rash and cruell attempts; charging the French king vpon his allegeance, that he with all power possible should fauour, maintaine, and defend king John of England, his feudarie or tenant. The French king thereto made answere, as one not content with that arrogant precept; The realme of England, said he, was neuer yet any part of S. Peters patrimonie, neither is it now, nor yet any time shall be hereafter. Thus spake he, for that he was in hope to obtaine it for his sonne by treason of the barons.

The discord betweene the nobles and the king.

Gualo cardinall sent into England.

No prince or potentat (said Philip the French king) may pledge or giue away his kingdome, which is (beside the realme) the gouernment of his whole common wealth, without the lawfull consent of his barons, which are bound to defend the same. If the pope shall introduce or set vp such a president in christiantie, he shall at his pleasure bring all christian kings, and their kingdomes to nought. I like not this example in these daies begun. I cannot therefore allow this fact of king John of England: though he be my vtter aduersarie, yet I much lament that hee hath so indamaged his realme, and hath brought that noble ground and queene of prouinces vnder miserable tribute. The chiefe lords and men of his nobilitie standing by, when hee vttered these words (being as it were in a furie) cried with one voice: By the blood of God, in whom we trust to be saued, we will sticke in this article to the losing of our heads. Let the king of England do therein what him liketh: no king may put his land vnder tribute, and so make his nobilitie captiue seruants. With that came in Ludouike the kings eldest sonne, and so said vnto them all there present: I beseech you, let not my purposed iourney: the barons of England haue elected me for their lord and king, and I will not surelie lose my right, but I will fight for it euen to the verie death, yea so long as heart shall stirre within my brest: and I doubt not

The French king and his sonne reasoning about England.

Digitized by Google

not but I shall well obtaine it, for I haue friends among them. His father the king stood still as if he had been in a dumpe, and answered neuer a word, but fared as though he had dissembled the matter. Belike hee mistrusted something therein, as hee might well enough, for all was procured by the priests, that they might liue licentiously in all wealth and freedome from the kings yoke.

Prelats and priests conspiring against the king.

About the same time were such treasons and conspiracies wrought by the bishops, priests, and monkes, throughout all the realme, that the king knew not where to become or find trustie friends; he was then compelled by the vncertaintie of his subiects to trauell from place to place, but not without a great armie of men, loking euery day when his barons and their confederats would cruelly set vpon him. At last he came to Douer, and there loked for aid from other quarters, which loued him better then did his owne people. And thither to him resorted from Flanders, Brabant, and Holland, on the one side, and from Guian, Gascoine, and Poitiers on the other side, and from other countries more, a wonderfull number of men. The report then went, that the pope had written vnto those countries, mightily to assist him for diuers considerations: one was, for that he had both submitted himselfe and his dominions vnto his protection; another was, because he had taken vpon him a little before, the liuery of the crosse, to win againe Hierusalem; the third was, for that he had gotten by him the dominion of England and Ireland, and feared to lose both, if he should chance to decay. For the space of three moneths he remained in the isle of Wight, abroad in the aire to quiet himselfe for a time from all manner of tumults, and led there a solitarie life among riuers and watermen, whereas he rather counted to die then to liue, being so traytorously handled of his bishops and barons, and not knowing how to be iustly auenged of them. Vpon the Purification day of our ladie therefore, he toke vpon him the crosse or voyage against the Turkes, for recouerie of Hierusalem, moued therto rather for the doubts which he had of his people, then for any other deuotion else. And thus he said to his familiar seruants: Since I submitted my selfe and my lands (England and Ireland) to the church of Rome (sorrow come to it) neuer thing prospered with me, but all hath gone against me.

Anno 1216

In the next yeare after 1216, was Simon Langton chosen archbishop of Yorke; but that election anon after was dissolued, for information was giuen to the pope, that the said Simon was brother to Stephan Langton the archbishop of Canturburie, which had been the occasion of all the tumults which were at that time in England. And the pope had the more hate vnto him, for that he had brought him vp of nought, and did find him at that time so stubborne: wherefore he placed in his brothers place Walter Gray, the bishop of Winchester.

Walter Gray archbishop of Yorke.

In the same yeare Gualo the popes legat renued his great curse vpon Lewis the French kings sonne, for vsurping vpon king John; likewise vpon Simon Langton, and Gernais Hobruge, for prouoking him to the same, and that with a wonderfull solemnitie: for in that doing he made all the bels to be rung, the candles to be light, the doores to be opened, and the booke of excommunications or interdictions publikely to be read, committing them wholly to the diuell for their contumacie and contempt. He also commanded the bishops and curats to publish it abroad ouer all the whole realme, to the terrour of all his subiects. The said Simon and Gernais laughed him to scorne, and derided much his doings in that behalfe, saying, that for the iust title of Ludouike, they had appealed to the generall councell at Rome.

Gualo the popes legat.

Radul. Niger. cap. 43. 44.

The magistrates of London and citizens of the same did likewise vilipend and disdainfullie mocke all that the pope had there commanded and done. And in spight both of him and his legat, they kept companie with them that were excommunicated, both at table and at church, shewing themselues thereby as open contemners both of him and his lawes. Ludouike at London taking himselfe for king, constituted Simon Langton for his high chancellour, and Gernais Hobruge for his chiefe preacher; by whose daily preachings, as well the barons and the citizens themselues being both excommunicated, caused all the church doores to be opened, and the seruice to be sung, and the said Ludouike was in all points fit for their hands. About this time was Pandulphus (then cardinall) collecting the Peter pence, an old pillage of the pope, taking great paines therein. And for his great labours in those the affaires of holy church, and for other great miracles besides, he was then made bishop of Norwich, to the augmenting of his dignitie and expences.

The popes curse laught to scorne.

Pandulphus the popes collector made bishop of Norwich.

It chanced about this time, that the vicount of Melun (a verie noble man of the realme of France, which came thither with the prince Ludouike) to fall deadly sicke at London, and also moued in conscience to call certaine of the English barons vnto him, such as were there appointed to the custodie of that citie, said vnto them: I lament your sorrowfull case, and pitie with my heart the destruction that is comming towards you and your countrie. The dangerous snares which are prepared for your vtter confusion are hidden from you, you do not behold them, but take you heed of them in time. Prince Ludouike hath sworne a great oth, and sixteene of his earles and noble men are of counsell with him, that if he obtaine the crowne of England, hee will banish all them from seruice, and depriue them of lands and goods, as manie as hee findeth now to go against their liege king, and are traytors to his noble person. And because you shall not take this tale for a fable, I assure you on my faith, lying now at the mercie of God, that I was one of them which was sworne to the same. I haue great conscience thereof, and therefore I giue you this warning. I pitie poore England which hath been so noble a region, that now it is come to so extreame miserie. And when he with teares had lamented it a space, he returned againe vnto them and said: My friends I counsell you earnestly to looke to your selues, and to prouide the remedie in time, lest it come vpon you vnwares. Your king for a season hath kept you vnder, but if Ludouike preuaile, he will put you from all; of two extreame euils chuse the more easie, and keepe that secret which I haue told you of good will. With that he gaue ouer and departed this life.

The prince of Wales and the barons of England conspire against king John.

When this was once noised among the barons, they were in great heauinesse, for they saw themselues betrapped euerie way, and to be in exceeding great danger. And this daily augmented that feare which then came vpon the barons. They were extreamely hated of the pope and his legats, and euery weeke came vpon them new excommunications. Daily detriments they had besides in their possessions and goods, in their lands and houses, corne and cattell, wiues and children: so that some of them were driuen to such need, that they were inforced to seeke preyes and booties for sustaining their miserable liues. For loke whatsoeuer prince Ludouike obtained by his wars, either territories or castles, he gaue them all to his Frenchmen in spight of their heads, and said that they were but traytours, like as they had warning afore, which grieued them worst of all. At the last they perceiuing that they in seeking to auoid one mischiefe, were readie to fall into another much worse: they began to lay their heads together, consenting to submit themselues wholly with all humilitie vnto the mercie of their late soueraigne and naturall liege lord king John. And for that they were somewhat in doubt of their liues for the treason afore committed; manie of the friends of them which were of most credit with him, made suite for them. So were a great number of them pardoned, after instant and great suite made for them. I heere omit his recouerie of Rochester castle and citie, with many other dangerous aduentures against the foresaid Ludouike, both at London, Yorke, Lincolne, Winchester, Norwich, and other places else, as things not pertaining to my purpose. And now I returne to my matter againe.

Into Suffolke and Norffolke he consequently iourneyed, with a very strong armie of men, and there with great mischiefe he afflicted them, because they had giuen place and were sworne to his enemies. After that, he destroyed the abbeyes of Peterborough and Crowland, for the great treasons which they also had wrought against him, and so he departed from thence into Lincolneshire.

The great prouidence of God for the helpe of England.

In this yeare, about the seuenteenth day of Julie, died pope Innocent the third, and was buried in a citie called Perusium in Italie: whereas he had trauelled to make a peace betweene the Genouaies and Pises, for his owne commoditie and aduantage. After him anon succeeded one Cintius, otherwise called Honorius tertius, a man of very great age: yet liued he in the papacie ten yeares and an halfe, and more. When this was once knowne in England, greatly reioyced all they which were king Johns enemies, specially the priests; yet had they small cause, as will appeare hereafter. They noised it all the realme ouer, that this new pope would set a new order, and not rule all things as the other pope did; thinking thereby that he would haue done all things to their commoditie: but they found it otherwise. For he made all them which were excommunicat, to pay double and treble, ere they could be restored againe to their former liuings.

Pope Innocent the third dieth.

And in the selfe same yeare, as king John was come to Swinstead abbey, not far from Lincolne, he rested there two daies: where (as most writers testifie) he was most trayterouslie poysoned by a monke of that abbey, of the sect of the Cistercians or S. Bernards brethren, called Simon of Swinstead. As concerning the noble personage of this prince, this witnesse giueth Roger Houeden therein: Princeps quidem magnus erat, sed minùs fœlix, atque vt Marius vtramque fortunam expertus. Doubtlesse (saith he) king John was a mightie prince, but not so fortunat as many were; not altogether vnlike to Marius the noble Roman, he tasted of fortune both waies, bountifull in mercie; in warres sometime he wan, sometime againe he lost. Munificus ac liberalis in exteros fuit, sed proditionis causa suorum deprædator, plus aduenis quàm suis confidens. Hee was also verie bounteous and liberall vnto strangers, but of his owne people (for their daily treasons sake) hee was a great oppressor, so that he trusted more to forreners then to them.

King John poysoned by a monke.

Mat. Paris. Radul Niger. cap. 47.

Ex chronico cuiusdam Eulogium.

Among other diuers and sundrie conditions belonging to this king, one there was which is not in him to be reprehended but commended rather: for that being far from the superstition which kings at that time were commonly subiect to, he regarded regarded not the popish masse, as in certaine chronicles writing of him may be collected: for so I find testified of him by Matth. Parisien. that the king vpon a time in his hunting, comming where a verie fat stag was cut vp and opened (or how the hunters learne it I cannot tell) the king beholding the fatnesse and the liking of the stag: See, saith hee, how easily and happily he hath liued, and yet for all that he neuer heard anie masse.

Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

The saying of king John deriding the masse.

It is recorded and found in the chronicle of William Caxton called Fructus temporum, and in the seuenth booke. The foresaid monke Simon being much offended with certaine talke that the king had at his table, concerning Ludouike the French kings sonne, (which then had entred and vsurped vpon him) did cast in his wicked heart how he most speedily might bring him to his end. And first of all he counselled with his abbat, shewing him the whole matter, and what he was minded to do. He alleaged for himselfe the prophecie of Caiphas, Joh. 11. saying; It is better that one man die, then all the people should perish. I am well contented (saith he) to lose my life, and so become a martyr, that I may vtterly destroy this tyrant. With that the abbat did weepe for gladnesse, and much commended his feruent zeale, as he toke it. The monke then being absolued of his abbat for doing this act (aforehand) went secretly into a garden vpon the backeside, and finding there a most venemous tode, he so pricked him and prelled him with his penknife, that he made him vomit all the poyson that was within him. This done, he conueyed it into a cup of wine, and with a smiling and flattering countenance he laid thus to the king: If it shall like your princely maiestie, heere is such a cup of wine as ye neuer dranke a better before in all your life time, I trust this wassaill shall make all England glad: and with that he dranke a great draught thereof, the king pledging him. The monke anon after went to the farmarie, and there died (his guts gushing out of his bellie) and had continually from thencefoorth three monkes to sing masse for his soule, confirmed by their generall chapter. What became after that of king John, ye shall know right well in the processe following. I would ye did marke well the wholesome proceedings of these holy votaries, how vertuously they obey their kings, whom God hath appointed, and how religiously they bestow their confessions, absolutions and masses.

Ex Caxtono lib. 7.

Wo be to you that call good euill, and euill good.

Simon the monke absolued of his abbat for poisoning his king.

The monke dieth of his owne poison.

The king within a short space after (feeling great griefe in his bodie) asked for Simon the monke; and answere was made that he was departed this life. Then God haue mercie vpon me (said he) I suspected as much, after he had said that all England should thereof be glad; he ment now I perceiue then of his owne generation. With that he commanded his chariot to be prepared, for he was not able to ride. So went he from thence to Slaford castle, and from thence to Newarke on Trent, and there within lesse then three daies he died. Vpon his death bed he much repented his former life, & forgaue all them with a pitifull heart that had done him iniurie, desiring that his elder son Henrie might be admonished by his example, and to learne by his misfortunes to be natural, fauourable, gentle, and louing to his naturall people. When his bodie was imbalmed and spiced (as the maner is of kings) his bowels or intrals were buried at Croxton abbey, which was of the sect of Premonstratenses or canons of S. Norbert. His hired souldiers both Englishmen and strangers were still about him, and followed his corps triumphantly in their armour, till they came to the cathedrall church of Worcester, and there honorablie was he buried by Silvester the bishop, betwixt S. Oswald and S. Wolstan, two bishops of that church. Hee died in the yeare of our Lord 1216, the nineteenth day of October, after he had raigned in such calamitie, by the subtill conueiance of his clergie, eighteene yeares and fiue moneths and odde daies. Now so soone as king John was dead and buried (as is said before) the princes, lords and barons, so many as were of his part (as well of strangers as of them that were borne heere) by counsell of the legat Gualo, gathered themselues together, and all with one consent proclaimed Henrie his sonne for their king. Of whom more shall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter.

The death of king John.

A prince to be louing to his subiects.

King John buried at Worcester.

Anno 1216

Many opinions are among the chroniclers of the death of king John. Some of them do write that he died of sorrow and heauinesse of heart, as Polydorus: some of surfetting in the night, as Radulphus Niger: some of a bloodie flix, as Roger

The death of king John.

The description of the poisoning of king Iohn by a monke of Swinstead abbey in Lincolnshire.

perpetuall mainteining daily in Swinstead for the monke that poisoned king John.

The monke presenteth king John with his cup of poison, beginning himselfe to the king.

The monke tempereth his poison into a cup to giue king Iohn.

Digitized by Google

Houeden, some of a burning ague, some of a cold sweat, some of eating apples, some of eating peares, some plums, &c.

Thus you see what varietie is among the writers concerning the death of this king John. Of which writers, although the most agree in this, that he was poisoned by the monke aboue named, yet Matthew Paris (something differing from the others) writeth thus concerning his death, that he going from Lin to Lincolnshire, and there hearing of the losse of his cariage and of his treasures vpon the washes, fell in great heauinesse of mind, in so much that he fell thereby into a feruent feuer, being at the abbey of Swinsted. This ague he also increased through euill surfetting and naughtie diet, by eating peaches and drinking of new ciser, or as we call it sider. Thus being sicke, he was caried from thence to the castle of Laford, and from thence to the castle of Newarke, where calling for Henrie his sonne, gaue to him the succession of his crowne and kingdome, writing to all his lords and nobles to receiue him for their king, and shortly after vpon S. Lucies euen departed this life, being buried at Worcester, &c.

Matth. Paris in vita Ioannis regis.

Another description of king Johns death. Ex hist. Gualt. Hemingford. Gisburnensi.

In Gisburne I find otherwise, who dissenting from others, saith; that he was poysoned with a dish of peares, which the monke had prepared for the king therwith to poison him. Who asking the king whether he would taste of his fruit, and being bid to bring them in: according to the kings bidding, so did. At the bringing in whereof (saith the storie) the pretious stones about the king began to sweat, in so much that the king misdoubting some poison, demanded of the monke what he had brought. He said, of his fruit, and that verie good, the best that euer he did taste. Eat, said the king. And he toke one of the peares which he did know, and did eat. Also being bid to take another, did eate likewise sauorlie, and so likewise the third. Then the king refraining no longer, toke one of the poisoned peares, and was therewith poisoned, as is before, &c.

The first maior of London.

In the raigne of this king John, the citizens of London first obtained of the king to chuse yerely a maior. In whose time also the bridge of London was first builded of stone, which before was of wood. Rastall.

King Henrie the third.

King Henrie the third.

After this king John had raigned (as some say) seuentéene yeares, or as some say, though falsely, nineteene yeares, was (as is aboue said) poisoned and died. This king left behind him foure sons, and three daughters, first Henrie, second Richard, and he was earle of Cornwall, third William of Valentia, fourth Guido Disenate: he had also another son who afterward was made bishop. Of his daughters first was Isabell, maried afterward to Frederike the emperour; the second named Elenor, maried to William earle marshall; the third to Mountfort the earle of Leicester, &c. Another storie saith that he had but two daughters, Isabell and Elenor, or as another calleth her Ione, which was after quéene of Scotland. Ex chronico vetusto Angliæ.

The issue of king John.

This king John being deceased, which had many enemies both of earles, barons, and especially of the popish clergie, Henrie his eldest sonne was then of the age of nine yeares, at what time the most of the lords of England did adhere to Ludouike or Lewis the French kings son, whom they had sent for before in displeasure of king John to be their king, and had sworne to him their allegeance. Then William earle marshall a noble man, and of great authoritie, and a graue and sound counsellor, friendly & quietly called vnto him diuers earles and barons, and taking this Henrie the yong prince, son of king John, setteth him before them, vsing these words. Behold (saith he) right honorable and well beloued, although we haue * persecuted the father of this yong prince for his euill demeanor, and worthilie; yet this yong child whom heere ye see before you, as he is in yeares tender, so is he pure and innocent from these his fathers doings: wherefore in as much as euery man is charged only with the burthen of his owne workes and transgressions, neither shall the child (as the scripture teacheth vs) beare the iniquitie of his father: we ought therefore of dutie and conscience to pardon this yong and tender prince, and take compassion of his age as ye see. And now for so much as he is the kings naturall and eldest sonne, and must be our soueraigne and king, and successor of this kingdome, come and let vs appoint him our king and gouernour, and let vs remoue from vs this Lewis the French kings sonne, and suppresse his people, which is a confusion and a shame to our nation, and the yoke of our seruitude let vs cast off from our shoulders. To these words spake and answered the earle of Glocester; And by what reason or right (said he) can we so do, seeing we haue called him hither, and haue sworne to him our fealtie?

An example of a worthie and faithfull counsellour.

The oration of the earle marshall for yong king Henrie.

* Truely said, that you persecuted him, for persecutors ye were of a true man and your owne naturall king. But well might England crie out of your blind guides and setters on.

Whereunto the earle marshall inferred againe and said: God right and reason we haue, and ought of duty to do no lesse, for that he contrarie to our mind and calling hath abused our affiance and fealties. Truth it is we called him, and meant to preferr him to be our chiefetaine and gouernour; but he eftsones surprised in pride, hath contemned and despised vs: and if we shall so suffer him, he will subuert and ouerthrow both vs and our nation, and so shall we remaine a spectacle of shame to all men, and be as outcasts of all the world.

At these words all they, as inspired from aboue, cried all together with one voice, Be it so, he shall be our king. And so the day was appointed for his coronation, which was the day of Simon and Jude. This coronation was kept, not at Westminster, forsomuch as Westminster the same time was holden of the Frenchmen, but at Glocester, the safest place (as was thought) at that time in the realme, An. 1216, by Swalo the popes legat, through counsell of all the lords and barons that held with his father king John, to wit, the bishop of Winchester, bishop of Bathe, bishop of Chester, & bishop of Worcester, the earle Radulph of Chester, William earle marshall, William earle of Penbroke, William Tren earle of Feres, William de Brues, Serle or Samarike de Val baron. These were at the crowning of the king at Glocester. Many other lords and barons there were, which as yet held with Lewis the French kings sonne, to whom they had done their homage before. And immediatly after the crowning of this king he held his councell at Brikstow at S. Martins feast, where were assembled eleuen bishops of England and Wales, with diuers earles and barons and knights of England, all which did sweare fealtie to the king. After which homage thus done to the king, the legat Swalo interdicted Wales, because they held with the foresaid Lewis, and also the barons and all others as many as gaue helpe or counsell to Lewis, or any other that moued or stirred any war against King Henrie the new king, he accursed them. All which notwithstanding, the said Lewis did not cease, but first laid siege to the castle of Douer fiftéene daies. When he could not preuaile there, he toke the castle of Berkhamsted, and also the castle of Hertford, doing much harme in the countries, in spoiling & robbing the people where they went: by reason wherof the lords and commons which held with the King, assembled themselues together to driue Lewis and his men out of the land. But some of the barons with the Frenchmen in the mean season went to Lincolne and toke the citie, and held it to the vse of Lewis. Which being knowne, eftsones a great power of the Kings part made thither, as earle Ranulph of Chester, William earle marshall, and William de la Brues earle of Feres, with many other lords, and gaue battell vnto Lewis and his partie, so that in conclusion Lewis lost the field, and of his side were slaine the earle of Parchis, Saer de Quincie earle of Winchester, Henrie de la Bohun earle of Hertford, and sir Robert le Fitzwater, with diuers others more. Whereupon Lewis for succor fled to London, causing the gates there to be shut and kept, waiting there for more succour out of France. Which as soone as the king had knowledge of, immediatly sent to the maior and burgesse of the citie, willing them to render them and their citie to him as their chiefe lord and king, promising to grant to them againe all their franchises and liberties as in times past, and to confirme the same by his great charter and seale. In this meane time on Bartholomew euen, Eustace a French lord accompanied with many other lords and nobles of France, came with a great power, to the number of 100 ships to aid and assist the said Lewis, who before they arriued, were encountred vpon the seas by Richard, King Johns bastard sonne, who hauing no more but eighteene ships to keep the cinque ports, set eagerly vpon them, and through Gods grace ouercame them, where presently he smote off the head of Eustace: the rest of the French lords to the number of ten, hee brought with him to the land, where he imprisoned them in the castle of Douer, and slew almost all their men that came with them, and sunke their ships in the sea, only fiftéene ships (saith some of my stories) escaped away. Ludouike or Lewis hearing this losse of his ships and men, and misdoubting his owne life for the great mischiefe he had done to the realme, sought means by Swalo and the archbishop of Canturburie, and by other lords, to be at accord with the King. With whom at length it was so concluded and agréed, that for his costs and expenses, he to haue a thousand pounds of siluer giuen. Parisiensis speaketh of fiftéene thousand markes (which he borrowed of the Londoners) that he should depart the realme neuer to returne into England againe, neither he nor none of his.

Lincolne taken by Lewis.

{Anno 1217}

This Eustace some say he was a Spaniard.

A noble victorie by Gods grace giuen to king Johns sonne.

Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

This done and vpon the same, he with all the other barons that toke his part was assoiled of Swalo the legat. And thus peace being confirmed at Merton, Lewis toke his leaue, and being brought honorablie to the sea with the bishop of Canturburie and other bishops, earles and barons, returned home into France.

Lewis the French kings sonne driuen out of England.

And heere, saith Gisburne, it was truly verified that was before spoken of the French king father of Lewis. At what time the said Lewis was in England, his father the French king demanded of his messengers comming into France, where his sonne was. And they said at Stamford. And he asking againe whether he had got the castle of Douer? And they said, no. Then the father swearing by the arme of S. James: My sonne (quoth he) hath not one foot in England, as afterward well proued true. Ex Gisburn.

The answere of the French king concerning his sonne Lewis.

But the chiefest helpe that repelled Lewis and the French men out of the realme, and that most preferred king Johns sonne to the crowne, was the singular working of Gods hand, whereof mention was made before: which was through the confession confession of a certaine gentleman of the French host (as Florilegus doth testifie) who lying sore sicke at the point of death, and seeing no hope to escape, was touched in conscience for danger of his soules health, openly to confesse and vtter to the barons of England, what was the purpose of the Frenchmen to doe; who were conspired and sworne together among themselues, with a priuie compaction, that so soone as they subdued the land, they should thrust all the chiefe and nobles thereof into perpetuall exile out of the realme, whereout they should neuer returne againe. This comming to the eares of the barons, as is said, gaue them to consider more with themselues, whereby many of them were the more willing to leaue Lewis, and applie to their naturall king and prince. Which no lesse may also bee an admonition to all times and ages for Englishmen to take heed, not to admit or to place forren rulers into the realme, lest perhaps it follow that they be displaced themselues.

An admonition to Englishmen not to admit forren rulers into the realme.

After the happie departure of this Lewis and his Frenchmen out of the land, wherby the state of this realme long vered before, was now somwhat more quieted; immediatly Swalo the legat looking to his haruest, directeth forth inquisitors through euery shire, to search out all such bishops, abbats, priors, canons, and secular priests, of what order or degree soeuer they were, that with any succour or counsell did either helpe, or els consented to Lewis. For all these were exempted out of the charter of pardon and absolution made before, betweene the king and Lewis. By reason whereof no small gaine grew to the pope and the cardinall; for all such were either put out of their liuings and sent vp to the pope; or else were faine to fine sweetly for them. Among whom (besides a great number of other clerks, both religious and lecular) was Hugo bishop of Lincolne, who for the recouerie of his bishoprike, disbursed 1000. marks to the pope, and 100. marks to the foresaid Swalo the legat, who now (as Paris recordeth) by this time had gathered in a faire crop of that which he did neuer sow. Ex Mat. Paris, &c.

It is a bad wind that bloweth no man profit.

Monie comming vnto the pope and cardinall.

Hugo bishop of Lincolne redeemeth his bishoprike for 1000. marks. Ex Math. Paris in vita reg. Henr. 3.

About this season, or not much before, died pope Innocent the third, in the nineteenth yeere of his popedome, to whose custodie, Fredericus the nephue of Frederike Barbarossa, being yet young was committed by the empresse his mother, of whom more shall follow (the Lord willing) hereafter. After this Innocent, next succeeded pope Honorius the third, who writing to young king Henry in a special letter, exhorteth him to the loue of vertue, and to the feare of God, namely to be circumspect with what familiars and resort he acquainted himself; but principally aboue all others monisheth him to reuerence the church which is the spouse of Christ, and to honor the ministers thereof, in whom Christ himselfe (saith hee) is both honored or despised. And this seemeth the chiefest article of that his writting to him.

Pope Innocent the third.

Pope Honorius the third.

The effect of the letter of pope Honorius the third to king Henrie the third. Ex Parisiens.

Of this pope Honorius, Abbas Vrspergensis (who liued in the same time) reporteth a strange wonder, more strange peraduenture then credible, which is this. Honorius being priest in Rome (whose name was then Centius) and procurator to Iacinthus a cardinall: so it befell, that his master sent him abroad about Rome, to borrow and procure monie for him against his iournie into Spaine: for pope Clement then intended to send the said Iacinthus his legat into Spaine. As this Centius was walking by himselfe all sad and sollicitous to speed his masters message, commeth to him a certaine aged and reuerend father, and asketh him what cause he had to walke so heauie and carefull. To whom he answered againe, and signified the occasion of his businesse that then he had to do. Then the old father said to him: Go and returne home againe, for thy master (saith he) shall not at this time go to Spaine. How so (quoth the other) how is that true? As true (saith he) as it is certaine that the pope shall die, and thy said master shal be pope after him. Centius thinking that to be vnlikely, said he could not beleeue that to be true. To whom the other inferreth again; So know this (said hee) to be as certaine, as it is true that the citie of Hierusalem this day is taken of the Saracens, and shal not be recouered againe from them, before the time of thy papacie. And thus speaking (saith Vrsperg.) he vaded suddenly away. Ex Abbate Vrsperg. All which (saith the said author) came afterwards to passe, and were testified of the same Honorius being pope afterward in his publike sermons at Rome. All which I grant may be, and yet notwithstanding this fabulous narration may be a peece of the popes old practises, subtillie inuented to driue men forth to Hierusalem to fight, &c. Again, after Honorius (when he had gouerned ten yeeres) followed Gregorius the ninth, which two popes were in the time of this king Henrie the third, and of Frederike the emperor, of whom we mind (Christ willing) further to touch, after that we shall haue prosecuted more concerning the historie of king Henrie and matters of England.

A strange tale of pope Honorius, if it be true.

Ex Abbate Vrsperg. in chronico.

After that it so pleased the mercifull prouidence of almightie God, to worke this great mercie vpon the stocke of king John (which notwithstanding the vnkind prelats with their false prophets had declared before, that neuer none should succeed in the throne after that king) and also vnto the whole commonwealth of the realme, in deliuering them from the dangerous seruice of Ludouike and the foresaid Frenchmen. After their departure, the next yeere following, An. 1218. which was the third of this kings raigne, the archbishop, S. Langton, and the bishops, earles & barons resorted to London vnto the king at Michaelmas next following, and there held a great parlement; wherein were confirmed and granted by the king al the franchises which were made and giuen by king John his father at Ronemedow, and them he confirmed & ratified by his charter, which long time after (saith mine author) vnto his daies did continue, and were holden in England. For the which cause, by the nobles and commons was giuen and granted againe vnto the king two shillings for euery plow land through England. And Hubert Burgh was made chiefe iustice of England, of whose troubles more is to be said hereafter. And this was the third yeere of king Henrie, and the fiftith yeere after the death of Thomas Becket: wherefore the said Becket the same yeere next following was taken vp and shrined for a new saint made of an old rebell. Thither came such resort of people of England and of France, that the countrie of Kent was not sufficient to sustaine them. Ex historia D. Scales. About the same time Isabell the kings mother was married to the earle of March. And William Marshall the good earle died, which was the gouernor of the king and the realme, not without great lamentation of the people of England. Then was the king committed to the gouernment of Peter bishop of Winchester. This noble earle left behind him fiue sonnes, and fiue daughters.

Anno 1218

King Henrie confirmed the liberties granted by king John.

Two shillings of euery plow land granted to king Henry.

Thomas Becket shrined.

Ex historia D. Scales.

William Marshall dieth and was buried at the Temple.

The yere next insuing, An. 1219. it was ordained and proclamed through all the land, that all aliens & forreners should depart the realme, and not returne to the same againe, onely such excepted as vsed traffike or trade of merchandize vnder the kings safe conduct. This proclamation was thought chiefly to bee set forth for this cause, to auoid out of the land Fouks de Brent, Philip de Marks, Egelardus de Ciconia, William earle Albemarle, Robert de Veteri ponte, Brihenne de Insula, Hugo de Bailluell, Roger de Gaugi, with diuers other strangers more, which kept castels & holds of the kings against his will. Of whom the forenamed Fouks was the principall, who fortified & held the castle of Bedford, which he had by the gift of king John, with might and strength against the king and his power, neere the space of three moneths. Moreouer he went about to apprehend the kings iustices at Dunstable; but they being warned thereof, escaped all, except Henrie Braibroke, whom he imprisoned in the said castel. The king hearing thereof, and consulting with his clergie and nobles, made his power against the same. Which after long seege and some slaughter at length he obtained, and hanged almost all that were within, to the number of ninetie and seuen, which was (as Paris writeth) about the seuenth or eight yeere of his raigne. Fouks the same time was in Wales, who hearing of the taking of the castell, conueyed himselfe to the church of Couentrie. At length submitting himselfe to the kings mercie, vpon consideration of his seruice done before to the kings father, was committed to the custodie of Eustace bishop of London, and afterwards being depriued of all his goods, possessions and tenements within the realme, was forced to perpetuall banishment, neuer to returne to England againe.

Anno 1219

Aliens commanded out of England.

Fouks de Brent rebelleth against king Henrie.

Yeere (by the way) I find it noted in Paris, that after this foresaid Fouks had spoiled and raced the church of S. Paul in Bedford, for the building vp of his castle; the abbasse of Helnestue hearing thereof, caused the sword to be taken from the image of S. Paul standing in the church, so long as hee remained vnpunished. Afterward, she hearing him to be committed to the custodie of S. Paul in London, caused the sword to be put into the hands of the image againe. Matth. Parisiens. in vita Henr. 3.

Ex Parisiens.

About this yeere the young king the second time was crowned againe at Westminster, about which time began the new building of our ladie church at Westminster. Shortly after Gualo the legat was called home again to Rome. For the holy father (as Matth. Paris reporteth) being sicke of a spirituall dropsie, thought this Gualo (hauing so large occupying in England) to be able somewhat to cure his disease. And so that legat returned with all his bags well stuffed, leauing Pandulph behind him to supplie that bailiwike of his great grandfather the pope.

Anno 1220

King Henrie crowned the second time at Westminster.

The life and acts of pope Innocentius the third are partlie described before, how he intruded Stephan Langton against the kings will into the archbishoprike of Canturburie, stirring vp also sixtie and foure monks of the same church of Canturburie priuilie to worke against the king. Moreouer how he did excommunicat the said king as a publike enemie of the church, so long as the said king withstood his tyrannicall doings, putting him and his whole kingdome vnder interdiction, for the space of fiue yeeres and three moneths; and at length deposed & depriued him from his scepter, keeping it in his owne hands for fiue daies. How he absolued his subiects from their due obedience and subiection vnto him. How he gaue away his kingdoms and possessions to Lewis the French kings sonne, commanding the said Lewis to spoile him both of lands and life. Wherupon the king (being forsaken of his nobles, prelats and commons) was inforced against his will to submit himselfe, and sware obedience vnto the pope, paying vnto him a yerelie tribute of 1000. marks by yeere, for receiuing his kingdome againe,

Pope Innocentius.

The deeds and decrees of pope Innocent the third.

Digitized by Google

againe, whereby both he and his successors after him were vassals afterwards vnto the pope. And these were the apostolicall acts of this holy vicar in the realme of England. Moreouer, he condemned Almericus a worthie learned man and a bishop, for an heretike, for teaching and holding against images. Also he condemned the doctrine of Joachim Abbas (whom we spake of before) for heroticall. This pope brought first into the church the paying of priuat tithes. He ordained the receiuing once a yeere at Easter. Vnto the papall decretals he added the decree, Omnes vtriusque sexus, &c. Also the reseruation of the sacrament, and the going with the bel and light before the sacrament was by him appointed. In the said councell of Lateran he also ordained that the canon of the masse should be receiued with equall authoritie as though it had proceeded from the apostles themselues. He brought in transubstantiation. Looke in the decretals, Titulo 1. De summa Trinit. & fide catholica, cap. firmiter credimus.

Almericus condemned.
Joachim Abbas condemned.
Priuat tithes brought in.
Bel and candel before the sacrament.
Canon of the masse authorised.
Transubstantiation.

Item, the said Innocentius the third ordained that none should marrie in the third degree, but only in the fourth degree, and so vnder.

Mariage in the third degree forbidden.

The said pope stirred vp Otho against Philip the emperor, because the said Philip was elected emperor against his will; vpon the occasion whereof followed much war and slaughter in Germany. And afterward against the said Otho, whom he had made emperor, hee set vp Frederike king of Cicile, and caused the archbishop of Maience to pronounce him excommunicat in all his titles, and to bee deposed of his empire. For the which cause the princes of Germanie did inuade his bishoprike, spoiling and burning his possessions. The cause why the pope so did accurse and depose him, was, for that the said Otho did take and occupie cities, townes, and castels, which the pope said appertained to him.

The pope setteth kings and emperors together by the eares.
Philip the emperor deposed.
Otho the emperor deposed.

Item, the said pope ordained, that if any prince offended one another, the correction shoul appertaine vnto the pope. In this councell of Lateran were archbishops and primats 61. bishops 400. abbats 12. priors and conuentuals 800. besides other ambassadors, legats, doctors, and lawyers an innumerable sort, &c.

The councell of Lateran.

In the historie of Hermanus Mutius, we read how in the yeere of our Lord 1212. in this popes time diuers noble men, and others in the countrie of Alsatia, contrary to the tradition of the Romish popes, did hold that euery day was free for eating of flesh, so it be done soberly. Also that they did wickedlie, which restrained priests and ministers from their lawful wiues, for the which cause (as is in the foresaid author) by this pope Innocentius the third and his bishops, an hundred of them in one day were burned and martyred.

Martyrs of Alsatia to the number of one hundred burned in one day. Ex Hermano Mutio.

Some other historie (as Nauclerus) recordeth also, that at the same time many were in the citie of Millaine of the said doctrine, which vsed to send collects vnto the foresaid saints of Alsatia. Ex Nauclero.

Collects sent from the brethren of Millaine to them of Alsatia.

In the chronicle of Gualter Hemingford, otherwise called Gisburnensis, it is recorded that in the daies of this king John, and pope Innocent, began the two sects and orders of friers, one called the preachers order, or blacke friers of S. Dominike: the other called the minorits of S. Francis. The preachers or blacke friers order began of one Dominike a Spaniard, about the parts of Tholouse, who after he had labored ten yeeres in preaching against the Albingenses, and such other as did hold against the church of Rome, afterward comming vp to the councell of Lateran with Fulco bishop of Tholouse, desired of the foresaid Innocent the third, to haue his order of preaching friers confirmed, which the pope a great while refused to grant: at length he had a dreame, that the church of Lateran was readie to fal. Which when he beheld, fearing and much sorrowing therat, commeth in this Dominik, who with his shoulders vnderpropped the church, and so preserued the building thereof from falling, &c. And right well this dreame may seeme verified, for the friers haue been alwaies the chiefe pillers and vpholders of the popes church. Vpon this the pope (waking out of his dreame) called Dominike to him, and granted his petition: and so came vp this wolnish order of the Dominiks. I call it wolnish, for that his mother when she was great with this Dominike, dreamed that shee had in her wombe a woolfe, which had a burning torch in his mouth. The which dreame, the preachers of that order doe greatlie aduance, and expound to their orders glorie, as well as they can. Neuertheless, howsoeuer they expound it, they can make a woolfe but a woolfe, and this a wolnish ender. The rule which they follow seemeth to be taken out of S. Augustine, as who should say, that Christs rule were not enough to make a christian man. Their profession standeth vpon three principall points, as thus described: Charitatem habentes, humilitatem seruantes, & paupertatem voluntariam possidentes. That is: Hauing charitie, holding humilitie, and possessing wilfull pouertie. Their habit and clothing is blacke.

Obseruant friers began.
Dominike.
Friers vpholders of the popes church.

The order of the minors or minorit friers descended from one Francis an Italian of the citie of Assisium. This Assisian asse, whom I suppose was some simple and rude idiot, hearing vpō a time how Christ sent forth his disciples to preach, thought to imitat the same in himselfe and his disciples, and so left off his shooes: he had but one cote, and that of course cloth. In stead of a latchet to his shoe, and of a girdle, hee tooke about him an hempen cord, and so he apparelled his disciples, teaching them to fulfill (for so he speaketh) the perfection of the gospel, to apprehend pouertie, and to walke in the way of holy simplicitie. He left in writing to his disciples and followers, his rule, which he called Regulam euangelicam, The rule of the gospel. As though the gospell of Christ were not a sufficient rule to all christian men, but it must take his perfection of frantike Francis. And yet for all that great presumption of this Francis, and notwithstanding this his rule, sounding to the derogation of Christs gospell, he was confirmed by this pope Innocent. Yea and such fooles this Francis found abroad, that not onelie hee had followers of his doltish religion (both of the nobles and vnnobles of Rome) but also some there were, which builded mansions for him and his friers. This Francis, as he was superstitious in casting all things from him, as his girdle, girding a cord about him, so in outward chastising of himselfe, so strait he was to his flesh (leauing the ordinarie remedie appointed by God) that in winter season, he couered his bodie with ice and snow. He called pouertie his ladie, he kept nothing ouer night. So desirous he was of martyrdome, that he went to Syria, to the Soldan, which receiued him honorablie. Whereby it may be thought, that (surely) he told not the truth, as S. John Baptist did in Herods house. For truth is seldome welcome in courts and in the world. But it is hard to make a martyr of him which is no true confessor. I will heere passe ouer the fable, how Christ and his saints did marke him with fiue wounds. These Franciscan or begging friers, although they were all vnder one rule and clothing of S. Francis, yet they be diuided into many sects and orders, some go on treen shoes or pattins, some barefoted, some regular Franciscans or obseruants, some minors or minorits, others bee called Minimi, others of the gospell, others De caputio. They all differ in many things, but accord in superstition and hypocrisie. And forsomuch as we haue heere entred into the matter of these two orders of friers, by the occasion hereof, I thought a little by the way to digresse from our storie, in reciting the whole catalogue or rabblement of monks, friers and nuns of all sects, rules and orders, set vp and confirmed by the pope. The names of whom heere in order of the alphabet follow vnder written.

The minorit friers descended from S. Francis.
Diuers sects of Franciscans.

The rabblement of religious orders.

The rabble of all religious orders.

AVgustinians, the first order.		Charterhouse order.	1086	Gerundinensis order.
Ambrosians two sorts.	490	Cisterciensis order.	1098	Galilei or Galieans.
Antonies heremits.	324	Crossebearers or crossed friers.	1216
Austins heremits.	498	Carmelits or white friers.	1212	Heremits.
Austins obseruants.	490	Clares order.	1225	Helens brethren. Humiliati.	1166
Armenians sect.		Celestines order.	1297	Hospitall brethren.
Ammonits and Moabits.		Camaldulensis order.	950	Holy ghost order.
		Crosse starred brethren.
Basilius order.	384	Constantinopolitanish order.		Ieroms orders two sorts.	1412
Benets order.	524	Crosse bearers.		Iohns heremits.
Bernardus order.	1120	Chapter monks.		Iustins order.	1432
Barefooted friers.	1222			Iohns order Ioannits.	380
Brigits order.	1370	Duch order.	1216	otherwise knights of the Rhodes.	1308
Beghearts or white spirits.	1399	Dominike blacke friers.	1220	Iniesuati.	1365
Brethren of Hierusalem.	1103			Ieroms heremits.	490
Brethren of S. Iohn De ciuitate blacke Friers.	1220	Franciscans.	1224	Iosephs order.
Brethren of wilfull pouertie.		Grandmontensis order.	1076	Iacobits sect.
		Gregorian order.	594	Iames brethren order.
Cluniacensis order.	913	Georges order.	1407	Iames brethren with the sword.
Canons of S. Augustine.	1080	Cuilielmits.	1246	Indians order.

Katharine

Katharine of Senes order.	1455
Keied monks knights of Rhodes.
Lazarits or Marie Magdalens our ladie brethren.	1034
Lords of Hungarie.
Minorits which be diuided into: Conuentuals.
Obseruants.
Reformat.
Collectan.
De Caputio.
De Euangelio.
Amedes.
Clarini and others.
Minors or Minorits,	1224
Maries seruants.	1304
Monks of mount Oliuet.	1046
Marouinies sect.
Monorits sect.
Monachi and Monachæ.
Morbonei and Meresti.
Menelaish and Iasoniſh sect.
New canons of S. Austin.	1430
Nestorini.
Nalheart brethren.
New order of our ladie.
Nazaræi.
Pauls heremits.	345
Præmonstratensis order.	1119
Preacher order, or Black friers.
Peter the apostles order.	1409
Purgatorie brethren.
Rechabits.
Sarrabaits.
Sambonits.	1199
Scourgers the first sect.	1266
Souldiers of Iesus Christ.	1323
Scopenits, or S. Saluators order.	1367
Specularij or the Glasse order.
Sepulchers order.
Sheere order.
Swerds order.
Starred monks.
Starred friers.
Sclauonie order.
Scourgers the second sect, called Niniuits.
Stoole brethren.
Scotland brethren order.
Sicarij.
S. Sophies order.
Templar lords.	1110
Templar knights.	1120
The vale of Iosaphat his order.
Vallis vmbrosæ.	1400
Waldensis sect.
Wentzelaus order.
Wilhelmer order.
White monks of mount Oliuet.	1406
Zelotes order.

Thus haſt thou if thou pleaſe (gentle reader) to know what orders and what ſects of religion haue been ſet vp by the pope, the catalogue and number of them all, ſo far as we could ſearch them out, not onelie in bookes printed of late in Germany, namely by the reuerend father Martin Luther: but alſo conferred with another Engliſh booke which came to our hands, containing the ſame like notes of ancient antiquitie, the number of which rabblement of religious perſons came to 101. Now as I haue reckoned vp the names and varieties of theſe prodigious ſects, it commeth to mind conſequently to infer the prophecie of Hildegardis, as well againſt the whole rout of Romiſh prelats, and the fall of that church, as eſpecially againſt the begging friers and ſuch other vnprofitable bellies of the church. This Hildegardis is holden of the papiſts themſelues to be a great prophetiſſe: whoſe prophecie procéedeth in this manner, firſt againſt the prieſts and prelats of the Romiſh church, as followeth.

The prophecie of Hildegardis of the ruine of Rome, and againſt the Begging friers.

Hildegardis a nun, and (as many iudged) a prophetiſſe, liued in the yeere 1146. In hir prophecies ſhe doth moſt grieuouſlie reprehend not only the wicked and abominable life of the ſpirituall papiſts, but alſo the contempt of the eccleſiaſticall office, and alſo the horrible deſtruction of the church of Rome. In a certaine place ſhee hath theſe words: And now is the law neglected among the ſpirituall people, which neglect to teach and to doe good things; the maſter likewiſe and the prelats doe ſléepe, deſpiſing iuſtice and laying it aſide. In a certaine viſion the church appeared to her in the ſhape of a woman, complaining that the prieſts had beraied her face with duſt, and rent her cote, &c: and that they did not ſhine ouer the people, neither in doctrine, neither in example of life; but rather contrariewiſe, that they haue driuen the innocent lambe from them. She ſaid moreouer, that all eccleſiaſticall order did euery day become worſe and worſe, and that prieſts did not teach but deſtroy the law of God: and for theſe horrible crimes and impieties, ſhe threatneth and propheſieth vnto them Gods moſt heauie wrath and diſpleaſure, and dolefull punithments. There is no cauſe why the ſpirituall papiſts ſhould flatter themſelues vpon this, that ſhe promiſed againe to the miniſters of the church thoſe good things to follow, like as Ioannes de rupe ſciſſa doth, and other ſuch like prophets: for they ſay it will come to paſſe, that they muſt repent before the times be amended. By which thing (vndoubtedly) they meane the godly miniſters in the reformed churches, which for the moſt part were of the ſpirituall number, and yet did forſake the diſhoneſt life & thoſe wicked idolatries. Now, whereas the prieſts and monks, that is, the whole rabble and ſpiritualtie do account Hildegard for a true prophetiſſe; now they ought to conſider that by hir they are more ſeuerely accuſed, not as by a woman, but as by God himſelfe. And I pray you, what abomination, impietie, and idolatrie hath béen committed ſince that time by the ſpirituaItie? I will note heere a certaine prophecie of hirs, taken out of the common places of Henrie Token, becauſe we ſée it manifeſtly fulfilled in our time. She prophecieth of the reformation of religion, and ſaith that it ſhall be moſt godly.

A prophecie for the decay of the Romiſh church.

Then ſhall the crowne of apoſtolicall honor be diuided, becauſe there ſhall bee found no religion among the apoſtolicall order, and for that cauſe ſhall they deſpiſe the dignitie of that name, and ſhall ſet ouer them other men and other archbiſhops. In ſo much that the apoſtolike ſée of that time (by the diminution of his honour) ſhall haue ſcarſe Rome, and a few other countries thereabout vnder his crowne. And theſe things ſhall partlie come to paſſe by incurſion of wars, and partly alſo by a common councell and conſent of the ſpirituall & ſecular perſons. Then ſhall iuſtice flouriſh, ſo that in thoſe daies men ſhal honeſtie applie themſelues to the ancient cuſtoms and diſcipline of ancient men, and ſhall obſerue them as ancient men did. The gloſſe agreeth, &c.

These things thus premiſed, now will we come to the prophecie of the foreſaid Hildegard, concerning the foreſaid Begging friers aboue mentioned, reciting hir words, not only as they are printed in a booke, printed of late in Germany; but alſo as my ſelfe haue ſéene and read, agréeing to the ſame booke word for word, and yet haue the ſame to ſhew, written in old parchment leaues, in ſuch ſort as the thing it ſelfe moſt euidently declareth a great iniquitie of time: The words of hir prophecie be theſe.

Hildegardis prophelying of friers and monks.

In thoſe daies ſhall ariſe a ſenſeleſſe people, proud, grædie, without faith, and ſubtill, the which ſhall eat the ſinnes of the people, holding a certaine order of fooliſh deuotion vnder the fained cloke of beggerie, preferring themſelues aboue all others by their fained deuotion, arrogant in vnderſtanding, and pretending holineſſe, walking without ſhamefaſtneſſe or the feare of God, in inuenting many new miſchiefes ſtrong and ſtout. But this order ſhall be accurſed of al wiſe men and faithfull chriſtians. They ſhall ceaſe from all labor, and giue themſelues ouer vnto idleneſſe, chooſing rather to liue through flatterie and begging. Moreouer, they ſhall together ſtudie how they may peruerſlie reſiſt the teachers of the truth, and ſtay them together with the noble men; how to ſeduce and deceiue the nobilitie, for the neceſſitie of their liuing, and pleaſures of this world: for the diuell will graft in them foure principall vices, (that is to ſay) flatterie, enuie, hypocriſie, and ſlander. Flatterie, that they may haue large gifts giuen them. Enuie, when they ſée gifts giuen to others, and not to them. Hypocriſie, that by falſe diſſimulation they may pleaſe men. Detraction, that they may extoll and commend themſelues and backebite others, for the praiſe of men, and ſeducing of the ſimple. Alſo, they ſhall inſtantly preach, but without deuotion or example of the martyrs, and ſhall detract the ſecular princes, taking away the ſacraments of the church from the true paſtors, receiuing almes of the poore, diſeaſed, and miſerable, and alſo aſſociating themſelues with the common people, hauing familiaritie with women, inſtructing them how they ſhall deceiue their huſbands and friends by their flatterie and deceitfull words, and to rob their huſbands to giue it vnto them, for they will take all theſe ſtolne and euill gotten goods, and ſay; Giue it vnto vs, and we will pray for you: ſo that they being curious to hide other mens faults, do vtterlie forget their owne. And alas, they will receiue all things, of rouers, pickers, ſpoilers, théeues and robbers, of ſacrilegious perſons, vſurers and adulterers, heretiks, ſchiſmatiks, apoſtataes, whores and bauds, of noble men, periurers, merchants, falſe iudges, ſouldiers, tyrants, princes, of ſuch as liue contrarie to the law, and of many peruerſe and wicked men, following the perſwaſion of the diuell, the ſweetneſſe of ſinne, a delicat and tranſitorie life, and fulneſſe; euen vnto eternall damnation.

All theſe things ſhall manifeſtlie appeare in them vnto all people, and they (day by day) ſhall wax more wicked and hard hearted: and when as their wickednеſſe and deceits ſhall be found out, then ſhall their gifts ceaſe, and then ſhall they go about their houſes hungry, and as mad dogs looking down vpon the earth, and drawing in their necks as doues, that they might be ſatiſfied with bread. Then ſhal the people crie out vpon them: Wo be vnto you ye miſerable children of ſorrow, the world hath ſeduced you, & the diuel hath bridled your mouthes, your fleſh is fraile, and your hearts without ſauor, your minds haue been vnſtedfaſt, and your eies delighted in much vanitie and follie, your daintie bellies deſire delicat meats, your feet are ſwift to run vnto miſchiefe. Remember when you were apparantlie bleſſed, yet enuious; poore in ſight, but rich; ſimple to ſée to, but mightie flatterers, vnfaithfull betraiers, peruerſe detracters; tracters, holy hypocrits, subuerters of the truth, ouermuch vpright, proud, vnshamefast, vnstedfast teachers, delicat martyrs, confessors for gaine; meeke, but slanderers; religious, but couetous; humble, but proud; pitifull, but hard hearted liars; pleasant flatterers, persecutors, oppressors of ỳ powre, bringing in new sects newly inuented of your selues; mercifull thought, but found wicked, louers of the world, sellers of pardons, spoilers of benefices, vnprofitable orators, seditious conspirators, drunkards, desirers of honors, maintainers of mischiefe, robbers of the world, vnsatiable preachers, menpleasers, seducers of women and sowers of discord, of whom Moses the glorious prophet spake very well in his song, A people without counsell or vnderstanding: would to God they did know and vnderstand and foresee the end. You haue builded vp on high, and when you could ascend no higher, then did you fall euen as Simon Magus whom God ouerthrew, and did strike with a cruel plague; so you likewise through your false doctrin, naughtines, lies, detractions, and wickednes, are come to ruine. And the people shal say vnto them, Go ye teachers of wickednesse, subuerters of the truth, brethren of the Sunamit, fathers of heresies, false apostles, which haue fained your selues to follow the life of the apostles, and yet haue not fulfilled it in part: ye sonnes of iniquitie wee will not follow the knowledge of your wales, for pride and presumption hath deceiued you, and insatiable concupiscence hath subuerted your erroneous harts. And when as you would ascend higher then was meet or comely for you (by the iust iudgement of God) you are fallen backe into perpetuall opprobrie and shame.

Digitized by Google

This Hildegardis (whose prophecie we haue mentioned) liued about the yeere of our Lord 1146. as wee read in Chronico Martini.

Crossebearer friers.

About the same time that these Franciscans and Dominike friers began (which are aboue mentioned) sprang vp also the Crosbearers, or Crouched friers, taking their originall and occasion of Innocent the third, which Innocent raised vp an armie (signed with a crosse on their brest) to fight against the Albingenses.

Albingenses, whom the pope and his sect accounted for heretikes about the parts of Tholouse. What these Albingenses were, it cannot be well gathered by the old popish histories: for if there were any that did hold, teach or maintaine against the pope or his papall pride, or withstand and gainesay his beggerly traditions, rites, and religions, &c: the historicians of that time (for the most part in writing them) doe so depraue and misreport them (suppressing the truth of their articles) that they make them and paint them forth to be worse then Turks and infidels. And that, as I suppose, caused Math. Parisiensis and others of that sort, to write so of them as they did: otherwise it is to be thought (& so I find in some records) that the opinions of the said Albingenses were sound enough, holding and professing nothing else but onely against the wanton wealth, pride, and tyrannie of the prelats, denying the popes authoritie to haue ground of the scriptures: neither could they away with their ceremonies and traditions, as images, pardons, purgatorie of the Romish church, calling them (as some say) blasphemous occupyings, &c. Of these Albingenses were slaine (at times) and burned a great multitude by the means of the pope, and Simon Ecclesiasticus, with others more. It seemeth that these Albingenses were chiefly abhorred of the pope, because they set vp a contrarie pope against him about the coasts of Bugarorum: for the which cause the bishop called Portinensis being the popes legat in those quarters, writeth to the archbishop of Rone and other bishops in this wise.

A letter of the bishop Portinensis concerning the Albingenses.

Venerabilibus patribus Dei gratia Rothomagensi archiepiscopo & eius suffraganeis episcopis, salutem in Domino Iesu Christo. Dum pro sponsa veri crucifixi vestrum cogimur auxilium implorare, potius compellimur lacerari singultibus & plorare. Ecce quod vidimus loquimur, & quod scimus testificamur. Ille homo perditus qui extollitur super omne quod colitur, aut dicitur Deus, iam habet perfidiæ suæ præambulũ hæresiarcham, quẽ hæretici Albingenses papam suum nominant, habitantem finibus Burgarorum & Croatiæ, & Dalmatiæ, iuxta Hungarorũ nationem. Ad eam confluunt hæretici Albingenses, vt ad eorum consultare spondeat. Etenim de Carcasona oriundus vices illius antipapæ gerens Bartholomæus, hæreticorum episcopus, funestam ei exhibendo reuerentiam, sedem & locum concessit, in villa quæ Porlos appellatur, & seipsum transtulit in partes Tholosanas. Iste Bartholomæus in literarum suarum vndiq; discurrentium tenore, se in primo salutationis alloquio intitulat in hũc modũ: Bartholomæus seruus seruorũ, M. sanctæ fidei salutẽ. Ipse etiam inter alias enormitates creat episcopos, & ecclesias perfide ordinare contendit. Rogamus igitur attentius, & per aspersionem sanguinis Iesu Christi, & propensius obsecramus, authoritate domini papæ qua fungimur, in hac parte districtè præcipientes, quatenus veniatis Senonas in oct. apostolorum Petri & Pauli proximè futuris, vbi & alij prælati Franciæ, fauente Domino congregabuntur, parati consilium dare in negotio prædicto, & cũ alijs qui ibidem aderunt prouidere super negotio Albingensi. Alioqui inobedientiam vestram domino papæ curabimus significari. Datum apud Plauuium 6. nonas Iulij.

For so much as mention is heere made of these superstitious sects of these friers, and such other beggerlie religions, it might seeme not much impertinent, being moued by the occasion hereof, as I haue done in Hildegardis before: so now to anner also to the same a certaine other ancient treatise compiled by Geffrie Chaucer by the way of a dialogue or questions, moued in the person of a certaine vplandish and simple ploughman of the countrie. Which treatise for the same, the author intituled Jacke Upland, wherein is to be seene and noted to all the world, the blind ignorance and variable discord of these irreligious religions, how rude and vnskilfull they are in matters and principles of our christian institution, as by the contents of this present dialogue appeareth, the words whereof in the same old English wherein first it was set forth in this wise doe proceed. Wherein also thou maiest see, that it is no new thing that their blasphemous doings haue by diuers good men in old time been detected, as there are many and diuers other old books to shew.

The blinde ignorance of friers described.

A treatise of Geffrey Chaucer intituled Iacke Vpland.

IJacke Upland make my mone to verie God and to all true in Christ, that antichrist and his disciples (by colour of holinesse) walking and deceiuing Christs church by many false figures, where through (by antichrist and his) many vertues been transposed to vices.

The fruits of antichrist.

But the felliest folke that euer antichrist found, been last brought into the church and in a wonder wise, for they been of diuers sects of antichrist, sowne of diuers countries and kindreds. And all men knowne well, that they be not obedient to bishops, ne leegemen to kings: neither they tillen, ne sowen, weeden, ne repen, wood, corne, ne grasse, neither nothing that man should helpe: but only themselues their lines to sustaine. And these men han all manner power of God as they seein in heauen and in yearth, to sell heauin and hell to whom that them liketh, and these wretches weet neuer where to been themselfs.

Antichrist his hood.

And therefore (frére) if thine order and rules been grounden on Goddis law, tell thou me Jacke Upland, that I aske of thée, and if thou' bee or thinkest to be on Christs side keepe thy paciens.

Patience yoneth master frier.

SAint Paul teacheth, that all our déeds should be doo in charitie, and else it is nought worth, but displeasing to God and harme to our owne soules. And for that freers challenge to bee greatest clerks of the church, and nert following Christ in liuing: men should for charitie ax them some questions, and pray them to ground their answers in reason and holie writ, for else their answer would nought be worth, be it florished neuer so faire: and as me thinke men might skilfully aske thus of a frére.

The frier must answer according to Gods word.

1 ¶ Frére, how many orders be in earth, and which is the perfectest order? Of what order art thou? Who made thine order? What is thy rule? Is there any perfecter rule then Christ himselfe made? If Christs rule bee most perfect, why rulest thou thée not thereafter? Without more why, shall a frére be more punished if he breake the rule that his patron made, then if he breake the hests that God himselfe made?

Friers may better breake Gods law then mans law.

2 Approoueth Christ any more religions then one, that S. James speaketh of? If he approoueth no more, why hast thou left his rule and takest another? Why is a frére apostata that leueth his order and taketh another sect, sith there is but one religion of Christ?

There is but one religion.

3 Why be ye wedded faster to your habits then a man is to his wife? For a man may leaue his wife for a yéere or two as manie men done: and if you leaue your habit a quarter of a yéere, ye should be holden apostatas.

The frier more bound to his habit then the man to his wife.

4 Maketh your habit you men of religion or no? If it doo, then euer as it weareth, your religion weareth, and after that your habit is better, your religion is better, and when yee haue liggen it beside, then lig ye your religion beside you, and bin apostatas: why bie ye you so pretious cloths? sith no man séeketh such but for vainegloríe, as S. Grégorie saith.

If the habit make the frier religious, as his habit weareth, so doth his religion.

What betokeneth your great hood, your scaplerie, your knotted girdle, and your wide cope?

5 Why vse ye all one colour, more then other christian men doo? What betokeneth that ye been clothed all in one manner clothing?

If ye say, it betokeneth loue and charitie, certes then yee be ofte hypocrits, when any of you hateth another, and in that that ye woll be said holy by your clothing.

Holinesse of all hypocrits consisteth in clothing and outward appearance.

Why may not a frére weare clothing of another sect of freers, sith holinesse stondeth not in the cloths?

6 Why hold ye silence in one house more then another, sith men ought ouer all to speake the good and leaue the euill?

Why eat you flesh in one house more then in another, if your rule & your order be perfect, and the patron that made it?

7 Why get ye your dispensations to haue it more easie? Certes, either it seemeth that ye be vnperfect, or he that made it so hard, that ye may not hold it. And siker, if ye hold not the rule of your patrons, ye be not then her freers, and so ye lie vpon your selues.

All friers found liers.

8 Why

Friers be dead men, and quick beggers.

8 Why make you as dede men when ye be professed, and yet ye be not dede but more quick beggers then ye were before? and it seemeth euill a dead man to go about and beg.

9 Why wil ye not suffer your nonnes heare your councels in your chapter house ere that they haue bin professed, if your councels bin true and after Gods law?

Graues befit dead men and not courtly houses.

10 Why make ye you so costly houses to dwel in? sith Christ did not so, and dede men should haue but graues, as falleth it to dede men, and yet ye haue more courts then many lords of England: for ye now wenden through the realme, & ech night will lig in your owne courts, and so now but few right lords doe.

11 Why heire you to ferme your limitors, giuing therfore ech yere a certen rent, and will not suffer one in anothers limitation, right as ye were your selues lords of countries?

Friers not the kings liege men.

Why be ye not vnder your bishops visitations, and leege men to our king?

Friers needе no mens prayers.

Why are ye no letters of brotherheds of other mens prayers, as ye desire that other men should are letters of you?

If your letters be good, why grant ye them not generallie to all manner of men for the more charitie?

Friers greater and better then God.

12 Now ye make any man more perfect brother for your prayers then God hath by our beleeue? by our baptisme and his owne grant? if ye now, certes then ye be aboue God.

Why make ye men beleeue that your golden trentall song of you, to take therfore ten shillings, or at least fiue shillings, wold bring soules out of hell, or out of purgatorie? if this bee soth, certes ye might bring al soules out of paine, and that wold ye nought, and then ye be out of charitie.

Vncharitable friers.

13 Why make ye men beleeue that hee that is buried in your habit shall neuer come in hell, and ye weet not of your selfe whether ye shall to hell or no? and if this were sooth, yee should sell your high houses to make many habits for to saue many mens soules.

Friers stealers of mens children.

14 Why steale ye mens children for to make hem of your sect, sith that theft is against Gods hests, and sith your sect is not perfect? ye know not whether the rule that ye bind him to, be best for him or worst.

15 Why vnderneme ye not your brethren for their trespasse after the law of the gospell, sith that vnderneming is the best that may be? but ye put them in prison oft when they doe after Gods law, and by S. Augustines rule, If any doe amisse and would not amend him, ye should put him from you.

Christ and burials were more gainefull then the ministring of the sacraments.

16 Why couet ye christ and burying of other mens parishens, and none other sacrament that falleth to christian folke?

Why bustle ye not to heare to christ of poore folke as well as of rich lords and ladies, sith they now haue more plentie of christ fathers then poore folke now?

Why sey ye not the gospell in houses of bedred men, as ye doe in rich mens that now go to church and heare the gospell?

Poore men haue no soules, saith my fellow frier.

Why couet you not to burie poore folke among you? sith that they bin most holy (as ye sain that ye bin for your pouertie.)

17 Why will ye not bee at hir diriges as ye haue bin at rich mens? sith God prayseth him more then he doth other men.

What is thy prayer worth? sith thou wilt take therfore, for all chapmen ye need be most wise for dread of simonie.

These be they that will not enter themselues, nor suffer other men that would.

What cause hast thou that thou wilt not preach the gospel, as God saith that thou shouldest? sith it is the best lore and also our beleeue.

Why be ye euill apaid that secular priests should preach the gospell? sith God himselfe hath bodden hem.

The frier getteth by In principio, and yet hateth the gospell.

18 Why hate ye the gospell to bee preached, sith ye bee so much hold thereto? for ye win more by yere with In Principio, then with all the rules that euer your patrons made, and in this minstrels bin better then ye, for they contrarien not to the mirths that they maken, but ye contraien the gospell both in word and deed.

Judas for thirtie pence, but the priest and frier for foure pence selleth Christ. A comparison betweene Judas and the frier.

19 Freer, when thou receiuest a pennie for to say a masse, whether sellest thou Gods bodie for that pennie, or thy prayer, or els thy trauell? if thou saiest thou wolt not trauell for to say the masse, but for the penny, that certes if this be soth, then thou louest too little meed for thy soule: and if thou sellest Gods bodie, other thy prayer, then it is very simony, and art become a chapman worse then Judas that sold it for thirtie pence.

The frier writeth because God forgetteth.

20 Why writest thou his names in thy tables that geueth thee monie? sith God knoweth all thing: for it seemeth by thy writing that God would not reward him, but thou writest in thy tables, God would els forgotten it.

Why bearest thou God in hand and slanderest him that he begged for his meat? sith he was Lord ouer all, for then had he bin vnwise to haue begged, and haue no need thereto.

Freer after what law rulest thou thee? where findest thou in Gods law that thou shouldest thus beg?

21 What maner men needeth for to beg?

For whom oweth such men to beg?

Why beggest thou so for thy brethren?

If thou saiest, for they haue need, then thou doest it for the more perfection, or els for the least, or els for the meane. If it be the most perfection of all, then should all thy brethren doe so, and then no man needed to beg but for himselfe, for so should no man beg but him needed. And if it be the least perfection, why louest thou then other men more then thy selfe? For so thou art not well in charitie, sith thou shouldst seeke the more perfection after thy power, liuing thy selfe most after God. And thus leauing that imperfection thou shouldest not so beg for them. And if it is a good meane thus to beg as thou doest, then should no man doe so, but they bin in this good meane, and yet such a mean granted to you may neuer be grounded on Gods law; for then both lerid and leaud bin in meane degree of this world, should go about and beg as ye do. And if all should do so, certes well nigh all the world should go about and beg as ye done, and so should there be ten beggers against one yeuer.

It is better to labor and giue, then to loiter and beg, as frier.

Why procurest thou men to yeue thee their almes, and sayest it is so needfull, and thou wilt not thy selfe win thee that meed?

22 Why wilt not thou beg for more bedred men that bin power then any of your sect, that liggen and now not go about to helpe himselfs, sith we be all brethren in God, and that brotherhed passeth any other that ye or any man could make, & where most need were, there were most perfection, either els yee hold them not your pure brethren, but worse, but then ye bee vnperfect in your begging?

Why make ye so many maisters among you? sith it is against the teaching of Christ and his apostles?

23 Whose been all your rich courts that ye han, & all your rich iewels? sith ye seene that ye han nought ne in proper ne in common. If ye saine they beene the popes, why gether ye then of poore men and lords so much out of the kings hand to make your pope rich? And sith ye saine that it is great perfection to haue nought in proper ne in common, why be ye so fast about to make the pope that is your father rich, and put on him imperfection? sithen ye saine that your goods been all his, and he should by reason be the most perfect man, it seemeth openlich that ye beene cursed children so to slander your father and make him imperfect. And if ye saine that the goods be yours, then do ye aienst your rule; and if it be not aienst your rule, then might ye haue both plough & cart, and labor as other good men done, and not so to beg by losengerie, and idle as ye done. If ye say that it is more perfection to beg then to trauell or to worch with your hand, why preach ye not openly, and teach all men to doe so? sith it is the best and most perfect life to the helpe of their soules, as ye make children to beg that might haue been rich heires.

Friers beg from all men to make the pope rich.

If it be imperfection to be rich, why doe the friers desire to make the pope vnperfect?

Why make ye not your feasts to poore men and yeueth him gests, as ye done to the rich? sith poore men han more need then the rich.

What betokeneth that ye go twaine and twaine together? if ye be out of charitie, ye accord not in soule.

Why beg yee and take salaries therto more then other priests? sith he that most taketh, most charge hath.

24 Why hold ye not S. Francis rule and his testament? sith Francis saith, that God shewed him this liuing and this rule: and certes if it were Gods will, the pope might not fordo it; or els Francis was a lier that said on this wise. And but this testament that he made, accord with Gods will, or else erred: he is a lier that were out of charitie: and as the law saith, he is accursed that letteth the rightfull last will of a dead man. And this testament is the last will of Francis that is a dead man; it seemeth therefore that all his freers been cursed.

If Francis order be contrarie to Christ his testament, then is Francis accursed.

25 Why will ye not touch no coined mony with the crosse, ne with the kings head, as ye done other iewels both of gold and siluer? Certes if ye despise the crosse or the kings head, then ye be worthy to be despised of God and the king; and sith ye will receiue monie in your hearts, and not with you hands, and it seemeth that ye hold more holinesse in your hands then in your hearts, and then be false to God.

He that is more holy in hand then in heart, is false to God.

26 Why haue ye exempt you from our kings lawes, and bisitting of our bishops more then other christen men that liuen in this realme, if ye be not giltie of traitorie to our realme, or trespassers to our bishops? But ye will haue the kings lawes for the trespasse do to you, and ye will haue power of other bishops more then other priests, and also haue leaue to prison your brethren as lords in your courts more then other folks han that been the kings leege men.

A subiect to exempt himselfe from the lawes of his prince smelleth of treason.

27 Why shall some sect of you freers pay ech a yere a certaine to her generall prouinciall or minister, or els to her soueraignes? but if he steale a certaine number of children (as some men saine) and certaine if this been soth, then ye be constrained vpon certaine paine to do theft against Gods commandement, Non furtum facies.

Friers are forced to be theeues.

28 Why be ye so hardie to grant by letters of fraternity to men and women, that they shall haue part and merit of all your good deeds, & ye weeten neuer whether God be apaid with your deeds because of your sinne? Also ye written neuer whether that man or woman be in state to be saued or damned, then shall he haue no merit in heauin for his owne deeds ne for none other mans. And all were it so, that he should haue part of your good deeds: yet should he haue no more then God would giue him after that he were worthie, and so much shall ech man haue of Gods yeft without your limitation. But if ye will say that ye been Gods fellowes, and that he may not doe without your assent, then be ye blaspheemers to God.

Works of superrogation.

God is the limiter of meed and reward, and not the frier.

29 What betokeneth that ye hatie ordained, that when such

Digitized by Google

Friers will not pray, but for them that be of their fraternitie.

one as ye haue made your brother or sister, and hath a letter of your seale, that letter mought be brought in your holy chapter, and there be rad, or els ye will not pray for him. And but ye willen pray especially for al other that were not made your brethren or sistren, then were ye not in right charitie, for that ought to be commen, and namely in ghostly things.

30 Fréer, what charitie is this, to ouercharge the people by mightie begging vnder colour of preaching or praying, or masses singing? sith holy write biddeth not thus, but euen the contrarie: for all such ghostlie deeds should be done freely, as God yeueth them freely?

Friers do make apostataes.

31 Fréer, what charitie is this, to beguile children or they commen to discretion, and bind hem to your orders that bin not grounded in Gods law against hir friends will? sithen by this follie bin many apostatas both in will and deed, and many bin apostatas in hir will during al hir life, that would gladly be discharged if they wist how, and so many bin apostates that shoulden in other states haue bin true men.

The number of friers are superfluous and as necessarie as ten fingers on one hand.

32 Fréer, what charitie is this, to make so many fréers in euery countrie to the charge of the people? sith persons and vicars alone, ye secular priests alone, ye monks and canons alone, with bishops aboue them, were inough to the church to doe the priests office. And to adde more then inough is a foule error, and great charge to the people, and this openly against Gods will that ordained all things to be done in weight, number and measure. And Christ himself was apaid with twelue apostles and a few disciples, to preach and do priests office to all the whole world, then was it better do then is now at this time by a thousand dele. And right so as foure fingers with a thombe in a mans hand helpeth a man to worch, and double number of fingers in one hand should let him more, and so the more number that there were passing the measure of Gods ordinane, the more were a man letted to worch: right so (as it séemeth) it is of these new orders that bin added to the church without ground of holie write and Gods ordinance.

See, so fast the frier followeth Christ in his pouertie.

33 Fréer, what charitie is this, to the people to lie, and say that yée follow Christ in pouertie more then other men done? and yet in curious and costlie housing, and fine and precious clothing, and delicious and liking féeding, and in treasure and iewels, and rich ornaments, fréers passen lords and other rich worldlie men, and worest they should bring hir cause about (be it neuer so costly) though Gods law be put abacke.

Friers are the letters of preaching the gospell.

34 Fréer, what charity is this, to gather vp the books of holy write, and put hem in treasorie, and so emprison them from secular priests and curats, and by this cautell let hem to preach the gospell freelie to the people without worldlie méed, and also to defame good priests of heresie, and lien on hem openly for to let hem to shew Gods law by the holy gospell to the christian people?

What holinesse is in a friers coat.

35 Fréer, what charitie is this, to faine so much holinesse in your bodilie clothing (that ye clepe your habit) that many blind fooles desiren to die therein more then in another? and also that a fréer that leaueth his habit late founden of men, may not bée assoiled till he take againe, but is apostata as ye sain, and cursed of God and man both? The fréer beléeueth truth, and patience, chastitie, méeknesse and sobrietie, yet for the more part of his life hee may soone be assoiled of his prior, and if he bring home to his house much good by the yére (be it neuer so falsly begged and pilled of the poore and néedie people in countries about) hee shall behold a noble fréer. O Lord whether this be charitie?

The stouter begger the nobler frier.

Why friers so much desire to haue rich men buried in their friaries.

36 Fréer, what charitie is this, to preasse vpon a rich man, & to intise him to be buried among you from his parish church, and to such rich men giue letters of fraternitie confirmed by your generall seale, and thereby to beare him in hand that hée shall haue part of all your masses, mattens, preachings, fastings, wakings, and all other good déeds done by your brethren of your order (both whilest hee liueth, and after that he is dead) and yet ye witten neuer whether your déeds bée acceptable to God, ne whether that man that hath that letter be able by good liuing to receiue any part of your déeds, and yet a poore man (that ye wite well or supposen incerten to haue no good of) ye ne giuen to such letters, though he be a better man to God then such a rich man: neuertheless, this poore man doth not retch thereof. For as men supposen, such letters and many other that fréers behotten to men, be full false deceits of fréers, out of all reason, and Gods law and christian mens faith.

Friers behests are false deceits.

37 Fréer, what charitie is this, to be confessors of lords and ladies, and to other mightie men, and not amend hem in hir living? but rather as it séemeth, to be the bolder to pill hir poore tenants and to liue in lecherie, and there to dwell in your office of confessor for winning of worldly goods, and to be hold great by colour of such ghostlie offices? this séemeth rather pride of fréers, then charitie of God.

Friers desire to be lords and ladies confessors.

38 Fréer, what charitie is this, to sain that who so liueth after your order, liueth more perfectly, and nert followeth the state of apostles in pouerty and penance, and yet the wisest and greatest clerks of you wend or send, or procure to the court of Rome to be made cardinals or bishops of the popes chaplens, and to be assoiled of the vow of pouertie and obedience to your ministers, in the which (as ye sain) standeth most perfection and merit of your orders, and thus ye farren as Pharisées that sain

Friers and Pharisees say one thing and doe another.

one and doe another to the contrarie.

Why name ye more the patron of your order in your Confiteor when ye begin masse, then other saints, apostles, or martyrs, that holy church hold more glorious then hem, and clepe hem your patrons and your auowries?

Dilemma.

Fréer, whether was S. Francis in making of his rule that he set thine order in, a fole and a liar, or else wise and true? If ye sain that he was not a fole, but wise; ne a liar but true: why shew you contrarie by your doing, when by your suggestion to the pope ye said; that your rule that Francis made was so hard, that ye mow not liue to hold it without declaration and dispensation of the pope, and so by your déed? Ne let your patron a fole that made a rule so hard that no man may well kéepe, and eke your déed prooueth him a liar, where he saith in his rule, that he toke and learned it of the holy ghost. For how might ye for shame pray the pope vndoe that the holy ghost bit, as when ye prayed him to dispence with the hardnesse of your order?

Which is the best order of friers.

Fréer, which of the foure orders of friers is best to a man that knoweth not which is the best, but would faine enter into the best, and none other? If thou saiest that thine is the best, then saiest thou that none of the other is as good as thine, & in this each fréer in the thrée other orders woll say that thou liest, for in the selfe manner ech other fréer woll say that his order is best. And thus to ech of the foure orders bin the other thrée contrarie in this point: in the which if any say soth, that is one alone, for there may but one be the best of foure. So followeth it that if ech of these orders answered to this question as thou doest, thrée were false, and but one true, and yet no man should wite who that were. And thus it séemeth, that the most part of fréers bin or should be liars in this point, and they should answer thereto. If you say that another order of the fréers is better then thine, or as good; why toke ye not rather thereto as to the better, when thou mightst haue chose at the beginning? And eke why shouldst thou be an apostata to leaue thine order and take thée to that is better, and so why goest thou not from thine order into that?

Friers neuer agree one with another.

Fréer, is there any perfecter rule of religion then Christ Gods sonne gaue in his gospell to his brethren? Or then that religion that S. James in his epistle maketh mention of? If you say yes, then puttest thou on Christ (that is the wisdome of God the father) vnkunning, vnpower, or euill will: for then he could not make his rule so good as another did his. And so he had be vnkunning, that he might not so make his rule so good as another man might, and so were he vnmightie, & not God, as he would not make his rule so perfect as another did his, and so he had bin euill willed, namely to himselfe.

The frier thinketh his rule perfecter then Christs, because he leaueth the one and followeth the other.

For if he might and could, & would haue made a rule perfect without default, and did not, hee was not Gods sonne almightie. For if any other rule be perfecter then Christs, then must Christs rule lacke of that perfection by as much as the other weren more perfecter, and so were default, and Christ had failed in making of his rule: but to put any default or failing in God is blasphemie. If thou say that Christs rule, and that religion which S. James maketh mention of, is perfectest; why holdest thou not thilke rule without more? And why clepest thou the rather of S. Francis or S. Dominiks rule or religion or order, then of Christs rule or Christs order?

Dilemma.

Fréer, canst thou any default or alligne in Christs rule of the gospell (with the which he taught al men sikerlie to be saued) if they kept it to her ending? If thou say it was too hard, then saist thou Christ lied; for he said of his rule: My yoke is soft, and my burthen light. If thou say Christs rule was too light, that may bee alligned for no default, for the better it may bee kept. If thou saist that there is no default in Christs rule of the gospell, sith Christ himselfe saith it is light and easie: what need was it to patrons of fréers to ad more thereto? and so to make an harder religion to saue fréers, then was ỳ religion of Christs apostles and his disciples helden and were saued by. But if they woulden that her fréers saten aboue the apostles in heauen for the harder religion that they kepen here, so would they sitten in heauen aboue Christ himselfe, for their more and strict obseruations, then so should they be better then Christ himselfe with mischance.

Friers would sit in heauen aboue the apostles.

Go now forth and fraine your clerks, and ground ye you in Gods law, and gif Jacke an answer, and then ye han assoiled me that I haue said sadly in truth, I shall soile thée of thine orders, and saue thée to heauen.

If fréers kun not or mow not excuse hem of these questions asked of hem, it séemeth that they be horrible guilty against God, and hir euen christian; for which gilts and defaults it were worthie that the order that they call their order were fordone. And it is wonder that men sustaine hem or suffer hir liue in such maner. For holy write biddeth that thou do well to the méeke, & giue not to the wicked, but forbed to giue hem bread, least they be made thereby mightier through you.

After these digressions, now to returne to the course of our storie againe. As Henrie this king succéeded king John his father, so after Innocent the pope, came Honorius the third, then Gregorie the ninth, &c. And after Otho the emperor (whom the pope had once set vp, and after deprined againe) succéeded Frederike Otho the emperor set vp and deposed againe by the pope.

Digitized by Google

Frederike the second, as is partly before touched. In the daies of these kings, popes and emperours, it were too long to recite all that happened in England, but especially in Germanie, betwixt pope Honorius, Gregorius and Frederike the emperor: the horrible tragedie whereof were enough to fill a whole booke by it selfe. But yet we meane (God willing) somewhat to touch concerning these ecclesiasticall matters, first beginning with this realme of England.

After that the kingdome of England had been subiected by king John (as hath been said) and made tributarie to the pope and the Romish church, it is incredible how the vnsatiable auarice and greedinesse of the Romans did oppresse and wring the commons and all estates and degrees of the realme, especially beneficed men, and such as had any thing of the church. Who, what for their domesticall charges within the realme, what for the pope, what for the legats, what for contributing to the holie land, what for relaxations and other subtill sleights to get away their money, were brought into such slauerie, captiuitie, and penurie, that whereas the king neither durst nor might remedie their exclamations by himselfe: yet notwithstanding by his aduice, Simon Montfort and the earle of Leicester, with other noble men (not forgetting what great grieuances and distresses the realme was brought into by the Romans) thought to worke some way how to bridle and restraine the insatiable rauening of these greedie wolues. Wherefore they deuised their letter, giuing strait commandement to the religious men, and to such as had their churches to farme, that henceforth they should not answere the Romans of such farmes and rents any more, but should pay the said farmes or rents vnto their owne proctors appointed for the same purpose, as by their writings sent abroad to bishops or chapters, and other ecclesiasticall houses may appeare, in this forme and effect as followeth.

A complaint of the nobles of England against the intollerable couetousnesse of the pope and prelats of Rome.

A complaint of the nobles of England against the couetousnesse of Rome.

TO such and such a bishop, and such a chapter; all the vniuersitie and companie of them, that had rather die then to be confounded of the Romans, wisheth health. How the Romans and their legats haue hitherto behaued themselues toward you and other ecclesiasticall persons of this realme of England, it is not vnknowne to your discretions, in disposing and giuing awaie the benefices of the realme after their owne lust, to the intollerable preiudice and grieuance both of you and all other Englishmen. For whereas the collation of benefices should and doe properlie belong to you and other your fellow bishops (ecclesiasticall persons) they thundering against you the sentence of excommunication, that you should not bestow them vpon anie person of this realme, vntill in euerie dioceese and cathedrall church within the realme, fiue Romans (such as the pope shall name) bee prouided for, to the value of euerie man an hundred pounds by yeare. Besides these, many other grieuances the said Romanists do inflict and inferre, both to the laitie and nobles of the realme for the patronages and almes bestowed by them and their ancestors, for the sustentation of the poore of the realme, and also to the clergie and ecclesiasticall persons of the realme touching their liuings and benefices. And yet the said Romanists not contented with the premisses, doe also take from the clergie of this realme the benefices which they haue, to bestow them on men of their owne countrie, &c.

Wherefore, we considering the rigorous austeritie of these foresaid Romanists, which once comming in but as straungers hither, now take vpon them not only to iudge, but also to condemne vs, laying vpon vs importable burthens, whereunto they will not put to one of their owne fingers to moue: Laying therefore our heads togither vpon a generall and full aduice had mong our selues concerning the same, wee haue thought good (although verie late) to withstand them, rather then to be subiect to their intollerable oppressions, and greater slauerie more hereafter to be looked for. For the which cause wee straitlie charge and command you (as your friends going about to deliuer you, the church, the king, and the kingdome from that miserable yoke of seruitude) that you do not intermeddle or take any part concerning such exactions or rents to be required or giuen to the said Romans. Letting you to vnderstand for truth, that in case you shall (which God forbid) be found culpable herein, not only your goods and possessions shall be in danger of burning, but also in your persons shall incurre the same perill and punishment as shall the said Romish oppressors themselues.

Thus fare ye well.

Example teaching neuer to take part against their king with forren power.

¶ Thus much I thought heere to insert and notifie concerning this matter, for that not only the foule and auaricious greedinesse of the Romish church might the more euidentlie vnto all English men appeare: but that they may learne by this example how worthie they be so to be serued and plagued with their owne rod, which before would take no part with their naturall king against forren power, of whom now they are scourged.

To make the storie more plaine: In the raigne of this Henrie the third (who succeeding (as is said) after king John his father raigned sir and fiftie yeares) came diuers legats from Rome to England. First cardinall Otho sent from the pope with letters to the king, like as other letters also were sent to other places for exactions of money. Cardinall Otho legat.

The king opening the letters, and perceiuing the contents; answered, that he alone could say nothing in the matter which concerned all the clergie and commons of the whole realme. Not long after a councell was called at Westminster, where the letters being opened, the forme was this: Petimus inprimis ab omnibus ecclesijs cathedralibus duas nobis præbendas exhiberi, vnam de portione episcopi, & alteram de capitulo: & similiter de cœnobijs vbi diuersæ sunt portiones abbatis & conuentus; a conuentibus quantum pertinet ad vnum monachum, æquali facta distributione honorum suorum, & ab abbate tantundem. That is; We require to be giuen vnto vs, first, of all cathedrall churches two prebends, one for the bishops part, the other for the chapter: and likewise of monasteries where be diuers portions, one for the abbat, another for the conuent; of the conuent so much as appertaineth to one monke, the portion of the gods being proportionally diuided; of the abbat likewise as much. The cause why he required these prebends was this: It hath been (saith he) an old slander, and a great complaint against the church of Rome, to be noted of insatiable couetousnes, which as ye know is the rot of all mischefe, and all by reason that causes be wont commonly not to be handled, nor to proceed in the church of Rome without great gifts and expence of money. Whereof seeing the pouertie of the church is the cause, and why it is so slandered and euill spoken of: it is therefore conuenient that you (as naturall children) should succor your mother. For vnlesse we should receiue of you and of other good men as you are, we should then lacke necessaries for our life, which were a great dishonor to our dignitie, &c. The pope requireth two prebendships in euery cathedrall church. Note the cause why the pope is compelled to craue money of other countries.

When those petitions and causes of the legat were propounded in the foresaid assemblie at Westminster on the popes behalfe (the bishops and prelats of the realme being present) answere was made by the mouth of maister John Bedford on this wise: that the matter there proponed by the lord legat, in especiall concerned the king of England, but in generall it touched all the archbishops with their suffragans, the bishops, and all the prelats of the realme. Wherefore, seeing both the king by reason of his sickenesse is absent, and the archbishop of Canturburie with diuers other bishops also were not there, therefore in the absence of them they had nothing to say in the matter, neither could they so doe without preiudice of them which were lacking. And so the assemblie for that time brake vp.

Not long after the said Otho cardinall De carcere Tulliano, comming againe from Rome Cum autentico plenariæ potestatis, indicted another councell at London, caused all prelats, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, and other of the clergie to be warned vnto the same councell, to be had in the church of S. Pauls at London about the feast of S. Martin. The pretence of which councell was for redresse of matters concerning benefices and religion; but the chiefe and principall was to hunt for money: for putting them in feare and in hope, some to lose, some to obtaine spirituall promotions at his hand, he thought gaine would rise thereby, and so it did. For in the meane time (as Parisiensis in vita Henrici tertij writeth) diuers pretious rewards were offered him in palfries, in rich plate and iewels, in costlie and sumptuous garments richly furred, in coine, in victuals, and such like things of value wel worthy of acceptation. Wherein one indeuoured to go beyond another in munificence (not considering by meanes of the seruilitie wherewith they were oppressed of those popish shauelings and shameleese shifters, that all was meere pillage and extortion.) In so much that only the bishop of Winchester (as the storie reporteth) hearing that he would winter at London, sent him fiftie fat oxen, an hundred come of pure wheat, eight tun of chosen wine toward his house keeping. Likewise other bishops also for their part offered vnto the cardinals bor after their abilitie. A councell at London called. Great rewards giuen to the cardinall.

The time of the councell drawing nigh, the cardinall commanded at the west end of Pauls church an high and solemne throne to be prepared, rising vp with a glorious scaffold vpon mightie and substantiall stages strongly builded, and of great height. Thus against the day assigned, came the said archbishops, bishops, abbats and other of the prelacie, both farre and neere throughout al England, wearied and vered with the winters iourney, bringing their letters procuratorie. Who being together assembled, the cardinall beginneth his sermon. But before we come to the sermon, there hapned a great discord betweene the two archbishops of Canturburie and Yorke, for sitting at the right hand and left hand of the glorious cardinall; for the which the one appealed against the other. The cardinall to pacifie the strife betweene them both, so that he would not derogat from either of them, brought forth a certaine bull of the pope: in the middest of which bull was pictured the figure of the crosse. On the right side of the crosse stood the image of S. Paul, and on the left side S. Peter: Lo (saith the cardinall, Contention for sitting on the right hand of the cardinall.

(holding open the bull with the crosse) heere you see S. Peter on the left hand of the crosse, and S. Paul on the right side, and yet is there betweene these two no contention, for both are of equal glorie. And yet S. Peter for the prerogatiue of his keies, and for the preheminence of his apostleship and cathedrall dignitie, seemeth most worthie to be placed on the right side. But yet because S. Paul beleeued on Christ when he saw him not, therefore hath he the right hand of the crosse: For blessed be they (saith Christ) which beleeue and see not, &c. And from that time forth the archbishop of Canturburie inioyed the right hand, and the archbishop of Yorke, the left. Wherein yet this cardinall is more to be commended then the other cardinall Hugo mentioned a little before, which in the like contention betweene these archbishops ran his way.

Why S. Paul standeth on the right hand of the popes crosse. Why the archbishop of Canturburie hath the right hand, and the archbishop of Yorke the left hand.

Thus the controuersie ceased and composed betweene these two, Otho the cardinall sitting aloft betweene these two archbishops, beginneth his sermon, taking this theme of the prophet; In medio sedis & in circuitu eius quatuor animalia plena oculis ante & retro, &c. that is; In the midst of the seat, and in the circuit about the seat, were foure beasts full of eyes before and behind, &c. Upon this theme the cardinall proceeded in his sermon, sitting like a god in the midst. Hee compared them about him to the foure beasts about the seat, declaring how they ought to haue eyes both before and behind (that is) that they must be prouident in disposing of secular things, and circumspect in spirituall matters, continuing and ioyning wiselie things past with things to come; and this was the greatest effect of his clerkely sermon. That done, he gaueth forth certaine statutes for ordering of churches, as for the dedication of temples, for seuen sacraments, for giuing of orders, for farming of benefices, collations and resignations of benefices and vicarages, priests apparell, and single life, for eating of flesh in religious houses, for archdeacons, bishops, proctors, and such other like matters. But the chiefest intent of all his proceeding was this, that they should be vigilant, prouident, and circumspect, with all their eyes (both before and behind) to fill the popes pouch, as appeared not only by this, but all their other trauels besides. In so much that the king dreading the displeasures of his commons for the doings of the legat, willed him to repaire home to Roome againe; but yet could not so be rid of him: for he receiuing new commandements from the pope, applied his haruest still, gleaning and raking what soeuer he might scrape, writing and sending to bishops and archdeacons in this forme and tenor.

Note the theme of the cardinall applied to God, how he applieth it to himselfe.

Scripture cleerkly applied.

A letter of the cardinall to bishops and archdeacons. Censure of the church well applied.

Otto miseratione diuina, &c. Discreto viro N. episcopo vel N. archidiacono salutem. Cùm necesse habeamus de mandato summi pontificis moram trahere in Anglia longiorem, nec possimus propriis stipendys militare, discretionem vestram, qua fungimur autoritate rogamus, vt procurationes vobis debitas in episcopatu, vel archidiaconatu vestro colligi faciatis nostro nomine diligenter, eas quàm citiùs poteritis nobis, transmissuri, contradictores per censuram ecclesiasticam compescendo. Prouiso, quòd quælibet procuratio summam 4. marcarum aliquatenus non excedat, & vbi vna ecclesia non sufficiet ad procurationem huiusmodi habendam, duæ pariter vnam soluant. Datum Lond. 15. Kal. Mar. Pont. D. Gregor. papæ 9.

Foure markes to be paid to the pope of euerie procuration.

Note the craftie practise of Romish prelats to poll for money.

And moreouer, note againe the wicked and cursed traines of these Romish rakehels, who to picke simple mens purses, first send out their friers and preachers to stirre vp in all places and countries men to go fight against the Turkes: whom when they haue once bound with a vow, and signed them with the crosse, then send they their buls to release them both of their labour, and their vow for money, as by their owne stile of writing is heere to be seene, thus proceeding.

*N. episcopus dilectis in Christo filijs omnibus archidiaconis per diœcesim suam constitutis, salutem. Literas domini legati suscepimus in hæc verba; Otto miseratione diuina, &c. Cùm sicut intelleximus nonnulli cruce signati regni Angliæ, qui sunt inhabiles ad pugnandum, ad sedem apostolicam accedant, vt ibidem à voto crucis absolui valeant, & nos nuper recepimus à summo pontifice in mandatis, vt tales non solùm absoluere, verùm & ad redimenda vota sua * compellere debeamus, volentes eorum parcere laboribus & expensis, fraternitatem vestram qua fungimur, monemus, quatenus, partem prædictam à summo pontifice nobis concessam faciatis in nostris diœcesibus sine mora qualibet publicari, vt præfati cruce signati ad nos accedere valeant, * beneficium super his iuxta formam nobis traditam accepturi. Datum Londini 15. Kal. Mart. Pont. D. N. papæ Gregor. 9.*

* Note the stile of Rome.

* Imo maleficium & naufragium pecuniæ.

Frederike the emperour maried king Johns daughter.

The fift part of euerie spirituall mans liuing giuen to the pope.

The cause why the pope was so greedie and needie of money, was this; because he had mortall hatred, and waged continuall battell the same time against the good emperour Frederike the second, who had to wife king Johns daughter, and sister to king Henrie the third, whose name was Isabell. And therefore because the popes war could not be sustained without charges, that made the pope the more importunat to take vp money in all places, but specially in England. In so much that he shamed not to require the fift part of euerie ecclesiasticall mans liuing, as Parisiensis writeth. And not only that, but also the said pope Gregorie (consenting with the citizens of Rome) so agreed with them, that if they would ioyne with him in banquithing the foresaid Frederike, he would (and so did) grant vnto them, that all the benefices in England, which were or should be vacant (namely pertaining to religious houses) should be bestowed at their owne will and commandement to their children and kinsfolkes. Whereupon it followeth in the forenamed historie, Vnde infra paucos dies misit D. papa sacta præcepta sua domino Cant. archiep. Elien. & Lincol. & Salisb. episcopis, vt trecentis Romanis, in primis beneficijs vacantibus prouiderent, scientes se suspensos à beneficiorum collatione donec tot competenter prouiderentur: that is; The pope sent in commandement to the archbishop of Canturburie and foure other bishops, that prouision should be made for three hundred Romans in the chiefest and best benefices in all England at the next voidance: so that the foresaid archbishop and bishops should be suspended in the meane time from all collation or gift of benefices, vntill these foresaid three hundred were prouided for. Whereupon the archbishop the same time seeing the vnreasonable oppression of the church of England, left the realme and went into France.

Three hundred Romans to be placed in the best benefices of England.

Againe, marke another as much or more easie sleight of the pope in procuring money. He sent one Petrus Rubeus the same time with a new deuice, which was this: not to worke anie thing openly, but priuilie to go betwixt bishop and bishop, abbat and abbat, &c. telling in their eares, such a bishop, such an abbat hath giuen so much and so much vnto the popes holinesse, trusting that you also will not be behind for your part, &c. By the meanes whereof it is incredible to thinke what a masse of money was made out of the realme vnto the pope.

Petrus Rubeus the popes agent.

A Romish sleight of the pope to get English money.

At length the foresaid bishops, abbats, and archdeacons feeling their owne smart, came to the king (whose father before they did resist) with their humble sute lamentablie complaining of the vnmeasurable exactions of the pope, and especially against Petrus Rubeus and his fellow Otto the legat, desiring the king, that seeing the matter toucheth not themselues alone, but the whole church, and seeing the valuation of churches was knowen better to their archdeacons then to themselues, therefore they desired a generall calling and talke to be had in the matter. In the octaues of S. John the baptist, the day and place was assigned where they should talke, at which day and place the prelats of England conuenting together, durst not giue anie direct denial of that contribution, but after a modest sort did insinuat certaine exceptions against the same.

Exceptions aleaged for not contributing to the pope.

1 First they say, that for so much as the contribution is demanded to war against him, who was ioyned in matrimonie with their prince, they were not bound so to do.

2 Secondly, for that the said contribution tended to the shedding of christian blood: for so the forme of the bill pretended to fight against the emperour.

3 Thirdly, because it was against the liberty of the church: for so it is in the bill, that they that would not should be excommunicat.

4 Fourthly, because that when of late they gaue the tenth part of their goods, it was with this protestation, that they should contribute to the pope no more hereafter.

5 Item, because they had contributed before, if they should now contribute againe, it were to be feared lest an action twice done should grow into a custome, as is in the law, Lege nemo, &c.

6 Item, for so much as they shall haue causes continually to seeke to Rome through the emperours land: it were to be feared lest the said emperour by the way would worke their annoiance.

7 Item, because the king hath many enemies abroad, and for his wars hath need of much money at home, it is not conuenient that the goods of the realme should be alienated out of the realme.

8 Item, because that could not be done without preiudice to the patrons of their churches, not knowing whether their patrons did or would agree vnto the same.

9 Lastly, because they heare say that the generall state of the church is in danger, for the which they vnderstand there shal be shortly a generall councell, wherein such matters shall be determined: and therefore if they should contribute now, it should be to the hinderance and damage of the church.

The legat and his fellow hearing these allegations, seeing their owne confusion, were the lesse importunat.

Not long after this, followed a generall councell at Lions, called by pope Innocentius the fourth, in the which councell the English nation did exhibit certaine articles of their grieuances not vnworthie to be knowne. Grauatur regnum Angliæ, eo quòd D. papa non est contentus subsidio illo, quod vocatur denarius beati Petri, &c. In English thus.

Articles exhibited in the councell of Lugdune for the grieuances sustained by the pope. The first grieuance. The second.

1 The kingdome of England is grieued that the pope, being not contented with his Peter pence, requireth and extorteth from the clergie great exactions (and more is like) without the consent both of the king and against the customes of the realme.

2 Item, the church and kingdome of England is grieued, that the patrons of the same cannot present as they were wont into their churches for the popes letters: but the churches are giuen to Romans, which know neither the realme nor the tongue thereof, both to the great perill of soules and robbing away away the money out of the realme.

The third. 3 Item, it is grieued, for that the pope promising by the tenor of his letters, that in requiring of pensions and prouisions in the realme of England, he would require but only twelue benefices, now contrarie to the tenor thereof many more benefices and prouisions are bestowed away by him.

The fourth. 4 Item, the realme is grieued and complaineth, that in the benefices in England, one Italian succeedeth another, the Englishmen being not only excluded, but also compelled (for the determining of their matters) to seeke to Rome, contrarie both to the customes of the realme, and also to the priuiledges granted by the popes predecessors to the king and kingdome of England.

The fift. He meaneth percase Otho or master Martinus. 5 The fift grieuance is for the oft recourse of that infamous legat, by whom both faith and fidelitie, the ancient customes of the realme, the authoritie of old grants, statutes, lawes and priuiledges, are imbecilled and abrogat, whereby an infinit number in England be grieuously afflicted & oppressed.

The first. 6 The said realme is also grieued in generall tallages, collections, and assises, made without the kings consent, the appellation and contradiction of the kings procors to the contrarie notwithstanding.

The seuenth. 7 Seuenthly, the foresaid realme complaineth and is grieued, that in the benefices giuen to Italians, neither the old ordinances, nor reliefe of the poore, nor hospitalitie, nor any preaching of Gods word, nor care of mens soules, nor seruice in the church, nor yet the wals of the churches be kept vp and maintained, as the manner and custome of the same realme requireth. Ouer and aboue these foresaid grieuances, there came moreouer from the pope other frely letters, charging and commanding the prelats of England to find of their proper costs and charges for one whole yeare, some ten armed souldiers, some fiue, some fiftéene, to be readie at the popes commandement there where he should appoint.

The Babylonicall captiuitie and slauerie of England vnder the pope.

After these and other grieuances and enormities of Rome, the states of England consulting together, direct their letters to the pope for reformation thereof. First the abbats and priors, then the bishops and suffragans, after the nobles and barons, last of all the king himselfe. But as the prouerbe is, Venter non habet aures, so the popes purse had no eares to heare. And as our common saying goeth; As good neuer a whit as neuer the better: so went it with the pope, who not long after the same sent for new tallages and eractions to be collected. Which thing when it came to the kings eare, he being moued and disturbed vehemently withall, writeth in this wise to the bishops, seuerally to euery one in his diocesse.

The letter of king Henrie the third to the bishops.

Henricus tertius Dei gratia, &c. Venerabili in Christo, N. episcopo salute. m Licèt aliàs vobis, &c. In English thus.

King Henrie the third commandeth no tax nor tallage to be sent to the pope.

Henrie the third by the grace of God, to the reuerend in Christ bishop of N. Whereas we haue heretofore written vnto you, once, twice, thrice, as wel by our priuie seales, as also by our letters patents, that you should not exact or collect for the popes behalfe, any tallage or other helpe of our subiects, either of the clergie, or of the laitie, for that no such tallage nor helpe either can or is vsed to be exacted in our realme without the great preiudice of our princely dignitie, which we neither will nor can suffer or sustaine: yet you contemning and vilipending our commandement, and contrarie to the prouision made in our last councell at London (granted and agreed vpon by our prelats, earles and barons) haue that notwithstanding proceeded in collecting the said your taxes and tallages. Wherupon we doe greatly maruell and are moued (especially seeing you are not ashamed to doe contrarie vnto your owne decrees) whereas you and other prelats in the said councell in this did all agree and grant, that no such exactions should be hereafter, vntill the returne of our and your ambassadors from the court of Rome, sent thither purposely of vs, and in the name of the whole realme for the same, for to prouide redresse against these oppressions. Wherefore wee straitly will and command you, that from henceforth you doe not proceed any more in collecting and exacting such tallages or helpes, as you will inioy our fauor & such possessions of yours as within this our kingdome you haue and hold. And if you haue alreadie procured or gathered anie such thing, yet that you suffer not the same to be transported out of our realme, but cause it to be kept in safe custodie till the returne of the said ambassadors, vnder the paine of our displeasure in doing of the contrarie: and also of prouoking vs to extend our hand vpon your possessions, further then you will think or beleeue. Moreouer, willing and charging you that you participat and make common this our inhibition, with your archdeacons and officials, which we heere haue set forth for the liberties of the clergie and of the people, as knoweth God, &c.

The popes saying against king Henrie.

At length the ambassadors which were at Rome came home about the latter end of December, bringing word that the pope hearing what was done in the councell of Winchester and of the king, was greatlie displeased with him and the realme, saying: Rex Anglorum qui iam recalcitrat & frederisat suum habet consilium, ego verò & meum habeo, quod & sequar, &c. Whereupon when the ambassadors began to speake in the kings behalfe, from that time they were halfe counted for schismatikes, and could no more be heard in the court of Rome.

King Henrie against restraineth the popes taxes.

The king hearing this, was maruellously incensed therewith, commanding by general proclamation through all his realme, that no man should hereafter consent to any tax or subsidie of money for the court of Rome. When this came to the popes eare, vpon a cruell rage he directed his letters to the prelats of England, charging that vnder paine of suspence or interdiction, they should prouide the same summe of money to be collected against the feast of Assumption, the charge being giuen to the bishop of Worcester to be executor of the said curse. The king that lately intended to stand to the liberties of the church, now for feare of the pope and partly for persuasions of the said bishop of Worcester and other prelats, durst not stand to it, but gaue ouer.

The pope taketh against the king.

The king compelled for feare to giue ouer to the pope.

Moreouer, the greedie gulfe of the Romish auarice waxed so vnmeasurable, that at length the pope shamed not vpon the censure of his curse, to aske the third part of the church goods, and the yearely fruit of all vacant benefices. The chiefe doers and legats in England, were Otho, Stephanus capellanus, Petrus Rubeus nuncius, Mag. Martin, and Mag. Marinus, Iohannes Anglicus episcopus Sabinensis. Of whom to speake further (for that I haue matter much more to write) for this present time I thinke best to surceasle, lest in opening all the detestable doings and pestilent workings of those men, I might perhaps not only molest good eares, but also infect the aire. Yet one thing concerning the said Otho I cannot well ouerpasse.

The pope asketh the third part of the church goods.

A storie of cardinall Otho at Oxford.

This Otho, as he left no place vnsought, where any vantage might be got: so amongst all others he came to Oxford, where lying in the house of Osney, hee was receiued with great honour, the scholars presenting him honourablie with such dishes and rewards as they had, thinking to gratifie the cardinall after the best maner. This being done before dinner, and the dinner ended, they came reuerently to see and welcome him, supposing that they also should with like courtesie againe of him be intertained. As they came to the gate, the porter (being an Italian) with a loud voice asketh what they would haue. They said they came to see the lord legat. But Cerberus the porter holding the doore halfe open, with proud and contumelious language thrust them out, and would not suffer them to enter. The scholars seeing that, by force thrust open the gate and came in: whom when the Romans which were within would haue repelled with their fists, and such staues as they had in their hands, they fell to alarum and by the eares together, with much howing and showing and many blowes on both sides. In the meane time while some of the scholars ran home for their weapons, there chanced a poore scholar (an Irishman) to stand at the gate waiting for his almes. Whom when the maister saw at the gate, he taking hot skalding water out of the pan where the meat was sodden, did cast it in his face. One of the scholars a Welchman, that came with his bow and shafts, seeing that, letteth driue an arrow, and shooteth this Nabuzardan (that maister of cookes) cleane thorow the bodie, and slayeth him out of hand. The cooke falling dead, there wag a mightie broile and a great clamour throughout all the house.

A skirmish betweene the scholars of Oxford and the cardinals men.

The cardinall runneth away.

The cardinall hearing the tumult and great noise about him, like a valiant Roman runneth as fast as he could into the steeple, and there locketh the doores fast vnto him, where hee remained till midnight. The scholars in the meane while not yet all pacified sought all corners about for the legat, exclaiming and crying out; Where is that vsurer, that simoniake, that piller and poller of our liuings, that proller and extortioner of our money, which peruerteth our king, and subuerteth his kingdome, inriching himselfe with our spoiles: &c. All this heard the cardinall, and held his peace. When the night approching had broken vp the field, the cardinall comming out of his fort, and taking his horse (in silence of the night) was priuily conueyed ouer the riuer toward the king, conueying himselfe away as fast as he could. After the king heard this, he sendeth to Oxford a garrison of armed men, to deliuer the Romans which were there hidden for feare of scholars. Then was maister Otho a lawyer, with thirtie other scholars apprehended, and caried to Walingford castle, and from thence had in carts to London, where at length (through much intreatie of the bishops) being brought barefot to the legats doore, had their pardon, and the Vniuersitie released of interdiction. And thus much concerning the popes legat in England.

Thirtie scholars taken and had to prison.

Thus partly you haue heard, and do vnderstand the miserable thraldome and captiuitie of this realme of England and the clergie of the same, who before refused to take part with king John their naturall prince, against the forren power of the pope: and now how miserably they are oppressed and scourged of the same pope, whose insatiable extortion and rapacitie did so exceed in pilling and polling of this realme long after this, that neither the king now could helpe them, neither could the pope with any reasonable measure be content. In so much (as writers record) in the daies of Sudburie archbishop of Canturburie, An. 1365. the pope by his procors gat from the clergie in lesse then one yeare, more then fortie thousand florens, of meere contribution: besides his other anuales and common reuenues out of benefices, prebendaries, first fruits, tributes, Peter pence, collations, reseruations, relaxations, and such merchandize, &c.

Threescore thousand florens contributed to the pope in one yeare of the clergie.

Digitized by Google

Mention was made a little before of Albingenses keeping about the citie of Tholouse. These Albingenses because they began to smell the pope and to controll the inordinat proceedings and discipline of the see of Rome, the pope therefore recounting them as a people hereticall, excited and stirred vp about this present time and yeare Anno 1220, Ludouike the yong French king through the instance of Philip his father, to lay siege against the said citie of Tholouse, to expugne and extinguish these Albingenses his enemies. Whereupon Ludouike (according to his fathers commandement) reared a puissant and a mightie armie to compasse about and beset the forenamed citie, and so did. Héere were the men of Tholouse in great danger. But see how the mightie protection of God fighteth for his people against the might of man: for after that Ludouike (as Matth. Paris testifieth) had long wearied himselfe and his men in waste, and could do no good with all their engins and artillerie against the citie, there fell moreouer vpon the French host by the hand of God, such famine and pestilence both of men and horses, besides the other daily slaughter of the souldiers, that Ludouike was inforced to retire, and with such as were left to returne againe home to France from whence he came. In the slaughters of which souldiers besides many others, was earle Simon de monte forti, generall of the armie, to whom the lands of the earle of Tholouse were giuen by the pope, who was slaine before the gate of the citie with a stone, and so was also the brother of the said Simon the same time in besieging a castle néere to Tholouse, slaine with a stone in like maner. And so was the siege of the Frenchmen against Tholouse broke vp. Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

Ludouike the French king.

Ludouike fighteth against Albingenses.

Ludouike besiegeth Tholouse.

The hand of God fighting for his people.

Ex Matth. Parisiensi, in vita Henrici 3.

The generall of the armie slaine.

The siege against Albingenses broke vp.

As the siege of these Frenchmen could do no good against the citie of Tholouse, so it happened the same time that the christians marching toward the holy land, had better lucke in laying their siege to a certaine tower or castle in Egypt neere to the citie Damieta, which séemed by nature for the situation and difficultie of the place inexpugnable: as which being situat in the midst of the great floud Nilus (hard by the citie called Damieta) could neither be come to by land, nor bée vndermined for the water, nor by famine subdued for the neerenesse of the citie; yet notwithstanding through the helpe of God and policie of man, in erecting scaffolds and castles vpon tops of masts, the christians at last conquered it, and after that the citie also Damieta, albeit not without great losse of christian people. In the expugnation of this citie or fort, among others that there died, was the Lantgraue of Thuring named Ludouike, the husband of Elizabeth, whom we vse to call S. Elizabeth. This Elizabeth (as my storie recordeth) was the daughter of the king of Hungarie, and married in Almaine, where shée lived with the forenamed Ludouike Lantgraue of Thuring, whom shée through her persuasions prouoked and incensed to take that voiage to fight for the holy land, where he in the same voiage was slaine. After whose death Elizabeth (remaining a widow) entred the profession of cloisterly religion, and made her selfe a nun; so growing and increasing from vertue to vertue, that after her death all Almaine did sound with the fame of her worthie doings. Matthew Paris addeth this more, that shée was the daughter of that queene, who being accused to bée naught with a certaine archbishop, was therefore condemned with this sentence pronounced against her; Reginam interficere nolite timere bonum est, etsi omnes consenserint non ego contradico: that is (although it be hard in English to be translated as it standeth in Latine) To kill the queene will yée not to feare that is good, and if all men consent thereunto not I my selfe do stand against it, &c. The which sentence being brought to pope Innocent, thus in pointing the sentence, which otherwise séemeth to haue a double vnderstanding, so saued the queene, thus interpreting and pointing the same: Reginam interficere nolite, timere bonum est: & si omnes consenserint, non ego, contradico. That is; To kill the queene will yée not, to feare that is good: And if all do consent thereto, yet not I, I my selfe do stand against it: and so escaped she the danger. This queene was the mother (as is said) of Elizabeth the nun, who for her holy nunnishnesse was canonized of the popes church for a saint in Almaine, about the yéere of our Lord 1220. Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

The gray friers first entred into England.

The order of gray friers first confirmed.

The order of S. Elizabeth.

Elizabeth daughter of the king of Hungarie.

S. Elizabeth prouoketh her husband to go and fight for the holy land.

The mother of S. Elizabeth accused of adulterie.

The sentence of a double meaning.

The queene saued by fauourable interpretation of a double sentence.

Elizabeth canonized a saint in Almaine.

The expugnation of a certaine strong castle of Damieta in Egypt by the christians.

Damieta taken by the christians.

And this by the way. Now to proceed further in the yeares and life of this king Henrie. The next yeare following, which was An. 1221, the king went to Oxford, where he had something to do with William earle de Albemarlis, who had taken the castle of Biham: but at last for his good seruice he had done in the realme before, was released of the king with all his men, by the intercession of Walter archbishop of Yorke, and of Pandulph the legat. About which present yéere entred first the frier Minorits, or Gray friers into England, and had their first house at Canturburie, whose first patron was Franciscus, which died Anno 1127, and his order was confirmed by pope Honorius the third, An. 1224.

Anno 1221

Ex tabula pensili in æde diui Pauli.

About the first comming of these Dominike and Gray friers Franciscan into the realme (as is in Nicol. Triuet testified) many Englishmen the same time entred into their orders. Among whom was Iohannes de sancto Egidio, a man famouslie expert in the science of physicke and astronomie, and Alexander de Hales, both Englishmen and great diuines. This Iohannes making his sermon Ad clerum, in the house of the Dominike friers, exhorted his auditorie with great persuasions vnto wilfull pouertie. And to confirme his words the more by his owne example, in the midst of his sermon he came downe from the pulpit and put on his friers habit: and so returning into the pulpit againe, made an end of his sermon. Likewise Alexander Hales entred the order of the Franciscans, of whom remaineth yet the booke intituled De summa theologiæ in old libraries.

Iohannes de S. Egidio.

Alexander de Hales.

Moreouer, not long after by William de longa spata, which was the bastard sonne of king Henrie the second, and earle of Salisburie, was first founded the house of the Carthusian monkes at Heitrope, An. 1222. After whose death his wife Ela was translated to the house of Henton in Barkshire, An. 1227, which Ela also founded the house of nuns at Lacocks, and there continued her selfe abbesse of the place. The bishop of London named William, the same time gaue ouer his bishoprike, after whom succéeded Eustace in that see. Flor. hist.

Charterhouse monkes founded by William Longspey.

Ela foundresse of the house of Lacocks.

In the towne of Oxford aboue mentioned, where the king kept his court, Simon Langton archbishop of Canturburie held a councell, where was condemned and burned a certaine deacon, as Nicol. Triuet saith, for apostasie. Also another rude countriman, who had crucified himselfe, and superstitiouslie bare about the wounds in his feet and hands, was condemned to be closed vp perpetually within wals. Ex Nicol. Triuet. About which yeare also Alexander king of Scots maried Ione sister to king Henrie.

Two condemned at a councell in Oxford.

Ex Nic. Triuet.

Not long after began the new building of the minster of Salisburie, whereat Pandulphus the popes legat laid the fine first stones; one for the pope (such was the fortune of that church to haue the popes stone in his foundation) the second for the yong king Henrie; the third, for the good earle of Salisburie; the fourth, for the countesse; the fift, for the bishop of Salisburie, &c. which was about the same yeare aboue mentioned, An. 1221. Ex chron. do. Sal.

In the same yeare about S. James tide fell a dissension betweene the citizens of London and men of Westminster, the occasion whereof was this. A certaine game betweene these two parties was appointed, to trie whether part in wrestling could ouercome the other. Thus in striuing for maisterie, each part contending against the other (as the manner is in such passime) it happened the Londoners to get the victorie, and the other side was put to foile, but especially the steward of the abbat of Westminster, who being not a little confounded therewith, began to forethinke in his mind how to be reuenged againe of the Londoners. Whereupon another day was set, which was at Lammas, that the Londoners should come againe to wrestle, and who so had the victorie should haue the bell wether, which was the price of the game appointed. As the parties were thus occupied in their play, the steward suddenlie bringeth vpon the Londoners vnawares a company of harnessed men prepared for the same before, and letteth drive at the Londoners, who at length being wounded and grieuously hurt, after much bloodshed were driuen backe againe into the citie. This cõtumelie thus being receiued, the citizens eagerly stricken with ire and impatience, ran to the common bell, and by ringing thereof assembled their commons together, to consult with themselues what was to be done in that case so contumelious. Wherein when diuers sentences were giuen diuerslie, Serle the same time maior of London (a wise and discréet man) gaue this counsell, that the abbat of Westminster should be talked withall, who if he would rectifie the iniurie done, and satisfie for the harme receiued, it should be to them sufficient. But contrarie, one Constantine a great man then in the citie of London, in much heat exciting the people, gaue this sentence, that all the houses of the abbat of Westminster, but especially the house of the steward should be cast downe to the ground. In fine, that which he so vnaduisedly counselled, was as madlie performed: for the furious people according to his counsell so did. This tumultuous outrage, as it could not be pruie, comming to the knowledge of Hubert de Burgo lord chiefe iustice of England aboue mentioned, he comming with a sufficient strength of armed souldiers to the citie of London, sent to the maior and aldermen of the citie to will them to come vnto him. Who so obeying his commandement, required of them the principall beginners of the riot. To whom Constantine there being present answered, that he would warrant that which was done, sorrowing moreouer that they had not done more then they did in the matter. The iustice vpon the same his confession commanded him with two others, without any further tumult to be taken, and so with the same two he was hanged, offering for his life 15000 markes, &c.

Dissension betweene the citizens of London and of Westminster.

Wholesome counsell of the maior of London refused of wilde heads.

Constantine executed at London for riot.

The said Hubert earle of Kent, and lord chiefe iustice, although he was a faithfull and trustie officer to his prince, and had the whole guiding of the realme in his owne hands, the king as yet being in his minoritie: yet afterward, what indignation he sustained for this his seueritie and other things, both of the nobles and of the commons, and how sharpely he was tossed and trounsed of his prince, wonder it is to sée, as in his due place and time (by the Lords leaue) hereafter shal appeare. Hæc ex Matth. Parisiensi.

Hubert lord chiefe iustice of England.

Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

And for so much as mention hath been made of the wrang-

Digitized by Google

Discord and contention among churchmen.

ling betweene the commoners of London and of Westminster, both time and occasion bringeth me in remembrance something to speake likewise of the ecclesiasticall conflicts among churchmen, nothing inferiour in my mind, nor lesse worthie to be noted then the other. For so I reade in Matth. Paris, and in Ex Matth. Paris & ex Florilego. Flores hist. that at what time this wrestling was among the citizens for the cheepe, the like contention kindled and flamed betweene Eustace bishop of London and the chapter of Pauls on the one side, and the abbat of Westminster with his couent on the other side, about spirituall iurisdiction and subiection: to wit, whether the monasterie of Westminster were exempted from the subiection and iurisdiction of the bishop of London or not. Which controuersie at last comming into compromise, was committed to the arbitrement of Stephan archbishop of Canturburie, Philip bishop of Winchester, Thomas of Merton, and Richard prior of Dunstable; and at length was thus agreed, that the monasterie of Westminster should be vtterly exempted from the iurisdiction of the bishop of London, and that Staines with the appurtenances thereto belonging, should appertaine to the monasterie of Westminster. Also, that the manor of Sunburie should be due and proper to the church of S. Paul, and also the church of S. Margarit with all the lands belonging to the same to be exempted from all other iurisdiction, but only to the bishop of Rome: and so was this matter decided, An. 1222. Ibidem Flor. historiarum.

Whether the monasterie of Westminster be exempted from the subiection of the bishop of London or not.

{Anno 1222}

The same yeare (as writeth Matt. Paris) horrible tempests with such thundring and lightning, and whirlewinds, went through all the land, that much harme was done, churches, steeples, towers, houses, and diuers trees with the violence of winds were blowen vp by the roots. In Warwikshire a certaine wife with eight others in her house were slaine. In Grantham the church was set on fire by lightning most terrible, with such a stinke left there behind, that no man could after a long time abide it. The author addeth, that manifest markes of the tempest did remaine long after in that monasterie to be seene. Some also write that firie dragons and spirits were seene then flying in the aire.

Horrible tempest in England.

A woman with eight of her household slaine with thunder.

Grantham church burned with lightning.

{Anno 1223}

Anno 1223, Philip the French king died, after whom his sonne Ludouike succeeded in the crowne. To whom king Henrie sending his message, and desiring him to remember his promise and couenant made in rendering againe the lands lost in Normandie, could obtaine nothing at his hands. Whereupon Richard earle of Cornwall, also William the kings vncle earle of Salisbury, with diuers other nobles made ouer into France, where they recouered Poictiers, and kept Gascoine vnder the kings obedience. Ex Matth. Paris. Triuet. Flor. hist.

Lewis king of France.

The French king false of his promise.

{Anno 1224}

In the same yeere, or as Fabian giueth, the next following, which was 1224, by the vertue of a certaine parlement, was granted of the lords and baronie of the land, the king and his heires to haue the ward and mariage of their heires, which then was called, and after so proued, to be Initium malorum, the beginning of harmes.

Wardship first granted to the king.

Ex Gisburnensi & alijs.

In the same yeare by the count of Gisburne and other writers, the said king holding another parlement at Drenford, by the aduice of his counsell and of his clergie, did grant and confirme vnder his great seale, two charts of the old liberties and customes of this realme, for euer to be kept and obserued, the one called Magna Charta, the other Charta de foresta. The contents whereof fully in the forenamed author be expressed. For the which cause was granted againe by the whole parlement a quindecim, or a fifteene of all his subiects, as well of laymen as also of the clergie.

Magna Charta. Charta de foresta.

¶ Where is to be noted, that these liberties were afterward broken, and confirmed againe by the said king, An. 1236.

An. 1226, died pope Honorius a great aduersarie against Frederike the emperour, after whom succeeded Gregorie the ninth, more grieuous then his predecessor. In which yeare also died Ludouike the periured French king at the siege of Auinion, whom the pope now the second or third time had set vp to fight against Reimund the good earle of Tholouse, and the heretikes Albingenses of that countrie: for so the pope calleth all them, which hold not in all points with his glorious pride and vsurped power and vngodly procedings. The origin whereof was this, as in Matth. Paris appeareth. In the daies of Philip the French king, this Reimundus earle of Tholouse was disdamned of the pope for holding with the Albingenses, and therefore by the instigation of the pope the lands of the earle were taken from him and giuen to Simon Montfort, and instruments made vpō the same. But when the said earle Reimundus would not be remoued from the right of his possessions by vnrighteous dealing, then the pope setteth Philip the French king to make open war against him. Whereupon Lewis the French king was sent with a great power (as is aboue declared) to besiege the citie of Tholouse, but being repulsed from thence by the maruellous hand of God fighting for his people, could not preuaile, and so returned home after he had lost the most part of his armie by pestilence and other calamitie, as hath been before described. And thus continued the good earle still in quiet possession till this present time, Anno 1226. In the which yeare the pope not forgetting his old malice against the earle, and no lesse inflamed with insatiable auarice, directeth downe his legat maister Romanus to the parts of France for two seuerall purposes: one, to extirpe the earle, the other to inlarge his reuenues. Thus the legat being entred into France, beginneth to summon a councell, willing the French king with the archbishops, bishops, and clergie of France to appeare before him at Bitures; to whom eftsones repaired six archbishops with the bishops and suffragans of nine prouinces, to the number of an hundred, besides the abbats, priors, and proctors of all the couents of France, to heare the popes will and commandement. But because there was a discord feared to rise (saith Matthæus) about prehemmence of sitting, for that the archbishop of Lions challenged the superior place aboue the archbishop of Sene; also the archbishop of Rone aboue the archbishop of Bitures, and aboue the archbishop of Narbon, &c. therefore the session was holden there, not in maner and forme of a councell, but of a certaine parlee or consultation. Thus the meeke and holy councell being set, and the popes maiesties letters read and declared, appeareth before them Reimund earle of Tholouse of the one part, and Simon Montfort on the other part: which Simon required to be restored vnto him the lands and possessions of the said Reimund, which the pope and Philip the French king had giuen to him and to his father before, hauing good euidences to shew for the same, confirmed by the donation of the pope and of the king. Adding moreouer, that the earle Reimund was depriued and disherited in the generall councell at Rome for heresie, which is called the heresie of Albingenses. At least if he might not haue the whole yeelded vnto him, yet the most part of his lordships he required to be granted him.

Marke reader the right nature of Pharisies striuing for the chiefe place.

The pope giueth the right possession away from the owners.

Reimundus wrongfully disherited by the pope.

To this the earle Reimund answered againe, offering himselfe readie to all dutie and office both toward the French king, and to the church of Rome, whatsoeuer dutie to him did appertaine. And moreouer, touching the heresie wherewith he was there charged: he did not only there offer himselfe in that councell before the legat, but most humblie did craue of him, that he would take the paines to come into euerie citie within his precinct to inquire of euerie person there the articles of his beliefe; and if he found any person or persons holding that which was not catholike, he would see the same to be corrected and amended according to the censure of holy church to the vttermost. Or if he should find any citie rebelling against him, he to the vttermost of his might with the inhabitants thereof, would compell them to do satisfaction therefore. And as touching himselfe, if he had committed or erred in any thing (which he remembreth not to haue done) he offered there full satisfaction to God and church, as becommed any faithfull christian man to do, requiring moreouer there before the legat to be examined of his faith, &c. But all this (saith Matthæus) the legat despised: neither could the catholike earle (saith he) there find any grace, vnlesse he would depart from his heritage, both from himselfe and from his heires for euer. In fine, when it was required by the contrarie part, that he should stand to the arbitrement of twelue peeres of France: to that Reimundus answered, that if the French king would receiue his homage, which hee was readie at all times to exhibit, he was contented therewith. For else they would not (said he) take him as one of their societie and fellow subiects.

Reimundus the good earle of Tholouse answereth for himselfe.

Albigenses falsely suspected for heresie.

After much altercation on both sides about the matter, the legat willeth euery archbishop to call aside his suffragans, to deliberat with them vpon the cause, and to giue vp in writing what was concluded. Which being done accordingly, the legat denounceth excommunication to all such as did reueale ante peece of that which was there concluded, before the pope and the king had intelligence thereof.

The proud villanie of the popes legats.

These things thus in hudder mutter among themselues concluded, the legat gaue leaue to all proctors of couents and chapters to returne home, only retaining with him the archbishops, bishops and abbats, and certaine simple prelats, such as he might be more bold withall, to open and of them to obtaine the other part of his commission, which was indeed to obtaine of euery cathedrall church two prebendships: one for the bishop, the other for the chapter. And in monasteries also after the like sort, where the abbat and couent had diuers and seuerall portions, to require two churches, one for the abbat, the other for the couent, keeping this proportion; that how much should suffice for the liuing of one monke, so much the whole couent should find for their part, and as much the abbat likewise for his. And for so much as he would not seeme to demand this without some colour of cause, his reason was this; that because the court of Rome had long been blotted with the note of auarice, which is mother of all euill, for that no man could come to Rome for any businesse, but he must pay for the expedition of the same: therefore for the removing away of the occasion of that slander, the publike helpe of the church therefore must necessarily be required, &c.

The pope raiseth war.

{Anno 1226}

The popes wicked malice against the christian earle of Tholouse.

The proctors and parties thus sent home by the legats, marueiling with themselues why the bishops and abbats should be staied and they sent home, and suspecting no lesse but as the matter was in deed, conferred their counsels together, and deuised with themselues to send certaine vnto him in the behalfe of all the cathedrall and conuentuall churches in France, and sent to the said legat the message to signifie to him, that they were credibly informed he came with speciall letters from the court of Rome for the obtaining of certaine prebendaries in euery ca-

Marke reader the practise here of prelats, for the learning.

The clergie of France answering to the legat.

thedrall and conuentuall church. Which being so, they much maruelled that he would not in the publike councell make manifest to them those letters which specially concerned them as much as the others. Wherefore their requeſt was to him in the Lord, that no such offensiue matter might rise by him in the French church; knowing this, that the thing he enterpriseth could not be brought to effect without great offence taken, and inestimable damage to the church of France. For grant (said they) that certaine will assent vnto you, yet their assent standeth in no effect concerning such matters as touch the whole: especially, seeing both the states of the realme with all the inferiour subiects, yea and the king himselfe they are sure will withstand the same, to the venture not only of their honor, but of their life also, considering the case to be such, as vpon the offence whereof standeth the subuersion both of the realme publike, and of the whole church in generall. Declaring moreouer the cause of this feare to rise hereof, for that in other realmes such communication hath been with bishops and prelats for the procuring of such prebendships, whereas neither the prince nor the subiects were made any thing priuie thereto.

Inferiors euer more bold to speake in difficult causes of truth, then the rich.

The obiections of the clergie of France against the popes exaction.

In conclusion, when the matter came to debating with the legat, the obiections of the inferior parties against the cruell exaction were these in briefe effect, as is in Parisiensis noted.

First, they alleaged their great damages and expenses which they were like to sustaine thereby, by reason of the continuall procurators of the pope, which in euery diocesse must liue not of their owne, but must be sustained vpon the charges of the cathedrall churches, and other churches also, and many times they being but procurators, will be found as legats.

Item, by that means they said great perturbations might insue to the couents and chapters of cathedrall churches in their elections: for so much as the popes agents and factors being in euerie cathedrall church and chapter house, percase the pope would command him in his person to be present at their elections, and so might trouble the same, in delaying and deferring till it might fall to the court of Rome to giue: and so should be placed more of the popes clientele in the churches of France, then of the proper inhabitants of the land.

Item, by this meanes they affirmed, that all they in the court of Rome should be richer, and should receiue more for their proportion then the king of the realme: by reason of which abundance of riches it was like to come to passe, that as the wrong of rich men is pride; so by the meanes of this their riches, the court of Rome would delay and driue off great suites, and scarce would take any paines with small causes. The experiment whereof is euident, for that now also they vse to delay their matters when they come with their gifts, and being in assurance to receiue. And thus should iustice stand aside, and poore suters die at the gates of the court of Rome, thus flowing and triumphing in full abundance of all treasure and riches.

Item, for so much as it is méete and conuenient to haue friends in the court of Rome, for the better spéeding of their causes, therefore they thought to kéep them néedie, whereby their gifts may be the swéeter, and their causes soner dispatched.

Item, when as it is impossible the fountaine of grédie desire to be stopped, it was to be feared that either they would do that by others which they were wont to do by themselues, or else they should be inforced to giue greater rewards then before; for small gifts in the sight of great rich men are not loked vpon.

Item, where he alleaged the remouing away of the slander which goeth on the court of Rome: by this meanes rather the contrarie were to be feared, wherein they alleaged the sentence of the verse, that great riches stop not the taking of much, but a mind contented with a little:

Quòd virtus reddit, non copia sufficientem;
Et non paupertas sed mentis hiatus egentem.

Further, they alleaged that great riches would make the Romans mad, and so might kindle among them sides and parts taking, so that by great possessions sedition might follow to the ruine and destruction of the citie, whereof some experiment they had alreadie.

Item, they added, that although they would condescend and oblige themselues to that contribution, yet their successours would not so be bound, nor yet ratifie the bond of theirs.

Lastly, thus they conclude the matter, desiring him that the zeale of the vniuersall church, and of the church of Rome would moue him: for if this oppression of the church should be vniuersall, it were to be doubted lest an vniuersall departing might follow from the church of Rome: which God forbid (say they) should happen.

God grant, say we.

The legat hearing these words, being therewith something moued (as séemed) excused himselfe, that he being in the court neuer agréed in this exaction; and that the letters hereof came not to him before he was in France, whereat he said he was greatly sorie, adding this withall, that the words of his precept included this secret meaning in them thus to be vndersood and taken: so far forth as the empire and other realmes would agrée vnto the same. And as for him, he would stir no more in the matter, before it were proued what other countries would say and do therein.

The cardinall repulsed and defeated of his purpose in France.

And thus much concerning the second part of the blind commission of this legat touching his exaction of prebendships in euerie cathedrall and conuentuall church; wherein as yée heare, he was repulsed: Ex Matth. Paris. pag. 62.

Ex Matth. Paris. pag. 62.

Now to returne to the first part of his commission againe, which was concerning Reimundus the godly earle of Tholouse, thus the storie procedeth; that while the legat was in hand with this matter of the popes money, in the meane season certaine preaching friers were directed by the said Romanus the popes legat into al France, to incite and stir vp the Frenchmen to take the crosse vpon them, and to war against the earle of Tholouse and the people thereof, whom they accounted then for heretikes. At the preaching whereof a great number of prelats and lay-men signed themselues with the crosse, to fight against the Tholossians, being thereto induced, as the storie saith, more for feare of the French king or fauor of the legat, then for any true zeale of iustice. For so it followeth in the words of Paris: Videbatur enim multis abusio, vt hominem fidelem christianum infestarent, præcipuè cùm constaret cunctis eum in concilio nuper Biturensi, multis precibus persuasisse legato, vt veniret ad singulas terræ suæ ciuitates, inquirens à singulis articulos fidei: & si quempiam contra fidem inueniret, &c. For to many (saith he) it seemed an abuse, to moue warre against a faithfull christian man, especially seeing in the councell of Bitures (before all men) he intreated the legat with great instance that he would come into euerie citie within his dominions, and there to inquire of euerie person the articles of his faith: where if hee found any man to hold any thing contrarie to the catholike faith, he promised a full satisfaction to be had therof, according to the censure of the church, to the vttermost, &c.

The pope raiseth war against the earle and the people of Tholouse.

Testimonie of the author for the clearing of Reimundus and of the Albingenses.

Yet all this notwithstanding, the proud legat contemning this so honest and reasonable purgation of the earle Reimundus, ceased not by all manner meanes to prosecute the popes furie against him and his subiects, stirring vp the king and the Frenchmen vnder paine of excommunication, to war against them. Ludouike the French king thus being inforced by the legat, answered againe, that he for his owne safetie would not atchieue that expedition or aduenture against the earle, vnlesse it were first obtained of the pope to write to the king of England: commanding him that during the time of that expedition, he should inuade and molest no peece of his lands and possessions which he the same present time did hold, whether by right or by wrong, or howsoeuer they were holden, while the time of the said war against the heretikes (as they were then termed) did indure, but rather should aid and assist him with counsell and money in that enterprise. All which being done and accomplished, the French king and the legat (crossing themselues to the field) appointed a day peremptorie for the French armie to meet together at Lions, vnder paine of the popes excommunication, and with horse and harneſſe to set vpon the Tholossians, against the Ascension day next insuing.

The vnreasonable tyrannie of the pope against the Tholossians.

Excommunication abused.

When the Ascension day was come, which was the day peremptorie appointed, the French king hauing prepared at Lions all things necessarie for his armie, marcheth forward with a great and mightie host; after whom also commeth the legat, with his bishops and prelats. The number of fighting men in his armie besides the victuallers and wagoners were 50000 men. The legat by the way openly excommunicated the earle of Tholouse, & all that tooke his part, and furthermore interdicted his whole land. Thus the king came marching forward, till he came into the prouince of Tholouse, and the first citie which they came vnto there of the earles was Auinion: which citie they thought first to haue besieged, and so in order after, as they went, to haue destroyed and wasted all the whole prouince belonging to the earle. And first the king demanded of them to haue his passage through their citie, saining himselfe in peaceable wise (for the expedition of his iourney) but to passe through the same. The citizens consulting with themselues what was to be done, at length gaue answere that they mistrusted their comming, and supposed that in deceit they required the entrance of their citie, and for no necessitie of their iourney.

Lewis the French king and Romanus the popes legat marching against the Albingenses.

Reimundus earle of Tholouse excommunicated.

The citie of Auinion besieged.

The king hereat being much offended, sware an oth that he would not depart thence till he had taken the citie, and immediatly in those places where he thought most meet, he began to giue sharpe assaults, with all manner of saultable engins: the citizens againe within, manfully defended themselues, casting stone for stone, and shooting shot for shot, and slew and wounded many of the Frenchmen. Thus, when they had long besieged the citie, and could not win the same: at length victuals in the French campe began to faile, and many of them died for hunger. For the earle of Tholouse as a wise man of war, hearing before of their comming, tooke into the towne all the prouision that was abroad, and left nothing without to serue for their defence and succour: he plowed vp the fields, that there should no stouer be found to serue their horses, he put out of the towne all the old people and yong children, lest they should want victuals that kept the towne, and before their comming sent them far away; so that within the towne they had plentie, and without they died for famine. And besides in séeking farre for their forage, manie fell into the hands of them that kept the citie, who secretly lay in wait for them abroad and slew manie of them: besides a great number of cattell and horses died for want Policie of war.

Famine and pestilence in the French campe.

want of forrage: and poore souldiers that had no great store of monie, died for want of victuals. By which mortalitie and stink both of men and cattell, grew great infection and pestilence amongst them, in so much that the king himselfe and also the legat were greatly dismaied, thinking it to bee no little shame as well to the realme of France, as also to Rome, that they should so depart and breake vp their siege. Thus againe thought the souldiers, that much better it were for them to end their liues by battell then so to die like dogs and starue. Wherefore with one consent they purposed to giue a new assault at the bridge that goeth ouer the flood Rhodanus into the towne, to which place they came in such number, that either by the debilitie of the bridge, or subtiltie of the souldiers that kept the towne, three thousand of them with bridge and all fell armed into the violent streame, and were drowned. What was there then but ioy and gladnesse of the citizens part, and much lamentation and heauinesse on the other part? Then shortly after, the citizens of Auinion (when they saw a conuenient time, whilest their enemies were in eating meat) came suddenly vpon them out of the towne, and slue of them two thousand, and tooke the towne againe with safetie. But the legat with his companie of prelats (like good men of warre) practised none other martiall feats, but all to be cursed the earle of Tholouse, his cities and his people. Ludouicus the king, to auoid the pestilence that was in the campe, went into an abbie not farre off, where shortlie after he died; of whose death are sundrie opinions, some saying that he was poisoned, some that hee died of a bloudie flix.

The French souldiers destroyed at the siege of Auinion.

Lewis the French king dieth at the siege of Auinion.

Whose death notwithstanding the legat thought to keepe secret and conceale, till that the towne might bee rendred and giuen vp: for he thought himselfe shamed for euer, if hee should depart before the towne were wonne. Wherefore after hee had incouraged the souldiers afresh, and yet after many sharpe assaults could not preuaile, hee bethought him how by falshood he might betray them, and sent vnto them certaine heralds, to will them that they should amongst themselues consult vpon articles of peace, and bring the same to their campe, whose safe conduct they faithfully promised and warranted both of comming and going. And when they had giuen their pledges for the same, the messengers from the citizens talked with the legat: who promised them, if they would deliuer vp their citie, they should haue their liues, goods and possessions in as ample maner as now they inioyed the same. But the citizens & souldiers refused to be vnder the seruitude of the French king, neither would so deliuer vp their citie to those, of whose insolent pride they had so good experiment. After much talke on both sides, and none like to take effect, the legat requested them, & friendly desired, that he and his prelats which were about him, might come into their citie to examin what faith and beleefe they were of, and that he neither sought nor ment any other thing thereby, but their owne safeties as well of bodie as soule, which thing he faithfully sware vnto: For (saith he) the haute of your great infidelitie hath come to the lord popes eare, and therefore desired he to make true certificat thereof. Whereupon the citizens not mistrusting his faithfull oth and promise made vnto them, granted entrance to him and the residue of the clergie bringing with them no weapon into the town. The souldiers of the campe, as it was agreed before, made them ready, so that at the entrance of the prelats in at the gate, nothing regarding their oth and fidelitie, the other suddenlie were readie, and with violence rushed in, slue the porter & warders, and at length wonne the citie and destroyed the same, and slue many of them that were within. Thus by sallhood and policie, when they had gotten this noble citie, they carried the kings corps vnto Paris where they buried the same. Of the whole number of the French souldiers which in this siege were destroyed by famine, pestilence, and drowning, be recounted more then two and twentie thousand: Whereby, saith the storie of Mat. Parisiensis, it may euidentlie appeare the warre was vniustlie taken in hand, &c: Ex Mat. Parisiensi.

The popes legat wickedlie periured.

Periurie of the papists.

The citie of Auinion taken by treason and periurie of the popes legat.

The number of the French souldiers in this siege destroyed.

After these things finished, and after the funerall of the king celebrated at Paris, it followeth more in the said historie of Parisiensis, that the said legat Romanus was vehementlie suspected, and grieuously infamed to abuse himselfe with Blanca the kings mother: Sed impium est (saith he) hoc credere, quia æmuli eius hoc disseminauerunt; benignus autem animus dubia in melius interpretatur: that is, But it is vngodly to suspect any such thing of him, because his enemies so rumored the same abroad; but a gentle mind expoundeth things doubtfull in the better part.

The incontinent life of these Romish prelats to bee noted.

To passe further to the yeere next following, which was 1227. of the Lord, first is to be noted, that in this yeere king Henrie beginning to shoote vp vnto the twentith yeere of his age, came from Reading to London, where he began to charge the citizens of London for old reckonings, namely for giuing & lending one thousand marks to Lewis the French king, at his departing out of the realme, to the great preiudice of him and of his kingdome. For the recompence whereof they were constrained to yeeld to the king the full sum of the like monie. That done he remoued to Orford, where he assembled a great councell, there denouncing and protesting before them all, that he was come to sufficient age, no more to be vnder tutors and gouernors; but to be his owne man: requiring to be freed from the custodie of others. Which thing being protested, and contraried forthwith; hee by the counsell of Hubert the chiefe iustice (whom hee made then the earle of Kent) remoued from his companie the bishop of Winchester, & others, vnder whom he was moderated. And immediatlie in the same councell, by the sinister persuasion of some, doth annihilat and make void the charters and liberties before by him granted, pretending this colour: for that they had been granted and sealed in the time of his minoritie, at what time hee had the rule neither of himselfe, nor of his seale. Whereupon much muttering and murmuring was among the multitude, who did all impute the cause to Hubert the iustice. Moreouer, it was the same time proclamed, that whosoeuer had any charter, or gift sealed vnder the time of the kings minoritie, they should come and renew the same againe vnder the new seale of the king, knowing otherwise that the thing should stand in no effect. And finallie, for renewing of their seales, were tared not according to their abilitie, but according as it pleased the iustice and other to leuie them.

The king claimeth to befreed from gouernors and to be his owne man.

Hubert the iustice made earle of Kent.

The king vndooeth and dissolueth the liberties which before he granted.

Practises of princes to fetch in monie.

Moreouer, beside this general subsidie of the fifteenth granted to the king through the whole realme, and besides also the contribution of the Londoners, diuers other parcels and paiments he gathered through seuerall places: as of the burgesses of Northhampton he required a thousand and two hundred marks, for his helping of them, and so of others likewise. All this preparation of monie was made toward the furnishing of his voiage to recouer Normandie. And yet because hee would gratifie the citie of London againe with some pleasure; hee granted the citizens thereof should passe toll-free (saith Fabian) throughout all England. And if of any citie, borough, or towne they were constrained at any time to pay their toll, then the shiriffes of London to attach euery man comming to London of the said citie, borough, or towne, and him with his goods to withhold, till the Londoners were againe restored of all such monie paid for the said toll, with all costs and damages sustained for the same. Ex Fabiano.

The citizens of London freed from toll through all England.

Anno 1228

I declared before, how after the death of Honorius succeeded pope Gregorie the tenth, betweene the which Gregorie and the people of Rome, this yeere, fell a great sedition. Insomuch that about the feast of Easter, they thrust the pope out of the citie, pursuing him vnto his castle at Viterbium. Where also they inuaded him so valiantlie, that they chased him to Perusium. Then hauing no other remedie wherwith to reuenge his persecutors, fiercely did excommunicat them. Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 69.

Ex Fabi. part. 7.

Sedition betweene the Romans and the pope.

Heere, by the way, is to be obserued and considered, christian reader, not only by this sedition, but by so many other schismes, diuisions, tumults, fightings, brawles & contentions in the church of Rome from the first beginning of the popes vsurped power, and that not only within the citie of Rome, but vniuersallie almost in all popish monasteries, colledges, churches, and couents vnder the pope subiected, continuallie raigning amongst them, what is to bee thought of their religion and holinesse, hauing so little peace, so great disquietnesse, dissensions, and wrangling amongst them, as in stories both manifest it is to behold and wonderous to consider.

The popes church may be iudged by their dissensions and schismes.

No peace in the popes church.

And forsomuch as I haue entred heere into the mention of this schismaticall commotion betweene the pope and his citizens: it followeth moreouer in the historie of Parisiensis, who maketh relation of a like brawling matter, which befell the same yeere, and time, An. 1228. betweene the prior and couent of Durham, and this king Henrie the third vpon this occasion: After the death of Richard bishop of Durham, the prior and chapter of the said church came to the king, to obtaine licence for the electing of their bishop. The king offered to them one Lucas a chaplen of his, requiring them instantly to elect him for their bishop. To this the monks answered, that they would receiue no man, but by their order of canonicall election. Meaning belike by their canonicall election, that is, when as they elect either some monke out of their owne companie, or else some monkish priest after their owne liking. Contrarie, the king againe sendeth word vnto them, and bound it with an oth, that they should tarrie seuen yeeres without a bishop, vnlesse they would admit the foresaid Lucas to that place of that dignitie. All which notwithstanding, the monks proceeding in their election, refused the said Lucas, and preferred another clerke of theirs, named William archdeacon of Worcester, and him they presented to the king: but the king bringing in exceptions and causes against the partie, would not admit him. Then the monks in all hastie speed send vp to Rome certaine of their couent, to haue their election ratified by the authoritie apostolicall. On the other side the king likewise hearing, sendeth also to Rome against the monks, the bishop of Chester, and the prior of Lentone on his behalfe, to withstand the purpose of the monks. And so the matter being trauised with great altercatiõ on both sides, did hang in suspence (saith mine author) till at length thus it was concluded betweene both, that neither master William, nor yet Lucas should be taken, but that Richard bishop of Sarum should be translated to Durham, and be bishop there, An. 1228. Ex Matth. Parisiensi.

Dissention betweene the prior and couent of Durham and the king.

Canonicall election.

The monks of Durham send to Rome against their king.

The like stir also happened both the same yeere, and for the like

Digitized by Google

Another contention between the monks of Couentrie and the canons of Lichfield.

like matter, betweene the monks of Couentrie and the canons of Lichfield, about chosing of their bishop, which of them should haue the superior voice in the election of their prelat. After much adoe, the cause at length being hoisted vp to Rome, had this determination; that the monks of Couentrie & the church of Lichfield should chuse their bishop by course, eeh part keeping his turne the one after the other: prouided notwithstanding, that the prior of Couentrie should alwaies haue the first voice in euery election, whereas the old custome was, saith mine author, that the couent with the prior of Couentrie was wont to haue the whole election of the bishop without the canons; this was An. 1228. Ex Parisiensi, pag. 68.

Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 68.

Stephan Langton archbishop died.

In the which yeere died Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie, by whom (as is recorded by Nic. Triuet) the chapters of the Bible, in that order & number as we now vse them, were first distinсted. The said Langton also made postils vpon the whole Bible. The same moreouer builded the new hall in the palace of Canturburie.

The chapters of the Bible first distincted by Stephan Langton.

Another contentious dissension betweene the monks of Canturburie and king Henrie the third.

After the death of this Langton insued another variance about the election of the archbishop of Canturburie, betweene the monks of Canturburie and the king. The perturbation whereof as it was no lesse seditious, so the determination of the same was much more colsklie. After the death of Stephan Langton, the monks of Canturburie obtaining licence of the king to proceed in the election of a new archbishop, did choose one of their owne societie named master Walter Hemelham.

Obiections laid against the new archbishop.

Whom when the monks had presented vnto the king, hee after long deliberation, began to obiect against that election, saying: first, that the monks had elected such one as neither was profitable to him nor his kingdome. Secondly, he obiected against the partie elect, that his father was conuict of felonie, and hanged for the same. Thirdlie, that hee stood in causes against his father king John in the time of the interdict. Moreouer, the bishops his suffragans charged the partie elect, that he had lien with a certaine nun, and had children by her: adding further, that the election of the archbishop was without their presence, which ought not to be, &c. But the archbishop againe stoutlie standing vnto his election, appealed vp to Rome, and eftsoones taking with him certaine monks, presented himselfe to the popes own proper person, there to sue his appeale, instantlie intreating, that his election might stand confirmed by his authoritie pontificall. But the pope vnderstanding that the said election was resisted by the king and the bishops, deferred the matter vntill he did heare further of the certaintie thereof. The king and the bishops hauing intelligence that the archbishop with his monks were gone to Rome, thought good to articulat the foresaid obiections aboue alleaged, in writing; and sealing the same with the seales both of the king and of the bishops to exhibit them to the bishop of Rome. The messengers of these letters, were the bishops of Rochester, of Chester, and the archdeacon of Bedford master John, &c. Who comming to Rome, and exhibiting their message with their letters vnto the pope (consideration being had vpon the same) were commanded to wait attendance against the next day after Ashwednesday: then to haue a resolute answer concerning the cause, which was the second day of March the nert yeere following, that is, in the yeere of our Lord 1229. In the meane season, the kings procurors ceased not with all instance to labour the pope and his cardinals to be fauourable to the kings side. But finding them somewhat hard and strict in the matter (as is the guise of that court) they began to mistrust their speeding. Wherfore consulting together with themselues vpon the premisses, they came to the pope, promising in the kings behalfe to be giuen and granted to him out of the realmes both of England and Ireland, the tith or tenth part of all the goods within the said realms moueable, to sustaine his wars against the emperor, so that he would incline fauourably to the kings sute and petition herein. At dominus papa (saith Paris) qui rebellem imperatorem super omnia æstuabat deijcere, tantis promissionibus exhilaratus trahitur ad consensum. That is, But the pope (saith the author) which boiled with desire aboue all measure, to haue the emperour his enemie cast downe, being cheered with so great promises granted his consent to them, who sitting then in his consistorie had these words, as heere follow.

Appeale sued to Rome.

King Henrie sendeth to the pope.

Tithe of all moueable goods in England and Ireland promised to the pope for granting the kings sute.

O auri sacra fames.

It is pitie the pope will take no bribes.

The popes answer to the election of Walter archbishop of Canturburie.

There hath come of late to our intelligence the election of a certaine monke named Walter, to be archbishop of Canturburie, whereupon after that we heard and aduised as well those things which the said monke hath said for himselfe and for his election; as also on the contrarie side, the obiections and exceptions of the bishops of England alleaging against him and against his election; namelie of the bishop of Chester, the bishop of Rochester, and Iohn archdeacon of Bedford: We vpon the same committed the examination, touching the person of the man, vnto our reuerend brethren lord cardinall Albanie, L. cardinall Thomas de Sabina, and master Peter. And when the foresaid elect comming before them, was asked of them, first concerning the Lords descending into hell, whether he descended in flesh, or without his flesh, he answered not well. Item, being asked touching the making of the bodie of Christ on the altar, he answered likewise not soundly. Being asked moreouer how Rachel wept for her children, she being dead before, he answered not well. Item, being asked concerning the sentence of excommunication denounced against the order of law, he answered not wel. Againe, being required of matrimonie, if one of the maried parties be an infidell, and do depart, he answered thereto not well. Vpon these articles he was (as is said) diligentlie examined of the cardinals; to the which wee say hee answered not onely not well, but also very ill. For so much therefore, as the church of Canturburie is a noble church, and requireth a noble prelat, a man discreet and modest, and such as ought to be taken out of the bosome of the church of Rome; and for so much as this new elect (whom not only heere we pronounce to be vnworthie, but also should say more of him, if wee would proceed with him by the rigor of the law) is so insufficient, that he ought not be admitted to such a roome: we doe vtterly infringe, annihilat, and euacuat his election, alwaies reseruing to our selues the prouision of the said church. Hec ex Mat. Parienſi ad verbum.

No, but when your darling Tho. Becket came, he was heard without such communication.

The election of Walter archbishop of Canturburie dissolued of the pope for the kings mony.

Thus the election of Walter being frustrat and dissolued, the kings procurators bringing forth the letters of the king, and of the suffragans of the church of Canturburie, presented the same vnto the pope for the ratification of Richard chancellor of Lincolne, to bee appointed archbishop of Canturbury, whom they with great commendation of words did set forth to be a man of profound learning and knowledge, of an honest conuersation; and which was greatest of all, that he was a man much for the profit of the church of Rome, as also for the realme of England. And thus the said Richard being commended to the pope by the letters procuratorie of the king and of the bishops, had the consent of the pope and of the cardinals, and so was made bishop of Canturburie before he was elected. Whereupon the said pope Gregorie in his behalfe directeth downe his letters to al and singular suffragans of the church of Canturburie, declaring thus, and beginning first with a lie; that for so much as by the fulnesse of ecclesiasticall power the charge of pastorall office is committed to him in generall vpon all churches, he therefore for the sollicitude hee beareth as well to all other churches in generall, as in speciall to the metropolitan church of Canturburie, repudiating and disanulling the former election of Walter the monke vpon iust causes, hath prouided for that see a man, as in all other good gifts perfect and excellent, by the report of them that know him, so for that function very fit and commodious; and willeth and commandeth them, and al others by his authoritie apostolicall, with all deuout reuerence to receiue him, and humblie to obay him, &c: which was An. 1229. Ex Paris.

Richard chancellor of Lincolne commended to the pope to be archbishop of Canturbury.

Richard made archbishop of Canturburie by the pope without election.

The effect of the popes letters to the suffragans of Canturburie.

The pope beginneth first with a lie.

Ex Mat. Parisenſi.

These things thus finished at Rome, the pope not forgetting the sweet promises made of the English siluer which he so griedilie gaped for, omitting neither time nor diligence, in all speedie wise sendeth vnto the king of England M. Stephan his owne chaplen and trustie legat, to require and collect the foresaid tithes of all the moueable goods both of England, Ireland, and Wales, which were promised to him before, therewith to maintaine his war against Frederike the emperor. And to the intent he might inflame al christian realms with the like hatred which he bare against Frederike the emperor, sendeth also with the said Stephan speciall letters full of manifold complaints, and grieuous accusations against the said emperour, whereof more (Christ granting) shall be shewed hereafter. Vpon the comming of this Stephan the legat, the king assembled all his earles and barons, with the archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, templaries, hospitalers, parsons, and vicars, and other such as held of him In capite, to appeare before him at Westminster, to heare and to commune of the matter. In the assembly of whom, the popes patent letters were brought forth and read, wherein hee required the tenths of all the mooueables in England, Wales, and Ireland, as well of the clergie as of the laitie, to maintaine his expedition against the foresaid Frederike the emperor. The which expeditio as he pretended to atchieue and to take in hand for the cause of the vniuersal church, and happily had begun the matter alreadie; and for so much as the riches of the apostolik see did not suffice for the accomplishing of so great an enterprise: he therefore inforced by meere necessitie, did implore the aid and helpe of al the true obedient and natural chickens of the church of Rome, lest the members thereof together with the head should be subuerted. These letters of the pope to this effect, being openlie recited & explaned by ỹ popes chaplen, which he with much more allegation and perswasion of words did amplifie to his vttermost; the king (saith mine author) in whom all men did hope for helpe to their defence, became then as a staffe of reed. For so much as he had obliged himselfe to the same before, for the election of his archbishop, now could he say nothing against it, but held his peace. The earles, barons, and all the laitie vtterlie refused so to bind their baronies to the church of Rome: but the bishops, abbats, priors, with other prelats of the church, first requiring space & respit to deliberat for three or foure daies; at length for feare of the popes curse (although they durst not vtterly withstand) had brought to passe to haue concluded for a sum of mony much lesse, had not Stephan Segraue, one of the kings counsellors, craftilie conuented with the legat; and by subtill meanes brought it so to passe, that the whole tenths were gathered and paid, to the inestimable

The pope requireth the tenths of all the mooueables in England, Wales, and Ireland.

The contents of the popes letters to the king.

The false pretence of the pope vnder the name of the church wherking his owne cankered malice.

The kings mouth stopped.

Digitized by Google

Excommunication abused.

ble damage (saith Parisiensis) both of the ecclesiastical and temporall state. The means wherof (saith the author) was this. The legat hauing to the prelats his procuratorie letters, to collect and gather vp all the foresaid tenths in the name and authoritie of the pope, declared moreouer full authoritie to him granted by the vertue of his commission, to excommunicat all such and to interdict their churches, whosoeuer did gainstand or goe contrarie to the said collection. Whereupon by the said vertue legantine, hee sendeth to euery shire his proctors to gather the popes monie, or else to excommunicat them which denied to pay. And for so much as the present need of the pope required present helpe without delay, he sendeth moreouer to the bishops and prelats of the realme, in paine of interdiction, forthwith to procure and send to him either of their owne or by loue, or usance, or by what meanes soeuer, so much monie in all post speed for the present vse of the pope; and after to take vp againe the said monie of the tenths of euerie singuler person, by the right taxing of their goods. Vpon this, the prelats to auoid the danger (hauing no other remedie) were driuen to sell their chalices, cruets, copes, iewels, and other church plate, and some to lay to mortgage such things as they had, some also to borrow vpon vsance to make the monie which was required. Moreouer, the said Stephan the popes chaplen (as reporteth Paris) brought with him into England for the same purpose, such bankers and vsurers, who lending out their monie vpon great vsurie, did vnreasonablie pinch the English people, which merchant vsurers were then called Caursini. Briefle, such strict exaction was then vpon the poore Englishmen, that not onlie their present goods were valued and taxed, but also the corne yet growing in the field, against the next haruest was tithed, &c.

The popes extortion.

Vsurers brought into England by the pope to serue him with monie.

Corne vpon the ground tithed to the pope.

Mnelie the earle of Chester named Ranulphus, stood stoutly against the pope, suffring none within his dominion either laie man or clerke to yeeld any tenths to the popes proctors. Ex Mat. Paris, pag. 74. And this was the end of the strife betweene the monks of Canturbury and the king for the election of their archbishop, which was about the yeere of our Lord 1229. in the which yeere was finished the new church of Couentrie, by Alexander bishop of the said citie, and partlie by the helpe of the king: which church, Richard his predecessor bishop before him of Couentrie had begun.

Raimulphus earle of Chester denied to pay the popes tenths.

Anno 1229

The church of Couentrie finished.

The Frenchmen about this time againe prepared themselues towards Prouans, to warre against the foresaid Reimundus earle of Tholouse, and to expulse him out of his possessions. And hearing that he was in his castle of Saracene, they made thither all their power, thinking there to inclose and compasse him about: but the earle being priuie of their conspired purpose, set for them by the way, appointing certaine bushments in woods, not so secretly as strongly, there to wait and receiue the comming of the Frenchmen, and to giue them their welcome. Thus when the French were entred the wood, the earle with his traine of wel armed and able warriors, suddenly did flie vpon them vnwares, and gaue them a bitter meeting, so that in that conflict fiue hundred of the French souldiers were taken, and many slaine. Of their seruitors to the number of two thousand men with their armour were taken, of whom some lost their eies, some their noses, some their eares, some their legs, and so sent home; the rest were carried away prisoners into the castell. And to bee briefe (saith the historie) thrice the same summer were the Frenchmen discomfited, put to flight, taken and imprisoned by the foresaid Reimundus the godly earle. Ex Parisiensi pag. 69. Wherein is to be seene and to bee praised the gratious protection of the Lord our God against the furious papists, which is glorious alwaies in his saints.

The popes French armie thinking to destroy Reimund, is destroyed by the way.

The same yeere the king being at Portsmouth, had assembled together all his nobilitie, earles, barons, and knights of England, with such an armie of horsemen and footmen, as hath not been lightlie seene, thinking to recouer againe the countrie of Normandie, of Gant, and other possessions which king

The inconstant loue of princes towards them that be chiefe about them.

John his father before had lost. But when the captaines and marshals of the field should take shipping, there were not halfe ships enow to receiue the host. Whereupon the king was behementlie inflamed with anger, laying all the fault to Hubert the lord chiefe iustice (who vnder the king had all the gouernment of the realme) calling him old traitor, charging him that he should be the let of his voiage, as hee was before when hee tooke of the French queene fiue thousand marks to stay the kings iournie into Normandie. Insomuch that the rage of the king was so kindled against him, that drawing his sword, hee made at him to run him through, had not the earle of Chester Ranulph stopt the king. Hubert withdrew himselfe away till the kings rage was past. This was about the time of Michaelmas, at which time arriued Henric earle of Normandie in the hauen of Portsmouth in the moneth of October, who should haue conducted the king vpon his alleagiance and oth into Normandie. But he with other of the kings armie counselled the king not to take that voiage toward winter, but rather to defer it to the Easter next following: wherewith the king was staied and well contented, and pacified againe with Hubert the iustice, &c. Ex Parisiensi.

Fabian recordeth this yeere the liberties and franchise of the citie of London to be confirmed by the king, and to euerie of the shrifs to be granted two clerks, and two officers without any more. Ex Fabian.

Then followed the yeere 1230. in which vpon the day of the conuersion of saint Paul (as saith Paris) as a great multitude of people for solemnitie of the day were congregat in the temple of S. Paul, the bishop then being at his masse, a sudden darkenesse with such thicknesse of clouds fell in the aire, that vnneth one man might see another in the church. After that followed cracks of thunder and lightning so terrible, leauing such a sent in the church, that the people looking for dooms day, thought no lesse but that the steeple and whole church would haue fallen vpon their heads: in so much that they running out of the church, as people amazed, fell downe together by thousands, as men amazed, not knowing for the time where they were, onlie the bishop and his deacon stood still at their masse, holding the altar fast. Ex Parisiensi.

Anno 1230

A sudden terror among the people in Paris church by thunder and lightning. Ex Parisiense pag. 75.

Of the death of Stephan Langton, and of the troublesome election of the next archbishop, also of the costlie and chargeable bringing in of Richard to succeed in the roome, which did cost the whole realme of England the tenths of all their mouebles, sufficient hath been declared before. This Richard being now confirmed in his seat, came to the king complaining of Hubert the lord chiefe iustice, oft mentioned before, for withholding from him the castle and towne of Tunbridge with the appurtenances to the same belonging, and other lands of the earle of Clare late deceased. Which lands appertaine to the right of his seat, and to the church of Canturburie, for the which the said earle with his ancestors were bound to doe homage to him and to his predecessors, and therefore required the keeping of the foresaid castle, with the demaines thereof to be restored to him. To this the king answered againe, that the said earle did hold of him In capite, and that the castles being vacant of earles and barons with their heirs, did belong to his crowne, till the lawfull age of the said heirs. The archbishop when hee could get no other answer of the king, did excommunicat all such as inuaded the foresaid possessions, with all others that tooke their part, the king only excepted. Which done, eftsoones speedeth himselfe to Rome, there to prosecute his sute before the pope. The king hearing thereof, not long after sendeth vp maister Roger Cantelu with certaine other messengers vnto Rome against the archbishop.

Anno 1231

Richard archbishop of Canturburie.

The complaint of Richard archbishop of Canturburie against Hubert Lord chiefe iustice.

The kings answer to Richard the archbishop.

Excommunication abused.

This Richard the archbishop comming before the popes presence, beginneth first to complaine of his king, for that hee committed all the affaires of his realme to the disposition and gouernment of Hubert his iustice, vsing onlie his counsell, all his other nobles despised.

Richard the archbishop complaineth to the pope of his king and other matters more.

Against the said iustice moreouer he complained, laying to his charge: first, that he had married a wife, being the kinswoman of her whom hee had married before; also that the said Hubert the iustice did inuade, hold, and wrongfully detaine such possessions as belonged to the see and church of Canturburie.

As touching the wife of this Hubert, heere is to be noted, that he married the elder sister of the king of Scots, which seemeth could be of no great kin to her whom he married before.

Further, hee complaineth of certaine bishops his suffragans, who neglecting their pastorall function, did sit on chequer matters belonging to the king, and exercised sessions and iudgements of blood.

Pluralitie of benefices complained of by the archbishop of Canturbury.

Ouer and besides, hee complaineth of beneficed persons, and clerks within orders, for hauing many benefices ioyned with cure of soule: and that they also taking example of the bishops, did intermeddle in secular matters, and in iudgements of lay men.

Of these and such other defaults he required redresse to be had. The pope weighing and considering the cause of the archbishop to stand vpon right and reason (at least wise seeming so to his purpose) commanded incontinent his petitions and requests to be dispatched according to iustice.

The kings attornies could not speed with the pope.

Against these complaints of the archbishop, the kings attornies alleaged and defended, in as much fauour of the king as they might, but could do no good. Such fauour found the archbishop in the popes sight, being (as the storie reporteth) of a comly personage and of an eloquent tongue, that hee obtained whatsoeuer he asked. Thus the archbishop with all fauourable speed being dispatched at Rome after his owne will and desire, returned homeward, who in his iournie within three daies of his setting forth, departed in the house of Gray friers at S. Gemmes, and so his cause departed with him: who winning his sute, lost his life; for whom it had been better I suppose to haue tarried at home. And heere of him an end, with all his complaints also. Ex Parisiensi.

Respect of person both much with the pope.

Richard the archbishop in his iournie frō Rome dieth.

After the death of this Richard, the monks of Canturburie (according to the maner) addresse themselues to a new election: at which was chosen Ralfe Neuill, bishop of Chichester, who was the kings chancellor, much commended in stories, to be a man faithfull, vpright, and constant: which from the way of iustice declined neither to the right hand nor to the left, but vpright and sincere both in word and deed. This Ralfe (thus chosen of the monks) was presented vnto the king to bee their archbishop, wherewith the king was right well contented, and glad also of his election: and forthwith inuested him for archbishop of the church of Canturburie. But this inuesting

Ralfe Neuill bishop of Chichester elected archbishop of Canturburie.

The king inuesteth the archbishop of Canturburie.

Ex Mat. Paris.

Digitized by Google

king of the king was not enough, vnlesse he should also be confirmed by the pope. Wherefore the monks readie to take their iournie vnto Rome, came to the new archbishop, requiring his helpe for their expenses by the way, and to know what seruice he would command them to the court of Rome. But hee fearing in his mind the same not to be without some scruple of simonie and ambition, said he would not giue an halfpenie, and holding vp his hands to heauen, thus prayed, saying: O Lord God, if I shal be thought worthie to be called (although indeed vnworthie) to the seat and office of this church: so be it as thou shalt dispose it. But if otherwise in this troublesome office of chancery, and this my inferior ministerie, whereunto I haue bin assigned, I shall seeme more necessarie for this thy kingdome and people, I refuse not my labour, thy will be done.

A rare example of a good archbishop.

The prayer of the archbishop elect.

The monks beholding the constancie of the man, notwithstanding they had of him no monie, yet refused not their trauell and iournie to Rome, to haue their election confirmed by the popes authoritie. The pope inquiring of Simon Langton (brother of Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturburie before mentioned) of the person of this man, it was reported againe to him by the said Simon (maliciouslie deprauing the good man behind his backe) declaring to the pope that hee was a courtier, vnlearned, hastie, and seruent in his doings, and such a one, who if he should be promoted to that dignitie, would go about with the helpe of the king and of the whole realme, to remoue and bring the realme of England from vnder the yoke of the pope and of the church of Rome: and so to bereaue the see of Rome of the tribute, vnder which king John had once subiected himself and his realme, at what time he yelded his crowne to the hands of Pandulphus the legat, &c. With these and such other words Simon Langton falslie and maliciouslie depraued the godly bishop. The pope hearing with one eare and crediting what he heard, without further inquisition made of the other partie accused, sendeth incontinent to the monks of Canturburie to proceed in a new election, and to chose them another archbishop, such as were an wholsome pastor of soules, profitable vnto the church of England, and deuote to the church of Rome: and thus was the lawfull election of this good archbishop made frustrat, too good peraduenture to serue in that place whereunto he was elected.

Simon Langton archbishop of Yorke, a malicious backbiter of Radulphus archbishop elect.

The rash iudgement of the pope.

The election of Radulph archbishop elect, defeated by the pope.

John archbishop of Canturburie elected and refused of the pope.

After the repulse of this Radulph, the Canturbury monks entring a new election, agréed vpon John their prior, to bee their metropolitan, who going vp to Rome to haue his election confirmed by the pope, was three daies together examined of the cardinals. And when they could find no insufficiencie in him, touching those things wherein they tried him: yet notwithstanding the pope finding fault with his age (he peraduenture being more aged himselfe) repelled him, for that hee said he was too old and simple to sustaine that dignitie. Ex Paris.

What was the age of this person, I find it not in the author expressed; yet it is to be supposed, that he which was able to take that iourny to Rome and home again, was not so greatly to be complained of for his age, but that he was able sufficientlie to take paines in keeping the chaire of Canturburie.

The popes intollerable exactions vpon England.

In the former parts of this storie proceeding, partly before hath been declared, partlie hereafter more shall appeare (Christ willing) how the church of England and commons of the same was grieued and miserablie afflicted by the intollerable oppressions of the pope: who through his violent extortion had procured the best benefices to be giuen vnto his Romans, and the chiefe fruits of them to be reserued to his owne coffers. And what complaints thereof haue béen made, yee heard before; but yet no redresse could be had. Such was the insatiable auarice of these Romane rakehels, prolling and polling where-soeuer they came, with their prouisions and exactions out of measure, and neuer satisfied. In so much that here in England wholsoeuer lacked, their barnes were alwaies full of corne; and what penurie soeuer pinched the people, they were sure to haue inough. And these importunat exactions and contributions of these Italiã harpyies, besides the Peter pence, besides the common tribut, daily more and more increased, to the great grieuance of the realm, in so much that the wealth of this land was almost cleane sucked vp and translated to the court of Rome. Neither was the king ignorant hereof, but could not helpe the matter. Wherefore it was deuised by some of the nobles (as appeareth in the storie of Parisiensis) this foresaid yéere, An. 1231. that certaine letters vnder the pretensed colour of the kings authoritie, should bée sent abroad, willing and commanding, that such corne and graine with other reuenues, as were taken vp for the pope, should be staid and forth comming by a certaine day in the said letters appointed; the which letters are thought to proceed chieflie by the meanes of Hubert lord chiefe iustice of England, who then, next vnder the king, ruled the most affaires of the realme. The words and contents of the letters be these.

Ex Mat. Paris. pag. 79.

Hubert L. chiefe iustice a worker against the pope.

The copie of the letter written vnder the kings authoritie to restraine the benefices of the Romans within the realme.

After diuers and sundrie griefes and oppressions which this realme, as you know, hath sustained by the Romanists, and yet doth, as well to the preiudice of the king himselfe, as also of the nobility of the same, concerning the aduousons of their churches, and about their tithes: who also goe about to take from the clerks and spiritual men their benefices, and to bestow them vpon their owne nation and countrimen, to the spoile and confusion both of vs and our realme: we therefore by our common consents haue thought good (although very late) now yet rather, then any longer to suffer their intollerable oppressions and extortions, to resist and withstand the same. And by the taking from them their benefices through all England, in like maner to cut short and bridle them, as they had thought to haue kept vnder and bridled others: whereby they may desist any longer to moleste the realme. Wherefore we straitly charge and command you, that as touching the farming of their churches, or else the rents belonging to them, which either you haue presently in your hands, or else do owe vnto the said Romanists, that from hencefoorth you be no more accountable to them, or else pay to them from hencefoorth the same. But that you haue the said your rents and reuenues readie by such a day, to pay and deliuer vnto our procurators thereunto by our letters assigned; and that al abbats and priors haue the same in a readinesse at the time appointed, in their owne monasteries: and all other priests, clerks, and laimen, at the churches of the Romanists, there readie to pay. And further, know yee for certaintie, that if ye refuse thus to doe; that all that you haue besides, shall bee by vs burnt and spoiled. And besides, looke what danger we purpose shall fall vpon them, the same shall light vpon your necks, if you refuse thus to doe. Farewell.

When this was done, they sent their letters abroad by certaine souldiers therunto appointed, to the which letters they had deuised a new seale with two swords ingraued, and betweene the swords was written; Ecce gladij duo, &c; Behold these two swords, readie to take vengeance of all those that shall withstand the forme and order in these letters contained.

At that time the sixteenth day before the kalends of Januarie, about the beginning of the yéere 1232. there was kept at S. Albons a great conuocation of abbats, priors, archdeacons, with diuers both of the nobilitie and clergie by the popes commandement, for the celebration of a diuorce betweene the countesse of Esser and her husband. At the breaking vp of which conuocation, when euerie man was about to depart thence, there was a certaine clerk, whose name was Cincius a Romane, and also a canon of Pauls in London, taken by some of the said vniuersitie not far off from S. Albons, and was carried away from his companie by the souldiers. But master John archdeacon of Norwich a Florentine, hardlie escaping from that companie, gat to London where he hid himselfe, and durst not be séene. Cincius after fiue weeks, when they had wel emptied his bags, was safely sent againe without any more hurt to London.

Anno 1232

A Roman priest, canon of Pauls taken and robbed by souldiers.

Not long after this, about the beginning of Januarie, the barnes of a certaine beneficed man a Roman, and parson of Wingham, being full of corne, were broke vp by a like companie of armed souldiers; and the corne brought out to be sold and giuen away to the poore people. The farmer séeing this and not able to resist, complaineth to the shiriffe of the shire of this iniurie done to his master, and of breaking the kings peace: whereupon the shiriffe sent certaine of his men to see what was done. Who comming to the emptie barns, and there finding the foresaid souldiers to them vnknowne, who had sold away the most part of the corne vpon easie price, and some for charitie had giuen to the pouertie of the countrie about: required of them what they were, that so durst presume to breake the kings peace. Whom the other then called secretly apart, and shewed them the kings letters patents (pretending at least the kings name and seale) wherein was forbidden that no man should presume to stop or let them in that purpose. Whereof the shiriffs seruants being certified, quietly returned from whence they came.

The barnes of a Roman parson broke vp and the corne distributed to the poore.

The Roman and Italian parsons in England robbed of their rents and corne.

This comming to the knowledge of Roger bishop of London, hée (with the assistance of other bishops) proceedeth in solemne excommunication, first against them that robbed Cincius the Romane; then of them which spoiled the barnes of the parson of Wingham another Romane; thirdly, he excommunicated them that forged the letters and seale of the king aboue specified.

Neither yet for all this, did that so cease, but the same yéere about Easter next following, all the barns in England, which were in the hands of any Roman or Italian, were likewise walked, and the corne sold to the best commoditie of the poore commons. Of the which, great almes were distributed, and many times monie also with corne together was sparsed for the néedie people to gather vp. Neither was there any that would or durst stand against them. As for the Romans and Italians themselues, they were stricken in such feare, that they hid themselues in monasteries and cels, not daring to complaine of their iniuries receiued; but held it better to lose rather their goods then to lose their liues. The authors and workers of this feat were to the number of fourscore armed souldiers, of whom the principall captaine was one naming himselfe William Withers, surnamed Twing.

A generall spoile of the Roman parsons in England.

This comming to the popes knowledge, he was not a little stirred therewith, and sendeth his letters immediatlie to the king vpon the same, with sharpe threatnings, and imperious commandements, charging him for suffering of such villanie within within his realme, ſtraitly inioyning him vnder paine of excommunication, to ſearch out the doers hereof with all diligence, and ſo to punish them that all others by them may take example. Likewiſe he ſendeth the ſame charge to Peter biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the abbat of S. Edmund, to inquire in the ſouth parts. Alſo to the archbiſhop of Yorke, and to the biſhop of Durham, and to maiſter Iohn canon of Yorke, a Romane, to inquire in the north parts for the ſaid malefactors, and after diligent inquiſition made, to ſend vp the ſame to Rome, there néeds to appeare before him, &c.

A family vicar of mild Chriſt.

Inquiſition made for the ſpoiling of the popes coyne.

Thus after earneſt inquiſition made of all parties, and witneſſes ſworne and examined, many were found culpable in the matter, ſome that were factors, ſome that were conſentors, of whom ſome were biſhops and chaplens vnto the king, ſome archdeacons and deans, with other ſouldiers and lay men. Among whom certaine ſhirifs and vndershirifs with their ſeruitors vnder them were apprehended and caſt into priſon by the king. Many for feare fled and eſcaped away, who being ſought for could not be found: but the principall of this number (as is aforeſaid) was ſuppoſed to be Hubertus lord cheefe iuſtice, who Hubert de Burgo.

both with the kings letters and his owne, fortified the doers thereof, that no man durſt interrupt them. Moreouer, in the ſame ſocietie of them which were noted in theſe doings, was the ſame Robert Twing aboue mentioned, a comelie young man and a tall ſouldier, who of his owne voluntarie accord with fiue other ſeruitors, whom hée toke with him abroad to worke that feat, came vnto the king, openlie proteſting himſelfe to be the author of that déed doing, and ſaid he did it for hatred of the pope and the Romans, becauſe that by the ſentence of the biſhop of Rome, and fraudulent circumuention of the Italians he was bereaued of the patronage of his benefice, hauing no more to giue but that one: wherefore to be reuenged of that iniurie, hee enterpriſed that which was done; preferring rather iuſtlie to bee excommunicated for a ſeaſon, then to be ſpoiled of his benefice for euer. Then the king and other executors of the popes commandement, gaue him counſell, that ſéeing hée had ſo incurred the danger of the popes ſentence, he ſhould offer himſelfe to the pope to be abſolued of him againe, and there to make his declaration vnto him, that hee iuſtlie and canonicallie was poſſeſſed of that church. The king moreouer with him ſent his letters teſtimoniall vnto the pope, witneſſing with the ſaid ſouldier, and inſtantly deſiring the pope in his behalfe, that he might with fauor be heard. At the requeſt whereof, pope Gregorie afterwards both releaſed him of the ſentence, and reſtored vnto him his patronage, writing vnto the archbiſhop of Yorke, that hee might againe inioy the right of his benefice in as ample manner as he did before it was taken from him.

Robert Twing ſpoiled of his benefice by the Romans.

The biſhops go about to bring Hubert out of the kings fauor.

Hubert de Burgo lord cheefe iuſtice, being one of them which held againſt the Romiſh prieſts, as is afore ſignified, was therefore not a little noted of the biſhops, who to requite him with the like deſpite againe (after their accuſtomed manér of practiſe) went about by ſubtill working to ſhake him out of the kings fauour. And firſt commeth Peter biſhop of Wincheſter to the king, grieuouſlie complaining of certaine about the king; but eſpecially of the foreſaid Hubert the kings iuſtice: in ſo much that he cauſed him to be remoued from his office, notwithſtanding hee had the kings ſeale and writing for the perpetuitie of the ſame, and procured Stephan Segraue to bée placed in his function. And after a few daies, the king more and more incenſed againſt him, called him vnto account of all the treaſure which he was countable for by his exchéker office, alſo of all ſuch debts by him due from the time of his father, till his time: alſo of all the lordſhips which were in the poſſeſſion of William earle of Penbroke, cheefe iuſtice before him. Item, of the liberties which he did hold at that time in forrests, warrens, ſhires and other places, how they were kept, or how they were made away. Of priſes likewiſe, alſo of loſſes committed through his negligence, & of walks made contrary to the kings profit, of his liberties how he did vſe them. Item, of iniuries and damages wrought againſt the clerks of Rome and other Italians, and the popes legats, for the redreſſe whereof hée would neuer adioyne his counſell, according as pertained to his office, being then cheefe iuſtice of England. Alſo of ſcutagies, gifts, preſents, eſcapes of priſoners. Item of marriages which king Iohn committed to his keeping at the day of his death, and which were alſo in his time committed vnto him. To theſe Hubert anſwered, that he had king Iohns owne hand to ſhew for his diſcharge, who ſo approued his fidelitie, that he neuer called him to any, but clérelie diſcharged him from all ſuch counts. Whereunto anſwered againe the biſhop of Winchéſter, ſaying; The charter of king Iohn hath no force after the death of him, but that ye may now be called to a reckoning of this king for the ſame.

Obiections laid againſt Hubert by the king.

Note, that the Winchéſter the kings charter is no longer in force then whileſt he liueth.

Other crimes obiected to Hubert by the king.

Ouer and beſides theſe, other greater obiections were laid to his charge by the king, as for ſending and writing vnto the duke of Auſtria that he might marrie his daughter, to the preiudice of the king and of the realme, diſſwading that ſhée might not be giuen to him. Item for counſelling the king not to enter into Normandie with his armie, which he had prepared for the recouerie of lands there belonging to his right, whereby great treaſure was there conſumed in vaine. Item, for corrupting the daughter of the king of Scots, whom king Iohn his father committed vnto his cuſtodie for him to marry. Item, for ſtealing from him a pretious ſtone, which had a vertue to make him victorious in war, and for ſending the ſame vnto Leolin prince of Wales: and that by his letters ſent to the ſaid Leolin, William Brues a noble man was cauſed there traitorouſlie to be hanged, &c. Theſe with other crimes, (whether true or falſe) were ſuggeſted to the king againſt the ſaid Hubert by his aduerſaries; whereunto he was required to anſwer by order of law. Hubert then ſéeing himſelfe in ſuch a ſtrait, refuſed to anſwer preſently, but required reſpit thereunto, for that the matters were weightie which the king obiected to him; which was granted to him till the fourteenth day of September: but in the meane time, Hubert being in feare of the king, fled from London to the priorie of Merton. And thus Hubert, who before for the loue of the king, and defence of the realme (ſaith mine author) had got the hatred of all the nobles of England, now being out of the kings fauour, was deſtitute of comfort on euery ſide; ſaue onely that Lucas archbiſhop of Dublin, with inſtant prayers and teares, labored to the king for him. By this example and many like is to be ſéene, how vnſtable and variable a thing the fauour of mortall and mutable princes is: to teach all ſuch as haue to doe about princes, how to repoſe and plant their truſt, not in man, but in their Lord God, by him to find helpe in Chriſt the true prince of all princes, which neuer faileth. By like example was Clito ſerued of king Alexander, Ioab of king Dauid, Beliſarius of Iuſtinian, Harpagus of Aſtiages, Cromwell of king Henrie, with innumerable more, which in hiſtories are to be found.

Princes fauors not to be truſted vnto.

When the day was come that this Hubert ſhould anſwer, kéeping amongſt the monks of Merton, he durſt not appeare. Then was it ſignified vnto him from the king, that hée ſhould come vp and appeare in the court, there to anſwer to his charge. Whereunto he anſwered againe, that he miſdoubted the kings anger, and therfore he did flie to the church, as the vttermoſt refuge to all ſuch as ſuffer wrong; from whence hée would not ſtirre, till he heard the kings wrath to bee mitigated towards him. With this the king moued and ſore diſpleaſed, directed his letters in all haſt to the maior of London, commanding him at the ſight thereof to muſter and take vp all the citizens that could beare harneſſe in the citie, & to bring to him by force of armes the foreſaid Hubert either quicke or dead out of Merton. Whereupon, the maior immediatlie, cauſing the great bell to be rung, aſſembled together the people of London, and opening before them the kings letters, commãded them to prepare and arme themſelues in all readineſſe to the executing of the kings will and meſſage.

The kings diſpleaſure againſt Hubert.

The kings meſſage to the maior of London.

The citizens hearings this, were therewith right glad and readie, for they were all in great hatred with Hubert, becauſe of the execution of Conſtantine their citizen afore mentioned. Notwithſtanding, certaine of the citizens, namelie Andrew Bukerell, Iohn Trauers and others more, men of more graue and ſage diſcretion (wiſely pondering with themſelues, what inconuenience might riſe hereof) went in haſte to the biſhop of Winchéſter, lying then in Southworke, and waking him out of his ſléepe, deſired him of his counſell in that ſo ſudden and dangerous diſtreſſe, declaring vnto him what perill might therby inſue as well to the church of Merton, as alſo to the citie, by the furie of the vnordinat and fierce multitude, which will hardly be bridled from robbing and ſpoiling, neither will ſpare ſhedding of bloud, &c. Vnto whom againe the bloudie biſhop gaue this bloudie counſell (ſaith Pariſienſis:) Dangerous it is (quoth he) both here and there; but yet ſée that you obay and execute the precept of the king, I counſell you plainely. At the which counſell of the biſhop they being amazed, went with an ill will about the buſineſſe inioyned. But the people inflamed with hatred, gladly coueted to be reuenged and to ſhed the bloud of the ſaid Hubert.

Old grudge borne in mind.

Some wiſer then ſome.

Good aduiſement of diſcreet citizens.

Truell counſell giuen of Peter biſhop of Winchéſter.

¶ The cauſe why Peter biſhop of Winchéſter was ſo cruellie ſet againſt the iuſtice, was partly for the damages hee had done to the Romane prieſts, as before is touched: partlie alſo for the old grudge, becauſe the king comming to his lawfull age before (through the counſell of this Hubert) looſed himſelfe from the gouernement of the ſaid biſhop, who had him then in cuſtodie. And thus roſe vp the grudge and diſpleaſure of this biſhop towards him.

The cauſes of diſpleaſure betweene Hubert and the biſhop of Winchéſter.

On the nert morrow, the Londoners iſſuing out of the citie to the number of twentie thouſand, ſet forth toward the abbie of Merton, where Hubert was lying proſtrat before the altar, commending himſelfe to God.

Hubert proſtrat vpon the ground commendeth himſelfe to God.

In the meane ſeaſon, while the citizens were in their iourne, raging againſt the poore earle of Kent; it was ſuggeſted to the king by Radulph biſhop of Chicheſter, and lord chancellor, that it was dangerous to excite vp the vulgar and vnruly multitude, for feare of ſedition; leſt peraduenture the rude and headie people being ſtirred vp, will not ſo ſoone be brought downe againe, when the king would haue them. Moreouer, what ſhall be ſaid (quoth hee) among the Frenchmen and other nations, which of great things loue to make them greater, and of euill things to make them worſe then they are; but thus ieſtinglie and mockingly: Sée what a kind bird is ỹ young king of England, which ſéeketh to deuour his old nurſe, vnder whoſe wings he Sage counſell of an earle giuen to the king.

Digitized by Google

The marueilous working of the Lords helpe at time of neede, Iuxta versum, saith the storie: Alis ales, alis alium ne longius ales. Ex additamentis Mat. Pariss. pag. 81.

he had been brought vp and nourished in his youth. And thus the king by the perswasion hereof, changing his counsell, sent in all hastie wise after the armie againe, willing them to retract their iournie, and to retire. And thus the Londoners (although much against their wils) returned home, missing of their purpose. Wherein is to be obserued another notable example of Gode worcking prouidence. For when the king (saith the historie) had sent by two messengers or pursuants to reuoke and call backe againe the armie of the Londoners, going with greedie minds to shed the blood of the innocent iustice: one of the messengers posting with all speed possible, with the kings letters, ouertoke the armie; and comming to the foreward where the captaines were, by vertue of the kings letters staid their course and bloudie purpose, whereby they could proceed no further. But the other messenger craftie and malicious, who bearing hatred to ỹ said Hubert, rather wishing him to be slaine then to be deliuered, lingred by the way of purpose (although being commanded to make hast) and when hee came, went only but to the middle sort: more like a messenger meet to serue a dead mans arrant, then to serue the turne of them which be aliue. And so in like maner by the iust hand of God it fell vpon him. For the same messenger stumbling with his horse, riding but a soft or a fot pase, and rather walking then riding, fell downe backward from his horse backe, and there bracke his necke and died. This mercifull message of the king was (as is said) sent by the instigation of Radulph bishop of Chichester lord chancellor (a vertuous and a faithfull man) and one that could skill to haue compassion on the miseries of men. Of whom was declared before, that he being elected archbishop of Canturburie, would not giue one halfe peny to their expenses by the way, to get his election confirmed by the pope: and afterward by the said pope was defeated and frustrated of his election, as relation was made afore. And thus through Gods prouidence by the meanes of the kings letters the armie returned, and Huberts life (contrarie to his expectation) was preserued.

A notable example of Gods iust punishment striking with death him that seeketh the death of another.

Commendation of Radulph bishop of Chichester.

The archbishop of Dublin againe maketh intercession for Hubert.

After this, the archbishop of Dublin with much labor and great sute intreated, and obtained of the king to grant vnto the said Hubert respit till the twelfth day of Januarie, to prouide himselfe of his answer to such things as were commensed against him. Then Hubert trusting to inioy some safetie by the kings permission to him granted, to breath himselfe a little and to walke abroad, toke his iournie towards S. Edmundsbury, where his wife was; and passing through the countrie of Esser, was inned there in a certaine towne belonging to the bishop of Norwich. Whereof when the king was certified, fearing lest hee would raise vp some commotion in the realme, sendeth in hastie anger after him, sir Godfrid Cranecombe knight with three hundred men: commanding vnder paine of hanging, that they should apprehend him, and bring him to the tower of London: which commandement to accomplish, there lacked no haste. Hubert hauing intelligence of their comming (rising out of his bed naked as he was) ran vnto the chapell standing neere vnto the inne; where he holdeth with the one hand the crosse, with the other hand the sacrament of the Lords bodie. Then Godfrid with his foresaid armed souldiers entring into the chapell, willed him to come out. Which when hee would not, with violent hands he drew him out of the chapell, and taking the crosse and the sacrament out of his hands, fast bound him with fetters and giues vnder the horse bellie, and brought him as they were commanded, to the towre. And so certifying the king what they had done (who then taried vp waking for them) he reioyced not a little thereat, and went merrie to his bed.

Hubert flieth to the church for his refuge.

Hubert violently drawne out of the church. Hubert cast into the towre of London.

The king blamed for breaking the peace of holy church.

The next morrow following after, Roger bishop of London hauing knowledge, how and in what order he was taken violentlie out of the chapell, commeth vnto the king, blaming him boldly for violating the peace of holy church, and protesting that vnlesse the partie were losed againe, and sent to the chapell from whence he was drawne, he would enter sentence of excommunication against all the deed doers.

The king compelled to send Hubert againe to his sanctuarie.

The king as he did not denie his transgression herein, so sendeth him (albeit against his will) out of the towre vnto the said chapel again, and by the same souldiers which brought him out before. Which done, hee giueth in strait charge and commandement vnder paine of hanging to the shirifs of Herford and of Esser, that they in their owne persons with the strength of both shires should watch and compasse about the chapell, and see that the said Hubert no waies might escape. Which commandement of the king was accomplished with all diligence. But Hubert toke all this patiently, and continued in the chapell praying both night and day, and commending his cause vnto the Lord, whom hee desired so to deliuer him from that instant danger, as hee alwaies sought the kings honour by his faithfull and trustie seruice. And as hee continued in his prayer, so the king continuing in his rage, commanded that no man should intreat for him, or make any mention of him in his presence. Notwithstanding yet Lucas archbishop of Dublin, his true and almost onelie friend, ceased not to pray and weepe to the king for him, desiring the king at least to intimat to him what hee purposed should be done with Hubert. Whereunto the king answering, said: that of these three things one he should chose, whether he would abiure the realme of England for euer, or be condemned vnto perpetuall prison, or else confesse himselfe openlie to bee a traitor. But Hubert hereunto said, that hee would chose none of these articles, as who knew himselfe neither guiltie, nor worthie of any such confusion: but to satisfie somewhat the mind of the king, hee would bee contented to depart the realme for a season, but to abiure the realme he would not so doe.

Example of a constant friend in the time of need.

Three things put to Hubert to choose.

In this meane time it befell that Ranulphus earle of Chester and of Lincolne, one of his forest enemies died. Hubertus all this while remained in the chapell inclosed and garded about with the power (as is said) of two shires, and so continued till at length by the commandement of the king, his two seruitors which ministred to him within the chapell, were taken from him. Then Hubert seeing no other remedie, but there to starue for famine, offred himselfe of his owne accord to the shirifs, saying that hee would put himselfe rather in the kings mercie, then there desperatly to perish for hunger. And so was he taken, and being fast bound in fetters, was brought againe and clapped, by the kings commandement, in the towre of London.

Hubert yeeldeth himselfe to the shirifs.

Hubert reuoked againe to the towre.

Not long after this, word was brought vnto the king by certaine, that the said Hubert had much treasure lying in the house of the new templaries in London. Whereupon the king, to trie out the truth thereof, sendeth for the prior or master of the house: who not daring to denie, confessed that there was indeed treasure brought into the house, but the quantitie and number thereof he could not tell. The king desirous to seizon vpon the treasure, required and charged the master with his brethren with threatning words, to bring forth the treasure to him, saying that it was taken and stolne out of his treasurie. But they answered againe, that the treasure was committed with trust and faith vnto their hands, and therefore they would nor ought to let it goe out of their hands, being trusted withall, without the assent of him which committed the same vnto them. When the king could get no other answer at their hands, neither durst shew any further violence against them, he sendeth vnto Hubert in the towre, requiring of him the foresaid treasures. To whom he answering againe mildly, yeelded both himselfe, his treasures, and all that euer hee had vnto the kings will and pleasure, and so sending word vnto the master and brethren of the temple, willeth them to take all the keies, and deliuer the goods with all that there was vnto the king; who receiuing the same, and taking an inuentorie of that which was receiued, caused it to be brought vnto his treasurie: whereof the number both of the plate, of coine, and of the iewels, was of price vnknowne. The enemies of Hubert supposing thereby for to take aduantage against him to bring him to his end, came with open complaint vnto the king, crying out against Hubert, that he was a theefe, a traitor, and a robber of the kings treasure, and therefore by right was worthie to bee hanged, and thus cried his accusers daily in the kings eare. But the hearts of kings (saith the wise man) are in the hands of the Lord, to bee ruled, not after mans will, but as it pleaseth God to direct them. And so this king hauing now his will and fill vpon poore Hubert, and somewhat comming more vnto himselfe, answered againe in this wise, that there was no such need to deale so straitlie with him, who from the time of his youth first serued mine vncle king Richard, then my father king John, in whose seruice (as I heard say) beyond the seas, hee was driuen to eat his horse, Parisiensis, pag. 81. and in my time hath stood so constantly in defence of the realme against forren nations, who kept the castle of Douer against king Lewis, and vanquished the Frenchmen vpon the seas, also at Bedford and at Lincolne hath done such seruice. And though against me hee hath dealt any thing vntruely, which yet is not euidentlie proued, yet he shall neuer be put by me to so villanous a death. I had rather bee counted a king foolish and simple, then to bee iudged a tyrant or seeker of bloud, especiallie of such as haue serued me and mine ancestors in many perils so dangerouslie, weighing more ỹ few euils which yet be not proued, then so manie good deserts of his euident and manifest seruice done both to me and to the whole realme, &c. And thus the king somewhat relenting to poore Hubert his old seruant, granted vnto him all such lands as hee had giuen by king John his father, and whatsoeuer else he had by his owne purchase.

Hubert bereft of all his treasures.

Anno 1232

God ruleth the harts of kings.

The kings answer in defence of Hubert.

A worthie word of a king.

Thus Hubert after long trouble a little cheered with some peece of comfort, set Laurence his trustie friend that neuer left him, one that belonged to S. Albons, to bee his steward and ouerseer of those possessions granted vnto him by the king. And shortly vpon the same, after the kings mind was seene thus something to relent, the enuie also of the nobles being now partly satisfied, began to turne to mercie; in so much that foure earles, to wit, earle Richard the kings brother, William earle of Warreine, Richard earle marshall, and William earle of Ferris, became suerties to the king for him. Upon whose suretie hee was transferred to the castle of Deuizis, where hee was vnder the keeping of foure souldiers by them appointed, hauing the libertie of the castle. But the bishop of Winchester, who alwaies hunted after the life of Hubert, craftilie commeth vnto the king, and desireth the custodie of that castle, making

The kings mind relenteth toward Hubert.

Foure earles sureties for Hubert.

Hubert put in the castle of Deuizis.

Anno 1233

king no mention of Hubert, to the intent that by the keeping thereof, he might the sooner dispatch him. Hubert hauing thereof some inkling, breaketh the matter to two of his seruants, who with compassion tendering his miserie, watched their time (the keepers being asleepe) and conueied him by night on their backs, fettered as he was, into the parish church of the towne, and there remained with him. The keepers when they mist their prisoner were in great perplexitie, and after diligent search finding him at length where he was in the church, with violent force drew him from thence to the castle againe. For the which iniurie to the church, the bishop of Sarum vnderstanding the order of the matter, commeth to the castle where the keepers were, and required that Hubert should bee brought againe into the church from whence he was taken. Which when the keepers denied to doe, saying they would rather hee should hang then they: then the bishop gaue sentence against them of excommunication. Which done, he with the bishop of London and other bishops, goeth immediately vnto the king, complaining of the iniurie done vnto Hubert, and especially of the contumelie against holy church: neither would they leaue the king, before they had obtained that he should be reduced againe into the church, and so he was. It was not long after, but the king in great displeasure sendeth to the shiriffe of the shire to keepe him well watched in the church, till either he came forth, or there perished with famine.

Hubert conueied out of the castle into the parish church.

Hubert againe taken out of the church, and brought backe to the castle.

It befell in the meane season that great dissension rose betweene the king and the nobles of the realme, by reason whereof Hubert was taken and carried away by Richard earle marshall into Wales, and there remained, vntill the king at length was reconciled with his nobles, and so receiued (with the rest) the said Hubert againe into his fauor. Ex Matthæo Parisiensi, & ex Floribus historiarum. Of the which dissension more shall bee shewed (Christ willing) hereafter.

Hubert deliuered out of prison and carried into Wales.

As the beginning of this trouble of Hubert first sprang of buying the popes barnes: so likewise Roger bishop of London suspected for the same cause, was inforced to trauell vp to Rome, there to purge himselfe before the pope. Where after much money consumed, and robbed also by the way, hee gat nothing else, but lost his labor, and so came home againe. Who then doing the part of a good bishop, after his returne from Rome, attempted to expell and exclude out of his dioces all these Italian vsurers called, as is before said, Caursini. These Caursinits comming with the popes legats into England, and lending their money to religious houses, to colleges and churches, had their debters bound vnto them in such sort as was much vantageable to them, and much iniurious to the other, as in the forme of their obligations in the storie of Mat. Parisiensis is largely expressed fol. 65. Against these Caursinites the bishop of London being worthilie inflamed with zeale of iustice, first with louing admonition went about to reclaime them for the wealth of their soules, afterward with sharpe words began to charge them. But they neither regarding christian counsell, and despising the bishops threatnings, would not leaue the sweetnesse of their occupation. Wherfore the bishop proceeding vnto the sentence of excommunication, precisely and districtly charged them to depart his dioces. But they againe being confident and imboldened vpon the popes defence, not onely set at light his excommunication, but also wrought such waies with the pope, that they caused the said bishop of London, being both aged & sickly, to bee cited peremptorily to appeare beyond the seas, there to answere to such obiections as they should inferre against him. And thus the bishop minding rather to couer then to open the faults of the church, and partly being let with infirmitie and age, was compelled to let the cause fall.

Roger bishop of London goeth to Rome to purge himselfe before the pope.

Against vsurers.

Vsurers excommunicated and expelled by the bishop of London.

Excommunication well vsed against vsurers.

And thus much of the popes merchants here in England, which were not so busie here for their part, but the pope the great master of these merchant vsurers, was as busie for his. And although his barnes here in England were destroyed, and his banke something decayed, yet he thought to win it vp another way: for he proclaimed the same yeare a generall visitation through all the religious houses exempt or not exempt vniuersally pertaining to his iurisdiction, where by the cruell dealing of the visitors, many were compelled to appeale and to trauell vp to Rome, to the great expenses of their money, and filling the popes cofers. But as touching this visitation, to make short (saith the storie) it tended not to any reformation so much as to the deformation of vniuersall order: Dum omnes qui in diuersis orbis partibus vnicam Benedicti secuti fuerant regulam, per nouas constitutiones ita inueniantur vbique discordes, quòd ex omnibus cœnobijs, vel alijs religiosorũ ecclesiis vix duo habeantur in norma viuendi concordes: that is, While all they, which before through all parts of the world followed onely the rule of Benedict, now through new deuised constitutions are found in all places so diuided and diuers, that of all monasteries, and other churches of religion, scarce may two be found, which doe agree in one rule and institution of life.

The generall visitation of the pope through all religious houses.

Ex Parisiensi.

The great diuersitie among all religious orders noted.

All this while that Hubert aboue mentioned was secluded from the king, Peter bishop of Winchester bare all the rule, and aboue all other alone was accepted. This bishop being in such principall fauour with the king, as by whose counsell all things were administred, remoued the naturall seruitors that were Englishmen, out of their offices, and placed other strangers, namely, of Pictauia, and of other countries, in their rowmes. Among whom was thrust out William vndermarshall, which supplied the rowme of Richard lord great marshall of England: for the which cause, the said lord Richard was mightilie offended. Also Walter treasurer of the kings house, was not onely expelled, but also mercied at an hundred pounds, and put from all his holds and munitions, which he had by the kings patent granted to him.

Old seruitors of the king put out and discharged.

Moreouer, by the counsell of the said bishop of Winchester, all the old counsellers as well bishops, as other earles and barons, and all the nobles were reiected from the king in such sort, that he would heare and follow no mans counsell, but only the said Peter bishop of Winchester, and his cosin Peter de Riuallis. Whereby it came to passe that all the greatest holds and munitions in the realme were taken from the old keepers, and committed to the custodie of the said Peter. Then the bishop of Winchester, to plant and pitch himselfe more strongly in the kings fauor, adioyned to his fellowship Stephan Segraue succeeding in the place of Hubert the iusticé: also Robert Passelew, who had the keeping of the treasure vnder the foresaid Peter Riuall. So by these three, all the affaires of the realme were ordered. Moreouer, to make their partie more sure, by them was prouided, that souldiers and seruitors from beyond the sea, as Pictauians and Britains were sent for, to the number of two thousand, which were placed partly about the king, partly were set in castles & holds within the realme, and had the ouersight and gouernment of shires and baronies, who then oppressed the nobles of the land, accusing them to the king for traitors, whom the simple king did lightly beleeue, committing to them the custodie of his treasures, the sitting in iudgements, and the doing in all things. And when the nobles thus oppressed, came to complaine of their iniuries to the king, by the meanes of the bishop of Winchester, their cause was nothing regarded; insomuch that the said Winchester moreouer accused certaine bishops also to the king, so that hee did flie and shun them as open traitors and rebels.

The king forsaketh his nobles and sticketh to strangers.

These things standing thus out of order, Richard the noble marshall of England, with others of the nobles ioyning with him, seeing these oppressions and iniuries daily growing contrarie to the lawes and wealth of the realme, came to the king, and blamed him for retaining such peruerse counsel about him of the Pictauians and other forreners, to the great preiudice of his naturall subiects, and of the liberties of the realme, humblie desiring and beseeching him, that he with as much speed as might be, would reforme and redresse such excesses, wherby the whole realme seemed to lie in danger of subuersion. Otherwise, if he refused to see correction thereof, hee with other peers and nobles would withdraw themselues from his counsell, so long as he maintained the societie of those forreners and strangers about him.

Richard earle marshall admonisheth the king.

To this Peter Winchester answering againe, said, that the king right well might call vnto him what forreners and strangers him liked, for the defence both of his kingdome and of his crowne; and what number of them hee would, as by whom hee might be able to bridle his proud and rebellious subiects, and so to keepe them in awe and good order. When the earle and the nobles could get no other answere of him, in great perturbation they departed, promising among themselues, in this case, which so touched the state of the whole realme, they would constantly ioyne togither to the parting of their life.

The disdainefull answere of the bishop of Winchester to the nobles.

After this, the foresaid Petrus bishop of Winchester with his complices, ceased not by all meanes to inflame the kings hart to hatred and contempt of his naturall people, whom they so vehemently peruerted, that he counting them no other then his enemies, sought by all diligence the vtter destruction of them, sending daily more garrisons of the Pictauians, that in short space they replenished welneare the whole land, whose defence the king only trusted vnto: neither was any thing disposed in the realme, but through the guiding of this Peter and of the Pictauians.

Wicked counsell about a king.

Petrus de rupibus bishop of Winchester peruerter of the king.

The king thus garded and strengthened with these forren aliens and strangers, proclaimed a parliament to be holden at Oxford, where the nobles were warned to bee present. They considering the indignation of the king conceiued, would not appeare. Againe they were required the first, second, and third time to present themselues. The assemblie proceeded, but they came not, for whom the king loked. In this assemblie or parliament, it was plainely told the king by a Dominike frier preaching before him, that vnlesse he remoued from him the bishop of Winchester and Peter Riuall his kinsman, hee should not, neither could long inioy peace in his kingdome. This although it was bluntly spoken of the frier against the bishop, yet this remedie he had; the frier had nothing to lose. Yet was there another chaplaine of the court, who perceiuing the king somewhat mitigated by the former preaching, and after a courtlike dexteritie handling his matter, being a pleasant conceited man, thus merrilie came to the king asking a question, What was the thing most pernicious and dangerous of all other things to them that trauell by the seas? That, said the king

A merrie apothegme of the kings chaplain.

Digitized by Google

king, is best knowne to such as trauell in that kind of traffike. May (saith he) this is easie to be told. The king demanding what it was, Forsooth (quoth he) stones and rocks; alluding merilie (but yet truely) to the bishop of Winchester, whose name and surname was Petrus de rupibus, for so Petræ in Latine signifieth stones, and Rupes rocks. Notwithstanding, the king either not perceiuing the meaning, or not amending the fault, againe signifieth to his nobles to speake with him at Westminster. But they fearing some traine to be laid for them, refused to appeare, sending plaine words to the king by solemne message, that his grace without all delay should seclude from him Peter bishop of Winchester and other aliens of Pictauia, or if he would not, they with the common assent of the realme, would displace him with his wicked counsellors from his kingdome, and haue within themselues tractation for chusing a new king.

The message of the nobles to the king.

The king at the hearing of this message being mightilie moued, partly to feare, partly to indignation, especially hauing the late example of king Iohn his father before his eyes, was cast in great perplexitie, doubting what was best to bee done. But Winchester with his wicked counsell so wrought with the king, that he proceeded with all seueritie against them, insomuch that in short time the sparkles of poysoned counsell kindling more & more, grew to a sharpe battell betweene the king and Richard earle marshal with other nobles, to the great disquietnesse of the whole realme. The which war before was presignified by terrible thundring and lightning heard all England ouer in the moneth of March, with such abundance of raine and flouds growing vpon the same, as cast downe mils, ouercouered the fields, threw downe houses, and did much harme through the whole realme.

War raised by the king against his nobles.

Great thunders and flouds in England.

To prosecute here at large the whole discourse of this war betweene the king and earle marshall, which continued neere the space of two yeares, to declare all the parts and circumstances thereof, what troubles it brought, what damages it wrought vnto the whole realme, what traines were laid, what slaughter of men, what wast of whole countries insued from Wales vnto Shrewsberie, how the marshall ioyned himselfe with Leolin prince of Wales, how the Pictauians were almost all slaine and destroyed, how the king was distressed, what forgerie wilie Winchester wrought by the kings letters to intrap the marshall and to betray him to the Irishmen, amongst whom he was at length slaine; all this I refer to other authors, who at large doe intreat of the same, as Mat. Paris, Florilegus, and such others. This is to be noted and obserued (which rather pertaineth to our ecclesiasticall history) to see what sedition and continuall disquietnes was in those daies among all christian people almost, being vnder the popes catholike obedience: but especially to marke the corrupt doctrine then reigning, it is to be maruelled, or rather lamented, to see the king and the people then so blinded in the principall point and article of their saluation, as we find in stories, which making mention of a house or monasterie of conuerts, builded the same yeare by the king at London, do expresse in plaine words, that he then did it Pro redemptione animæ suæ, & regis Ioannis patris sui, & omnium antecessorum suorum: that is, For the redemption of his soule, of the soule of king Iohn his father, and for the soules of all his ancestors, &c. Whereby may bee vnderstood in what palpable darkenesse of blind ignorance the sillie soules redeemed by Christ were then inwrapped, which did not know nor yet were taught the right doctrine and first principles of their redemption. Ex Mat. Parisiensi. pag. 86.

Monasteries builded Pro redemptione animæ.

Mention was made a little before of dissoluing the election of Iohn Poor of Canturburie, which was chosen by the monks to be archbishop of the said church of Canturburie, but by the pope was defeated. After whom one Iohn Blund was elected, who trauelling vp to Rome this yeare, An. 1233. to be confirmed of the pope, was also repealed and vnelected againe, for that it was thought in England, and so complained of to the pope, that he had receiued of Peter bishop of Winchester, a thousand marks, and had another thousand promised him of the said Winchester. Who by his money thought to make him of his side, and also wrote vnto the emperor to helpe forward his promotion in the court of Rome. Notwithstanding, both hee with his giuing, and the other with his taking of bribes, were both detected and disappointed of their purpose. For the pope hating then the emperor, for the same cause admitted not the election; pretending the cause, for that he was proued to hold two benefices without his dispensation. After whom, by the commandement of the pope, one Edmund canon of Salisburie was ordained archbishop, and had his pall sent to him from the pope. Which Edmund after for his vertues was canonized of the popish monks there for a saint, and called S. Edmund. About which time also Robert Grosthead was made bishop of Lincolne.

Iohn archbishop of Canturburie elected by the chapter, againe vnelected by the pope.

Corruption of bribes.

Edmund archbishop of Canturburie.

S. Edmund canonized.

Robert Grosthead made bishop of Lincolne.

This Edmund accompanied with other bishops, during this trouble betweene the king and his nobles, being in councell at Westminster, in the yeer next insuing, which was 1234: came vttering their minds boldly in the name of the lords, and declaring vnto the king as became his faithfull seruants, that his counsell which then he followed, was not sound nor safe, but cruell and dangerous both to him, & to the state of the realme,

{Anno 1231}

Faithfull counsel of the bishops giuen to the king.

meaning the counsell of Peter Winchester, and of Peter Riuall, with other adherents.

The counsell of Winchester and such other bishops about the king, disproued for certaine causes.

1 FIrst and in primis, for that they hate and contemne the English nation, calling them traitors and rebels, and turning the kings heart from the loue of his naturall subiects, and the hearts of them from him, as appeareth by the earle marshall and others, sowing discord among them.

2 Item, by the said counsell, to wit, by the foresaid bishop and his fellowes, king Iohn the kings father lost first the hearts of his barons, after that lost Normandie, and afterwards other lands also, and in the end wasted all his treasure, so that since that time the regiment of England had neuer any quiet after.

3 By the said counsell also, in their time and memorie, the kingdome of England had been troubled and suspended, and in conclusion became tributarie, she that was before the prince of prouinces: and so war insuing vpon the same, the said king Iohn his father incurred great danger of death, and at last was extinguished, lacking both peace of his kingdome and of his owne heart.

4 Item, by the said counsell the castle of Bedford was kept long time against the king, to the great losse both of men and treasure, beside the losse of Rupella, to the shame of the realme of England.

5 Moreouer, through their wicked counsell, at this present, great perturbation seemed to hang ouer the whole realme; for else if it had not been for their counsell, and that true iustice and iudgement might haue been ministred vnto the kings subiects, these tumults had neuer been stirred, and the king might haue had his land vnwasted, and his treasure vnconsumed.

6 Item, in that faith and allegiance, wherewith they were obliged vnto him, they protested vnto him that the said his counsell was not a counsell of peace, but of diuision and disquietnesse, to the end that they which otherwise by peace could not aspire, by disturbing and disheriting others might be exalted.

7 Item, for that all the castles, forts, munitions, also all the officers of the excheker, with all other the greatest escheats of the realme were in their hands, of the which if the king would demand account, he should proue how true they were.

8 Item, for that neither by the kings seale, nor commandement, except it bare withall the seale of Peter Riuall, almost no businesse of any weight could be dispatched in the realme, as though they counted their king for no king.

9 Furthermore, by the foresaid counsell, the naturall subiects and nobles of the realme were banished the court, which was to be feared would grow to some inconuenience both to the king and to the realme; forsomuch as the king seemed more to be on their side then they of his, as by many euident coniectures may appeare.

10 Item, it was not well to be taken and liked, the said counsell standing of strangers and aliens, to haue in their power both the kings sister, and many other noble mens daughters and other women mariageable, with the kings wards and marriages, which they bestowed and diuided among themselues, and men of their affinitie.

11 Also, the said counsell regarding neither the lawes, nor liberties of the realme confirmed and corroborated by excommunication, did confound and peruert all iustice: wherefore it was to be feared that they would run vnder excommunication, and the king also in communicating with them.

12 Item, because they kept neither promise nor faith, nor oth with any person, neither did obserue any instrument made neuer so formall by law, nor yet did feare any excommunication; wherfore they were to be left for people desperate, as which were departed from all truth and honestie.

These things (said the bishops) we as your faithfull subiects before God and men, do tell and aduertise your grace, desiring and beseeching you, that you wil remoue and seclude from you such counsell: and as the custome is of all other kingdomes to do, that you will so gouerne in like maner your kingdome by your owne naturall leege people, and such as bee sworne vnto you of your owne realme. For thus (said they) in veritie wee denounce vnto you, that vnlesse in short time you will see these things reformed, we according to our dutie will proceed by the censure of the church against you, and al others that gainstand the same, tarrying no other thing, but onely the consecration of this our reuerend archbishop.

Excommunication denounced by the bishops against the king.

These words of the bishop thus said and finished, the king required a little time of respit, wherein to aduise with himselfe about the matter, saying that he could not in such a sudden remoue from him his counsell, before hee had entred with them account of his treasure committed to them: and so that assemblie brake vp.

The kings answere to the bishops.

It followed then after this communication so broken vp, that the king resorted to the parts of Northfolke, where coming by S. Edmundsburie, where the wife of Hubert the iustice was, he being moued with zeale of pitie toward the woman, who verie humblie behaued her selfe to the king, did grant hir eight manor places, which her husband before with his mony had purchased, being then in the custodie & possession of Robert Passelew, one of the kings new counsellors aboue specified.

The pitie of the king toward the wife of Hubert.

It

Edmund consecrated archbishop of Canturburie, which was afterward canonized by pope Innocent the fourth for a saint.

It was not long after this, but Edmund the archbishop was inuested and consecrated in the church of Canturburie, who shortly after his consecration, about the moneth of Aprill, comming with his suffragans to the place of councell, where the king with his earles and barons was assembled, opened to him the cause and purpose of his comming and of the other prelats, which was to put him in remembrance of their former talke had with him at Westminster; denouncing moreouer to him expressie, that vnles with speed hee would take a better way, and fall to a peaceable and godly agreement with the true and faithfull nobles of his realme, hee incontinent with the other prelats there present, would passe with the sentence of excommunication against him, and against all them that should bee enemies to the same peace, and maintainers of discord.

Example of excommunication rightly practised.

The kings promise to the bishops.

The king after he heard the meaning of the bishops, with humble and gentle language answered them againe, promising to condescend to them in all things. Whereupon within few daies after, the king comming to some better remembrance of himselfe, commanded the forenamed bishop of Winchester to leaue the court, and returne home to his bishoprike, there to attend vnto the spirituall charge and care of his flocke committed to him. Moreouer, he commanded Peter Riuall the bishops cosin (some stories say his son) who had then the disposing of all the affaires of the realme, to render vnto him his castles, and to giue account of all his treasures, wherof he had the keeping, and so to voide the realme, swearing moreouer vnto him, but for that he was beneficed, and was within orders of the church, else he would haue caused both his eyes to be pluckt out of his head.

Peter bishop of Winchester discharged out of the court.

Peter Riuall called to account of the kings treasures.

Pictauians and strangers sent home by the king vnto their countrie.

He expelled likewise the Pictauians out of the court, and from the custodie of his munitions, sending them home into their countrie, and bidding they should no more see his face. And thus the king wisely dispatching himselfe of his wicked counsellors, first did send Edmund the archbishop, with the bishops of Chester and of Rochester, into Wales to Leolin, and to Richard earle marshall, and others, to intreat with them of peace.

Reconciliation sought betweene the king and the nobles.

Also he receiued to his seruice againe men of his naturall countrie, to attend about him, offering himselfe willing to be ruled by the counsell of the archbishop and the bishops, by whose prudence he trusted his realme should be reduced againe to a better quietnesse.

Richard earle marshall fraudulently circumuented and slaine in Ireland.

But in the meane time, while these things were doing in England, the foresaid Richard earle marshall by the falshod of the bishop of Winchester, and Peter Riuall, forging the kings letters to the Irishmen against him, and partly by the conspiracie of Gilbert de Marisco, was circumuented by the Irishmen in war, and there taken & wounded, was by them through the meanes of his surgeon slaine.

Catini slaine about Almaine, iudged of the papists for heretiks.

Great slaughter the same time was of them which were called Catini, about the parts of Almaine. These Catini were esteemed of pope Gregorie and the papists to be heretiks; but what their opinions were I find it not expressed: In Parisiensi.

Albigenses slaine in Spaine by the popes setting on.

In like sort the Albigenses afore mentioned, recounted also of the popes flock to be heretiks, with their bishops, and a great number and companie of them were slaine by the commandement of pope Gregorie at the same time in a certaine plaine in Spaine. Ex Matth. Parisiensi, fol. 87.

How the archbishop of Canturburie with other two bishops were sent into Wales for intreatie of peace, yee heard before. At whose returne againe after the time of Easter, the king going toward Glocester to meet them by the way, as hee was in his iourney at Woodstocke, came messengers of Ireland, declaring to the king the death of Richard earle marshall, and the order thereof, through the forged letters of Winchester and others: whereat the king made great lamentation and mourning, to the great admiration of all them that were by, saying and complaining that he left not his like in all the realm againe.

The king lamenteth the death of Richard earle marshall.

After this the king proceeding in his iourney came to Glocester, where the archbishop with the other bishops comming to the king, declared to him the forme and condition of peace, which they had concluded with Leolin, which was this: If the king would be reconciled before with the other nobles with whom he was confederate, such as the king had banished out of his realme; to the end that the concord might be the more firme betweene them. Thus (said they) was Leoline contented, although with much ado & great difficulty, to receiue the league of peace, saying and protesting this vnto them, that he feared more the kings almes then all the puissance both of him and of all his clergie within England.

The saying of Leolin king of Wales. The almes of king Henrie more feared then his puissance.

This done, the king there remaining with the bishops directed his letters to all the exiles and banished lords, and to all his nobles, that they should repaire to him about the beginning of June, at Glocester; promising to them his full fauour and reconcilement to them and to their heires, and that they should suspect no fraud therin they should haue their safe conduct by the archbishop and bishops.

Peace concluded betweene the king and the nobles.

Whereupon, through the mediation of the said archbishop and the bishops, first commeth to the king, Hubert earle of Kent, offring himselfe to the kings good will and fauor. Whom the king with chearefull countenance receiued and imbraced, restoring him not onely to his fauor, but also to his houshold and counsell, with his liuings and possessions from which hee had been disseized before. Then Hubert lifting vp his eyes to heauen, gaue praise and glorie to God, by whose gratious prouidence he so marueilously being preserued from so great distresses and tribulations, was againe so happilie reconciled to the king, and his faithfull friends. After him in like sort came in Gilbert Basset a noble man, Richard Siward, also Gilbert the brother of Richard Marshall that was slaine; which Gilbert recouered againe his whole inheritance as well in England as in Ireland, doing his homage to the king, & his seruice due for the same; to whom also was granted the office of the high marshall court, belonging before to his brother Richard.

Hubert giueth thanks to God.

In the same councell or communication continuing then at Glocester, the said Edmund archbishop of Canturburie, bringing the forged letters wherein was betraied the life of Richard earle marshall, sealed with the kings seale, and sent to the great men of Ireland, read the same openly in the presence of the king and all the nobles. At the hearing whereof, the king greatly sorrowing and weeping, confessed there in truth, that being forced by the bishop of Winchester and Peter de Riuallis, he commanded his seale to be set to certaine letters presented vnto him, but the tenor thereof he said and swore he neuer heard. Whereunto the archbishop answering againe, desired the king to search well his conscience, and said that all they which were procurers or knowledge of those letters, were guiltie of the death of the earle marshall, no lesse then if they had murthered him with their owne hands.

Falshood and murther commeth out. Kings many times abused by wicked counsell.

Then the king calling a councell, sent his letters for the bishop of Winchester, for Peter Riuall, Stephan Segraue, and Robert Passelew to appeare and yeeld account for his treasures vnto them committed, and for his seale by them abused. But the bishop and Riuall keeping themselues in the sanctuarie of the minster church of Winchester, neither durst nor would appeare. Stephan Segraue, who succeeded after Hubert the iustice, and was of the clergie before, after became a lay man, and now hiding himselfe in S Maries church in the abbie of Leicester, was turned to a clerke againe. Robert Passelew couertly hid himselfe in a certaine cellar of the new temple, so secretly that none could tell where he was, but thought he was gone to Rome. At length through the foresaid Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, meanes was made, that a dilatory day was granted by the king for them to answere. At which day first appeared Peter de Riuallis, then Stephan Segraue, after him Robert Passelew, each of them seuerally one after another shewed themselues, but not able to answere for themselues, like traitors were reproued, and like villaines were sent away. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 91.

The bishop of Winchester called to his answere.

Peter Riuall, Stephan Segraue, Robert Passelew called to their answere.

Variance betweene pope Gregorie the ninth and the Romans.

Variance betweene the pope and the citizens of Rome.

WHile peace thus betweene the king and the nobles was reconciled in England, dissension and variance the same time and yeare began in Rome, betweene the pope and the citizens of Rome. The cause was, for that the citizens claimed by old custome and law, that the bishop of Rome might not excommunicate any citizen of the citie, nor suspend the said citie with any interdiction for any maner excesse.

The allegation of the Romans.

To this the pope answered againe; Quod minor Deo est, sed quolibet homine maior (to vse the very words of mine author:) Ergo, maior quolibet ciue; nè Etiam rege, vel imperatore, &c: That is, that he is lesse then God, but greater then any man: Ergo, greater then any citizen, yea also greater then king or emperor. And for so much as he is their spirituall father, hee both ought and lawfully may chastise his children when they offend, as being subiected to him in the faith of Christ, and reduce them into the way againe when they stray out of course.

The popes answere.

Moreouer the citizens alleage againe for themselues, that the potestats of the citie and senators doe receiue of the church of Rome yearely tribute, which the bishops of Rome were bound to pay to them, both by new and also ancient lawes. Of the which yearely tribute they haue been euer in possession before this present time of this pope Gregorie the ninth.

The second allegation of the Romans. The pope bound to pay to Rome yearely tribute.

Hereunto the pope answered and said, that although the church of Rome in time of persecution, for their defence and cause of peace, was wont to respect the head rulers of the citie with gentle rewards, yet ought not that now to be taken for a custome: for that custome onely ought to stand, which consisteth not vpon examples, but vpon right and reason.

The pope replieth.

Further and besides, the citizens said that they at the commandement of the senators, would appropriate their countrie with new and larger limits, and infranchise the same, being inlarged with fines and borders.

The third cause and allegation of the Romans.

To this the pope againe made answere, that certaine lordships, and cities, and castles, be contained within the compasse of the said limits, as the citie Viterbium, and Montcastler, which they presume to appropriate within their precinct: but to ascribe to them and vsurpe that which pertaineth to others, is against right and iustice.

The popes answere.

For these and such other controuersies rising betweene the pope and the Romans, such dissension kindled, that the pope

Digitized by Google

The pope flieth to the citie of Rome.

with his cardinals leauing the citie of Rome, remoued to Perusium (as partly before is recited) thinking there to remaine and to plant themselues: but the Romans preuailing against him, ouerthrew diuers of his houses in the citie, for the which he did excommunicate them. The Romans then flying to the emperor, desired his aid and succor: but he, belike to pleasure the pope, gathering an armie, went rather against the Romans.

Excommunication abused.

The pope warreth against the Romans.

Then the popes armie, whose captaines were the earle of Tholouse (to purchase the popes fauor) and Peter the foresaid bishop of Winchester (whom the pope for the same had sent for from England, partly for his treasure, partly for his practise and skill in feats of war) and the emperors host ioyned togither, and bordering about the citie of Rome, cast downe the castles or mansions belonging to the citizens round about the suburbs, to the number of eightéene, and destroyed all their vines and vineyards about the citie. Wherat the Romans being not a little offended, brast out of the citie, with more heate then order, to the number of 100000 (as the storie reporteth) to destroy Viterbium the popes citie with sword and fire. But the multitude being vnordered and out of batell raie, and vnprouided for ieopardies which by the way might happen, fell into the hands of their enemies, who were in wait for them, and of them destroyed a great number, so that on both parts were slaine to the diew of 30000: but the most part was of the citizens. And this dissension thus begun was not soone ended, but continued long after.

A great slaughter of the Romans by the pope. Ex Parisiensi, pag. 92.

The church of Rome degenerated from the image of the true church.

By these and such other stories, who séeth not how farre the church of Rome hath degenerated from the true image of the right church of Christ, which by the rule and example of the gospell ought to be a daughter of peace, not a mother of debate, not a reuenger of her selfe, nor a séeker of wars; but a forgiuer of iniuries, humbly and patiently referring all reuenge to the Lord; not a raker for riches, but a winner of soules; not contending for worldly maistership, but humbling themselues as seruants, and not vicars of the Lord; but ioyntly like brethren seruing togither, bishops with bishops, ministers with ministers, deacons with deacons; and not as maisters separating themselues by superioritie one from another; and briefly communicating togither in doctrine and counsell, one particular church with another, not as a mother one ouer another, but rather as a sister church one with another, séeking together the glorie of Christ, and not their owne. And such was the church of Rome first in the old ancient beginning of her primitiue state, especially while the crosse of persecution yet kept the bishops & ministers vnder in humilitie of heart and feruent calling vpon the Lord for helpe; so that happie was that christian then, which with libertie of conscience onely might hold his life, how barely soeuer he liued. And as for the pride and pompe of the world, as striuing for patrimonies, buying of bishoprikes, gaping for benefices, so far was this off from them, that then they had little leisure and lesse list yea once to thinke vpon them. Neither did the bishops then of Rome fight to be consuls of the city, but sought how to bring the consuls vnto Christ, being glad if the consuls would permit them to dwell by them in the citie. Neither did they then presume so high, to bring the emperors neckes vnder their girdles, but were glad to saue necks in any corner from the sword of the emperors. Then lacked they outward peace, but abounded with inward consolation, Gods holy spirit mightilie working in their hearts. Then was one catholike vnitie of truth and doctrine amongst all churches against errors and sects. Neither did the east and west, nor distance of place diuide the church, but both the east church and west church, the Grécks and Latins made all one church. And albeit there were then fiue patriarchall sées appointed for order sake, differing in regions, and peraduenture also in some rites one from another: yet all these consenting together in one vnitie of catholike doctrine, hauing one God, one Christ, one faith, one baptisme, one spirit, one head, and linked together in one bond of charitie, and in one equalitie of honor, they made all together one body, one church, one communion, called one catholike, vniuersal, and apostolicall church. And so long as this knot of charitie and equalitie did ioyne them in one vnitie together, so long the church of Christ flourished and increased, one readie to helpe and harbor another, in time of distresse, as Agapetus and Vigilius flying to Constantinople were there aided by the patriarch, &c: so that all this while, neither forren enemie, neither Saracen nor Soldan, nor Sultan, nor Calipha, nor Cozalmine, nor Turke had any power greatly to harme it.

Difference betweene the church of Rome that was, and the church of Rome that now is.

East church. West church.

Catholike.

The schisme betweene the Greeke church and the church of Rome. Equalitie mother of concord.

But through the malice of the enemie, this catholike vnitie did not long continue, and all by reason of the bishop of Rome, who not contented to be like his brethren, began to extend himself and to claime superiority aboue the other foure patriarchall sées, and all other churches in the world. And thus as equalitie amongst christian bishops was by pride and singularitie oppressed, so vnitie began by little & little to be dissolued, and the Lords cote, which the souldiers left whole, to be diuided. Which cote of christian vnitie, albeit of long time it had béen now seameript before by the occasion aforesaid: yet notwithstanding in some peece it held togither in some meane agréement, vnder subiection to the sée of Rome, till the time of this pope Gregorie the ninth, An. 1230: at which time ths rupture and schisme of the church brake out into a plaine diuision, vtterly disseuering the east church from the west church vpon this occasion.

The cause and occasion why the Greeke church vtterly brake from the Romans.

There was a certaine archbishop elected to an archbishoprike among the Grecians, who comming to Rome to bee confirmed, could not be admitted vnlesse he promised a very great sum of money. Which when he refused to doe, and detested the execrable simonie of the court of Rome, hee made his repaire home againe to his owne countrie vnconfirmed, declaring there to the whole nobilitie of that land the case how it stood. For the more confirmation whereof there were others also, which comming lately from Rome, and there had proued the same or worse, came in and gaue testimony to his saying. Whereupon all the churches of the Grecians the same time hearing this, departed vtterly away from the church of Rome, which was in the daies of this pope Gregorie the ninth. Insomuch that the archbishop of Constantinople comming afterward to the generall councell at Lions, there openly declared, that whereas before time he had vnder him aboue thirtie bishoprikes and suffragans, now he had not three; adding moreouer, that all the Grecians and certaine others, with Antioch and the whole empire of Romania, euen to the gates almost of Constantinople, were gone from the obedience of the church of Rome, &c. Mat. Paris, fol. 112, &c. fol. 186.

Matth. Paris. fol. 112.

All Grecia gone from the obedience of the church of Rome. Ex Matth. Parisiensi. fol. 186.

By the occasion of which separation aforesaid of the Grecians from pope Gregorie, it happened shortly after, being the yeare of our Lord 1237, that Germanus archbishop and patriarch of Constantinople wrote to the said pope Gregorie the ninth, humblie desiring him to studie and séeke some meanes of vnitie, how the seamelesse cote of the Lord Jesus thus lamentablie rent, not with hands of souldiers, but by discord of prelats may be healed againe; offering this moreouer, that if hee will take the paines to stir out, he for his part, notwithstanding his old age and féeble body, would not refuse to meet him in the mid way, to the intent that the truth on both sides being debated by the scriptures, the wrong part may be reduced, the slander stopped, and vnitie reformed betweene them.

Germanus patriarch of Constantinople writeth to pope Gregorie the ninth.

This request of the patriarch, as it was both godly and reasonable, so it had béen the bishops part againe with like humilitie to haue condescended to the same, and glad with all his might to helpe forward the reformation of christian vnitie in the church of Christ, and so to haue shewed himselfe the sonne of peace: but the proud bishop of Rome more like the forme of discord and dissension, standing still vpon his maiestie, refused thus to doe: but writing againe answere to his letters with great disdaine, séeking nothing else but onely how to aduance his sée aboue all other churches; and not onely that, but also shortly after sent forth his preaching friers to moue all christians to take the signe of the crosse, and to fight against the Grecians no otherwise then against the Turks and Saracens: insomuch that in the ile of Cyprus many good men and martyrs were slaine for the same, as by the letters of the said Germanus patriarch of Constantinople is to be séene.

The pope setteth the west church to fight against the east church. Ex Matth. Parisiensi. fol. 112.

The tenor of the which letter to the pope, with the popes answere againe to him, being long and tedious to reade, are extant in the historie of Mat. Parisiensis, there to bee séene and found. The summarie effect whereof notwithstanding, I thought here briefly to notifie for the simple and vnlearned multitude, which vnderstanding not the Latine, may hereby perceiue the fault of this schisme, not so much to rest in the Gréeke church, as in the church of Rome, as by the contents of his letter may appeare.

Ex libro Mat. Parisiensi manuscripto, fol. 3. & 111.

The effect of the patriarch of Constantinople his letter to pope Gregorie the ninth.

The letter of Germanus patriarch of Constantinople to pope Gregorie the ninth, An. 1237.

IN the which letter the said Germanus patriarch of Constantinople writing to pope Gregorie, first after his reuerend salutation and preamble following vpon the same, entring then towards the matter, sheweth the occasion of his writing, which was by fiue obseruant friers repairing that waies, whom he gentlie receiuing into his house, had conference with them touching this discord between the two churches, how it might be reduced againe to vnitie: and afterward perceiuing the said friers to make their iourney towards Rome, he thought therfore by them to write his letters. Wherin he first lamenting this diuision in the house of God, and reciting the inconueniences which come thereof, by the example of Iuda and Israel, Ierusalem and Samaria, Cain and Abel, Esau and Iacob; also of other such like, both priuat and publike societies, where brother fighteth against brother, like as amongst fishes the greater deuoureth the lesser: he proceedeth then further gently to exhort pope Gregorie to the studie of vnitie.

He sheweth the inconuenience of discord.

And forsomuch as the pope had accursed (belike) those churches of the Greeks before, he therefore taking his ground vpon the words of S. Paul (Gal. 1.) where he accurseth euery such person and persons whatsoeuer they be either man or angell of heauen, that shall preach any other gospell then hath been preached, &c: willeth the pope to stand with him vpon the same ground of the apostles curse: so that if the stroke of that curse haue light vpon him or his churches, he desireth him to shew the wound, and to helpe to wipe away the blood, to minister some spirituall implaster, to bind vp the sore, and to saue

Galath. 1.

Digitized by Google

saue his brethren from perishing which lay in danger, according to the saying of the wise man: A brotherly friend is tried in aduersitie, &c.

Salomon.

But if we (saith he) of the Greeke church bee free from the stripe of this curse of the apostle, & that you Italians and of the Latine church be stricken therewith, and lie thereby in danger of destruction, I trust that you through ignorance and wilfull obstinacie will not so suffer your selues to be separated from the Lord, but rather will suffer a thousand deaths before, if it were possible for a man so often to die.

Whether the church of the Greekes or the popes church lieth more vnder the danger of Gods curse.

And as touching this great discord betweene vs, if either contrarietie of doctrine, or swaruing from the ancient canons, or diuersitie of rites receiued of our forefathers bee any cause thereof, we here take heauen and earth to witnesse, that wee for our parts are readie, and desire also vpon due triall of profound truth by Gods word & inuocation of the Holy ghost, to ioyne hands with you, or you to ioyne with vs. But to say the verie tauth, & to tell you plaine, this we suppose, that many mightie and noble potentates would sooner incline to your obedience, were it not that they feared your vniust oppressions, your insatiable exactions, & inordinate prouisions wherwith you wring your subiects. By reason whereof haue risen amongst vs cruell wars, one fighting against another, desolation of cities, buls and interdictions set vpon church dores, diuision of brethren, and churches of the Grecians left whithout seruice, where God should be praised. So that now only one thing lacketh, which I beleeue to bee predefined & appointed from aboue long before to vs Grecians, the time I meane of marryrdome, which also now hasteneth fast vpon vs, that the tribunall of tyrants should be opened, and the seats of torments bee set, that the blood of martyrs should be spilled, and we brought to the stage of marryrdome, to fight for the crowne of glorie.

The Greeks afraid of the popes oppressions.

The patriarch of Constantinople prophesieth of the martyrdome and slaughter of the Grecians.

This that I do speake, and wherfore I speake it, the noble iland of Cyprus doth alreadie know and feele, which hath made many new martyrs, and hath seene valiant souldiers of Christ, which of long time before passing by water & tears of sorrow, now at last haue also passed through fire, and so entred into the heauenly rest. How say you, bee these good and seemely, O holy pope, the successor of S. Peter the apostle? Is this the bidding of that good Peter, the meeke and humble disciple of Christ? Doth he thus instruct the seniors and elders in his epistle, where he writeth in this wise? The elders which are among you, I beseech, which am also a fellow elder with them, & witnes of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glorie that shall be opened. Feed the flocke of God which is amongst you, hauing care & sight ouer it, not of a coaction as compelled against your wils, but willingly of your owne accord, not for filthie lucre sake, but freely and heartily, neither as bearing dominion and lordship ouer the church, but shewing your selues as an example to the flocke: and when the chiefe pastor shal appeare, you shall receiue an incorruptible crowne of eternall glorie, &c. And this is the doctrine of Peter, as they shall see, which do not obey it. As for vs, the other part of the said epistle is sufficient: wherein he willeth them to reioyce which are in heauinesse through manifold temptations, that the triall of their faith being much more precious then gold that perisheth, and is tried in fire, may be their laud, honor, and glorie, at the appearing of the Lord Iesu, &c. But beare with me I pray you (O holy father, and of al your predecessors most meeke) and suffer my words though they be something sharpe, for they bee sighings of a sorrowfull heart.

The popes persecution in the ile of Cyprus.

The tyrannie and auarice of the pope thakened by the words of Saint Peter: 1. Pet. 5.

1. Pet. 1.

Wherefore gird about your loines with fortitude, and light vp the candle of your discretion, and seeke the grote that is lost, of the vnitie, I meane of faith. And we will also with like compassion ioine with your holinesse, and will not spare this weake bodie of mine, in pretending any excuse either of age or length of the way: for the more laborious the trauell is, the more crownes it bringeth. And S. Paul saith: euery man shall receiue reward according to his trauell, &c.

He exhorteth the pope to come and meet with him, that they might confer together about the vnitie of faith.

Neither are we ignorant (if it please your holines) that like as we Grecians for our parts do labor in all respects to keepe & obserue the sinceritie of true faith and doctrine, not to erre ne swarue in any part or point from the statutes of the blessed apostles and ancient fathers: so the church likewise of old Rome doth for hir part labor also (we know well) to follow the sincere veritie of christian doctrine, and thinketh hir selfe to erre in nothing, nor to need any remedie or reformation. And this wee know is the iudgement and saying of both the churches, as well of the Greekes, as of the Latines. For no man can see any spot in his owne face, without he stoope downe to the glasse, or else be admonished by some other, whether his face be blotted or no. Euen so haue wee many great and faire glasses set before vs: first the cleare gospell of Christ, the epistles of the apostles, and diuinitie bookes of ancient writers. Let vs therefore looke in them well: they will shew euery mans mind and iudgement, whether he go right or wrong. The God of peace tread downe Satan speedilie vnder our feet. The author of peace confound the sower of discord. He that is the cause of all goodnesse destroy the hater of that which is good, and which giueth cause of offence and slander. And he which is God of all ioy and peace, send to vs, which are the shepheards of his sheepe reasonable, the angel of peace, and the messenger of great glad tidings, as

The Greeke church sound and sincere in doctrine.

He exhorteth the church of Rome to looke hir face in Gods glasse, that is, to trie their doctrine by Gods word.

he did in the nativitie of Christ, to the shepheards of brute sheepe and vnreasonable, and make vs worthie to sing that ioyfull song of Gods praise: Gloria in excelsis Deo, & in terra pax, hominibus bona voluntas: and to receiue one another with an holy kisse. The grace of our lord Iesus Christ, and the peace of God the father, and the communion of the Holy spirit be with you alwaies: Amen.

Another epistle of the said Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and primate of the Greeke church, to the cardinals of Rome.

An other letters of Germanus patriarch of Constantinople to the cardinals.

A Nother letter the said Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, wrote also the same time to the popes cardinals, wherin he first commendeth them for their wisedome and counsell, and sheweth what vtilitie commeth by good counsell giuing. For so much as God (saith hee) many times, that which he hideth from one, inspireth to another, so that that good thing which by the almightie God is sunderly dispended to diuers, through common counsell and conference spreadeth to the publike vtilitie of many, &c. After this eftsones he beginneth to exhort them, that they like charitable ministers, and discreet counsellors, will take in hand the spirituall armor of God, to cast downe the stop and partition wall of the old discord betweene the Greeke and Latin church, and that they will be a meanes to the bishop of Rome, that they which so long haue been disseuered by dissension, may now be conioyned in vnitie of peace, in brotherly charitie and communion of faith.

Concerning which matter, I haue (saith he) already written to his holinesse. And now I beseech the king of heauen, which tooke the shape of a seruant, to helpe his miserable seruants, & was exalted vpon the crosse, to raise them vp which were fallen into the profunditie of desolation, that he will vouchsafe to put from your hearts all elation of mind, extolling it selfe ouer and aboue the vnitie of your brethren and fellow seruants, and to lighten your consciences with the true light of vnderstanding, that we may all togither agree in one, & that there be no schisme amongst vs. Let vs therefore as we are instructed, so abide in one mind, that it bee not said of vs, as it was of the Corinthians before vs; I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, I of Cephas, and I of Christ: but that all we, as we hold the name of Christ, and are all called christians, so may also abide in that wherein wee are instructed in one mind, that is, to follow loue and charitie in Christ Iesus, hauing alwaies in our hearts the words of the apostle, saying: One Lord, one faith, one baptisme. 1. Cor. 1.

And now to be plaine with you in that I haue to say, I shall desire you not to be offended with me in vttring the truth as a friend vnto you. The words (saith Salomon) of a wise man telling truth, be like to nailes which bee driuen in deepe: And truth for the most part breedeth enemies. And therefore though I am partly afraid, yet wil I simplie confesse the truth vnto you. Certes this diuision of christian vnitie amongst vs, proceedeth of no other cause but onely of the tyrannie, oppression, and exactions of the church of Rome, which of a mother is become a stepdame, and hath put hir children from hir whom long time she nourished (after the maner of a rauening bird, which driueth hir yong from hir:) which children how much the more humble & obedient they are to hir, the lesse shee esteemeth them, & treadeth them vnder foot, not regarding the saying of the gospell: Who so humbleth himselfe shall be exalted.

The tyrannie and oppression of the church of Rome, is the onely cause of breaking vnity betweene the Greeke church and the Latine.

Let modestie therefore something temper you, and let the auarice of the court of Rome, although it cannot well out of the flesh which is bred in the bone, yet surcease a while, and let vs togither condescend to the triall of the truth; which truth being found out on both sides, let vs constantly imbrace the same. Luke 18.

For why, wee haue been altogither sometimes both Italians and Grecians in one faith, and vnder the same canons, hauing peace each with other, and defending one another, and confounding the enemies of the church. At what time many flying out of the west parts (whilest that the tyrannie of the heretiks indured) made their concourse to vs, and were receiued, and part fled vnto you, that is, old Rome, as to a strong towre of refuge, and so receiued they comfort in both places, and one brother was thus receiued into the bosome of another, by mutuall loue for their defence.

The old amitie and concord betweene the east church and the west.

Then after, when Rome had been often distressed by the barbarous and heathen nations, the Grecians were euer readie to rescue and deliuer them. Did not Agapetus and Vigilius flie vnto Constantinople by reason of the dissensions then at Rome, and being honorablie receiued, were here defended vnder our protection: although the like kindnesse was neuer yet shewed of your part to vs againe in our like necessities. Notwithstanding, we ought to do good to them also that be vngratefull; for so doth the sea participat hir smooth & calme tides euen vnto the pirats. And so God causeth the sun to shine vpon the iust and vniust. But (alas for sorrow) what bitter diuision is this, that hath thus sequestred vs asunder? One of vs detracteth another, shunning the companie one of another, as the damnation of his soule. What a mortall hatred is this come among vs? If you thinke we are fallen, then do you helpe to lift vs vp, and be not to vs a stumbling blocke to our bodily ruine, Agapetus and Vigilius fled to Constantinople for succor.

Digitized by Google

but helpers vnto the ſpirituall reſurrection of our ſoules. So ſhall we acknowledge our ſelues bound vnto you to giue you condigne thanks accordingly.

Paul rebuketh Peter. Galath. 2.

But if the blame and firſt origin of all this offence proceedeth from Rome, and the ſucceſſors of Peter the apoſtle; then read ye the words of ſaint Paul to the Galathians, ſaying: When Peter came to Antioch, I withſtood him in the face, becauſe he was to be rebuked, &c. Howbeit this reſiſtance was no cauſe of any diſcord, or breach betweene them, but the cauſe rather of further ſearch and profounder diſputations, prouoking temporall agreement. For they were faſt ioyned togither in the bond of charitie in Chriſt, agreeing in faith and conformitie of doctrine, ſeparated by no ambition or auarice. In which points would God we alſo were like vnto them! This to vs in our minds gendreth a great offence, that you gaping ſo greedilie after terren poſſeſſions, ſcrape togther all that you can ſcratch and rake. You heape vp gold and ſiluer, and yet pretend that you be the diſciples of him which ſaid: Gold and ſiluer I haue none, &c. You make whole kingdomes tributarie to you, and kings and princes your vaſſals. You augment your monie by vſurie, and by feats of merchandize. You vnteach by your deeds, that which you teach in words.

Acts 3.

He meaneth of the kingdome of England and other more which were made tributarie to the ſee of Rome.

The immoderate auarice of the court of Rome.

Moderate your ſelues therefore with more temperance, that you may be an example to vs and to all the world. You ſee how good a thing it is one brother to helpe another. Onely God alone needeth no helpe or counſell, but men need to bee holpen one of another. And were it not that I doe reuerence the bleſſed apoſtle Peter, the chiefe of Chriſts apoſtles, the rocke of our faith, I would here put you in remembrance how greatly this rocke was ſhaken and remoued from the foundation, at the ſight of a ſillie woman: and Chriſt of his ſecret purpoſe permitted the ſame, which by the crowing of the cocke brought him againe to remembrance of that which was foretold him, and raiſed him from the ſlumber of deſperation. Then he being thus waked, waſhed his face with teares, confeſſing himſelfe before God and all the world, to bee a true paterne of repentance, which before bare the keyes of the kingdome, as ſaying thus vnto vs: May not he which falleth, riſe againe? Oh you which are fallen, riſe vp and behold me, and hearken vnto me, trauelling toward paradiſe; the gates whereof to open I haue receiued power.

Peters faith ſhaken.

Peter an enſample of repentance.

And thus do I write vnto you, not for any inſtruction, but onely to put you in remembrance: for I know how God hath indued you with all wiſedome and knowledge; as Salomon ſaith: Giue only occaſion to the wiſe, and hee will learne wiſedome: Teach the iuſt man, & he will be glad to take inſtruction.

Chriſtian countries and nations in the eaſt parts which are not vnder the biſhop of Rome.

This one thing more I will ſay and ſo make an end: There bee great and mightie nations that are of like mind and opinion with vs. Firſt the Ethiopians that inhabite the chiefeſt part of the eaſt. After that the Syrians, and other more of greater number then they, and more diſpoſed to vertue, as the Hiberi, Alani, Gothi, Charari, with innumerable people of Ruſſia, and the kingdome of great Victorie of the Vulgarians. And all theſe are obedient vnto vs as their mother church, perſiſting hitherto conſtantly in the ancient and true orthodoxall faith immoueable.

Chriſt onely head of the church.

The God of all holineſſe, which for our ſakes became man, and which onely is the head of his church and congregation, vouchſafe to gather vs againe togither in vnitie, and grant that the Grecian church togither with hir ſiſter church of old Rome may glorifie the ſame Chriſt, the prince of peace, by the vnitie of faith, to the reſtitution of ſound & wholeſome doctrine, wherein many yeares agone they haue agreed and were vnited. God grant vnto you brotherly charitie, and the hand of the moſt mighty God gouerne you all (holy cardinals) till that ioyfully ye arriue in the hauen of euerlaſting tranquillitie. The grace of God be with you all, Amen. Ex Matth. Pariſienſ. fol. 111.

The pope proclameth war againſt the Greeke church. The archbiſhop of Antioch and Conſtantinople excommunicate the pope.

Shortly after the ſending of theſe letters, pope Gregorie prepared to ſend men of war ſigned with the croſſe to fight againſt the Grecians: whereupon the archbiſhop of Antioch, with the ſaid Germanus ſolemnly excommunicated the pope, after he firſt had excommunicated them: Pariſ. fol. 118. In the meane time by the tenor of theſe letters of the patriarch ſent to the pope and to the cardinals, it is euident to all men that haue eyes in their heads to ſee: firſt how the whole vniuerſall church of Chriſt, from the eaſt parts to the weſt, in ancient times were altogither vnited in one conſent of doctrine, and linked togither in brotherly charitie, one church brotherly to helpe another, both with temporall aid and ſpirituall counſell, as cauſe required. Neither was then any one mother church aboue other churches, but the whole vniuerſall church was the mother church and ſpouſe of the Lord, to euery faithfull beleeuer. Under which vniuerſall church in generall were comprehended all other particular churches in ſpeciall, as ſiſter churches togither, not one greater then another, but all in like equalitie, as God gaue his gifts ſo ſeruing one another, euer holding togither the vnitie of faith and ſiſterly loue. And ſo long was it and rightly might ſo be called the catholike church, hauing in it true vnity, vniuerſalitie, and free conſent. Unity in doctrine, vniuerſality in communicating and ioyning togither of voices, conſent in ſpirit and iudgement. For whatſoeuer was taught at Rome touching faith and ſaluation, it was no other then was taught at Antioch, Syria, &c.

Five notes to be conſidered.

The firſt note.

The true catholike church where it was, and when.

Vnitie. Vniuerſalitie. Conſent.

Secondly, how in proceſſe of time, through occaſion of the biſhops of Romes tyrannie and violent oppreſſion, this ring of equalitie being broken all flew in pieces, the eaſt church from the weſt, the Grecks from the Latins, and that which was one before, now was made two; vnitie turned to diuiſion, vniuerſalitie to ſingularitie, and free conſent to diſſenſion.

The ſecond note.

Thirdly, here is alſo to be noted, after this pitifull breach of equalitie, how many and what great nations departed from the communion of the church of Rome, and eſpecially about this time aboue ſpecified of pope Gregorie the ninth, An. 1230: ſo that both before and after that time many councels were holden, and many things concluded in the weſt church, whereunto the one halfe of chriſtendome lying in the eaſt parts, did neuer agree: and contrarie, many councels holden with them, which in the Latine church were not receiued. So that the church now as the loſt the benefit of vniuerſall conſent, ſo alſo ſhe loſt the name catholike. Whereupon this queſtion is to be aſked, that when the councell of Latran vnder pope Innocent the third, ordained the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, and auricular confeſſion here in the weſt church, without the free conſent of the eaſt church, whether the ſame doctrine is to be counted catholike or not?

The third note.

The church hath hir name of catholike, whereby and when.

Whether the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, made without the free conſent of the eaſt churches, be catholike or no?

Fourthly, in the departing of theſe churches from the biſhop of Rome, here alſo is to be noted, that the ſame churches of the Grecks, notwithſtanding they ſequeſtred themſelues, and fell out with the church of Rome, and that iuſtly: yet they kept their vnitie ſtill with their God, and receiued ſtill the true ὀρθοδοξίαν; that is, The true and ſincere doctrine of faith, readie to debate and trie the truth of their religion by the ſcriptures, as they here in their owne writings deſire to haue the truth examined, according as ye haue heard. Wherefore the church of Rome hath done them open wrong, which being offred ſo gentlie to trie and to be tried by the truth of Gods word, not onely would ſtand to no triall, nor abide conference, but alſo hath excommunicated them as heretiks, which appeare here to bee more orthodoxall chriſtians then they themſelues.

The fourth note.

Fiftly, theſe things thus ſtanding, then haue we to conclude that the church of Rome falſely pretendeth it ſelfe catholike. For if the name of catholike muſt needs import an vniuerſall conſent of the whole, how can that be catholike where the conſent of ſo many famous and true chriſtian churches hath been lacking; and furthermore where the conſent that hath been amongſt themſelues, hath rather been coacted then any true or free conſent? Which is eaſie to be proued: for let theſe fires and fagots ceaſe, let kings and princes leaue to preſſe their ſubiects with the popes obedience; but let the ſcripture, and the biſhops alone euery one in his owne dioceſſe to gouerne their flocke after the rule of Gods word, and how few bee there in this weſt end of the world (trow you) that would not doe the ſame that theſe Grecians, Ethiopians, and Syrians haue done before vs? And thus much by the occaſion of this patriarchs letters ſent to pope Gregorie concerning the Grecians.

The fifth note. The church of Rome proued not to be catholike.

The proceedings of Rome ſtand vpon no free conſent, but are coacted.

Whoſe doings when I conſider, as I cannot but commend their wiſedome, and iudge their ſtate happie and bleſſed, in ſhaking off from their neckes the miſerable yoke of the popes tyranny: ſo on the other ſide conſidering with my ſelfe the wretched thraldome of theſe our churches here in the weſt part of the world vnder the biſhop of Rome, I cannot tell whether more to maruell or to lament their pitifull ſtate, who were brought into ſuch oppreſſion and ſlauerie vnder him, that neither they could abide him, nor yet durſt caſt him off. So vnſufferable were his exactions, ſo terrible was his tyrannie, his ſuſpenſions and excommunications much like to a mad mans dagger, drawne at euery trifle, that no chriſtian patience could ſuffer it, nor nation abide it. Againe, ſo deepe did hee ſit in their conſciences, falſlie beleeuing him to haue the authoritie of S. Peter, that for conſcience ſake neither king nor Cеſar durſt withſtand him, much leſſe poore ſubiects once mute againſt him. And although his takings and ſpoilings namely in this realme of England were ſuch, that neither the laitie nor ſpiritualtie could beare them: yet was there no remedie, beare them they muſt, or elſe the popes ſentence was vpon them, to curſe them as blacke as pitch.

The miſerable ſtate of the weſt parts of chriſtendome vnder the pope. The popes excommunications like to a fooles dagger. The falſe perſuaſion of the popes ſupremacie, cauſe of much wretchednes.

In reading the hiſtories of theſe times, any good heart would lament & rue, to ſee the miſerable captiuitie of the people what they ſuffred vnder this thraldome of the biſhop of Rome, whereof part hath been ſhewed before, more (God willing) ſhall follow hereafter, and ſome part preſently I mind to erpreſſe.

A briefe table or declaration of the popes vnreaſonable gatherings, exactions, and oppreſſions in the realme of England.

A briefe table of the popes ſpoiling and getting of Engliſh money in the daies of king Henrie the third.

And firſt to begin with the elections of the biſhops, abbats, deanes, and priors within this realme, it cannot bee told what maſſe of money grew to the popes coffers thereby, eſpecially in this kings daies: forſomuch as in his time lightly no election happened either of archbiſhop, biſhop, abbat, or any rome of dignitie, but when the couent or chapter had choſen one to their mind, the king, who had maried a ſtranger, and and sought therefore to prefer strangers, would set vp another. By reason whereof, when the other part was faine to appeale to Rome, and there to plead the case, no small riuers of English mony, besides expences and trauell by the way, went flowing to the popes sea. And although the election went neuer so cleere, yet the new elect must needs respect the holy father with some gentle reward, and further by his oth was bound euery three yeeres, either in his owne person, or by another to visit Limina apostolorum.

Mony comming to the pope by election of John Herford, abbat of S. Albons.

So in the house of S. Albons, when John Herford was elected abbat, their publike election was not enough, but for the confirmation of the same the monks were faine to send Reinold the physician, and Nicolas a monke, to Rome with a sufficient bag of mony, through the mediation whereof the election might stand, and the new abbat sworne euery third yeere by himselfe, or another to visit the dooresels of the apostles.

Eight thousand marks giuen out of the bishoppicke of Winchester to the pope, about the election of William Rale, An. 1243.

Another such like contention happened betweene the king and the monks of Winchester, about the election of William Rale, whom the monks had chosen; but the king refused, willing to place a stranger, and therefore sent to Rome his messengers, Theobald a monke of Westminster, and Walter Alexander a lawyer, with no small sum of mony to euacuat the election of the foresaid William Rale: commanding moreouer, that the gates of Winchester should be shut against him, and no man so hardy there to receiue him in the house. Whereupon the said W. being excluded, after he had laid his curse vpon the whole city of Winchester, made his repaire to Rome, wherefore eight hundred marks being promised to the pope, his bishoppricke (spite of the kings heart) was confirmed, and he receiued. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 164. & 240.

After the death of Stephan Langton archbishop of Canturbury, ye heard before how the monks had elected Walter a monke of Canturbury. But the king to stop that election, sent vp his procters, M. Alexander Stanes, and M. Henry Sandford bishop of Rochester to the pope, to euacuat that election, and to place Richard chancellor of Lincolne. Which procors perceiuing at first the pope and cardinals, how hard and vnwilling they were thereunto, and considering how all things might be bought for mony, rather then the king should faile of his purpose, they promised on the kings behalfe to the pope for maintaining his wars against Frederike the emperor, a desme or tenth part of all the moueables in the realme of England and of Ireland. At the contemplation of which mony the pope eftsones thinking to passe with the king, began to picke quarrels with the foresaid Walter, for not answering rightly to his questions about Christs descending to hell, making of Christs body on the altar, the weeping of Rachel for her children, the being dead before; about the sentence of excommunication, and certaine causes of matrimony. His answers whereunto when they were not to the popes mind, he was therefore put backe, and the kings man preferred, which cost the whole realme of England and Ireland the tenth part of their moueable goods, by reason whereof, what mony was raised to the popes gazophylacium, I leaue to the estimation of the reader, An. 1229. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 71.

The tenth part of al moueables in England and Ireland giuen to the pope, 1229.

Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 71. b.

And yet for all this, the said Richard the costly archbishop of Canturbury, within lesse then two yeers after, falling out with the king about the castell and lordship of Tunbridge, went and complained of him to the pope. In the trauers whereof it cost the king a great peece of mony besides, and yet missed he his purpose. In the which iourny the said archbishop in his returne homeward by the way departed, An. 1231.

Mony spent at Rome between the king and the archbishop of Canturbury.

The costly election of the bishop of Durham.

Of the like dissension ye heard before betweene the king and the couent of Durham, for not chusing M. Lucas the kings chaplen, whom the king offred to be their bishop. About the suite whereof, when much mony was bestowed on both sides wel fauoredly, the pope defeating them both, admitted neither M. William, nor M. Lucas, but ordained the bishop of Sarum to be their bishop, An. 1228. Ex Paris.

Mony comming to the pope for the election of the bishop of Conentry and Lichfield.

Betweene the monks of Couentry and the canons of Lichfield rose another like quarrell, which of them should haue the superior voice in chusing their bishop. In which suite, after much mony bestowed in the court of Rome, the pope to requalifie againe each part with some retribution for their mony receiued, toke this order indifferently betweene them, that each part by course should haue the chusing of their bishop, An. 1228. Ex Paris, fol. 68.

Edmund archbishop of Canturbury condemned at Rome in a 1000. marks.

What businesse fell likewise betweén Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, and the monks of Rochester, about the election of Richard Wendour, to be their bishop? And what was the end? First the archbishop was faine to trauell himselfe to the pope, and so did the couent also send their procors. Who belike being better monied, weighed downe the cause, so that the good archbishop in that cause against the monks, and partly in an other cause against the earle of Arundell, was condemned of the pope in a thousand marks. Whereof the greatest part (no doubt) redounded to the popes coffers, An. 1238. Mat. Paris, fol. 114.

The fifth part of all the clergy granted to the pope.

After the returning of the said Edmund archbishop of Canturbury againe from Rome, it chanced that the monks of Canturbury had elected their prior without his assent: for the which he did excommunicat the monks, and euacuat their election. Not long after this, the popes eractors went about to extort from the churchmen the fifth part of their goods to the popes vse, fighting then against the emperor. This cruell eraction being a great while resisted by the prelats and clergy, at length the foresaid archbishop thinking thereby to get the victorie against the monks, was contented to grant to the said eraction, adding moreouer of his owne for an ouerplus eight hundred marks: whereupon the rest of the clergy was faine to follow after, and contribute to the popes eractors, An. 1240. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 132. b.

Great expence of mony in the court of Rome, between the bishop of Lincoln and the cathedrall church.

In the church of Lincolne (whose see before the conquest was in Dorkester, and afterwards by William Rufus translated from thence to Lincolne) rose a grieuous contention betweene Robert Grosthead then bishop, and the canons of the cathedrall church, about their visitation, whether the bishop should visit them or the deane: which matter being put vnto arbitrators, could not so be composed, before the bishop and the chapter after their appeale made vnto the pope, went both vnto Rome, and there after they had well wasted their purses, they receiued at length their answer, but paied full sweetly for it, An. 1239. Parisiensis, fol. 119.

Mony comming to the pope, betweene the bishop of Lincolne and the monkes within his diocesse.

At what time the canons of Chichester had elected Robert Passelew to their bishop at the kings request, the archbishop with certaine other bishops taking part against the kings chaplen, repelled him, and set vp Richard Witch. Vpon this, what sending and going there was vnto Rome, and what mony bestowed about the matter, as well of the kings part as bishops; reade the story thereof in Mat. Paris, 182. 184. 186.

Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne (of whō relation was made before) hauing a great care how to bring the priuileged orders of religious houses within his precinct, vnder his subiection and discipline, went vnto Rome, and there with great labor and much effusion of mony (as the story saith) procured of the pope a mandat, whereby all such religious orders were commanded to be vnder his power and obedience. Not long after, the monks not abiding that (who could some weigh downe the bishop with mony) sent their factors to the pope, who with their golden eloquence so perswaded him and stirred their affections in such sort, that some they purchased to themselues freedome from their ordinary bishop. Whereof Robert Grosthead hauing intelligence made vp to Rome, and there complaining to the pope, declared how he was disappointed and confounded in his purpose, contrary to promises and assurance made to him before. Vnto whom pope Innocent loking with a sterne countenance, made this answer againe: Brother (said he) what is that to thee? Thou hast deliuered and discharged thine owne soule. It hath pleased vs to shew fauor vnto them. Is thine eye ill for that I am good? And thus was the bishop sent away with a flea in his eare, murmuring with himselfe, yet not so softly, but that the pope heard him say these words; O mony, mony, what canst not thou do in the court of Rome? Wherewith the pope being somewhat pinched, gaue this answer againe: O ye Englishmen, Englishmen, of all men most wretched, for all your seeking is how yee may consume and deuoure one another, &c. An. 1250. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 230.

How prettily the pope can take with both hands.

Mony may doe much at Rome.

The popes answer to Robert Grosthead.

It happened moreouer the same yeere, that the said Robert Grosthead excommunicated and depriued one Randulphus a beneficed person in his diocesse, being accused of incontinencie: who after the terme of forty daies, refusing to submit himselfe, the bishop wrote to the shiriffe of Rutland to apprehend him as contumax. Which shiriffe because he deferred or refused so to do (bearing fauor to the party) and being therefore solemnly excommunicat by the bishop, vttered his complaint to the king. Whereat the king taking great displeasure with the bishop for excommunicating his shiriffe, and would not first make his complaint to him, sendeth forthwith a substantiall messenger (M. Moneta) such as he was sure would speed vnto pope Innocent, by vertue of whose words the pope easie to be intreated, sendeth downe a prouiso to the abbat of Westminster, charging that no prelat nor bishop in the realme of England, should molest or enter action against any of the kings bailiffes or officers, in such matters as to the kings iurisdiction appertained. And thus was the strife ended not without some helpe and heap of English mony, so that no wind of any controuersie here stirred in England, were it neuer so small, but it blew some profit for the popes aduantage, An. 1250. Ex Paris, fol. 231.

Iustice peruerted by the popes authority for mony.

Mony comming to the pope by the election of Boniface archbishop of Canturbury, and of Ethelmare bishop of Winchester, both strangers and Frenchmen.

In like maner no little treasure grew to the popes coffers by the election of Boniface the queenes vncle a Frenchman to be archbishop of Canturbury, An. 1243: and of Ethelmare the queenes brother, to be bishop of Winchester against the wils of the prior and couent there, An. 1250: besides many such other erchetes, which made England poore, and the pope rich.

I come now something likewise to touch briefly of the popes dispensations, prouisions, eractions, contributions and extortions in England in this kings daies; for to discourse all, it is not one booke will hold it.

Marriage with Elenor the kings sister a nun, dispenced by the pope for mony.

Simon Montfort earle of Leicester had married Elenor the kings sister, and daughter of king John, who by report of stories had taken the mantell and ring. Wherefore the king and his brother Richard earle of Excester, were greatly offended with the marriage, which seeing the earle Simon made a hand of mony, and posting ouer to Rome, after he had talked a few a few words in pope Innocents eare, the marriage was good enough: and letters sent to Otho the popes legat here, to giue sentence solemnly with the earle. Notwithstanding the Dominike friers, and other of the like religious fraternitie, withstood that sentence of the pope stoutly, saying that the popes holinesse was therein deceiued, and soules in danger, that Christ was ielous ouer his wife, and that it could not bee any wise possible, that a woman which had vowed marriage with Christ, could afterward marry with any other, &c: An. 1238. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 114.

Digitized by Google

What inconuenience commeth by the popes dispensations.

As there was nothing so hard in the wide world, wherewith the pope would not dispence for mony: so by the said dispensations much mischef was wrought abroad. For by reason thereof, the people trusting vpon the popes dispensation, little regarded what they did, what they promised, or what they sware. As well appeared by this king Henry the third, who being a great eractor of the poore commons, as euer was any king before him or since, and thinking thereby to win the people soner to his deuotion, most faithfully promised them once or twice, & thereto bound himselfe with a solemne oth, both before the clergy and laity, to grant vnto them the old liberties and customes as wel of Magna charta, as Charta de foresta, perpetually to be obserued. Whereupon a Quindecim was granted to the king. But after the paiment was sure, the king trusting by the popes dispensation for a little mony to be discharged of his oth and couenant, went from that he had promised and sworne before.

Wilfull periury maintained by the popes dispensations.

In like maner the said king another time, being in need of mony, signed himselfe with the crosse, pretending and swearing deeply in the face of the whole parliament, that he would himselfe personally fight in the holy land against the Saracens. But as soone as the mony was taken, small care was had for performance of his oth, being so put in the head by certaine about him, that he needed not to passe of that periury, forsomuch as the pope for an hundred pounds or two, would quickly discharge him thereof. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 273.

Out of the same corrupt spring of these popish dispensations, haue proceeded also many other foule absurdities. For where many young men were in those daies, which inioied benefices, and were no priests: and when by the procurement of Robert Grosthead, bishop of Lincolne, the said young men should be forced, whether they would or not, to enter orders; they laying their purses together, sent to Rome, and obtained of the pope a dispensation to remaine still as they were, that is, to haue the fruits of benefices to finde them at schole or Vniuersitie, and yet themselues neither ministers to take charge, nor yelding any seruice for their profits taken: Ex Mat. Paris, fol. 256. Besides innumerable heapes of enormities more, proceeding of the popes dispensations, as dispensing one man to haue sundry bishopricks, to incroch pluralities of benefices, to make children parsons, to legitimate bastards, with such other like, the particulars whereof for breuities sake I doe omit to further opportunitie.

Enormities which spring out of the popes dispensations.

The intollerable oppression of the realme of England by the popes exactions and contributions, and other sleights vsed in the time of king Henry the third.

The miserable impouerishing of the realme by the popes promotions and contributions.

Although these emoluments, thus rising daily to the popes purse by simony and bribery, by elections and dispensations, might seeme sufficient to satisfie his greedy appetite: yet so vnsatiable was the auarice of that sea, that he not yet contented herewith, ouer and besides all this, sent euery where almost some legat or other into this realme to take for his aduantage. Insomuch that during all this kings time, the realme was neuer lightly without some of the popes ligiers, with all violence eracting and extorting continuall prouisions, contributions, and summes of mony to be leuied out of cels, abbies, priories, fruits of benefices, and bishopricks, and also lay mens purses, to the miserable impouerishing both of the clergy and temporalty, as hereunder followeth.

Cardinal Otho legat in England.

The receiuing of Otho the popes legat into the realme.

First, after Pandulphus, was sent into this realme cardinall Otho, procured by the king without the assent of his nobles, to the intent to all'll him in certaine affaires he had to do. At receiuing of which legat, great preparance was made, many rich and pretious gifts in scarlet, in plate, in Iewels, in mony and palfreies were giuen him. Whom the king also himselfe went as far as the sea side to receiue, bowing downe his head in low courtesie to the cardinals knees. To whom also the bishop of Winchester for his part gaue toward keeping of his house, fifty fat oxen, an hundred seemes of wheat, & eight great vessels of pure wine. This legat at his first comming beginneth first to bestow such benefices as he found vacant, vpon them whom he brought with him, without respect whether they were meet or vnmeet. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 103. {Anno 1237}

After this, the pope hearing how the nobles and commons of the realme began to stomack the cardinall for his excessiue procurations and eractions, sent for him home: but the king by reason he stood in feare of his nobles, & thought to haue a stay by the cardinall against all occurrents, intreated him to stay while he wrote to the pope to obtaine further licence for him to tary: & so did, not without some English mony ye may be sure.

Otho the legat seeketh to come into Scotland.

In this meane time of vacation, Otho thinking to lose no time, but to gather also some crums in Scotland, made as though he would set things there in order, which were in the church of Scotland to be reformed. and so commeth to the king of Scots, being then in Yorke with king Henry, to haue leaue to enter. Vnto whom the king thus made answer, that he neuer saw, to his remembrance, any popes legat in his land, neither was there any such need (God be praised) for such to be sent for. Matters there were well enough, and needed no helpe of his. And as he could neuer learne either in the daies of his father, or any his predecessors, that any such entrance to any legat was granted; so he for his part would not now begin. But yet notwithstanding, forsomuch as I heare (said he) that you are a good man, this I tell you before, that if ye will needs aduenture in, doe it warily, and take heed to your selfe, lest it happen to you otherwise then I would wish: for they bee a sauage and vnruly people, giuen much to murther, and shedding bloud, whom neither I my selfe am scarse able to bridle, so that if they fall vpon you, I shall not be able to helpe you. And how they also inuaded me, and sought to expell me from my kingdome, ye heard a late. And therefore I warne you before, take heed betime what ye thinke best to do. After the cardinall heard the king speake these words, he pluckt in his hornes, and durst proceed no further, but kept him still by the side of king Henry. Notwithstanding shortly after, the same legat comming to the borders of Scotland, there called the bishops to him, and so when he had well filled his bags, came backe againe. Ex. Matt. Paris, fol. 106. 123. b.

The king of Scots his answer to cardinall Otho.

The realme of Scotland hitherto neuer troubled with any popes legat.

Cardinal Otho stopped from going into Scotland.

It was not long after, but licence came from pope Gregory to his legat Otho, for his longer abode here in the realme (as welcome as water in the ship) with new authority also to proceed in the popes affaires. Who first shewing to the bishops and the clergy his letters of longer tarying, required of them, forsomuch as no man (said he) warreth of his owne charges, to be supported with new procurations; which was, to haue of euery able church foure marks; and where one church was not able to reach thereto, that other churches should ioine withall, to make the said mony. Notwithstanding the bishops a great while stood in the denial thereof. Paris, fol. 123. 128. 132. {Anno 1238}

Oppressions of the cardinall Otho the popes legat.

Besides, he assembled together all the blacke monks of S. Benedicts order, giuing to them strict orders, which shortly after for mony he released to them againe. Paris, fol. 116. 119.

Moreouer, by the said Otho, and other the popes eractions, with speciall buls directed downe for the same, collation of benefices being taken out of the hands of the patrons were giuen to light and vile runnagates, comming from Italy and other places, such as pleased the pope & his legat to bestow them vpon, to the great preiudice of the ancient liberty and right of the true patrons thereof. Whereupon the earles, and barons, and nobles of the realme, addressed letters vnto pope Gregory by sir Robert Twing knight, for redresse of such wrongs and iniuries, who otherwise should be forced (they said) to inuocat the succor of their king, who both was able, and no lesse was willing, according to his duty (they trusted) to reforme such enormities, and to defend the liberties of his realme. The tenor of whose writing is to be read in Matth. Paris, fol. 128. a.

The nobles of England write to pope Gregory for collation of benefices wrested out of their hands.

Not long after the same, in the yeere of our Lord 1240, came a new precept from pope Gregory, by Petrus Rubeus the popes Nuncio, to the foresaid Otho, that all beneficed men of the clergy, as well in England as in France, should pay to the pope the fifth part of their reuenews. Whereupon when the clergy men made their complaint to the king, seeking to be relieued by him; the king answered them againe, that he neither would, ne durst stand against the pope in any case, and so without al hope of succor, sent them away. Parisiensis, fol. 132. Then were the archbishops, bishops, abbats, and prelats of the church commanded to assemble together at Reading, there to heare the popes pleasure and commandement concerning the paiment of this fifth part, where in the end thus the matter concluded; that the prelats desired a further time to be giuen them to aduise vpon the matter; and for that season the assembly brake vp: Paris, 122. Notwithstanding at last, after many excuses and exceptions laid in by the clergy: first, that because the mony was gathered to fight against the emperor, they ought not to contribute their mony, contrary to the liberties of the church. Item, forsomuch as they had paid a tenth not long before vnto the pope, vpon condition that no more such paiments should be required of them, much lesse now the fifth part should be eracted of them, because an action twice done maketh a custome. Item, seeing they had oftentimes to repaire vnto the court of Rome, if they should giue this mony against the emperor, it would turne to their danger comming through his land. Item, seeing their king had many enemies, against whom they must needs relieue the king with their mony, they could not so doe if the realme were thus impouerished, &c. All which excuses, with diuers other more notwithstanding, they were compelled at length to conforme themselues to the popes good pleasure, through the example giuen of Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, who to obtaine his purpose against the monks of Canturbury (with whom he was then in strife) began first to yeld to the legats 800. marks for his part, whereby the rest also were faine to follow after. Ex Mat. Paris. fol. 132. 136. {Anno 1240}

Petrus Rubeus the popes carrier.

All beneficed men in England compelled to giue the fifth part of their reuenewes to the pope.

Excuses of the clergy why they would not contribute to the pope.

Further-

Digitized by Google

Furthermore, the same yeere the pope agreed so with the people of Rome, that if they would aid him against Frederike the emperor, loke what benefices were to be giuen in England, the same should be at their arbitrement to be bestowed vpon their children. Whereupon commandement was sent to the foresaid Edmund archbishop, to the bishops of Lincolne and Sarum, that all the collations of benefices within the realme should be suspended, till prouision were made for three hundred children of the citizens of Rome to bee first serued. Vpon the which so miserable request, the said Edmund archbishop of Canturbury, for sorrow to see the church so oppressed, departed the realme, and so continued in France, and died at Pontiniac: Ex Mat. Paris, fol. 134. b. Which Edmund was afterward made a saint, and canonized by pope Innocent the fourth.

Three hundred children of Rome placed in benefices in England.

Edmund archbishop of Canturbury departeth the realme, and dieth in exile.

This done, then went Petrus Rubeus the popes Nuncio, and Ruffinus into Scotland, from whence they brought with them three thousand pounds to the popes vse about All hollontide the same yeere. At which time moreouer commeth another harpar from the pope to England, named Mumelius, bringing with him three and twenty Romans here into the realme to be beneficed. Thus, what by the king on the one side, and what by the cardinall Otho, Petrus Rubeus, Ruffinus and Mumelius on the other side, poore England was in a wretched case. Mat. Paris, fol. 137.

Three thousand pounds to the popes vse.

Romans 23 brought to England to be beneficed.

Another prettie practise of the pope to poll for mony, was this: The foresaid Petrus Rubeus, comming into religious houses and into their chapters, caused them to contribute to the popes holinesse, by the example of this bishop, and that abbat, pretending that he and he of their owne voluntary deuotion, had giuen so much and so much, and so seduced them. Paris, fol. 134. Also the pope craftily suborned certaine friers, authorized with full indulgence, that whosoeuer had vowed to fight in the holy land, and was disposed to be released of his vow, needed not to repaire to Rome for absolution, but paying so much mony as his charges would come to going thither, he resorting to the said friers might be assoiled at home.

The pope for mony releaseth christians of their vow.

✠ This passed in the yeere 1240. Now all these troubles laid together, were enough to ver the meekest prince in the world; whereto by way of accesse to the kings further molestation, he had much adoe with the prelats and clergy men of his realme, who were alwaies tempering with his title, especially in their assemblies and councels: to whom the king to restraine them from that presumption, did both send and write, as appeareth by this euidence of record: Rex misit Galfridum de Langley, &c. That is, The king sent Geffrey Langley to the archbishop of Yorke, and to other bishops purposed to meete at Dretford to appeale for him, lest in the said councell there called, they should presume to ordaine something against his crowne and dignity. This was done in the yeere of our Lord 1241. In which yeere also came a commandement apostolicall to the house of Peterborow, that they at the popes contemplation must needs grant him some benefice lying in their donation, the fruits whereof at least were worth an hundred pounds, and if it were more it should be the better welcome; so that they should be as the farmers, and he to receiue the profits. In fine, the couent excused themselues by the abbat, being then not at home. The abbat when he came home excused himselfe by the king, being the patron and founder of the house. The king being grieued with the vnreasonable rauening of these Romanists, vtterly forbad any such example to be giuen. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 143. But what happened? The abbat being therefore accused to the pope by one of the legats, and comming vp about foure yeeres after, in the time of pope Innocent, to the councell of Lions, was so rated and reuiled, and so shamefully thrust out of the popes court, that for sorrow he fell sick vpon the same, and there died. Paris, fol. 184.

The bishop of Yorke should ordaine nothing against the king.

Turris Lond.

Mumelius another messenger of the pope.

Abbat of Peterborow thrust out of the popes court.

In the time of which councell of Lions, pope Innocent the fourth, (forsomuch as the instrument or obligation whereby the realme of England stood tributary to the pope, was thought to be burned in the popes chamber a little before) brought forth either the same, or another chart like vnto it, whereunto he straitly charged and commanded euery English bishop being there present at the councell, seuerally to set to his hand and seale. Which vnreasonable petition of the pope, albeit it went sore against the hearts of the bishops, yet (see in what miserable subiection the pope had all the bishops vnder him) none of them durst otherwise doe but accomplish the popes request therein, both to their owne shame, and preiudice to the publike freedom of the realme. Amongst which bishops, the longest that held out, and last that put to his seale, was the bishop of London. Which act when the king and the nobility vnderstood, they were mightily and worthily therewithall offended. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 192. An. 1245.

The obligation of king Johns tribute to the pope burned.

The bishops of England put their hands and seales to the popes bill.

After what time cardinall Otho was sent for by pope Gregory in all hast to come to the generall councell, two other in his roome here remained, whose names were Petrus Rubeus, and Petrus de Supino. Of whom, the one bearing himselfe for the popes kinsman, brought out his bils and buls vnder the popes authority, to such an abbat, or to such a prior, or to such and such a bishop, and so extorted frō them a great quantity of gold and siluer. The other, to wit, Petrus de Supino sailed to Ireland, from whence he brought with him a thousand and fiue hundred marks to the popes vse, An. 1241. Ex Paris, fol. 247. b. All which mony notwithstanding gotten by both the collectors, in the carriage vp to Rome, about the death of pope Gregory, happened into the hands of Frederike the emperor, who caused it againe to be restored as neere as he could, to them of whom it was taken. Paris, fol. 151.

Petrus Rubeus, Petrus de Supino, the popes collectors in England.

A thousand and fiue hundred marks brought out of Ireland for the pope.

After these, came in then M. Martinus a new merchant from the new pope Innocent the fourth, An. 1244. armed with full power to suspend all prelats in England from giuing benefices, till the popes kinsmen were first preferred. Neither would he take the fruits of any benefice, vnlesse it were aboue the value of thirtie marks. At his first comming, he required of prelats, and especially of religious houses to furnish him with horses and palfraies, such as were conuenient for the popes especiall chaplen and legat to sit vpon; also with plate, rainent, prouision for his kitchen and cellar, &c: and such as denied or excused, he suspended; as the abbat of Malmesbury, and the prior of Merton. All prebends that were void he sought out and reserued them for the popes behoofe, among which was the golden prebend of Sarum, belonging to the chancellor of the quere, whom he preferred to the bishoprike of Bathe, and so setzed vpon the prebend being void, against the wils both of the bishop and the chapter. Paris, fol. 167, 180. Moreover, he brought with him blanks in paper and parchment, signed in the popes chamber with his stampe and seale, wherein he might afterward write to whom, and what he would: Paris, fol. 178. b. requiring furthermore of the king in the popes behalfe, to help his holinesse with a contribution to be tared amongst his clergy, at least of 10000 marks. Ibid. And to the end that the pope might win the king sooner to his deuotion, he writeth in the kings behoofe to the nobles and commons of the realme, that they should not faile vpon paine of his great curse, to confer such subsidie of mony to the subuention of the king; as he then had demanded of them, but they stood stiffe in not granting to him.

M. Martinus another messenger for the popes mony, An. 1244.

Extortion of the popes legat vpon the clergie of England.

Contribution of 10000 marks for the pope.

The pope craftily holdeth with the king, that the king might hold with him.

While the insatiable auarice of the pope thus made no end in gathering riches and goods together in England, the nobles and barons, with the community as well of the clergy as the laity, weighing the miserable state of the realme, and namely of the church, which now neither had liberty left them to chuse their owne ministers, nor yet could inioy their owne liuings, laid their heads together, and so exhibited an earnest intimation to the king, beseeching him to consider the pitifull affliction and oppression of his subiects vnder the popes extortion, liuing in more thraldome then euer did the people of Israel vnder Pharaoh. Whereupon the king begining at last to looke vp, and to consider the iniuries & wrongs receiued in this realme, through the auarice of the court of Rome, directeth to pope Innocent the fourth this letter in tenor as followeth.

Intimation giuen to the king, touching the importable oppression of the realme by the pope.

The kings letter to pope Innocent the fourth.

Sanctissimo in Christo patri ac domino Innocentio Dei gratia summo pontifici, Henricus eadem gratia rex Anglie, &c. Salutem & pedum oscula beatorum, &c.

King Henries letter to the pope.

To the most holy father in Christ and lord, Innocent by the grace of God chiefe bishop, Henry by the same grace king of England, &c. Greeting and kissings of his blessed feete. The more deuout and obsequious the sonne sheweth himselfe in obeying the fathers will, the more fauour and supportation doth he deserue to finde at his fathers hands againe. This therefore I write, for that whereas both we and our realme haue euer and in all things bin hitherto at the deuotion and commandement of your fatherhood, and that although in some certaine affaires of ours and of our kingdome, we haue found your fatherly fauour and grace sometimes propice vnto vs: yet in some things againe, as in prouisions giuen and granted to your clerks of forren nations, both we and our kingdome haue felt no small detriment. By reason of which prouisions, the church of England is so sore charged and burthened, that not onely the patrons of churches, to whom the donations thereof doe appertaine, are defrauded of their right: but also many other good workes of charity thereby doe decay, for that such benefices which haue been mercifully bestowed vpon religious houses to their sustentation, are now wasted and consumed by your prouisions.

The king offereth to kisse the popes feet.

Damage receiued by the pope in the realme of England.

Wherefore forsomuch as your sea apostolike ought to be fauourable to all that be petitioners to the same, so that no person be wronged in that which is his right, we thought therfore to be suters to your fatherhood, most humbly beseeching your holinesse, that you will desist and surcease for a time from such prouisions to be exacted. In the meane season, it may please your fatherhood wee beseech you, that our lawes and liberties, (which you may rightly repute none other but your own) you will receiue to your tuition, to be conserued whole and sound, nor to suffer the same by any sinister suggestion in your court to be violated and infringed. Neither let your holinesse be any whit moued therefore with vs, if in some such cases as these be, wee doe or shall hereafter resist the tenor of your commandements, forsomuch as the complaints of such as which daily call vpon vs, doe necessarily inforce vs thereunto, which ought by the charge of this our office and kingly dignity committed to

The popes prouisions.

The kings too much subiection to the pope.

vs

vs of almighty God, to foresee that no man in that which is their right be iniuried, but truly to minister iustice to euery one, in that which duly to him appertaineth. This letter was sent the eight and twentith yeere of the kings raigne. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 172.

A man would thinke that this so gentle and obedient letter of the king to the pope, would haue wrought some good effect in his apostolicall breast, to withdraw his prouisions, and to haue tendered the kings so reasonable and honest request: but how little all this preuailed to stop his insatiable greedinesse, and intollerable extortions and oppressions, the sequell well declareth. For besides that, shortly after the pope sent M. Martin with blanks, being bulled for contribution of 10000 marks, in all haste to be paid also, euen immediatly vpon the receiuing of this letter, it followeth in mine author, that the said pope Innocent the fourth, after all this great submission of the king, and so manifold benefits and paiments yeerly out of his realm receiued, was not ashamed to take of Dauid prince of North Wales, fiue hundred marks by yeere, to set him against the king of England, and exempted him from his fealty and obedience due to his owne liege lord and king, to whom both he and all other Welshmen had sworne their subiection before, as by the seales and obligations as well of that Dauid himselfe, as other Welsh lords in this behalfe doth appeare: In Mat. Paris, fol. 172.

Ex Matth. Paris. fol. 172.

The pope setteth Welshmen against the king of England.

Neither did M. Martinus in the meane while sleep his businesse, in making vp his market for the popes mony of ten thousand marks, but still was calling vpon the prelats and clergy. Who first excusing themselues by the absence of the king and the archbishop of Canturbury, afterward being called againe by new letters, made their answer by the deane of Pauls their prolocutor.

First, that the pouerty of the realme would not suffer them to consent thereto.

Item, whereas they had giuen before a contribution to cardinall Otho, for paying of the popes debts, and knew the said mony to be imploied to no such end as it was demanded for, more cause they had now to mistrust, lest this contribution in his hands, which was a much more inferior messenger then the cardinall, would come to the same or a worse effect.

Contribution required of the pope, with their excuses and reasons against the same.

Item, if they should now agree to a new contribution, they feared lest it would grow to a custome, seeing that one action twice done, maketh a custome.

Item, forsomuch as a generall councell is shortly looked for, where euery prelat of the realme must needs bestow both his trauell and expences, and also his present to the pope; if the prelats now should be bound to this tax, they were not able to abide this burthen.

Item, seeing it is alleaged, that the mother church of Rome is so far in debt, reason and right it were, that the mother so oppressed, should be sustained of all her deuout children meeting together in the generall councell; whereas by helps of many, more relefe might come then by one nation alone.

Item, last of all, they alleaged that for feare of the emperor and his threatnings, they durst not consent to the said contribution.

While these things were thus in talke between the popes priests and the clergy of England, commeth in Iohn Mariscall and other messengers from the king, commanding in the kings name, that no bishop that held his baronage of the king, should infeft his lay fee to the court of Rome, which they ought only to him, &c. Ex Paris. fol. 139. An. 1243.

The ports of England laid to stop the popes letters, yet all would not serue.

Not long after this, in the yeere of our Lord 1245, the whole nobility of the realme by generall consent, and not without the kings knowledge also, caused all the ports by the sea side to be laid, that no messenger with the popes letters and buls from Rome should be permitted to enter the realme, whereupon some were taken at Douer and there staied. Notwithstanding when complaint thereof was brought to the king by M. Martinus the popes legat, there was no remedy but the king must needs cause these letters to be restored againe and executed to the full effect. Paris.

Sixty thousand marks yeerly going out of England to the pope and his Italian clerks.

Then the king vpon aduice, caused a view to be taken through euery shire in England, to what sum the whole reuenewes of the Romans and Italians amounted, which by the popes authority went out of England: the whole sum whereof was found yeerly to be threescore thousand marks, to the which sum the reuenewes of the whole crowne of England did not extend: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 185. a.

M. Martin the popes legat, sent out of England in the diuels name.

The nobles then vnderstanding the miserable oppression of the realme, being assembled together at Dunstable for certaine causes, sent one Fulco in the name of the whole nobility, vnto M. Martinus the popes merchant with this message; that he indelaiedly vpon the same warning should prepare himselfe to be gone out of the realme, vnder pain of being cut all to peeces. At which message the legat being sore agast, went straight to the king, to know whether his consent was to the same or not. Of whom when he found little better comfort, he toke his leaue of the king, who bad him adiew in the diuels name (saith Matth. Paris) and thus was the realme rid of M. Martinus: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 185. b. An. 2245.

As soone as pope Innocent had hereof intelligence by the complaint of his legat, he was in a mighty rage. And furthermore, remembring how the French king, and the king of Arragon not long before had denied him entrance into their land, and being therefore in displeasure with them likewise, began in great anger to knit his browes, and said; It is best that we fall in agreement with our prince, whereby we may the sooner bring vnder these little petty kings: and so the great dragon being pacified, these little serpents we shall handle at our owne pleasure as we list.

The pope in displeasure with the king of England.

Ipsos reguli. The proud words of the pope against the French king and king of England.

After this, immediatly then followed the generall councell of Lions, to the which councell the lords & states of the realme, with the consent of the communalty, sent two bils: one containing a generall supplication to the pope and the councell; the other with the articles of such greeuances which they desired to be redressed, whereof relation is made sufficiently before. The other bill of the supplication, because it is not before expressed, I thought here to exhibit for two causes. First, that men now in these daies may see the pitifull blindnesse of those ignorant daies, wherein our English nation here did so blindly humble themselues and stand to the popes courtesie, whom rather they should haue shaken off, as the Grecians did. Secondly, that the pride of the pope might the better appeare in his colours, who so disdainfully reiected the humble sute of our lords and nobles, when they had much more cause to disdaine rather, and to stamp him vnder their feet. The tenor of the supplication was this.

The copy of the supplication written in the names of all the nobles and commons of England to pope Innocent the fourth, in the generall councell at Lions, Anno 1245. {Anno 1245}

To the reuerend father in Christ, pope Innocent, chiefe bishop, the nobles, with the whole comminaltie of the realme of England sendeth commendation, with kissing of his blessed feete.

The supplication of the lords and commons of England to the pope.

OVr mother the church of Rome we loue with all our harts, as our duty is, and couet the increase of her honour with so much affection as we may, as to whom we ought alwaies to flie for refuge, whereby the griefe lying vpon the child, may finde cõfort at the mothers hand. Which succor the mother is bound so much the rather, to impart to her child, how much more kind and beneficiall she findeth him in relieuing her necessitie. Neither is it to the said our mother vnknowne, how beneficiall and bountifull a giuer the realme of England hath bin now of long time for the more amplifying of her exaltation, as appeared by your yeerly subsidie, which we terme by the name Peter pence. Now the said church not contented with this yeerly subsidie, hath sent diuers legats for other contributions, at diuers and sundry times to be taxed and leuied out of the same realme: all which contributions and taxes notwithstanding haue bin louingly and liberally granted.

The superstitious founding of monasteries in England.

Furthermore, neither is it vnknowne to your fatherhood, how our forefathers, like good catholikes, both louing and fearing their maker, for the soules health as well of themselues as of their progenitors and successors also, haue founded monasteries, and largely haue indued the same both with their owne proper lands, and also patronages of benefices, whereby such religious persons professing the first and chiefest perfection of holy religion in their monasteries, might with more peace & tranquillity occupie themselues deuoutly in Gods seruice, as to the order appertained: and also the clerks presented by them into their benefices, might sustain the other exterior labors for them in that second order of religion, and so discharge and defend them from all hazards: so that the said religious monasteries cannot be defrauded of those their patronages and collations of benefices, but the same must touch vs also very neere, and work intollerable griefe vnto our hearts.

Iniuries receiued in England by the pope.

And now see we beseech you, which is lamentable to behold, what iniuries we sustaine by you and your predecessors, who not considering those our subsidies and contributions aboue remembred, doe suffer also your Italians and forreners (which be out of number) to be possessed of our churches and benefices in England, pertaining to the right and patronage of those monasteries afore said: which forreners neither defending the said religious persons, whom they ought to see to, nor yet hauing the language, whereby they may instruct the flock, take no regard of their soules, but vtterly leaue them of wilde wolues to be deuoured. Wherefore it may truly be said of them, that they are no good shepheards, whereas neither they know their sheep, nor the sheep do know the voice of their shepheards, neither doe they keepe any hospitality, but only take vp the rents of those benefices, carrying them out of the realme, wherewith our brethren, our nephewes, and our kinsfolks might be sustained, who could and would dwell vpon them, and imploy such exercises of mercy & hospitality as their duty required. Whereof a great number now for meere necessitie are lay men, and faine to flie out of the realme.

Benefices in England wickedly giuen away to Italians.

And now, to the intent more fully to certifie you of the truth, ye shall vnderstand that the said Italians and strangers receiuing of yeerely rents out of England not so little as threescore

Threeſcore thouſand marks yeerly giuen to Italians out of the church of England.

ſcore thouſand marks by yeere, beſides other auailes and exiſes deducted, do reape in the ſaid our kingdome of England more emoluments of meere rents, then doth the king himſelfe, being both tutor of the church, and gouernour of the land.

Italians receiued more in this land of meere rents, then did the kings crowne.

Furthermore, whereas at the firſt creation of your papacie, we were in good hope and yet are, that by meanes of your fatherly goodneſſe we ſhould inioy our franchiſes, and free collation of our benefices and donatiues, to be reduced againe to the former ſtate; now commeth another grieuance, which wee cannot but ſignifie vnto you, preſſing vs aboue meaſure, which we receiue by M. Martin; who entring late into our land without leaue of our king, with greater power then euer was ſeene before in any legat, although he beareth not the ſtate and ſhew of a legat, yet he hath doubled the doings of a legat, charging vs euery day with new mandats, and ſo moſt extremely hath oppreſſed vs: firſt in beſtowing and giuing away our benefices, if any were aboue thirty marks, as ſoone as they were vacant, to Italian perſons.

Deteſtable dealings of the popes legat in England.

Secondly, after the deceaſe of the ſaid Italians, vnknowing to the patrons, he hath intruded other Italians therein, whereby the true patrons haue been ſpoiled and defrauded of their right.

Thirdly, the ſaid M. Martinus yet alſo ceaſeth not to aſſigne and confer ſuch benefices ſtill vnto the like perſons: and ſome he reſerueth to the donation of the apoſtolicall ſea, and extorteth moreouer from religious houſes immoderat penſions, excommunicating and interdicting whoſoeuer dare gainſtand him.

Complaint of M. Martin the popes legat.

Wherefore, forſomuch as the ſaid M. Martin hath ſo far extended his iuriſdiction, to the great perturbation of the whole realme, and no leſſe derogation to our kings priuiledge, to whō it hath been fully granted by the ſea apoſtolike, that no legat ſhould haue to doe in his land, but ſuch as he by ſpeciall letters did ſend for: with moſt humble deuotion beſeech you, that as a good father will alwaies be ready to ſupport his child, ſo your fatherhood will reach forth your hand of compaſſion to relieue vs your humble children from theſe grieuous oppreſſions.

King Henry the third vſed euery day to heare three maſſes by note.

And although our lord and king, being a catholike prince, and wholly giuen to his deuotions and ſeruice of Chriſt Ieſu our Lord, ſo that he reſpecteth not the health of his own body, will feare and reuerence the ſea apoſtolike, and as a deuout ſon of the church of Rome, deſireth nothing more then to aduance the eſtate and honor of the ſame: yet we which trauell in his affaires, bearing the heat and burden of the day, and whoſe duty together with him, is to tender the preſeruation of the publike wealth, neither can patiently ſuffer ſuch oppreſſions ſo deteſtable to God and man, and grieuances intollerable, neither by Gods grace will ſuffer them, through the means of your godly remedy, which we well hope and truſt of you ſpeedily to obtaine. And thus may it pleaſe your fatherhood, we beſeech you to accept this our ſupplication, who in ſo doing ſhall worthily deſerue of all the lords and nobles, with the whole comminalty of the realme of England, condigne and ſpeciall thanks accordingly. An. 1245. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 188.

The ſtout words of the lords to the pope.

The ſupplication of the Engliſh nation took no place with the pope.

This ſupplication being ſent by the hands of ſir R. Bigot knight, and M. de Bowike ſquier, Henry de la Mare, with other knights and gentlemen, after it was there opened & read, pope Innocent firſt keeping ſilence, deferred to make anſwer thereunto, making haſt to proceed in his deteſtable excommunication and curſe againſt the good emperor Frederike. The which curſe being done, and the Engliſh ambaſſadors waiting ſtill for their anſwer: the pope then told them flat they ſhould not haue their requeſt fulfilled. Whereat the Engliſhmen departing in great anger away, ſware with terrible othes, that they would neuer more ſuffer any tribute, or fruits of any benefices, namely whereof the noble men were patrons, to be paied to that inſatiable and greedy court of Rome, worthy to be deteſted in all worlds. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 193.

The ſubtill practiſe of the pope.

The pope hearing theſe words, albeit making then no anſwer, thought to watch his time, and did. Firſt, incontinent vpon the ſame, during the ſaid councell, he cauſed euery biſhop of England to put his hand and ſeale to the obligation made by king John for the popes tribute, as is aboue ſpecified. Threatning moreouer, and ſaying, that if he had once brought downe the emperor Frederike, he would bridle the inſolent pride of England well enough.

The pope in an anger with England.

The biſhops of England ſet their ſeales to the popes tribute.

✻ But here by occaſion of this councell at Lions, that the reader may ſee vpon what ſlippery, vncertainty and variableneſſe the ſtate of the king did depend; it is materiall here to interlace the forme of a letter ſent by Henry the third to the prelats of his land, before they were tranſported ouer ſea to Lions, wherin may be gathered, that the king doubted they would be ſhouing and heauing at his royalty; and therefore directed theſe letters vnto them, otherwiſe to prepare their affections: the tenor whereof followeth.

A letter of charge to the prelats of England, purpoſed to aſſemble in the councell at Lions, that they ſhould ordaine nothing, &c: to their kings preiudice.

Turris Lond.

R Ex archiepiſcopis, epiſcopis, & omnibus aliis prælatis terræ ſuæ Angliæ conſtitutis ad concilium Lugdunenſe ſalutē: Vinculo iuramenti nobis (vt noſtis) aſtricti, &c. In Engliſh thus.

The king to the archbiſhops, biſhops, and to all other prelats of his land of England, appointed to meet at a councell at Lions, greeting. You are (as you know) bound vnto vs by oth, whereby you bught to keep all the fealty that you can vnto vs in all things concerning our roiall dignity and crowne. Wherefore we command you vpon the fealty and alleagiance wherein you are firmely bound vnto vs, inioining that you doe your vttermoſt indeuour, as well to get as to keepe, and alſo to defend the right of vs and our kingdome. And that neither to the preiudce of vs, or of the ſame kingdome, nor yet againſt vs or our rights, which our predeceſſors and we by ancient and approued cuſtome haue vſed, you preſume to procure or attempt any thing in your councell at Lions: nor that you giue aſſent to any that ſhall procure or ordaine ought in this caſe, vpon your oth aforeſaid, and the loſſe of your temporalties, which you hold of vs. Wherefore in this behalfe ſo behaue your ſelues, that for your good dealing and vertue of thankfulneſſe, we may rather ſpecially commend you, then for the contrary by you attempted (which God forbid) we reproue your vnthankfulneſſe, and reſerue vengeance for you in due time. Witneſſe my ſelfe, &c: the nine and twentith yeere of our raigne. ¶ In like ſort wrote hee to the archbiſhops and biſhops, &c. of Ireland and Gaſcoigne.

Anno 1246

After this councell ended, in the beginning of the nert yeer following, An. 1246, pope Innocent came to Cluniake, where was then appointed a ſecret meeting or colloquie betweene the pope and Lewis the French king (who was then preparing his voiage to Hieruſalem) in which colloquie the pope ſought all meanes to perſwade the French king, in reuengement of his iniury, to war Contra regulum (as he termed him) that is, againſt the weake and feeble king of England, either to driue him vtterly from his kingdome, or elſe to damnifie him, whereby he ſhould be conſtrained whether he would or no, to ſtoope to the popes will and obedience, wherein he alſo would aſſiſt him with all the authority he could doe. Neuertheleſſe, the French king to this would not agree. Firſt, for the conſanguinity that was betweene them (for their two queenes were ſiſters.) Alſo for the truce that they had taken. Thirdly, for feare of the emperor, leſt he ſhould take his part. Item, for that it could not be without the much ſpilling of chriſtian blood. And laſtly, becauſe he was preparing his voyage to the holy land, where his comming was already loked for. And thus the French king, denying the popes bloudy requeſt, refuſed not only to enter war againſt the king and the realme of England, but alſo ſhortly after concluded with him longer truce, An. 1246. Ex Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 196. b.

The pope ſtirreth Lewis the French king to war againſt the king of England.

Lewis the French king refuſeth to war againſt England.

Straight vpon the necke of this followed then the eraction of Boniface archbiſhop of Canturbury that he had bought of the pope; which was to haue the firſt yeers fruits of all benefices and ſpirituall liuings in England for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres together, vntill the ſum ſhould come of ten thouſand marks. Whereat the king firſt was greatly grieued. But in concluſion, hee was faine at laſt to agree with the archbiſhop; and ſo the mony was gathered. Paris. fol. 197.

The firſt yeeres fruits for ſemen yeeres gathered of all benefices for the archbiſhop of Canturbury.

Ouer and beſides all other eractions wherewith the pope miſerably oppreſſed the church of England, this alſo is not to be ſilenced, how the pope ſending downe his letters from the ſea apoſtolike, charged and commanded the prelats to find him ſome ten, ſome fiue, and ſome fiftéene able men well furniſhed with horſe and harneſſe for one whole yeere, to fight in the popes wars. And leſt the king ſhould haue knowledge thereof, it was inioined them vnder paine of excommunication, that they ſhould reueale it to none, but to keepe it in ſecret only to themſelues. Paris, fol. 200.

The prelats of England charged to finde horſe and harneſſe for the popes wars.

The popes haſt laid for more mony.

The pope yet notwithſtanding, partly being laboured by ſuters, partly of his owne mind thinking good ſomewhat to giue to the king and people of England, as fathers are wont to giue ſomething to their babes to play withall to keep them ſtill, ſent downe this releaſement to the king, that hereafter whenſoeuer any of the popes nephewes, or of his cardinals were to be beneficed in any church of England, either he or the cardinals ſhould firſt make the king prinie thereof, and inſtantly craue his good will in obtaining the procuration, or elſe the ſame to ſtand in no effect. Paris, 202. Howbeit all this ſeemed to be done but of a policie, to get the kings fauor, whereby he might be ſuffered more freely to paſſe with greater eractions, as afterward appeared.

A new law of the pope, to ſeiſon vpon all the goods of clergy men that die inteſtat.

For when the foreſaid pope Innocent the fourth had knowledge at the ſame time of certaine rich clerks leauing great ſubſtance of mony, which died inteſtate, as of one Robert Hails, archdeacon of Lincolne, which died leauing thouſands of marks and much plate behind him, all which becauſe no will was made, came to temporall mens hands: alſo of M. Almarike, archdeacon of Bedford, being found worth a great ſubſtance when he died: and likewiſe of another M. John Hotoſp, archdeacon of Northhampton, who died ſuddenly inteſtat, leauing behind him fiue thouſand marks, and thirty ſtanding peeces of plate, with other infinit iewels beſides: ſent forth vpon the ſame a ſtatute to be proclaimed in England, that whatſoeuer eccleſiaſticall perſon henceforth ſhould deceaſe in England inteſtat

A note of certaine eccleſiaſticall perſons dying in England worth great ſubſtance.

Digitized by Google

intestat, that is, without making his will, all his goods should redound to the popes vse. Paris, fol. 203.

Six thousand marks to be gathered of the clergy of England for the pope.

Furthermore, the pope not yet satisfied with all this, addresseth new letters to the bishop of Winchester, and to W. bishop of Norwich, for gathering vp amongst the clergy, and religious houses in England, six thousand marks, to the behoofe of holy mother the church, without any excuse or delay, by vertue of obedience. Which tallage being greatly grudged of the clergy, when it came to the kings eare, hee eftsoones directeth contrary letters to all the prelats and euery one of them, commanding them vpon forfetting their temporalities to the king, that no such subsidy of mony should be gathered or transported out of the realme. But the pope againe hearing thereof, in great anger writeth to the prelats of England, that this collection of mony, vpon paine of excommunication and suspension should be prouided, and brought to the new temple in London, by the feast of the assumption next ensuing.

The king beginneth to withstand the pope, but durst not hold out.

The pope in a chafe.

And furthermore, forsomuch as he perceiued the king to go about to gainstand his procéedings, taking thereat great disdaine, hee was about the same time to interdict the whole land. To whom then one of his cardinals called Ioannes Anglicus, an Englishman borne, speaking for the realme of England, desired his fatherhood for Gods cause to mitigate his modie ire, and with the bridle of temperance to allwage the passion of his mind: which (said he) to tell you plaine, is here stirred vp too much without cause. Your fatherhood (quoth he) may consider that these daies be euill. First, the holy land lieth in great perils to be lost. All the Grécke church is departed from vs. Frederike the emperor is against vs, the mightiest prince this day in all christendome. Both you and we, which are the péeres of the church, are banished from the papall sea, thrust out of Rome, yea excluded out of all Italy. Hungary with all coasts bordering about it, looketh for nothing but vtter subuersion by the Tartarians. Germany is wasted and afflicted with inward wars and tumults. Spaine is fierce and cruell against vs, euen to the cutting out of the bishops tongues. France by vs is so impouerished, that it is brought to beggery, which also conspireth against vs. Miserable England being so often plagued by our manifold iniuries, euen much like to Balaams asse, beaten and bounst with spurs and staues, beginneth at length to speake and complaine of her intollerable greéfes and burthens, being so wearied and dammified, that she may séeme past all recouery; and we, after the maner of Ismael, hating all men, prouoke all men to hate vs, &c. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 207.

The words of Ioannes Anglicus, cardinal, to the pope.

The miserable troubles of christendome.

Of Spaine he meaneth, because the king of Aragon a little before had cut off the tongue of a certaine bishop that did reprehend him.

Paris. fol. 207.

For all these words of Ioannes Anglicus his cardinall, the popes cholerike passion could not yet bee appeased, but forthwith he sendeth commandement with full authority to the bishop of Worcester, that in case the king would not speedily surceasse his rebellion against his apostolicall procédings, hee would interdict his land. So that in conclusion, the king for all his stout enterprise, was faine to relent at last, and the pope had his mony, An. 1246. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 204.

Power giuen to the bishop of Worcester to interdict the land.

The king faine to relent to the pope.

We heard before of the Grécke churches vnder the empire of Constantinople, how they sequestred themselues from the company of the Romish church. Insomuch that Germanus the patriach of Constantinople, and the archbishop of Antioch did excommunicat the bishop of Rome. And after the said Germanus another archbishop of Constantinople, at the councell of Lions protested, that whereas before were thirtie suffragans belonging to that prouince, now there were not three that held with the church of Rome. And this breach, albeit it chiefly brast out in the time of pope Gregory the ninth, Anno 1230, to open war and bloodshed, yet the same had begun, & so continued long before, in such sort as in the time of pope Innocent the third, if any priest had said masse in their churches, they would wash the altar afterward: as appeareth by the acts of the Lateran councell: Capit. 4. Wherefore pope Innocent now (as his other predecessors had done before) bearing an old grudge against those churches of the Grécks, and neither willing by conference to try with them, nor able by learning to match with them, thought by force of armes to subdue them, sent the prouinciall of the gray friers, with other associats of the same order into England with his precept authenticall, containing in it these articles.

Of this diuision reade before.

The Grecians vsed to wash their altars, if any Latin masse had bin said vpon them. Ex actis concilij Lateranensis, cap. 4.

1 FIrst, that the said prouinciall, or his friers, should inquire vpon all vsurers being aliue, and of all such euill gotten goods gained Per vsurariam prauitatem, should make attachment for the vse & preparation for this war against the Greeks, excommunicating all them by district censures of the church that repugned against it.

Goods gotten by vsury, attached for the pope.

Excommunication abused.

2 That all they which tooke the badge of the crosse, for the recouery of the said empire of the Greeks, or with goods and cattell would helpe sufficiently vnto the same, should be absolued of all their sinnes.

Falle absolution of sinnes.

3 Item, that all the goods left in the testaments of them that were departed, being gotten by vsury, should be taken vp to the subsidie of the empire aforesaid, and whosoeuer repugned against the same, should be excommunicated.

Vsuraria prauitas.

4 Item, that such goods as in the testaméts of the dead, were left, or which should be left three next yeers to come, for restitution of such goods as the dead had euill gotten, they should take vp for the subsidie of the empire aforesaid, excommunicating, &c.

Goods left in dead mens wils for restitution, conuerted to the pope.

5 Item, such goods as were left to be distributed in godly vses, after the arbitrement of executors, by the wils of the dead, or were not in their wils deputed to any certaine places or persons named, nor yet were bestowed by the said executors to the foresaid vses, they should collect to the vse and subsidie aforesaid, and giue certificat to the sea apostolike of the quantitie thereof, excommunicating all repugners and rebellers against the same.

Goods bequeathed in dead mens wils, conuerted to a war against the Grecians.

6 Item, that they should diligently inquire of such mens goods euill gotten or euil come by, as were aliue, and them they should attach for the subsidie aforesaid, in case the party which ought to be satisfied for those goods euill gotten, could not be found, giuing certificat thereof, and excommunicating, &c.

Goods ill gotten giuen to the pope.

7 Item, that the said prouinciall or his friers, should haue full power to absolue those that were excommunicated, which wittingly had done any fraud touching the collection aforesaid, so that the said persons did make due satisfaction to the deputies aforesaid. Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 205.

Absolution for mony.

What man hauing eies is so blind, which seeth not these execrable dealings of the pope to bs such, as would cause any nation in the world to do as the wise Grecians did, and perpetually to abrenounce the pope, and well to consider the vsurped authority of that sea not to be of God? But such was the rude dulnes then of miserable England, for lacke of learning and godly knowledge, that they féeling what burthens were laid vpon them, yet would play still the asse of Balaam, or else the horse of Esop, which receiuing the bridle once in his mouth, could afterward neither abide his owne misery, nor yet recouer libertie. And so it fared with England vnder the popes thraldome: as partly by these stories aboue hath béen declared, partly by other in like case following is to be séene.

For so it followeth in the history of the said Matth. Paris, how the pope taking more courage by his former abused boldnesse, and perceiuing what a tame asse he had to ride vpon, ceased not thus, but directed a new precept the same yeere, 1246, to the prelats of England, commanding by the authority apostolike, that all beneficed men in the realme of England, which were resident vpon their benefices, should yéeld to the pope the third part of their goods, & they which were not resident should giue the one halfe of their goods, and that for the space of three yéeres together: with terrible comminations to all them that did resist: and euer with this clause withall, Non obstante, which was like a key that opened all locks. Which sum cast together, was found to amount to 60000 pounds: which sum of mony could scarse be found in all England to pay for king Richards ransome: Paris, fol. 207. The execution of this precept was committed to the bishop of London, who conferring about the matter with his brethren in the church of Pauls, as they were busily consulting together, and bewailing the importable burthen of this contribution, which was impossible for them to sustaine, suddenly commeth in certaine messengers from the king, sir John Lexinton knight, and M. Laurence Martin the kings chaplen, straitly in the kings name forbidding them in any case to consent to this contribution, which should bee greatly to the preiudice and desolation of the whole realme. Paris. fol. 207.

An vnreasonable exaction of the pope.

Non obstante.

Threescore thousand pounds exacted of the clergy to be paied to the pope.

This being done, about the first day of December, in the yeere aboue said, shortly after in the beginning of the next yeere 1247, about February the king called a parliament, where by common aduice it was agréed, that certaine ambassadors should be sent to Rome, to make manifest to the court of Rome the exceeding grieuances of the realme, deliuering moreouer these letters to the pope in the name both of the temporalty and also of the clergy, as here followeth.

A parliament.

Another letter sent to pope Innocent the fourth in the names of the whole clergy and comminalty of England, An. 1247.

A letter sent to the pope in the name of all the estates and comminalty of the realme.

Sanctissimo patri in Christo ac domino Innocentio Dei prouidentia summo pontifici; vniuersitas cleri & populi per prouinciam Cant. constituti deuota pedum oscula beatorum. Cum Anglicana ecclesia, &c. To the most holy father in Christ, and lord Innocent, by Gods prouidence chiefe bishop; the whole comminalty both of the clergy and laity within the prouince of Canturbury sendeth deuout kissings of his blessed feet. Like as the church of England, since it hath first receiued the catholike faith, hath alwaies shewed her selfe faithfull and deuout in adhering to God and to our holy mother the church of Rome, studying with all kind of seruice to please and to serue the same, and thinking neuer otherwise to do, but rather to continue and increase as she hath begun: euen so now the same church most humbly prostrat before the feet of your holinesse, intirely beseecheth your clemencie to accept her petition, in sparing this imposition of mony, which so manifold wates for the subuention of other nations, by the commandement of your holinesse is laid vpon vs: considering that not onely it is importable, but also impossible which is inioyned vs. For although our country

More fooles you in giuing to the church so much.

Digitized by Google

countrie sometimes yeeldeth forth fruit for the necessarie sustentation of the inhabitants, yet it bringeth forth neither gold nor siluer, neither were able to bring forth of long time so much as now adaies is required. Which also being burdened and ouercharged of late daies with another such like imposition, but not so great as this, is not able any whit to answere vnto that which is exacted.

Furthermore, besides this commandement of your holinesse, there is required of the clergie a subsidie for our temporall king, whose necessities neither possiblie wee can, nor honestly ought to forsake, whereby he may both withstand the inuasion of the enemie, and maintaine the right of his patrimonie, & also recouer againe that hath beene lost. In consideration whereof, we haue directed the bearers hereof to the presence of your holinesse with our humble supplication, to explaine to you the dangers and inconueniences which are like to insue vpon the premisses, which by no meanes we are able to sustaine, although notwithstanding we know our selues by all bonds of charity to be obliged to your deuotion and obedience. And because our generall communitie hath no seale proper, wee haue signed therefore these presents with the publike seale of the citie of London, &c. Ex Parisiensi, fol. 209.

The like letters were sent also vnto the cardinals, to the same effect. The pope vnderstanding these things, and perceiuing that there was no striuing against such a generall consent, and yet loth to forgo his sweet haruest, which he was wont to reape in England, craftilie deuised to send this answere againe vnto the king, much like to the same which he sent before, which was: That although the pope in time past vpon his owne will and pleasure to the importable grieuance of the realme of England, hath euery where, and without respect, through the whole land made his prouisions in giuing their benefices vnto his Italians, yet now, the Lord be praised, that tempest said he, is ouerblowne: so that hereafter if the pope shall grant his prouision for any of his nephues or of his cardinals, they shall come first and make their instant sute vnto the king, without all inforcement, so that it shall stand wholy in the kings free arbitrement to doe herein what he thinketh good, &c. Matt. Paris, fol. 209. b.

The popes answere againe to the king of England.

This answere of the pope albeit it was but a subtil shift for the time, yet neither did he long stand to that hee had thus promised to the king. For shortly after, and within few daies vpon the same, and in the time also of the said parliament holden at Winchester, the pope sent two English friers into the realme, whose names were Iohn and Alexander, with full authoritie after the largest sort, for new contributions. Who first pretending lowly submission to the king, while they had leaue granted to range about the realme, afterward comming to the bishops and rich abbats, shewed themselues forth in their full authoritie, in such sort as they became rather tyrants then extortioners.

The pope false of his promise.

Note the subtill practise of the pope to get money.

Among others, comming to Robert bishop of Lincolne, who of all other bare a speciall mind to the order of obseruants, these two friers as proud as Lucifer, bringing forth the terrible mandat with the popes buls, required and eke commanded vnder the popes mightie curse, to haue the gathering in his diocesse of six thousand marks. Likewise of the abbat of S. Albons they required foure hundred marks vnder great penalty and that in short time to be paid.

The bishop of Lincolns answere to the friers the popes messengers.

The bishop although well liking before that order of those friers, yet seeing the impudent behauiour, and more impudent request of those merchants, thus answered to them againe: that this exaction (sauing, saith he, the popes authoritie) was neuer heard of before, and neither was honest, nor yet possible to be performed: and moreouer was such as did not onely concerne him, but the whole publike state of the clergie, and of the whole realme in generall; and therefore it should be absurdlie and rashly done of him to giue them answere herein, before the king and the rest of the councell, with others to whom the matter generally did appertaine, were made priuie thereunto, &c: and so for that time he shooke them off, Paris, fol. 210.

The abbat of S. Albones maketh great sute to the pope for the 400 marks that he should pay. This Iohannes Anglicus was the more fierce against the abbat, because he receiued him not with such reuerence as he thought meet for the popes legat.

Furthermore, as touching the abbat of S. Albons, when he also alleaged the same causes, he pretended moreouer that hee would appeale, and so did, to the pope and his cardinals. Whereupon immediately was sent downe from pope Innocent another legat called Iohannes Anglicus, an English frier and cardinall, who bringing downe a new speciall precept to the foresaid abbat, cited him either to appeare at London the morrow after S. Giles day, or to disburse to the vse of the pope the foresaid foure hundred marks. By reason whereof the abbat was driuen to send his proctors againe, with a new supplication to the pope at Lions, who in the end through great instance of monied friends, agreed with the abbat for two hundred marks, besids his other charges borne, and so was that matter compounded. little to the abbats profit, Paris. fol. 213.

To recite all damages and grieuances receiued by the bishop of Rome in this realme of England, neither is any history sufficiently able to comprehend, nor if it were, vnneth is there any that would beleeue it. Notwithstanding to those aboue declared, this one I thought to commit likewise to memorie, to the intent that they which now liue in this age may behold and wonder in themselues to se in what miserable slauerie, passing al measure, not onely the subiects, but kings also of this realme were brought to, vnder the intollerable yoke of the popes tyrannie, which in those daies neither durst any man cast off, nor yet was able to abide. As by this example insuing, with infinite others like to the same, may appeare.

In the yeare of our Lord 1248. after that pope Innocent the fourth had taken such order in the realme, that all prelats of the church were suspended from collation of any benefice, before the popes kinsfolks and clerks of Italie had been first prouided for: it happened vpon the same, that the abbat of Abington had a commandement from the pope, to bestow some benefice of his church in all hast, to a certaine priest of Rome, which the abbat as an obedient child vnto his father the pope was prest and readie to accomplish accordingly. But the Roman priest not contented with such as fell next hand, would tarie his time, to haue such as were principall and for his owne appetite, hauing a speciall eie to the benefice of the church of S. Helen in Abington, which was then esteemed worth an hundred marks by yeare, besides other vales and commodities belonging to the same: the collation whereof the priest required by the authoritie apostolicall to be granted vnto him.

Example how this realme of England was oppressed miserable by the pope.

As this past on, it chanced at last the incumbent to die and the benefice to be emptie. Which eftsones being knowne, the same day commeth a commandement, with great charge from the king to the abbat, to giue the benefice to one Aethelmare the kings brother by the mother side, who at the same time was possessed with so many benefices, as the number and value thereof was vnknowne. The abbat here being in great perplexitie, and not knowing what to doe, whither to gratifie his king, or to obey the pope, tooke counsell with his friends: who well aduising the matter, gaue him counsell rather to preferre the brother of his prince and patron, so that the king would vndertake to stand in his defence against the pope, rather then the Romish priest, whom alwaies hee should haue lying there as a spie and watcher of him, and like a thorne euer in his eie: and so the king assuring the abbat of his vndoubted protection, and indemnitie against all harmes, the benefice was conferred forthwith to the kings brother.

The Roman priest not a little grieued thereat, speedeth himselfe in all hast to the bishop of Rome, certifying him what was done, and partly also (as the maner is of men) making it worse then it was. Vpon whose complaint the pope eftsoones in great anger cited vp the abbat personally to appeare before him, to answere to the crime of disobedience. The abbat trusting vpon the kings promise and protection (which neither could helpe him in that case, neither durst oppose himselfe against the pope) being both aged and sickly, was driuen to trauell vp to the court of Rome, in great heauinesse and bitternesse of mind. Where in conclusion after much veration and bitter rebukes, besides great expences, he was faine to satisfie the pope after his owne will, compounding to giue him yearely fiftie marks in part of making amends for his trespasse of disobedience, Ex Matt. Parisiensi. fol. 222.

The abbat of Abington cited to appeare before the pope.

The abbat of Abington condemned in fiftie markes for denying of an English benefice to an Italian the popes nephue.

To this also may bee added another like fact of the pope as outragious as this, against the house of Binham. For when the benefice of wessle in the diocesse of Elie was voide by the death of the incumbent, who was an Italian and one of the popes chamber, the donation of which benefice belonged to the priorie of Binham, an other Italian which was a bastard and vnlearned, borne in the citie of Genoa, called Heriggetto de Malchana de balta, brought downe the popes letters to M. Berardo de Nympha the popes agent here in England, with strict charge and full authoritie, commanding him to see the said benefice to be conferred in any case to Heriggetto. Yea and though the benefice had been giuen alreadie, yet notwithstanding the possessor thereof should bee displaced, and the said Heriggetto preferred: yea also Non obstante that the said pope himselfe had before giuen his grant to the king and realme of England, that one Italian should not succeed another in any benefice there; yet for all that the said Heriggetto vpon paine of excommunication to bee placed therein, Ex Matt. Parisiensi, fol. 240.

A detestable extortion of the pope vsed against the priorie of Binham.

And thus much hitherto of these matters, through the occasion of the east churches and the Grecians, to the intent all men that read these stories, and see the doings of this westerne bishop, may consider what iust cause these Grecians had to seclude themselues from his subiection, and communion. For what christian communion is to bee ioyned with him, which so contrarie to Christ & his gospell seeketh for worldly dominion, so cruelly persecuted his brethren, so giuen to auarice, so greedie in getting, so iniurious in oppressing, so insatiable in his exactions, so malicious in reuenging, stirring vp wars, depriuing kings, deposing emperors, playing Rex in the church of Christ, so erronious in doctrine, so abominable abusing excommunication, so false of promise, so corrupt in life, so void of Gods feare: and briefly, so farre from all the parts of a true euangelicall bishop: For what seemeth hee to care for the soules of men, which setteth in benefices, boyes and outlandish Italians: and further, one Italian to succeed another, which neither did know the language of the flocke, nor once would abide to see their faces. And who can blame the Grecians

The Grecians excused and purged in parting from the church of Rome.

The miseries that haue risen in England through subiection vnder the church of Rome.

Digitized by Google

then for diſſeuering themſelues from ſuch an oppreſſor and giant againſt Chriſt.

England plagued by the pope when it needed not.

Whoſe wiſe example if this realme had then followed, as they might, certes our predeceſſors had been rid of an infinite number of troubles, iniuries, oppreſſions, wars, commotions, great trauels, and charges, beſides the ſauing of innumerable thouſands of pounds, which the ſaid biſhop ful fallſie hath raked and tranſported out of this realme of ours. But not to exceed the bounds of my hiſtorie, becauſe my purpoſe is not to ſtand vpon declamations, nor to dilate common places, I will paſſe this ouer, leauing the iudgement therof to y further examinatiõ of the reader. For elſe if I liſted to proſecute this argument ſo farre as matter would leade me, and truth peraduenture would require me to ſay, I durſt not onely ſay, but could well proue the pope and court of Rome to be the only fountaine and principall cauſe, I ſay not of much miſerie here in England, but of all the publike calamities and notorious miſchiefs which haue happened theſe many yeares through all theſe weſt parts of chriſtendome, and eſpecially of all the lamentable ruine of the church, which not onely we, but the Grecians alſo this day doe ſuffer by the Turks and Saracens. As whoſoeuer well conſidereth by reading of hiſtories the courſe of times, and vieweth withall the doings and acts paſſed by the ſaid biſhop of Rome, together with the blind leading of his doctrine, ſhall ſee good cauſe not onely to thinke, but alſo to witneſſe the ſame. Onely one narration touching this argument, and yet not tranſgreſſing the office of my hiſtorie, I mind (the Lord willing) to ſet before the readers eies, which happened euen about this preſent time of this king Henries reigne, in the yeare of our Lord 1244.

The pope and court of Rome the principall cauſe of all the publike calamities through chriſtendome.

The ſickneſſe of Lewis the French king.

In the which yeare it chanced, that Lewis the French king, ſonne to queene Blanch, fell very ſore ſicke, lying in a ſwound or in a trance for certaine daies, in ſuch ſort as few thought he would haue liued, and ſome ſaid he was gone alreadie. Among others, there was with him his mother, who ſorrowing bitterly for hir ſonne, and giuen ſomewhat (as commonly the maner of women is) to ſuperſtition, went and brought forth a piece of the holy croſſe, with the crowne and the ſpeare, which piece of the holy croſſe Baldwinus emperor of Conſtantinople (whom the Grecians had depoſed a little before for holding with the biſhop of Rome) had ſold vnto the French king for a great ſum of money, and bleſſed him with the ſame, alſo laid the crowne and the ſpeare to his bodie, making a vow with all in the perſon of hir ſon, that if the Lord would viſit him with health, and releaſe him of that infirmitie, hee ſhould bee croſſed or marked with the croſſe, to viſit his ſepulchre, and there ſolemnely to render thanks in the land which hee had ſanctified with his blood. Thus as ſhe, with the biſhop of Paris, & others there preſent were praying, behold the king which was ſuppoſed of ſome to be dead, began with a ſigh to plucke to his armes and legs, and ſo ſtretching himſelfe, began to ſpeake, giuing thanks to God, who from an high had viſited him and called him from the danger of death. Which as the kings mother with others there tooke to be a great miracle wrought by the vertue of the holy croſſe: ſo the king amending more and more, as ſoone as hee was well recouered, receiued ſolemnly the badge of the croſſe, vowing for a freewill ſacrifice vnto God, that he, if the counſell of his realme would ſuffer him, would in his owne perſon viſit the holy land: forgetting belike the rule of true chriſtianitie, where Chriſt teacheth vs otherwiſe in the goſpell, ſaying: That neither in this mount, nor in Samaria, nor at Ieruſalem the Lord will be worſhipped, but ſeeketh true worſhippers, which ſhall worſhip him in truth and veritie, &c. An. 1244. Pariſienſi, fol. 182.

The ſuperſtition of the kings mother.

The king recouereth his ſickneſſe.

The people of France blinded with a falſe miracle.

The vaine vow of Lewis the French king.

After this was great preparance and much ado in France toward the ſetting forth to the holy land. For after the king firſt began to be croſſed, the moſt part of the nobles of France, with diuers archbiſhops and biſhops, with earles, and barons, and gentlemen to a mightie number, receiued alſo the croſſe vpon their ſleeues. Amongſt whom was the earle Atrebacenſis the kings brother, the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Brabant, the counteſſe of Flanders with hir two ſons, the earle of Britaine with his ſonne, the earle of Barrenſis, earle of Swellon, earle of S. Paul, earle of Dzuil, earle of Retel, with many noble perſons more. Neither lacked here whatſoeuer the pope could do, to ſet forward this holy buſineſſe, in ſending his legats and friers into France, to ſtir the people to follow the king, and to contribute to his iourney. Whereupon was granted to the king, to gather of the vniuerſall church of France by the popes authoritie, the tenth part of all their goods for three yeares ſpace together, vpon this condition, that the king likewiſe would grant to the pope the twentith part, for ſo many yeres after to be gathered of the ſaid church of France. Which was agreed, An. 1246. Ex. Mat. Pariſienſi, fol. 204. b.

The French king ſickneſſe to recompence all iniuries done to his ſubiects.

William Longſpath with other noble Engliſhmen prepared to the ſame voyage.

Perſuaſions giuen to the French king to turne his voyage.

Contribution in France to the kings voyage.

The pope maketh prouiſion for his contribution alſo in France.

{Anno 1247}

Shortly after this, in the yeere of our Lord one thouſand two hundred fortie & ſeuen, followed a parliament in France, where the king with his nobles being preſent, there was declared how the king of Tartarians or Turks, hearing of the voyage of the French king, writeth a letter to him, requiring that he will become his ſubiect. In the which parliament the time was preſtired for taking their iourney, which ſhould be after the feaſt of ſaint John Baptiſt y very next yere inſuing. Alſo they that were croſſed, were ſworne to perſiſt in their purpoſe, and ſentence of the popes great curſe denounced to all them that went from the ſame: Mat. Paris fol. 211. Furthermore, for the better ſpeed in his iourney, the king through all his realme cauſed it to bee proclamed, that if any merchant or other had been iniured at any time by the kings exactors, either by oppreſſion, or borrowing of money, let him bring forth his bill, ſhewing how or wherein, and he ſhould bee recompenſed. At which time William Longſpath a worthie warrier, with the biſhop of Worceſter and certaine other great men in the realme of England moued with the example of the French men, prepared themſelues likewiſe to the ſame iourney.

The French king deſireth to reconcile the pope and the emperor.

The next yeare after this inſuing, which was 1248, the French king yet ſtill remaining in his purpoſed iourney, ladie Blanch his mother, alſo the biſhop of Paris his brother, with the lords of his counſell, and other nobles and his ſpecial friends aduertiſed him with great perſuaſions to alter his mind, touching that ſo aduenturous and ſo dangerous a iourney, for that his vow (ſaid they) was vnaduiſedly made, and in time of his ſickneſſe, when his mind was not perfectly ſtabliſhed: and what ieopardies might happen at home, it was vncertain, the king of England being on the one ſide, the emperour on the other ſide, and the Pictauians in the midſt ſo fugitiue, and vnſtable: and as concerning his vow, the pope ſhould friendly diſpence with him, conſidering the neceſſitie of his realme, and weakeneſſe of his body. Beſides all this, his mother vpon hir bleſſing required him, his brethren of all loues deſired him to ſtay at home, and not in his perſon to aduenture; others might be ſent in his roome, with no leſſe furniture to atchieue that enterpriſe, and to diſcharge him of his vow, eſpecially ſeeing at the making thereof his ſenſes were feeble, his bodie weake, and reaſon through ſickneſſe and verie death almoſt decaped.

The kings anſwere to his lords, laying downe and taking vp his croſſe againe.

To whom the king againe: For ſomuch (ſaid he) as you ſay, that for feebleneſſe of my ſenſes I toke this vow vpon me, lo therefore as you heare will me, I lay downe the croſſe that I toke. And putting his hand to his ſhoulder, tare off the badge of the croſſe, ſaying to the biſhop, here I reſigne to you the croſſe wherewith I was ſigned. At the ſight wherof there was no ſmall reioycing of all that were there preſent. To whom the king then both altering his countenance and his ſpeech, thus ſpake: My friends (ſaid he) whatſoeuer I was then in my ſickneſſe, now I thanke God I am of perfect ſenſe, and reaſon ſound, and now I require my croſſe againe to be reſtored vnto me. Saying moreouer, that no head ſhould come in his head, before he were recognſiled againe with the ſame croſſe, as he was before. At the hearing whereof all there preſent were aſtonied, ſuppoſing that God had ſome great matter to worke, and ſo moued no more queſtions vnto him.

{Anno 1248}

The French king letteth forth on his iourney.

Vpon this drew nigh the feaſt of John Baptiſt, which was the time ſet for the ſetting forth. And now being in a readines, the king in few daies after was entring his iourney: but yet one thing lacked. For the king perceiuing the mortall variance betweene the pope, and good Frederike the emperor, thought beſt firſt before his going to haue that matter appeaſed, whereby his way both might bee ſafer through the emperors countries, and alſo leſſe ieopardie at home after his departure, and therefore vpon the ſame, toke firſt his way to Lions, where the pope was, partly to take his leaue; but moſt eſpecially to make reconcilement betweene the emperor and the pope.

The emperor Frederike purgeth himſelfe to the pope and councell.

Where is to be noted by the way, that as touching the good emperor there was no let nor ſtay. Who rather ſought all meanes how to compaſſe the popes fauor, and neuer could obtaine it: inſomuch that before he ſhould be excommunicated in the councell of Lions, hee not onely anſwered ſufficiently by Thadeus his atturney, diſcharging himſelfe againſt whatſoeuer crimes or obiections could be brought againſt him; but ſo far humbled himſelfe to the pope and the councell, that for all detriments, damages, loſſes, or wrongs done of his part, what amends ſoeuer the pope could or would require, he would recompence it to the vttermoſt. This would not be taken.

The ſubmiſſion of the emperor.

The worthie offer of the noble emperor.

Furthermore, if the pope (he ſaid) could not abide his tarrying in his owne dominions and empire, he would go fight againſt the Saracens and Turks, neuer to returne into Europe againe, offering there to recouer lands and kingdoms whatſoeuer did at any time belong to chriſtendome, ſo that the pope onely would be contented that Henrie his ſonne (which was then nephue to king Henrie here in England) ſhould bee emperor after him. Neither could this be admitted.

The emperor offereth to put in the French king and king of England to be his ſuretie.

Then hee offered for truth of his promiſe, to put in the French king and the king of England to be his ſureties, or elſe for triall of his cauſe to ſtand to their award and arbitrement. Neither would that bee granted.

The emperor deſireth to anſwere for himſelfe in the councell.

At leaſt hee deſired, that hee might come himſelfe and anſwere before the councell. But the proud pope in no caſe would abide that, ſaying: that he did not yet find himſelfe ſo ready and meet for martyrdome, to haue him to come thither to the councell: for if he did, he would depart himſelfe, &c. Ex Matt. Pariſ. fol. 187.

The time of the kings voyage appointed.

This obſtinate rancor and diuelliſh malice of pope Innocent and his predeceſſor, againſt that valiant emperor, and againſt the Grecians, what diſturbance & miſchiefe it wrought to to the whole church, what strength it gaue to the Saracens and Tartarians, how it impaired christian concord, and weakened all christian lands, not onely the host of the French king did find shortly after, but christendome euen to this day may and doth feele and rue. Neither can in stories be found any greater cause which first made the Turks so strong, to get so much ground ouer christendome as they haue, then the pestilent working of this pope in deposing and excommunicating this worthie emperor. For as there was neuer emperor of long time, which more victorioullie preuailed in bridling and keeping vnder thele enemies of Christ, or would haue done more against them, then the said Frederike if hee might haue been suffered: so after the deposing and excommunicating of him, when the French king neither would abide at home, as hee was counselled, neither was yet able, without the helpe of others, to withstand the force and multitude of the said Saracens and Tartarians being now ioyned togither, neither yet could the emperor be suffered by the pope to rescue the king: it followed thereof, that the good king being taken prisoner, and all his armie destroyed, the Turks thereupon got such a hand, and such a courage against the christians, that euer since they haue burst in further vpon vs, and now haue preuailed so far; as neither the power of the pope nor of all christendome is able to driue them out, as hereafter by sequell of storie is further to be declared.

The beginning of the Turks victories ouer christendome.

Pope Innocent the fourth would not be reconciled with the emperor.

In the meane time, to returne where before we left, when the French king comming thus vnto the pope at Lions, to intreate for the emperor could find no fauor, hee toke his leaue and with great heauinelle departed, letting forward on his iourney vnto Marsilia, and so sailed to the ile of Cyprus, where he remained all that winter, so that falling into penurie and lacke of victuals, he was faine to send to the Venetians and other ilands by, for helpe of prouision. The Venetians gently sent vnto him six great ships laden with corne, wine, and other victuals requisite, besides the relefe of other ilands more. But especially Frederike the emperor vnderstanding of their want, so furnished the French campe with all plentie of necessaries, that it had abundance. Whereupon the French king moued with the kindnelle of the emperor, wrote his speciall letters to the pope in the emperors behalfe; but the hard heart of the pope would not relent. Blanchia the kings mother in France, hearing what the emperor had done to hir sonne, sent him most heartie thanks, with presents and rewards manifold: Matt. Paris. fol. 226.

The French armie relieued by the emperor Frederike.

The French king againe intreateth the pope for the emperor.

In this meanstime about the beginning of October, the Frenchmen got Damiata, being the principall fort or hold of the Saracens in all Egypt, in the yere one thousand two hundred fortie and nine. After the winning of Damiata, the prince and people of the Saracens being astonied at the losse thereof, offered to the christians great ground and possessions more then euer belonged to christendome before, so that they might haue Damiata to them reskored againe. But the pride of the earle of Artois the kings brother would in no case accept the offers of the Saracens, but requireth both Damiata and Alexandria the chiefe metropolitan citie of all Egypt to bee deliuered vnto them. The Saracens seeing the pride and greedinesse of the Frenchmen, in no case would abide it: which turned afterwards to the great detriment of our christians, as in the end it proued: Ex Mat. Parisiensi, fol. 229.

Damiata gotten againe by Frenchmen.

The pride of the earle of Artois.

First, in the ile of Cyprus and in the iourney before, died the earle of Palatin and one of the twelue peeres of France, also the earle of S. Paul and Blesle, who had vnder him fiftie enlignes, which were al after his death scattered abrode and dispersed; also died Joannes de Denis a valiant captaine, with many other noble personages both men and women, which by altering the aire and diet, there deceased.

Death of certaine of the French captaines in the way.

The next yeare insuing, which was 1250, about Ashwednesday, the Frenchmen issuing out of their tents by the citie of Damiata, slew vpon the Saracens which besieged them, and so after a great number of the enemies slaine, with victorie and great spoiles, returned to their tents againe. Now within the citie of Damiata was the queene with hir ladies, the popes legat, and bishops, with a garrison of horsemen and footmen for the defence of the citie strongly appointed. The next day, the Frenchmen supposing to haue the like hand of the Saracens, as they had the day before, gaue a fresh assault vpon them; but in that conflict the Saracens had so strongly appointed themselues, that the Frenchmen lost ten times more then they got the day before, and so after a great slaughter of their men, retired vnto their tents againe. Where upon the Saracens began to take great hearts and courage against our men, stopping also the passages round about the citie of Damiata, that no victuals could passe vnto them. In like maner the Soldan also gathering all the gallies about Alexandria and all the land of Egypt, so inclosed the seas, that no intercourse should be to them by water.

Anno 1250

Victorie of the Frenchmen ouer the Saracens.

Frenchmen discomfited by the Saracens.

At length after long talke and consultation betweene them on both sides, the Soldan aduised them betimes to resigne vnto him the citie of Damiata, with the furniture which they found therein, and they should haue all the countrie about Jerusalem, with all the captiues of the christians friendly restored vnto them. Wherewith the christians (said he) ought to be contented, and to seeke no further, but onely to haue the land of Jerusalem; which being granted to them, they should not incroch into their lands and kingdomes, whereto they had no right. This forme of peace, as it liked well the meaner sort of the poore souldiers and diuers others of the said counsell and nobilitie: so the proud earle of Artois the kings brother, in no case would assent thereto, but still required the citie of Alexandria to be yelded vnto them. Which the Egyptians by no meanes would agree vnto.

The earle of Artois and the popes legat against refuse the forme of peace offred.

From that time the French armie being compassed by sea and by land, began euery day more and more to bee distressed for lacke of victuals and famine, being driuen to that miserie, that they were faine to eate their owne horses in the Lent time, which should haue serued them vnto other vses. Neither could any christian, nor Frederike being deposed by the pope, be able to send them any succor. Furthermore, the more miserie the christians were in, the more fiercely did the Saracens preese vpon them on euery side, detecting their forward wilfulnesse. Insomuch that diuers of the christian souldiers not able to abide the affliction, priuilie conueied themselues as they could, out of the campe to the Saracens, who were gladly receiued and relieued, and some suffered still to keepe their faith, some marrying wiues amongst them, and for hope of honor did apostatate to their law, and so wrought no little harme to the christians. The Soldan being perfectly instructed by these fugitiues of all things belonging to the kings armie, sent him word in derision, asking where were all his mattocks, forkes, and rakes, his sithes, plowes, and harrowes, which he brought ouer with him, or why he did not occupie them, but let them lie by him to rust and canker? All this and much more the king with his Frenchmen were faine to take well in worth. It happened shortly after, that this Soldan died, being poysoned of his owne seruants, which was to the christians a more heaping of their miseries. For albeit the said Soldan had been a cruell tyrant to the christians, yet was he hated of his owne people, whereby his strength was the lesse: after whom succeeded an other much more cruell. Who as he was better loued, so he became much stronger by a generall confederacie of all the Saracens which were in the east parts, ioyning now togither. So that when the christians desired now to haue the forme of peace before proffered, he precisely denied them. And so the French host, which at first began to bee feared, by their pride and ouermuch greedinesse grew more and more in contempt amongst their enemies, and now was vtterly despised.

Famine and miserie in the French campe.

The Frenchmen eate their horses in Lent time.

The Soldans message deriding the Frenchmen.

The Soldan dieth, a worse followeth.

The Frenchmen desire againe the peace offred before, and could not haue it.

The christians thus seeing all things to go backward with them, and how the infidell Saracens daily did preuaile, began to murmur against God, and some also which were well setled before, to stagger in their religion, calling out these words of infidelitie; How is this (said they) that the Lord hath left vs, in whose cause wee fight? How often within the time of remembrance haue we been confounded by these Saracens and infidels, who with sheading of our blood haue inioyed great spoiles and victories? First this citie of Damiata, which wee christians had gotten dearely with effusion of so much christian blood, afterwards wee were constrained for nought to resigne vp againe. After that, the armie of the templaries, fighting for the holy temple against the Saracens, neere to Antioch, was banquished, and the standerbearer slaine in the fields. Againe, within these few yeers, our Frenchmen fighting in like maner against the Saracens at the citie of Gazara, were put to the worst, and many afterward out of captiuitie ransomed, by Richard duke of Excester, brother to the king of England, Henrie the third. Then came in the Cholmozins sent by the Soldan of Babylon, which by a wile inuaded the christians in the citie of Jerusalem, where almost all the christian armie being in the holy land were destroyed. And now here our most christian king togither with the whole nobilitie, is like to bee in danger, vtterly to bee ouerthrowne. And how is it, that the Lord thus standeth against vs, and fighteth with them? Hath he more regard of them, then of vs, or? Matthæus Parisiensis fol. 231. Such murmuring words of an vnstable faith many there began to call out, as taking displeasure for their sufferings: but not considering on the other side what idolaters they were, what pride and discord was amongst them, what crueltie and murther they had shewed at home in persecuting the poore Albingenses, what superstition they first brought out with them, with what idolatrie they proceeded, putting their trust in masses, in the popes indulgences, in worshipping of images, and praying to saints. And what helpe then could they looke for at Gods hand, which had images in their temples, to fight against them which had none? Or what marueil, if the Lord of hosts went not with their armie, committing such idolatrie euery day in their pauilions to their sacramentall bread and wine as they did, and fighting with the strength of their owne merits, and not onely by the power of thir faith in Christ, which is onely the victorie that ouercommeth the world: Iohn 1. Finally, hauing in their campe the legate of him whom the Lord taketh to be his enemie: as by example of Frederike the emperor may be well perceiued, who after hee was accursed by pope Gregorie a little before, comming the same time in war against ỹ Saracens in Palestina, Gods blessing wrought so mightilie with him, that without any bloudshed he recouered Victories giuen the templaries and keepers of Jerusalem.

Causes debated why the Lord did not prosper the christians fighting against the Saracens.

Digitized by Google

Ierusalem, and set all the countrie about it in great quietnesse, till at last the popish templaries, which at the popes setting on, went about to betray him to the Soldan of Babylon, and so lost all againe by their owne malicious mischiefe, that the emperor before had gotten. Ex Mat. Parisiensi.

But let vs proceed further in this holy progresse. The French king with his armie seeing himselfe distressed, and no good there to be done against the Soldan of Egypt, after he had sufficiently fortified the citie of Damiata, with an able garrison left with the duke of Burgundie, hee remoued his tents from thence to goe eastward. In whose armie also followed William Longspath (of whom mention was touched before) accompanied with a picked number of English warriers retayning vnto him. But such was the disdaine of the Frenchmen against this William Longspath and the Englishmen, that they could not abide them, but flouted them after opprobrious maner, with English tailes, insomuch that the good king himselfe had much ado to keepe peace betweene them.

William Longspath.

Grudge and disdaine betweene the French campe and the English souldiers.

The originall cause of this grudge betweene them, began thus: There was not far from Alexandria in Egypt, a strong fort or castle, replenished with great ladies, and rich treasure of the Saracens: the which hold it chanced the said William Longspath with his company of English souldiers to get, more by good lucke and politike dexteritie, then by open force of armes, whereby hee with his retinue were greatly inriched. When the Frenchmen had knowledge hereof, they being not made priuie therto, began to conceiue an hartburning against the English souldiers, and could not speake well of them after that. It happened againe not long after, that the said William had intelligence of a companie of rich merchants among the Saracens going to a certaine faire about the parts of Alexandria, hauing their camels, asses, and mules richly laden with silks, pretious iewels, spices, gold and siluer, with cartlodes of other wares, besides victuals and other furniture, whereof the souldiers then stood in great need. He hauing secret knowledge hereof, gathered all the power of Englishmen vnto him that he could, and so by night falling vpon the merchants, some hee slue with their guides & conductors, some he tooke, some he put to flight. The carts with the driuers and with the oxen, and the camels, asses, and mules, with the whole cariage and victuals he tooke and brought with him, losing in al the skirmish but one souldier, and eight of his seruitors: of whom notwithstanding some he brought home wounded to be cured.

A bootie gotten by the English souldiers about Alexandria.

A venturous act of William Longspath.

William Longspath inriched by Saracens goods.

This being knowne in the campe, forth came the Frenchmen which all this while loitered in their pauilions, and meeting their cariage by the way, tooke all the foresaid prey whole vnto themselues, rating the said William and the Englishmen, for so aduenturing and issuing out of the campe without leaue or knowledge of their generall, contrarie vnto the discipline of war. William said againe, he had done nothing but hee would answere to it, whose purpose was to haue the spoile diuided to the behoofe of the whole armie: when this would not serue, hee being sore grieued in his mind so cowardly to be spoiled of that, for the which hee so aduenturously had trauelled, went to the king to complaine. But when no reason nor complaint would serue, by reason of the proud earle of Artois the kings brother, which vpon despite and disdaine stood against him, hee bidding the king farewell, said he would serue him no longer. And so William de Longspath with the rest of his companie breaking from the French host, went to Achon. Upon whose departure then said the earle of Artois: Now is the armie of Frenchmen well rid of these tailed people. Which words spoken in great despite, were euill taken of many good men that heard him: Ex Mat. Parisiensi. fol. 233. 234.

William Longspath wronged by the Frenchmen.

William with the Englishmen departeth to Achon.

The despitefull words of the kings brother against Englishmen.

Before the arriuing of the French armie in the land of Egypt, the Soldan of Babylon hauing before intelligence of their comming, committed the custodie of Damiata vnto a certaine prince of his, whom he specially trusted, committing also to his brother the keeping of Kaira and Babylonia. It followed now after the taking of Damiata, that the Soldan of Babylon accused the prince which had the custodie thereof, before his nobles of proditition, as giuing the citie vnto the christians. Who notwithstanding in iudgement did sufficiently cleare himselfe, declaring how hee was certified that the king would land at Alexandria, and therefore bent all power to preuent the kings arriuall there. But by distresse of weather, hee missing of his purpose, and the king landing about Damiata, by reason thereof the citie was taken vnprouided, hee notwithstanding with his companie resisting as well as they might, till they could no longer, and so departed out, cursing (said hee) Mahomet and his law. At which words the Soldan being offended, commanded him to be had away as a traitor and blasphemer, and to bee hanged, albeit hee had sufficiently purged himselfe by the iudgement of the court. His brother which was the keeper of Kaira and Babylonia, being therewith not a little grieued, and bearing a good mind to the christian religion, deuised in himselfe how to giue the said citie of Kaira and Babylonia to the French king, and so in most secret wise sent to the king shewing his full purpose and what had happened: and furthermore instructing the king in all things how and what he should doe, and moreouer requiring the sacrament of baptisme, meaning indeed good faith, and sending also away all the christian captiues which he had with him in prison. The king being glad hereof, sent in all hast for William Longspath, promising a full redresse of all iniuries past, who vpon hope of some good lucke towards, came at the kings request, and so ioyned with the French power againe.

Babylon in Egypt.

How Damiata was taken of the christians.

The keeper or tribune of Damiata wrongfully put to death by the Soldan.

The tribune of Kaira desireth to be christened.

William Longspath sent for againe, and commeth.

The lamentable ouerthrow and slaughter of the French armie fighting against the infidels, through the sinister counsell of the popes legat.

TO make the storie short, the king setting forward from Damiata, directed his iourney toward Kaira, slaying by the way such Saracens as there were set to stop the victuals from Damiata. The Soldan in the meane time hearing of the courragious comming of the French host, as being in great hope to conquer all; sent vnto the king by certaine that were next about him, offering to the christians the quiet and full possession of the holy land, with all the kingdome of Ierusalem, and more; besides other infinite treasure of gold and siluer, or what else might pleasure them, onely vpon this condition, they would restore againe Damiata, with the captiues there, and so would ioyne togither in mutuall peace and amitie. Also they should haue all their christian captiues deliuered home, and so both countries should freely passe one to another with their wares and traffike, such as they lusted to occupy. Furthermore, it was also firmely affirmed and spoken, that the Soldan with most of his nobles were minded no lesse then to leaue the filthie law of Mahomet, and receiue the faith of Christ, so that they might quietly enioy their lands and possessions. The same day great quietnesse had entred (no doubt) in all christendome, with the end of much bloodshed and miserie, had it not been for the pope and his legat, who (hauing commandement from ỹ pope, that if any such offers should come, he should not take them) stoutly Et frontose (as the words be of the story) contradicens, in no wise would receiue the conditions offered: Parisiensis, fol. 233.

The storie how the French armie was ouerthrowne fighting against the Saracens.

The faire offers of the Soldan to the Frenchmen, if they had had grace to take it.

The pope and his legat cause of all this mischiefe.

Thus, while the christians vnprofitablie lingered the time in debating this matter, the Soldan in the meane time got intelligence of the compact betweene the tribune of Kaira and the French king, wherupon he sent in all hast to the citie of Kaira, to apprehend the tribune till the truth were fully tried, which seemed to him more apparent, for that the christian prisoners were alreadie deliuered. Herewpon the Soldan being in some better hope, and lesse feare, refused that which before he had offered to ỹ christians, albeit they with great instance afterward sued to the Soldan, and could not obtaine it. Then the Soldan being wholly bent to trie the matter by the sword, sent to ỹ east parts for an infinite multitude of souldiers, giuing out by proclamation, that whosoeuer could bring in any christian mans head, should haue ten talents, besides his standing wages. And whosoeuer brought his right hand, should haue fiue. Hee that brought his foot should haue two talents for his reward.

The christians refusing good offers could not haue them when they would.

A cruell proclamation of the Saracens against the christians.

After these things thus prepared on both sides to the necessity of war, the king commeth to the great riuer Nilus, hauing gotten togither many botes, thinking by them to passe ouer, as vpon a sure bridge. On the other side the Soldan pitcheth himselfe to withstand his comming ouer. In the meane time happened a certaine feast amongst the Saracens, in which the Soldan was absent, leauing his tents by the water side. Which being foreseene by a certaine Saracen lately conuerted to Christ, seruing with earle Robert the kings brother, and shewing them withall a certaine shallow foord in the riuer of Nilus, where they might more easilie passe ouer, the said earle Robert and the master of the temple with a great power, esteemed to the third part of the armie, issued ouer the riuer, after whom also followed William Longspath with his band of English souldiers. These being togither ioyned on the other side of the water, incountred the same day with the Saracens remaining in the tents, and put them to the worse. After this victorie gotten, the French earle surprised with pride and triumph, as though he had conquered the whole earth, would needs forward, diuiding himselfe from ỹ maine host, thinking to win the spurs alone. To whom certaine sage men of the temple giuing contrarie counsell aduised him not so to doe, but rather to returne and take their whole company with them, and so should they be more sure against all deceits and dangers, which there might be laid priuilie for them. The maner of that people (they said) they better knew, and had more experience thereof then he: alleaging moreouer their wearied bodies, their tired horses, their famished souldiers, and the insufficiencie also of their number, which was not able to withstand the multitude of the enemies, especially at this present brunt, in which the aduersaries did well see the whole state of their dominion now to consist either in winning all, or losing all: with other such like words of persuasion. Which when the proud earle did heare, being inflated with no lesse arrogancie then ignorance, with opprobrious tants reuiled them, called them cowardly dastards, and betrayers of the whole countrie, obiecting vnto them the common report of many, which said, that the land of the Holy crosse might bee won to christendome were it not for the rebellious templaries, with the hospitalaries and their fellowes, &c.

The earle of Artois with the third part of the christian armie passeth ouer the riuer Nilus.

William Longspath.

Victorie of the christians against the Saracens.

Good counsell giuen, but not followed.

The despitefull rebukes of earle Robert to them that gaue him good counsell.

To these contumelious rebukes when the master of the temple

Digitized by Google

temple answered againe for him and his fellowes, bidding him display his ensigne when he would, and where hee durst, they were as readie to follow him, as he to go before them. Then began William de Longspath the worthie knight to speake, desiring the earle to giue eare to those men of experience, who had better knowledge of those countries and people then hee had, commending also their counsell to bee discreet and wholesome, and so turning to the maister of the temple began with gentle words to mitigate him likewise. The knight had not halfe ended his talke, when the earle taking his words out of his mouth began to fume and sweare, crying out of these cowardly Englishmen with tailes. What a pure armie (said he) should we haue here, if these tailes and tailed people were purged from it: With other like words of great villanie & much disdaine. Whereunto the English knight answering againe, Well earle Robert, said he, whersoeuer you dare set your foot, my step shall goe as far as yours; and as I beléeue, wee goe this day where you shall not dare to come neere the taile of my horse: as in the euent it proued true. Ibid. fol. 236.

The worthie answere of an English knight to earle Robert the kings brother.

In this meane time the French king intending to aduance forward his armie, thought best to send away such as were feeble and lacked armor, vnto Damiata by botes. The Soldan hearing thereof, prepared a great number of botes to be caried by waine and cart to the water side, which meeting them by the way, drowned and destroyed by wildfire euery one, so that of all that companie of our christians, of whom some were burned, some slaine, some drowned, not one escaped aliue, saue one onely Englishman, named Alexander Giffard, who although he was sore wounded in the chace in fiue places in his bodie, yet escaped to the French campe, bringing word vnto the king what was done. And this was vpon the water.

A number of French souldiers sent to Damiata, drowned and slaine by the way.

Now vpon the land, séeing earle Robert would néeds set forward, weening to get all the glorie vnto himselfe before the comming of the host; first they inuaded a little village or castle which was not far off, called Mansor. The countrie boores, and pagans in the villages by, séeing the christians come, ran out with such a maine crie and shout, that it came to the Soldans hearing, which was neerer then our men did thinke. In the meane while the christians inuading and entring into the munition incircumspectly, were pelted and pashed with stones by them which stood aboue, whereby a great number of our men were lost, and the armie sore maimed, and almost in despaire. Then immediately vpon the same commeth the Soldan with all his maine power, who séeing the christians armie to bee diuided, and the brother separated from the brother, had that which he long wished for, and so inclosing them round about that none should escape, had with them a cruell fight. Then the earle began to repent him of his headie rashnesse, but it was too late: who then séeing William the English knight doughtilie fighting in the chiefe brunt of the enemies, cried vnto him most cowardly to flie, séeing God (said hee) doth fight against vs. To whom the knight answering againe, God forbid (saith hee) that my fathers sonne should runne away from the face of a Saracen: the earle then turning his horse fled away, thinking to auoid by the swiftnesse of his horse, and so taking the riuer of Thasnis, oppressed with harnesse, was there sunken and drowned. Thus the earle being gone, the Frenchmen began to despaire and scatter. Then William de Longaspatha, bearing all the force of the enimies stood against them as long as he could, wounding and slaying many a Saracen, vntill at length his horse being killed, and his legs maimed, hee could no longer stand, who yet notwithstanding as hee was downe mangled their feet and legs, and did the Saracens much sorrow, till at the last after many blowes and wounds, being stoned of the Saracens, hee yéelded his life. After the death of him, then the Saracens setting vpon the residue of the armie, whom they had compassed on euerie side, deuoured and destroyed them all, in so much that scarce one man escaped aliue, sauing two templaries, one hospitular, and one poore rascall souldier, which brought tidings hereof to the king.

Earle Robert's armie inclosed by the Soldan of Babylon.

The cowardlie flying away of the earle Robert.

Earle Robert the kings brother drowned.

The manlie courage of William Longspath.

William Longspath slaine in batte.

The Frenchmen ouerthrowne.

The sorrowe in the French campe for losse of their brethren.

These things being knowne in the French campe vnto the king and his souldiers, first of their drowning which were sent to Damiata, then of the ruine and slaughter of the armie, with the kings brother by the towne of Mansor, there was no little sorrow and heauinesse on euery side, with great feare and doubt in themselues what was best to doe. At last, when they saw no remedie, but they must stand manfully to reuenge the blod of their brethren, then the king with his host past ouer the flod of Nilus, and comming to the place where the battell had been, there they beheld their fellowes and brethren pitifully lying with their heads and hands cut off. For the Saracens for the reward before promised by the Soldan or Sultan, vnto them that could bring the head and hand of any christian, had so mangled the christians, leauing their bodies vnto the wild beasts. Thus as they were sorrowing and lamenting the rufull case of their christian fellowes, suddenly appeareth the comming of the Soldan, with a multitude of innumerable thousands. Against whom the Frenchmen eftsoones prepare themselues to incounter, and so the battell being stricken vp, the armies began to ioyne. But alacke for pity, what could the Frenchmen here doe, their number first so maimed, their hearts wounded already with feare and sorrow, their bodies consumed with penury and famine, their horses for feblenesse not able to serue them? In conclusion, the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, slaine, and dispatched; and séeing there was no flying, happie was he that first could yéeld himselfe. In which miserable conflict, the king with his two brethren, and a few that claue vnto him, were taken captiues, to the confusion of all christian realmes, and presented to the Soldan. All the residue were put to the sword, or else stood to the mercie of the Saracens, whether to be slaine or to remaine in wofull captiuitie. And this was the end of that sorrowfull battell, wherin almost all the nobilitie of France was slaine, neither was there one man welneare in all the multitude which escaped free, but either was slaine, or taken prisoner. Furthermore, they that were slaine or left halfe aline, had euery one his head and hand cut off, vpon the Soldans proclamation aboue mentioned.

The French army ouerthrowne.

The pitifull slaughter of the Frenchmen.

The French king with his two brethren, taken captiue by the Soldan.

The Sultan or Soldan, after the taking of the French king, fraudulently suborning an armie of Saracens, to the number of the French army, with the armes and enlignes of them that were slaine, made toward Damiata, where the duke of Burgundie, with the French quéene, and Otho the popes legat, and other bishops and their garrisons were remaining, supposing vnder the shew of Frenchmen to bee let in: but the captaines mistrusting their hastie comming, and misdoubting their visages, not like to the Frenchmen, shut the gates against them, and so returned they frustrate of their intent.

The purpose of the Soldan was, if he might haue gotten Damiata, to send ỳ French king vp higher in ỳ east countries to Calipha the chiefe pope of Damascus, to increase the titles of Mahomet, and to be a spectacle or gazing stocke to all those quarters of the world. The maner of which Calipha was, neuer to let any christian prisoner come out, whosoeuer came once in his hand. But for so much as the Soldan missed his purpose, he thought by aduice of councell, to vse the kings life for his owne aduantage in recouering the citie of Damiata, as in the end it came to passe. For although the king at the first was greatly vnwilling, and had rather die then surrender Damiata againe to the Saracens, yet the conclusion so fell out, that the king was put to his ransome, and the citie of Damiata was also resigned, which citie being twice won, and twice lost by the christians, the Soldan or Saladin afterward caused it vtterly to be raced downe to the ground. The ransome of the king, vpon condition that the Soldan should see him safely conducted to Achon (which I take to be Cesaria) came to 60000 marks. The number of Frenchmen, & others which miscarted in that war by water and by land, came to 80000 persons. Hæc Matt. Paris, fol. 237. 238.

Damiata resigned to the Saracens.

The summe of the kings ransome.

The number of the Frenchmen slaine.

And thus haue ye the briefe narration of this lamentable peregrination of Lewis the French king. In which when the Frenchmen being once or twice well offered by the Soldan, to haue all the kingdome of Jerusalem, and much more in free possession; they not contented with that which was reasonable and sufficient, for greedinesse to haue all, lost all, hauing at length no more then their naked bodies could couer, lying dead vpon the ground, and all through ỳ originall cauſe of the pope and Otho his legat. By whose sinister meanes and pestilent pride, not onely the liues of so many christians were then lost, but also to the said pope is to be imputed all the losse of other cities and christian regions bordering in the same quarters: for so much as by the occasion hereof, the hearts of the Saracens on the one side were so incouraged, and the courage of the christians on the other side so much discomfited, that in short space after, both the dominion of Antioch and of Achon, with all other possessions belonging to the christians were lost, to the great diminishing of Christs church.

During the time of this good king lying at Achon or Cesaria, almightie God sent such discord betwixt the Soldan of Halapia, and the Soldan of Babylon, for letting the king so escape, that the said Soldan or Saladin of Babylon, to win the king vnto his side, entred league with him (whom both his brethren, and all his nobles almost at home had forsaken) and remitted his ransome, and also restored vnto him such prisoners as were in the said battell found to bee aliue. Thus the Lord worketh, where man commonly forsaketh. Mat. Paris. fol. 261.

The two Soldans at variance about the French king.

Another cause moreouer, why the ruine of this French armie may worthilie bee imputed to the pope, is this: for that when Lewis the French king perceiuing what a necessarie friend and helper Frederike the emperor might bee to him in these his affaires against the Saracens, and therefore was an earnest sutor for him to the pope to haue him released; yet neither he, nor the king of England by any meanes could obtaine it. And although the emperor himselfe offered to pope Innocent with all humble submission to make satisfaction in the councell of Lions, promising also to expugne all the dominions of the Saracens, and neuer to returne into Europe againe, and there to recouer whatsoeuer the christians had lost, so that the pope would onely grant his sonne Henrie to be emperor after him: yet the proud pope would not bee mollified, but would néeds proceed against him with both swords, that is, first with the spirituall sword to accurse him, and then with the tenporall sword to depose him from his imperiall throne. Through the occasion whereof, not onely the

What mischiefe hath come to christendome and by what meanes.

How Frederike the emperor might haue serued in good stead against the Saracens, but the pope would not suffer him.

Digitized by Google

The tyrannie and dnelliſh miſchiefe of the pope againſt the emperor.

French kings power went to wracke, but alſo ſuch a fire of miſchiefe was kindled againſt chriſtendome, as yet to this day cannot bee quenched. For after this ouerthrow of the French king and his armie, the chriſtians of Antioch and of other chriſtian regions thereabouts, being vtterly diſcouraged, gaue ouer their holds and cities. Whereupon the Saracens, and after them the Turks, got ſuch an hand ouer chriſtendome, as to this day we all haue great cauſe to rue and lament. Beſides this, where diuers chriſtians were croſſed to goe ouer and helpe the French king, the pope for money diſpenſed with them to tarrie ſtill at home.

But as I ſaid, the greateſt cauſe was, that the emperor which could haue done moſt, was depoſed by the popes tyrannie, whereby all thoſe churches in Aſia were left deſolate. As touching the which emperor Frederike, becauſe wee haue diuers and ſundrie times made mention of him before, and for that his ſtorie is ſtrange, his acts wondrous, and his conflicts tragicall, which he ſuſteined againſt foure or fiue popes one after another, I thought (not out of ſtorie) in a whole narration to ſet forth the ſame, for the reader to conſider, what is to bee iudged of this cathedrall ſée of Rome, which had wrought ſuch abominable miſchiefe in the world, as in the ſequell of the ſtory following faithfullie tranſlated out of Latine into Engliſh is to be ſéene.

The whole tragicall hiſtorie of Frederike the ſecond emperor, tranſlated out of the Latine booke of Nich. Ciſnerus.

What houſe Frederike came of.

FRederike the ſecond, came out of the ancient houſe of the Weblins or Gibillins; which Gibillins came of the moſt famous ſtocke of the French kings and emperors.

What father and mother.

He had Frederike Barbaroſſa to his grandfather, whoſe ſonne Henricus the ſixth was emperor after him, who of Conſtantia, the daughter (or as ſome write the neece) of Roger the firſt, king of Sicilie, begat this Frederike the ſecond.

The time and maner of his birth.

This Conſtantia was fiftie yeares of age before ſhe was conceiued with him; whom the emperor Henrie the ſixth to auoide all doubt and ſurmiſe that of hir conception and childing might be thought, and to the perill of the empire inſue: cauſed his regall tent to be pitched abrode in place where euery man might reſort. And when ỹ time of his quéens trauell approched, Conſtantia (in preſence of diuers ladies and matrons, and other gentlewomen of the empire, a great number) was brought a bed and deliuered of this Frederike, the ſeuenth day before the kalends of Januarie, in the yeare of Chriſts incarnation 1193, who by inheritance was king of Naples, Apulia, Calabria and Sicilia.

What patrons hee had.

Henricus his father ſhortly after hee was borne, obteined of the princes electors, that by their oth vnto him giuen, they would chuſe his ſonne Frederike for their emperor after his deceaſe, and ſo did, and immediately called him Ceſar, being yet but in his cradle.

This Henrie when hee died (which was ſhortly after the birth of Frederike) committed the protection of him to Conſtantia his wife, to Philip his brother chiefe gouernor of Hetruria, and to the biſhop of Rome, then Innocentius the third.

Conſtantia, not long after the death of Henry hir huſband being ſickly and growing into age, and thereby not ſo well able to gouerne the troubles and vnquiet ſtate of the empire, reſigned, and willed by hir teſtament the ſafety both of hir ſonne Frederike, and alſo of his dominions to the protection and gouernment of Innocent the third, thinking therby ſafely to haue prouided, &c.

The conſpiracies of pope Innocent againſt Frederike during his minoritie.

This pope Innocent, as ſoone as hee had the protection of the yong emperor and his ſeigniories, became in ſtead of a patron and protector to him and his dominions both an enemie and conſpirator. The examples are many. One is, hee perſuaded Sibyll the late wife of Tancredus (whom Henrie put from the kingdome of Sicilie) to recouer the ſame againe, and that ſhee ſhould thereunto require Philip the French kings aide.

The firſt conſpiracie.

Whereupon one Waltherus being of ỹ noble houſe of the erles of Bzenno, which in the prouince of Barrencecis had great liuing; and marrying with Ateria the eldeſt daughter of Tancredus once king of Sicilia (as is ſaid) now by the inſtigation, counſell, and aid of the French king with the pope (well hoping to recouer the kingdom) entred and inuaded with great power Campania, and Apulia. At which time alſo, the ſame worthie protector Innocentius the third, ſent his legats with letters of excommunication againſt all thoſe that would not admit and take the ſaid Waltherus for their king.

The ſecond conſpiracie.

Another was, that where the princes electors and other nobles as before is ſaid, had promiſed by their oth to Henricus, that they would make Frederike his ſonne emperor after his deceaſe (whom the pope ſaw to put their indeauor thereunto to bring it to paſſe) abſolued them all from the oth which they had taken and giuen for the election of Frederike the emperor, as one not content he ſhould obtaine the ſame. And further, hee raiſed ſlanders and defamations againſt Philip, whom the electors had choſen to gouerne the empire during the minoritie of Frederike his nephue. Hee wrote his epiſtle (which is yet extant) to the duke Barthold of Zaringia to bee emperour.

The third conſpiracie.

Who for that he gaue place to Philip, hee went about to procure that Otho the ſon of Henry Leo ſhould be made emperor, and that the princes and lords electors of Germanie would crowne him forthwith after the maner of Aquiſgrane. He depriued all ſuch biſhops as he knew to fauour Philip as emperor, in the defence of his nephues right. But Philip whoſe cauſe was better, his ſkill in martiall affaires greater, and in power and ſtrength mightier, after diuers and great conflicts, the maruellous diſturbance & vaſtation of the whole empire, by Gods helpe put the other to the worſe. All which calamities and miſchiefes Conradus Lichtenauus at that time liuing, in his annales moſt pitifullie complaineth of, and accuſeth the biſhop of Rome and his adherents to be the chiefe authors and deuiſers of this great and lamentable miſchiefe, as ſuch that for to make themſelues rich by the ſpoile thereof, ſought by all meanes and deſired the ſame.

The fourth conſpiracie.

Not long after, a peace was concluded betweene Philip and Otho, and Philip reconciled againe to the pope, who within a while after betweene Otho and him was murthered in his chamber and ſlaine. And then was Otho againe brought to the imperiall ſeate, and new elected for emperor, with the counſell and conſent of this Innocent the third, and ſo continued vntill that a great variance and diſcord chanced to ariſe betweene the ſaid Otho and the pope. Wherupon Innocentius ſought by all meanes, how againſt him likewiſe hee might worke miſchiefe and bring him vnto his end. The occaſion of this ſudden change and alteration my author maketh no mention of, but that Otho (now being of great power) inuaded and deſtroyed theſe dominions of Frederike, as Flaminia, Piſenum, Umbria, Hetruria, but chiefly Campania, and Apulia, ſo that thoſe properly appertained to the inheritance of Frederike.

The fifth conſpiracie.

Philip ſlaine.

Variance betweene Otho and the pope.

Thus you ſée, how firſt by the counſell and conſent of pope Innocentius and by his inſtigation, beſides his ſecret conſpiracies, this good Frederike and his dominions were hurt and indamaged. Then againe through his default what damage he ſuſteined by Otho, who by him and his meanes was made ſo ſtrong as he was: notwithſtanding the great truſt he was put in for the protection both of Frederike and his dominions.

What learning and knowledge he was of.

At this time Frederike was come vnto the age of twentie yeares, who in his youth by the prouiſion of Conſtantia his mother, was ſo well inſtructed in letters, and in other arts and vertues ſo indued, that at theſe yeares there appeared and did ſhine in him excellent gifts both of wiſdome and knowledge.

What vertue he was indued with.

He was excellently well ſéene in the Latine and Gréeke tongues, although at that time learning began to decay, and barbaroufneſſe to increaſe. He had alſo the Germane tongue, the Italian tongue, and the Saracen tongue. Hee daily exerciſed and put in practiſe thoſe vertues which nature had planted in him, as pietie, wiſedome, iuſtice, and fortitude: in ſo much that well he might be compared and accounted among the worthieſt and moſt renoumed emperors his predeceſſors.

Frederike ſuſpected for his grandfathers ſake.

Fazellius (the hiſtorician of Sicilia in this time) writeth, that Fredericus was againe after this had in great honor and eſtimation with Innocentius; but yet notwithſtanding he had no ſure confidence in him, for that he had the ſuſpected name of Frederike his graundfather often in remembrance, and for that occaſion was much deſirous to haue him far from Italie.

When Frederike had gathered his power, he purpoſed to ſet vpon Otho his enemie; of which thing Otho hearing (as he was painefull in trauell) came out of Italie with his armie into Germanie, thinking to haue met Frederike at the riuer of Rhene, and to haue ſtopped his paſſage; but hee was deceiued of his expectation, and Fredericus was crowned, as the maner of Aquiſgrane is, before he came. And after that Frederike in the winter time toke his iourney to Frankford, and after many métings in Norico had, and that Otho was dead, he ſet the empire in a ſtay, and the whole countrie of Germanie hee in a maner appeaſed. And then with all his nobles and princes hee returned to Rome, and of Honorius the third was with great ſolemnitie conſecrated and called Auguſtus. Which Honorius ſucceéded Innocentius the third in the papall ſée: and was a great helpe to Frederike (although hee loued him not) in this behalfe, to reuenge himſelfe vpon Otho.

The coronation of Frederike.

The death of Otho.

The conſecration of Frederike the emperor.

After the conſecration of Frederike the ſecond, hee gaue many great and liberall gifts, as well vnto the biſhop of Rome himſelfe, as alſo vnto the court of Rome beſides. Alſo he gaue and aſſured by his charter to the church of Rome, the dukedome of Fundanum. For by the vnſatiable couetouſneſſe of the Romiſh biſhops, this wicked vſe and cuſtome grew, that vnleſſe the emperors elect and crowned would giue vnto them ſuch like great and large gifts, they could not obtaine of them their conſecration or confirmation, which for that intent they deuiſed.

The liberall munificence of Frederike to the pope and church of Rome.

Furthermore, Frederike the emperor willing to ſhew himſelfe more bountifull and liberall vnto the church, neither yet to reſtraine any priuiledge that might benefit the ſame, gaue and admitted thoſe conſtitutions which the pope himſelfe would deſire, and are yet extant in their ciuill law: by which his doings he deliuered to their hands a ſword (as it were) to cut his Frederike giueth through his liberalitie a woord to cut his owne throte.

Digitized by Google

his owne throte: for the bishops of Rome now having euen what they listed, and all in their own hands, might by the paine of proscription, bring what emperor or king vnder Coram nobis that them listed, and keepe them by their owne lawes, as if they were bound in certaine bands, out of which they might not start. For whatsoeuer he were which for the diminution of the liberties of the church were excommunicated, and so continued a yéere's space, then he should be within the danger of this proscript, and should not be released before hee had made satisfaction, and were admitted by the pope to the church and congregation of good men againe. Whereby it came to passe, that whatsoeuer emperor in the gouernement of his dominions, should in any point displease or do contrary to the lust of the bishop of Rome, he then as enemy to the church was excommunicat. And vnlesse within a yéere he were reconciled to them againe (by this their principall law) he was in the proscript. And often it chanced, that princes to auoid the pain of this proscript, were ready to doe whatsoeuer the pope would haue them, and commanded them to doe.

The canon of proscription granted and confirmed by Frederike.

After the consecration of Frederike was with great solemnity finished, and that the pope and church of Rome in all ample maner (as is partly described) were gratified, and yet larger constitutions to them confirmed, hee departed from Rome, and went into Italy, there to set in order and stay the cities and great townes, for the better tranquillity of himselfe and safetie of his subiects, and from thence into his owne prouinces and dominions: where he heard of certaine that began to raise and make new factions against him. Amongst whom were found Thomas & Richard, the brethren of Innocentius the third earle of Anaquinos, that held certaine castels in the kingdome of Neopolitans from him by force: which castels he besieged and beat downe, and tooke from them all that hee in them found. Richard he tooke and sent as a prisoner into Sicilia: but Thomas escaped and came spéedily to Rome, whither also repaired certaine bishops and others that were conspirators against Frederike, as also such others as the feare of the emperors lawes, and their own guilty consciences caused to flie, and were (that notwithstanding) of this bishop of Rome Honorius the third (to gratifie againe the liberality of the emperor bestowed vpon him) vnder his rose succored, maintained, and defended. Which thing when Frederike vnderstood, he began to expostulat with the bishop, considering the vnseemlinesse of that his fact. Against whom the pope on the other side was so chafed and vered, that immediatly without further delay hee thundereth out against him like a tyrant, his curses and excommunications.

Frederike after his consecration directeth his prouinces and dominions.

The liberality of Frederike well recompenced of Honorius the third.

Frederike expostulateth, the pope curseth.

Thomas Fazellus declareth the detestation or defiance to happen betweene them somewhat otherwise. There were (saith he) amongst those which were found traitors to the emperor, certaine bishops, which flying to the pope, requested his aid: whereupon the pope sent his legats to the emperor, and requested him that he would admit and receiue to fauor those bishops which he had banished and put from their offices, and that he would not intermeddle with any ecclesiasticall charge wherewith he had not to doe: and said further, that the correction and punishment of such matters pertained to the bishop of Rome, and not to him. And moreouer, that the ouersight of those churches in that kingdome, from the which he had expelled the bishops, pertained and belonged vnto him.

Whereunto Frederike thus replieth; That forsomuch as now foure hundred yéeres and more (from the time of Carolus Magnus) all emperors and kings in their dominions might lawfully commit to apt and fit men for the same, such ecclesiasticall functions and charges as within their territories and kingdoms fell: that he looked to haue the like priuiledge and authority also, that other his predecessors before him had. And further said, that he had the same and like authority in the empire that his father Henry and Frederike his grandfather, and other his predecessors before them had; neither had he so deserued at the hands of the church of Rome, either of Honorius himselfe, to be depriued of those priuiledges which his ancestors before him had and kept. And further, Frederike being chafed and moued with these demands of the pope, breaketh forth and saith; How long will the bishop of Rome abuse my patience? When will his couetous heart be satisfied? Whereunto will his ambitious desire grow? With such like words more, repeating certaine iniuries and conspiracies, both against him and his dominions, as well by Honorius as Innocentius the third his predecessor, as also other like iniuries of popes to his ancestors practised. What man (saith he) is able to suffer and beare this so incredible boldnesse and intollerable insolencie of so proud a bishop? Go, saith he (vnto the legats) and tell Honorius that I will hazard both the seignior of my empire, and crowne of my kingdome, rather then I will suffer him thus to diminish the authority of our maiestie. Thomas Fazellus, lib. 8.

The emperor replieth to the popes demand.

The emperor speaketh but reason, howsoeuer it pleaseth the pope to take it.

Now because much disquietnesse and controuersie hath arisen (for the most part through all christendome in euery kingdome and realme seuerally) for and about the authority of chusing and depriuing of bishops (as may be séene by the example of this Frederike) which the pope only and arrogantly challengeth to himselfe, and not to appertaine to another: I thought good not with silence to ouerpasse, but somewhat to say, and to proue the authority of christian kings and princes in this behalfe, to be both sufficient and good. Which thing not only by the holy scriptures is right easie to be done, but also by synodall decrées and councels (diuers and sundry) to be established and confirmed, may easily be proued, as also by the ancient custome and maner of the primitiue church may further be corroborated and made good.

The strife betweene the pope and the emperor for the election and deprivation of bishops.

Wherunto appertain certaine places collected and gathered out of the decrées of Gratianus, and especially in these canons, 12, 13, 14, 26, 27, 32, and 63 distinctions. Furthermore, when christian kings & princes began to imbrace Christ his religion, both for honor & orders sake it was granted: that when the people desired such ministers as were conuenient, and by them thought méet, that they which were then in the ecclesiasticall function, and chiefest in authority, should either confirme such as were presented, or else themselues to place fit men in their churches as need required. So did the emperors of Constantinople (receiuing the order and maner from Constantine the Great) vse and giue the right of ecclesiasticall function with the consent both of the people and ecclesiasticall persons, and long so retained the same. As Honorius the emperor vnto Boniface, can. 8. dist. 79. and can. 2. dist. 97. Also of Pelagius & Gregorius Magnus: of which one in the raigne of Iustinian the emperor and Totila gouerning Italy; the other in the time of Mauricius the emperor (when the Lombards possessed Italy) were appointed bishops to the church of Rome: cap. 15. 21. 24.

Authority for the election of bishops to be in the princes and their subiects.

Authorities of election of the bishop of Rome to be in the emperor.

And whereas Gratianus in the beginning of the 96 and 97 distinction doth declare, that the rescript of Honorius the emperor is void and of none effect, for that he determined the election of the bishop of Rome, contrary to the authority of the holy canons, when as yet neither to the ciuill magistrat, nor to any of the ecclesiasticall order, can be read of any licence giuen them for to dispence withall: each man may plainly see and discerne his great folly and want of vnderstanding. As though at that time any decrées were made, which should debar emperors for the constituting of the ecclesiastical ministers. Or that it were doubtfull whether the emperors at that time had past any constitutions touching the causes of ecclesiasticall discipline, and the same lawes then put in vre, when the contrary most manifestly (both by the lawes and histories of that age and time, as well of the church as of the empire) may appeare. And that we need not seeke far for the matter, this thing is sufficiently proued by these titles: De sacrosanctis ecclesijs, episcopis, clericis, besides other ecclesiasticall chapters and matters touching religion. All which are to be séene in the bookes of the principall and chiefest constitutions, collected and set forth by Iustinian. Amongst the which, many of the chapters are said to be accepted and allowed of Honorius and Theodosius: so in like case the 21 can. in the 63 distinction doth declare, that the Grecian emperors that next ensued after Iustinian, did obserue that maner of ordaining & electiō of the bishop of Rome, although then at that time Interpellatum erat, it was somewhat spurned at. Amongst whom mention is made of Constantinus the fourth, which was surnamed Pogonatus.

Gratianus in his distinctions reproued for the election of bishops to be in the pope.

The titles of Iustinian for the election.

The Grecian emperors electors of bishops.

Carolus Magnus in like manner followed their steps and maner in the same, as in the 22 canon, and the same distinction is declared. And further, it was at a synodall councell in Lateran (Adrian being high bishop, where were conuented and assembled 153 other bishops) decréed: that the power and authority of creating the bishop of Rome, and ordaining of all other prelats and ecclesiasticall orders, should be in the power and will of Carolus Magnus, as well in Italy as other his dominions and prouinces, and that whosoeuer was not promoted and allowed by him, should not be consecrated of any; and that those which repugned and disobeied this decrée, should incur the most sharpe paine of proscription and publication of law. The worthy example hereof is extant in the 18 can. and 18 title. Yet notwithstanding, Stephanus the fourth author of this rescript against the said decrée and without the emperors consent was made bishop of Rome; who to the intent he might delude the decrées and solemnized penalty, thereby to excuse himselfe, went into France to Ludouicus Pius the sonne of Carolus Magnus, and at Rheims crowned he him with the imperiall diadem. Neither could this bishop here stay himselfe, but spying the great lenity of the emperor, allaied to make frustrate the foresaid constitution. For his purpose was, and so brought it to passe, as in the 27 can. and the same distinction appeareth, that it might bee lawfull for the ecclesiasticall order, with the people and senat of Rome (without the authority of the emperor) to chuse the bishop of Rome, referring that he should not be consecrated without the will and consent of the emperor. Thus it is manifest, that the bishops of Rome themselues, not regarding but despising the strict penalty and sanction of the foresaid decrée of the Lateran councell, were not only the first that brake the same, but also by contrary rescripts and constitutions, laboured and indeuoured to extoll and set vp themselues aboue all others.

Stephan the fourth first alterer of this election.

The bishop of Rome the first breaker of the decrees of the councell.

Whereupon Lotharius afterward being emperor and nephew to Carolus Magnus, comming into Italy there to dissolue the conspiracie and confederacie of Leo the fourth about the translation of the empire, renewed & stablished againe the synodall

Lotharius renewed the Lateran decree for election of bishops.

Digitized by Google

synodall decree of Lateran touching the iurisdiction of the emperor for the election of the bishop of Rome and other ecclesiasticall persons. And heereof it came that those epistles were written of Leo in the 16 and 17 canon, and the same distinction, which also, as in the 9 can. and 10 distinction, made a profession, that the same imperiall precepts should bee kept in all ages. This Leo when he was reproued of treason and other euils, pleaded his cause before Ludouicus the second, emperor of Rome, and sonne of Lotharius aboue recited: 2 question, 7 can. 40.

Otho deposeth Iohn the fourteenth, and ratifieth a new decree of election.

But after this, as time grew on, the bishops of Rome nothing relinquishing their ambitious desires; Otho the first emperor of that name, depriued and put from the sea of Rome that most filthy and wicked bishop Iohn the thirteenth, both for diuers and sundry wicked and hainous acts by him committed, as also for his great treasons and conspiracies against his roiall person, and did substitute in his place Leo the fifth, who calling a synod at Lateran in the same temple and place where the other before was kept, did promulgat a new constitution with consent of the senat and people of Rome concerning the emperors iurisdiction in the foresaid election: which in the 23 canon is contained and 63 distinction. Whereby the old right and power of the emperor in the election of the bishop of Rome and other ecclesiasticall prelats, was againe with more sharper and stricter sanction confirmed and ratified. Against Iohn the eightéenth, whom Crescentius the Roman (vsurping the imperiall crowne) had made bishop by the consent of the people of Rome and the ecclesiasticall order, hauing his nose cut off, and his eies put out, and so thrust out of the capitoll, was againe of Otho the third established and made bishop. But when as yet notwithstanding, the bishops of Rome would not alter their old accustomed disposition, but with all their industry indeuored to abrogat that iurisdiction of the emperor ouer the bishop of Rome (as people loth to bee vnder subiection) Henry the third (then Leo the ninth being constituted bishop) did once againe ratifie the same, and cauled the bishop (which extolled himselfe before all his fellow bishops) to stepe and giue place to Moguntinus.

Leo the fifth was instituted by Otho the emperor.

The election once againe ratified to be in the emperors iurisdiction.

Henry the third and Leo the ninth.

So after the death of Henry the third emperor, Nicolas the second, although in his decrée (which in the 1 canon, and 23 distinction is recited) he gaue the primacy for the election of the bishop of Rome by the means of the priests & people of Rome, vnto the cardinals: yet he would after that, that the prerogatiue therein should be reserued to Henry the fourth the young emperor, from whom the empire afterwards was for a time wrested and taken.

Henry the fourth and Nicolas the second.

But now after this, when Hildebrand, which was called Gregory the seuenth, was pope, this prerogatiue of the emperors in their election, which before in the creation of Alexander the bishop was neglected and broken; the bishops of Rome not only did séeke to diminish the authority thereof, but also to euacuat and quite vndo the same. For he not only aspired to that dignity without the consent and appointment of the emperor, but also made restraint, that no emperor, king, duke, marques, earle, or any ciuil magistrat, should assigne and appoint to any, any ecclesiasticall function and charge; neither that any of his prelats so hardy, should take them at any of their hands: as quest. 16. can. 7, 9 and 10 may be séene.

The election hitherto in the emperors, and now beginneth to faile by Hildebrand.

Yet notwithstanding, after that this horrible monster Hildebrand was proscript and thrust out of the papall seat, and Clement the third put in his stead, Henry againe challenged his imperiall prerogatiue of election. But yet, when the bishops which succéeded after this Hildebrand, and led by his example, began to derogat from the imperiall prerogatiue of election: and Henry on the other side by all the means possible, sought to defend and maintaine the same, by the subtill fraud and mischieuous policie of the bishops, which set the sonne against the father, and found meanes to steale from him the hearts of his nobles and subiects, and to set them all against him, and especially the princes of Germany, was deposed and disappointed of his purpose.

Henry the fourth againe challengeth the election.

And although Henry the fifth (comming to Rome) brought Paschalis the second to that point, that he both in publike concion, and in writing sealed, and also by oth confirmed, restored againe to the emperors of Rome the prerogatiue of election, and of giuing ecclesiasticall dignities: yet notwithstanding, after that Henry the emperor was gone from Rome, Paschalis the pope, greatly repenting and sorrowing that he had done (in allowing and confirming the priuiledges of emperors through feare) touching the giuing and disposing of ecclesiasticall functions, excommunicated the emperor, and in a synodall coūcell at Lateran, ordained and decréed, that he should be had and accounted a wicked enemy, that would take any ecclesiasticall function or preferment at the hands of a ciuill magistrat: whereupon were made these decrées, qu. 16, chap. 7, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

Henry the fifth also striueth for the election and faileth.

Priests accursed that take any benefit at the hands of a lay man.

Therefore when these decrées touching the designation of bishops, in spight and contempt of the emperor were practised and put in vre; and when that now (especially by the means and procurement of the bishops) intestine and ciuill wars began to rise in the empire: the imperiall iurisdiction in this matter was not onely weakened and much debilitat, but also in manner vtterly broken and lost. For when Henry the fifth emperor was sharply of Lotharius and his vassals the bishops beset, and laid vnto by the prouocation of the pope, and was mightily by the bishops that toke his part on the other side, requested and intreated (in hope of publike peace & tranquillity) that hee would condescend and somewhat yéeld to the popes demands: he at length (the more was the pitie) that he might be reconciled and haue peace with pope Calixtus the second, in the citie of Mangio, departed from and with that his prerogatiue or iurisdiction of giuing ecclesiasticall preferments to the pope and his prelats, now more then three hundred yéeres (from the time of Carolus Magnus) in the hands of the emperors of Rome, and vntill this time with great fortitude and princely courage conserued and kept: which resignation turned to no small detriment both of the church of Christ, and christian commonwealth.

Henry the fifth resigneth his prerogatiue of election.

Then first, and neuer before, obtained the bishop of Rome, and quietly inioied that prerogatiue of election and bestowing of benefices, which he so long before with such great policies (now secretly, now openly, and now with force) had sought for. And with what sufficient and good authority Gratianus will proue, that before this time the same authority was giuen to the city of Rome for the election of the pope without the consent of the emperor, he sheweth, as in the 29 and 30 canon, and what good stuffe he putteth in the latter, and how subtilly that papisticall flatterer or pontifical parasit hath forged the same, both Carolus Molinæus sufficiently in diuers places hath noted, and by the obseruation of times may of a meane historiographer that hath read the French and German histories, some be espied and discerned. For first, fiue bishops one after another succéeded this Gregory the fourth, vpon whom the 29 canon is intituled or fathered; that is, Sergius the second, Iohn the eighth, Adrian the second, Iohn the ninth, and Adrian the third. Which Adrian by force, wresting the authority of the election from the people, was made pope, when as Gregory (specially to be noted) would not take on him the papacie, before that the emperor had consented to his election. After this, Molinæus compareth Raphael Volaterranus with the 30 canon, which againe is suspected. For why, when Eugenius was bishop, who was the successor of this Paschalis, with whom Ludouicus Pius is said to haue made a league or paction, the same Ludouicus Pius with his sonne Lotharius, together with the helpe of the king of Romans, at Rome made lawes both to all his subiects in the empire, as also to the Romans themselues: speaking nothing of the renewing of the decrée made by Lotharius. Then againe, how could Leo the fourth write to Lotharius and Ludouicus emperors, that counterfet or forged decrée beginning with Constitutio, &c? when in the same mention is made of Henricus Aucupes, and Otho the first, which reigned more then foure score yéeres after them, and Leo the fourth bishop of Rome.

The election gotten to the bishops of Rome.

Gratianus found a forger of the canons.

Sergius the second.

Iohn the sixth and Adrian the third.

The second fault found with Gratianus.

Now with what face dare this fond fellow Gratianus make Otho the first to be author of the 31 can. when as Otho depriued the same Iohn the twelfth of the papacie: and not only toke nothing from the imperiall iurisdiction concerning the election, nor from the citie of Rome, nor any other bishops subiect to the Roman empire, but added somewhat more thereunto, as was said before. And yet notwithstanding, so shameless and senseless was this Gratian, that he durst obtrude and lay before the reader so manifest fraud and euident legerdemaine (fained and made of his owne braines in the compiling of this decrée) being so necessary, as he thought for the dominion and primacie of the Roman bishops, in the stead of good and true lawes, neither fearing that the same might be after his daies reprehended, neither to his great shame and discredit to him attributed. Where also by the way is to be noted, that as this graceless Gratianus to please these holy fathers, and to erect their kingdome, would giue so impudent an attempt to the blinding and deceiuing of all posterities, inserting for grounded truths and holy decrées such loud lies and detestable doctrine, what may be thought of the rabble of the rest of writers in those daies, what attempts hope of gaine might cause them to worke: by whom and such like is to be feared the falsifying of diuers other good works now extant, in those perilous times written.

How shameles and impudent Gratianus is in forging the decrees.

The corrupting of many good works to be feared.

Thus when the bishops had once wrested this authority out of the emperors hands, they then so fortified and armed themselues and their dominion, that although afterwards Frederike the first, grandfather vnto this good emperor Frederike the second, as also Ludouicus Pius, and Henricus Lucelburgensis (as men most studious and carefull for the dignities of the empire, vnfained louers and maintainers of the vtility of the commonweale, and most desirous of the preseruation and prosperity of the church) did all their indeuors with singular wisdome and strength, as much as in them lay, to recouer againe from the bishop of Rome this the authority of the imperiall iurisdiction lost, most cruelly and wickedly abusing the same, to the destruction both of the empire, vndoing of the commonwealth, and vtter subuersion of the church of God: yet could they not be able to bring the same to passe in those darke and shadowed times of peruerse doctrine and errors of the people; and most miserable seruitude of ciuill magistrates.

The election wrested from the emperor.

What Rome once catcheth, that she keepeth.

Not without good cause desired they to nuzzell the people in ignorance.

The

The same and like priuiledge also in the election of their bishops and prelats, and disposing of ecclesiasticall offices, as the emperor of Rome had, euery prince and king in their seuerall dominions had the like. For by the decree of the councell of Toletan, which in the 25. canon and 63. distinction is mentioned; the authoritie of creating and chusing bishops and prelats in Spaine, was in the power of the king of Spaine. The like also by the histories of Clodoueus, Carolus Magnus, Ludouicus nonus, Philippus Augustus, Philippus Pulcher, Carolus quintus, Carolus sextus, Carolus septimus, kings of France, is apparant and well knowne; that all these kings had the chiefe charge and gouernment of the French church, and not the bishops of Rome.

Euery king and prince in their seuerall kingdome, had also till that time the prerogatiue of election.

Spaine had the same.

France had the same.

And by our English histories also, as you heard, it is manifest, that the authority of chusing ecclesiasticall ministers and bishops, was alwaies in the kings of England, till the raigne of king Henry the first, who by the labor and procurement of Anselmus archbishop of Canturbury, was depriued and put from the same.

England had the election.

Also the princes of Germany and electors of the emperor, till the time of Henry the fifth, had all (euery prince seuerally in his owne dition and prouince) the same iurisdiction and prerogatiue, to giue and dispose ecclesiasticall functions to their prelats at their pleasure, and after that it appertained to the people and prelats together. And how in the raigne of Frederike, the prelats gat vnto themselues alone this immunitie, Iohannes Auentinus in his seuenth booke of the annales of the Boiors doth describe.

Germany had the election.

Also it is probable that the kings of Sicilia had the same facultie in giuing and disposing their ecclesiasticall promotions and charge of churches: Andræas de Isthmia ad 1. constit. Neap. nu. 12. And that because Frederike defended him against the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, therefore (as Fazellus saith) he was excommunicated of Honorius: but that Platina & Blondus alleage other causes wherefore he was excommunicat of Honorius, I am not ignorant: howbeit, he that will compare their writings with others that write more indifferently betweene Honorius and him, shall easily find, that they more sought the fauor of the Roman bishops, then to write a verity. But now againe to the history of Frederike.

Sicilia had the election.

Nicolaus Cisnerus affirmeth, that whilest Frederike the emperor was in Sicilia, his wife Constantia died at Catiana or Catana. In the meane time the christians which with a great nauie, sailed into Egypt, and toke the citie Heliopolis, commonly called Dalmatia, and long ago named Pelusinum, being in good hope to haue driuen Sultanus the Soldan out of Egypt, had a great and maruellous ouerthrow by the conuaying of the water of the floud Nilus (which then ouerflowed into their campe) and were faine to accord an vnprofitable truce with the Soldan for certaine yeeres, and to deliuer the citie againe, and so departing out of Egypt, were faine to come to Acon and Tyrus, to the no small detriment and losse of the christian army. Whereupon king John surnamed Brennus (being king of Hierusalem) arriued in Italie, and praied aid of the emperor against his enemies, in whom he had great hope to finde remedy of the euils and calamities before declared, and from thence he went to Rome to the pope, delaring vnto him the great discomfit and ouerthrow past, as also the present perill and calamity that they were in, desiring also his aid therein. By whose meanes (as Cisnerus saith) the emperor was reconciled again to the pope, and made friends together, to whom also king John gaue Joell his daughter in marriage, which came of the daughter of Conradus king of Hierusalem, and marques of Montferrat, with whom he had for dowrie, the inheritance of the kingdome of Hierusalem, as right heire thereunto by her mother. By whom also he after obtained the kingdome of Naples and Sicill, and promised that with as much expedient speed as he might, he would prepare a power for the recouery againe of Hierusalem, and be there himselfe in proper person: which thing to do, for that vpon diuers occassions he deferred (whereof some thinke, one some another) Honorius, vnto whom he was lately reconciled, purposed to haue made against him some great and secret attempt, had he not been by death before preuented, vpon whom were made these verses.

The death of Constantia the wife of Frederike.

A great ouerthrow of the christians in Egypt.

Frederike and the pope made friends.

Honorius the pope dieth before he put his practise in vre against Frederike.

O pater Honori, multorum nate dolori,
Est tibi decori viuere, vade mori.

After whom succeeded Gregorius the ninth, as great an enemy to Frederike, as was Honorius, which Gregory came of the race whom the emperor (as before ye heard) condemned of treason which they wrought against him. This Gregory was scarsly setled in his papacie, when that he threatned him greatly with excommunication, vnlesse hee would prepare himself into Asia according to his promise, as ye heard before, to king John; and what the cause was why the pope so hastened the iourny of Frederike into Asia, you shall heare hereafter: In effect, he could not well bring that to passe which in his mischieuous mind he had deuised, vnlesse the emperor were further from him. Notwithstanding, Frederike it should seeme smelling a rat, or mistrusting somewhat (as well he might) alleaged diuers causes and lets, as lately and truly he did to Honorius.

Gregory the ninth as great an enemy to Frederike as Honorius.

Frederike refuseth to go into Asia at the popes bidding: the pope is angry.

Fazellus a Sicilian writer saith, that the speciall cause of the emperors stay was, for the oth of truce and peace during certaine yeeres, which was made betweene the Saracens and christians as you heard, which time was not yet expired.

The same also Fazellus writeth thus of king John of Hierusalem, that when his daughter was brought to Rome, the emperor and the pope were reconciled together. And being called vp to Rome to celebrat the marriage, pope Gregory (as the maner of those proud prelats is) offered his right foote vnto the emperor to kisse. But the emperor not stooping so low, scarsely with his lip touched the vpper part of his knee, and would not kisse his foot; which thing the pope toke in very euill part, and was therewith maruellously offended. But for that no opportunity at that time serued to reuenge his conceiued grudge and old malice, he dissembled the same as he might for that time, thinking to recompence it at the full, as time would serue, and fall out therefore.

The cause of the stay of the emperors iourny into Asia.

The pope dissembleth his grudge.

After this, it fortuned that the emperor hearing how the christians were oppressed by the Soldan in Syria, and that from Arsacida there came a great power against the christian princes: he made the more haste, and was with more desire incouraged to set forward his iourny into Asia. Wherefore assembling the nobility of the empire at Rauenna & Cremona, he gaue in commandement to Henry his sonne (whom not long before he caused to be created Cesar) that he should perswade the nobles and princes of the empire, that they all would bee ready to put to their helping hands, in furthering this his iourny and enterprise. This writeth Fazellus: howbeit, some others affirme that these things were done in the time of Honorius. But howsoeuer the matter is, this thing is manifest; that Frederike to satisfie the popes desire, which neuer would lin, but by all means sought to prouoke him forward, gaue him at length his promise, that by a certaine time he would prepare an army, and fight himselfe against those, which kept from him the citie of Hierusalem (which thing he also confesseth himselfe in his epistles, and also how hee desired, and obtained of the peeres and nobility of the empire, their aid thereunto) as also, to haue appointed a conuenient time when they should bee at Brundusium.

The preparation of the voyage of Frederike to Hierusalem and stay thereof.

In the meane season, he with all his power and indeuour made spedy and hasty preparation for the warres: he rigged and manned a puissant nauy, he had the pickedst men and best souldiers that were in euery country, and made warlike prouision and furniture, for euery thing that to such a voiage and expedition appertained. Neither was the matter slacked, but at the time appointed great bands assembled and mustred both of German souldiers and others, and vnder their captaines appointed, set forth and marched to Brundusium. Their generals were, Thuringus and Sigebertus, and Augustinus the bishop: where they long time lying, and attending the emperors comming, being let by infirmity and sickenes, great pestilence and sundry diseases molested them, by reason of the great heat and intemperance of that country: and many a souldier there lost his life, among whom also died Thuringus, one of their generals. The emperor, when he had somewhat recouered his health, with all his nauy lanched out and set forward to Brundusium. And when he came to the straits of Peloponesus and Creta, being Ilands lying in the sea, and there for lacke of conuenient wind was staied, suddenly the emperor (his diseases growing vpon him againe) fell sicke; & sending before all or the most part of his bands and ships into Palestina, promising them (most assuredly) to come after and follow them so soone as he might recouer and get neuer so little health: hee himselfe with a few ships returned and came to Brundusium, and from thence, for want of health, went into Apulia.

The preparation of the emperors war against the Turke.

Great sickenes in the emperors army.

The emperor himselfe sicke.

When tidings hereof came to the popes eare, he sent out his thundring curses and new excommunications against the emperor. The causes wherefore, I finde noted and mentioned by his owne letters, that is; How that when hee had robbed and taken from Brundusius, prince of Thuring, his horses, his mony, and other rich furniture of his house at the time of his death, he sailed into Italy: not for the intent to make war against the Turke, but to conuay his pray that he had stollen and taken away from Brundusius, who neglecting his oth and promise which he had made, and faining himselfe to be sicke, came home againe. And that by his default also, Damiata was lost, and the host of the christians sore afflicted. Fazellus besides these causes spoken of before, doth write that the pope alleaged these also: that he defiled a certaine damsell, which was in the quenes nursery; and that he slew his wife when he had whipped her in the prison, for declaring the mischieuous act to her father king John. But all the writers, and also Blondus himselfe doth declare, that this Joell died after the publication of the proscript and excommunication: wherefore, the pope could not without great shame alleage the cause vpon the death of Joel; for vndoubtedly the truth is, that she of her sonne Conradus died in childbed. Then Frederike, to refell and auoid the foresaid slanders, sendeth the Bishop of Brundis and other legats to Rome, whom the pope would not suffer to come to his presence, neither yet to the councels of the cardinals to make his purgation. Wherefore the emperor to purge himself of the crimes which the pope did so falsly accuse him of, both to all christian

The pope excommunicateth the emperor for staying his voyage.

He laieth false accusations to his charge.

The emperor purgeth himselfe of those crimes the pope laid against him by his letters dedicated to all christian princes.

Digitized by Google

christian kings, and specially to the princes of Germany, and all the nobles of the empire, he writeth his letters (which are to be seene) that those things are both false & also fained, and of the popes owne head inuented; and sheweth how that his ambassadors with his purgation could not be suffered to come to the popes presence: also doth largely intreat how vnthankfull and vngratefull the bishops of Rome were towards him for the great benefits, which both hee and also his predecessors had bestowed vpon them and the Roman church: which letter, for that it is ouer tedious here to place, considering the discourse of the history is somewhat long, the sum of the purgation is this.

The effect of the emperors letters.

He protesteth and declareth vniuersally, that hee had alwaies great care for the christian common wealth, and that he had determined euen frō his youth to fight against the Turke and Saracens. And for that occasion he made a promise to the princes electors of Aquisgrane, how that he would take the war vpon him. Afterward he renewed his promise to Rome when he was consecrated of Honorius; then when he maried the daughter of the king of Hierusalem, which was an heire of the same. And for because that kingdome might be defended & kept from the iniuries of the enemies, and that he fauored it euen as hee did his own, he prepared an huge nauy, and gathered togither a strong army of men, neither did he neglect any thing that belonged to the furniture of the war. But when the time was come, and his band was gathered together, his sicknes would not suffer him to be there. And afterward when he had recouered the same, and came to Brundusium, and from thence without any disturbance went forthwith to the sea: he fell into the same sicknesse againe, by the which he was let of his purpose, which thing (saith he) he is able to proue by sufficient testimony. How the pope also doth lay the losing of Damiata and other things which prospered not wel with him, vniustly to his charge, when as he had made great prouision for the same iourny, both of souldiers & other necessary things. But he ỹ will vnderstand these things more plainly, among other epistles of Petrus de Vineis, written in the name of Frederike, let him reade these especially which begin thus: In admirationem, & iustitiam, & innocentiam, & Leuate oculos. And truly euen as Fredericus the emperor declareth in his letters concerning this matter, all the old writers of Germany doe accord and agree in the same.

The emperors purgation.

The emperors epistle beginning thus: In admirationem & iustitiam, and againe: Leuate oculos.

A letter of the emperor to the king of England, abstracted by Matthew Paris.

Matth. Parisiensis also briefly collecteth the effect of another letter which he wrote to the king of England, complaining vnto him of the excommunication of the pope against him, whose words are these: And amongst other catholike princes (saith he) he also wrote his letters vnto the king of England, embulled with gold: Declaring in the same that the bishop of Rome so flamed with the fire of auarice and manifest concupiscence, that not being cōtented with the goods of the church, which were innumerable, but also that he shamed not to bring princes, kings, and emperors to be subiects and contributors to him, and so to disherit them and put them from their kingly dignities. And that the king of England himselfe had good experiment thereof, whose father (that is to say, King Iohn) they so long held excommunicat, till they had brought both him and his dominions vnder seruitude, and to pay vnto him tribute. Also that many haue experience of the same by the earle of Tholouse and diuers other princes, which so long held their persons and lands in interdict, till they might bring them into like seruitude. I pretermit (saith he) the simonies & sundry sorts of exactions (the like whereof was neuer yet heard) which daily are vsed amongst the ecclesiasticall persons, besides their manifest vsury (yet so cloked and coloured to the simple sort) that therewithall they infect the whole world. They be sugred and embalmed simonists, the insatiable horse-leaches or bloud-suckers, saying: that the church of Rome is our mother and nurse, whereas it is indeed the most polling court in the vniuersall world, the roote & right mother of all mischiefe, vsing and exercising no motherly doings or deedes, but bringing forth the right exercises of a wicked stepdame, making sufficient proofe thereof by her manifest fruits to all the world apparant. Let the barons of England consider whether this bee true or not, whom pope Innocent by his buls with one consent incouraged to rise and rebell against their soueraigne lord and prince king Iohn your father, as an obstinat enemy to the church of Rome. But after that, the king (farre out of square) remembring himselfe, had crouched vnto him and obliged both himselfe and kingdome to the church of Rome, more liker a woman then a man; and that the wise barons whom the pope had first maintained and stirred vp, without all shame either of the world, or feare of God had done the same, sought how hee might with gaping mouth deuour and consume the sweet fat from them, whom he had miserably to death betraied and disherited, as the maner of the Roman bishops is. By whose greedy auarice it came to passe, that England the prince of prouinces was brought vnder miserable subiection and tribute. Behold the manners and conditions of our Roman bishops, behold the snares wherewith these prelats doe seeke to intangle men withall, to wipe their noses of their mony, to make their children bondmen, to disquiet such as seeke to liue in peace, being clothed with sheeps clothing, when in deed they be but rauening wolues, sending their legats hither and thither to excommunicat and to suspend: as hauing power to punish whom they list, not sowing the seed, that is the word of God, to fructifie, but that they may bribe and poll mens persons, and reape that which they neuer did sow. Thus commeth it to passe, that they spoile the holy churches and houses of God, which should be the refuge for the poore, and the mansion houses of Saints, which our deuout and simple parents to that purpose builded and ordained to the refection of poore men and pilgrims, and to the sustentation of such as were well disposed and religious. But these degenerat varlets, whom only letters haue made both mad and malipert, do striue and gape to be both kings and emperors.

Who be the rauening wolues in sheeps clothing.

The treasure of the church belongeth to the poore.

Many kingdomes haue experience of the popes practises.

The church of Rome the mother of mischiefe.

King Johns submission to the pope blamed by the emperor.

Doubtlesse the primitiue church was builded and laid in pouerty and simplicitie of life, and then as a fruitfull mother begat she those her holy children, whom the catalogue of Saints now maketh mention of: and verily no other foundation can be laid of any other church, then that which is laid by Iesus Christ. But this church as it swimmeth and walloweth in all superfluitie of riches, and doth build and raise the frame in all superfluous wealth and glory, so is it to be feared lest the wals thereof in time fall to decay, and when the wals be downe, vtter ruine and subuersion follow after. Against vs, he knoweth that is the searcher of al hearts, how furiously these catholikes rage and go to worke; Saying, and therefore excommunicating me, that I will not take vpon me the iourny I haue promised beyond the seas, whereas ineuitable and most vrgent causes and perils as well to the church of God, as also to the empire, besides the annoiance of mine infirmity and sickneſſe, do detaine me at home, and stay the same, but specially the insolencie of the rebellious Sicilians. For why? neither doe we thinke it safetie to our empire, nor expedient to the christian state, that we should now take our iourny into Asia, leauing behind vs at home such intestine and ciuill wars, no more then for a good surgeon to lay a healing plaister to a grieuous wound new stricken with the sword and made. In conclusion, also to this he addeth, admonishing all the princes of the world, that they would beware and take heed (by their auaricious iniquity) of like perill and danger to themselues, because that as the prouerbe is: It behoueth him to looke about that seeth his neighbours house on fire. Thus much out of Parisiensis, pag. 69.

Christs church was builded in humility: the popes church is all superfluitie: Ergo, the popes church is not Christs church.

But now, that Fredericus the emperor might in very deed stop the slanders of the cruell pope, which did perstil and go forward still in his excommunication against him; and that he might declare in the whole world, how that the last yeere he forslowed not his iourny by his owne voluntary will, but by necessity, when he had deuised and prepared all things meete for the war, and that he had gathered together and leuied a great army of men, he departed from thence to Brundusium, committing the gouernment of his kingdome to Reinaldus the sonne of duke Spoletus, and to Anselmus a baron of Justingensis, and came by sea to Cyprus with his host.

Another iourny of the emperor to Hierusalem.

From Cyprus, the emperour with his whole nauy sailed into Ioppa, which citie he fortified, for that the passages by land were stopped and kept of the enemies: and by sea might he not passe nor trauell, by meanes of the extreame weather and tempest; whereby it came to passe, that within short space they lacked victuals, and were sore afflicted with famin. Then fell they to praier, and made their humble supplication to God, with whose teares his wrath being appeased, the great tempest and long continued foule weather ceased, whereby (the seas being now calme) they had both victuals great plenty, and all other necessary things for their need brought vnto them, whereby immediatly it came to passe, that both the emperor and his army, as also the inhabitants of Joppa were greatly refreshed and animated: and on the other side, their enemies being disappointed of their purpose, were greatly discouraged; insomuch that the king of Egypt, who with great power (accompanied with Scarapho his brother, prince of Gaza, & the prince of Damascus their nephew, with many other dukes and nobles) hauing incamped themselues within one daies iourny of Joppa, thinking to haue besieged the same, were contented vpon the comming of the emperors heralds vnto them, to intreat of a peace.

The emperor oppressed by famin, and by praier miraculously relieued.

A conclusion of a profitable peace during ten yeeres betweene the Turks and the christians.

Whereupon, ambassadors were sent vnto them with the emperors demands, right profitable to the christian common weale. The Saracens (immediatly consulting vpon the same) granted thereunto; so that a peace for ten yeeres was concluded, and was confirmed by solemne oth on the behalfe of both princes, according to their seuerall vsages and manner: the forme and condition of which peace breefly collected are these.

The Articles of the peace agreed vpon.

Firſt, that Frederike the emperor should be crowned and annointed king of Jerusalem, according to the manner of the kings of Jerusalem before him.

Secondly, that all the lands and possessions which were situat betwixt Jerusalem & Ptolomaida, and the greatest part of Palestina, and cities of Tyrus and Sidon, which were in Syria, and all other territories which Baldwinus the fourth at any time had and did occupy there, should bee deliuered vnto him, only certaine castels reserued.

Thirdly, that he might fortifie and build what fortresses and castels castles cities and townes hee thought good, in all Syria and Palestina.

Fourthly, that all the prisoners which were in the Saracens hands, should be ransomed freely and sent home: and againe, that the Saracens might haue leaue without armor to come into the temple where the Lords sepulcher is, to pray; and that they should hold and keepe still Chratum, and the kings mount.

The letters of Frederike to the princes and pope of his successe.

Frederike now, for that he thought the conclusion of this peace to be so necessary, as also profitable for all christians, and had also gotten as much thereby as if the wars had continued he should: he sent his legats with letters into the west, to all christian kings, princes and potentates, as also to the bishop of Rome, declaring vnto them the circumstance and successe of his iourny and wars, as partly ye haue heard; requiring them that they also would praise and giue God thanks for his good successe and profitable peace concluded. And desireth the pope, that for so much as he had now accomplished his promise, neither that there was any cause now wherefore hee should be with him displeased, that he might be reconciled and obtaine his fauor.

The emperor crowned king of Hierusalem.

In the meane season the emperor with all his army marcheth to Hierusalem: where, vpon Easter day in the yeere one thousand two hundred twenty and nine, he was with great triumph and comfort of all his nobles, and also the magistrates of that kingdome (onely the patriarch of Cyprus the kings legat, and Oliuer the master or captaine of the temple with his company excepted) solemnely and with great applause crowned king.

After this, he reedifieth the citie and wals thereof, which by the Saracens were beaten downe and battered. After that, he furnisheth it with munition, he buildeth vp the churches and temples that were ruinous, he fortifieth Nazarethum and Joppen with strong garrisons, victuals, and all other things necessary.

Now see and behold I pray you, whilest Frederike was thus occupied in the kingdome of Hierusalem, what practises the pope had in Italy: not I warrant you any whit at all carefull in the affaires of the christian commonwealth, but studying and labouring what mischiefe and spight he might worke against the emperor, whom of set purpose he had so occupied (partly for hate, and partly to inrich himselfe) in Asia and Hierusalem, so far out of Italy ye may be sure. First, he caused the souldiers which the emperor sent for out of Germany to the maintenance of the holy warres, to be staied as they passed through Italy, letting them of their iourney, and take from them, and spoiled them of all such prouision as they had. And not onely this, but he sent secretly also his letters into Asia to those that were of his owne faction: that is, to the patriarch of Hierusalem, and souldiers that kept the temple and the hospitall, inticing and inciting them to rebell against the emperor: which thing Blondus himselfe, that popish parasit or historiographer, dissembleth or hideth not. But that he furthermore dissuaded the princes of the Saracens, that they should make no league nor take any truce with Frederike, neither deliuer vp vnto him the crowne and kingdome of Hierusalem. Which letters, as they were manifest testimonies of his trechery & treason towards him, whom God had instituted and made his liege lord and soueraigne, and mightiest potentate vpon earth: so was it his will that he should come to the knowledge thereof, and that those letters should fall into his hands. And that he kept the same letters for the more credible testimony thereof, in the same his last epistle vnto the christian princes he protesteth. The copie of which letter amongst his other epistles you shall haue expressed.

The first and secret practise of pope Gregory the ninth.

Neither were the popes letters written to that leauened and factious sect in vain: for the patriarch and his collegioners, which toke their name of the temple, did mightily repugne against Frederike. They raised a tumult in Ptolomaida against him, they accused him and his legats openly of treason, and did malipertly and boldly withstand the right worthy and good order he made amongst them. But as God would, by the helpe of the inhabitants of Pisa and the Genowaies, and the Duch souldiers, both their false accusations were refelled, & also their seditious purpose and tumult repressed. And this was the cause that when al other men reioiced and were glad of the emperors coronation, they as wicked confederators were heauy therefore, and obtrectors of his worthy laud and fame.

The emperor withstandeth the secret treason which the pope had wrought against him at Hierusalem.

The second and manifest treason of the pope against Frederike.

The pope when he had thus conspired against Frederike, and had betraied him to the publike enemy of all christian men the Turke, hee could not dissemble this his mischieuous fact, nor content himselfe therewith, but that he would deuise and practise yet another. For by reason of those slanders (which a little before I touched) of the death and slaughter of his wife Iola, hee incited John Brennus his father in law to make warre against him, who caused the subiects of his empire to withdraw from him their allegiance, as also the inhabitants of Picenum, & inhabitants of Lombardy. And thus ioining themselues togither, craued further aid of the French king, whereby they made a great power. That done, they diuided their host in two armies, inuading with the one the empire, and with the other the proper territories and ditions belonging to the inheritance of Frederike; John Brennus and Pandolph Saiellantus, leading the one (as generals) into Campania and the kingdome of Naples, and the other (with John Columna cardinall, his legat, and that Thomas before conuicted of treason being his lieutenants) he sendeth into Picenum.

Brennus, Pandolphus, Johannes Columna and Thomas the traitor, the popes generals and leaders of his host.

Of this treason of the pope against Fredericus, doth also Matthæus Parisiensis make mention during his wars in Asia, who (saith he) purposed to haue deposed him, and to haue placed Alium quemlibet filium pacis & obedientiæ loco eius subrogare: That is; Any other he cared not whom (so that hee were the child of peace and obedience) in his stead. And for the more certainty thereof, the said Matthæus Parisiensis, pag. 71. repeateth the letter which a certaine earle of Syria wrote vnto him concerning the same, which letter heere vnder insueth word for word.

To the high and mighty prince Fredericus by the grace of God emperor of Rome, and euer Augustus, and most puissant king of Sicilia, Thomas earle of Actran his faithfull and trustie subiect in all things, humble salutation. After your departure, most excellent prince, Gregory the bishop of Rome, and publike enemie to your magnificence, gathering togither a great power and host of men by Iohannes Brennius, late king of Hierusalem, and other stout captaines, whom he hath made generals of the same his host, as a forren enemy inuading your dominions and possessions of your highnesse subiects against the law of christianity, hath purposed and determined to vanquish and subdue you with the materiall or temporall sword, whom he cannot master and ouercome with the spirituall sword, hee saith. For the foresaid Iohn Brennus gathering out of France and other prouinces neere adioining, a great army; giueth vnto them of the treasure he hath gotten (by what meanes togither I cannot tell) great wages, in hope to recouer and get from you the empire. And furthermore, the same Iohn and others (the captaines of the sea apostolicall, inuading your land) burne and destroy all as they goe, driuing away and taking for their booties all that they can come by, as well cattell as other things, and such as they take prisoners, they constraine by afflicting them with greeuous punishments to ransome themselues for great summes of mony: neither spare they man, woman, nor child, but take and keepe your townes and castels, hauing no regard that you be in the seruice of Iesus Christ. And further, if any make mention of your maiesty vnto him, he saith, there is none other emperor but himselfe. Your friends and subiects, most excellent prince, much maruell heereupon; yea and also the clergy themselues of the empire doe maruell with what conscience, or vpon what consideration the bishop of Rome can doe the same, making such bloudy wars and slaughter vpon christian men; especially seeing that Christ commanded Peter, when he strooke with the materiall sword, to put vp the same into the scabbard, saying; All that strike with the sword, shall perish with the sword. Or else by what law he daily can excommunicat such pirats, burners of mens houses, and robbers, when he is the patron & maintainer of such himselfe: hereat they greatly muse and maruell. Wherefore most mighty and renowned emperor, I beseech your highnesse to consider your owne safety, for that the said Iohn Brennus hath laid and fortified all the ports and hauens with no small company of men and souldiers: that if (not knowing thereof) your grace should arriue in any of them, the same garrisons of his should apprehend and take you as a prisoner; which thing to chance God forefend.

What meaning the pope had to send Frederike to fight gainst the Turke.

Thus whilest the host of this hostill enemy the pope was incamped in the dominions of Frederike, he receiued the letters which Frederike by his legats sent into Europa, as you heard, whereby he vnderstood the good successe hee had in Asia: who not only toke no delectation at all therein, but was also in a vehement perturbation therewith. Whereby manifestly it may appeare, what was the cause and meaning of the pope, that he was so solicitous and vrgent to haue Frederike the emperor make a voyage into Asia. Doubtlesse euen the same that Pelias had, when by his instigation he procured Iason with all the chosen youth and flower of Grecia to saile into Colchus, to fetch away the golden fleece: and that by the opportunity of his absence he might vse, or rather abuse his power and tyranny; and that Frederike might either be long afflicted and molested in the Asian war, or that he might perish and lose his life therein, was that he sought, and all that he desired.

How the pope chafeth and fretteth at the prosperous successe of the emperor.

And when he saw, that fortune neither fauored his fetches, nor serued to his longing lust, he was as a man bereft of his wits, specially at these tidings of the prosperous successe of the emperor. He tare and threw his letters on the ground, and with all opprobrious words rebuked and reuiled the legats for the emperor their masters sake: which thing also Blondus himselfe denieth not, though he write altogither in the fauor of the pope. And to the intent that he might couer this his rage and vnbridled furie with some cloke and colour of iust deserued dolor, he fained himselfe therfore so much to mislike therewith, as though the emperor therein had onely respected his owne priuat commoditie, not regarding the vtility of the christians; for that the Saracens had licence (although without armour and weapon) weapon) to haue repaire vnto the sepulchre of Christ, and had left for them somewhat nére the same an hostelrie or lodging place: for which occasion (saith Blondus) his lord pope rebuked the emperors legats by the name of traitors & such like other opprobrious words. Now to go to friend Blondus, by what strong arguments proue you and your lord pope, that the peace which the emperor hath concluded, to be either against the christian commonwealth, or that the emperor was a traitor? But who is it that seeth not these things either by reading of old and ancient writers, or else partly by mee that haue gathered and collected the same out of diuers monuments and histories, and plainly perceiueth not the conspiracies and treasons of your good lord the pope so notable and filthy, as also his manifest shame and infamie? What? there be diuers that write how the pope commanded these legats of Frederike to be made secretly out of the way, and also how he commanded diuers souldiers returning out of Asia, to be slaine, to the end that none should heare the report of those good newes which were in Asia, nor none go thither to tell the fetches he had in hand at home. But I wil make report of no more then of those things which all the writers with most consent agrée vpon. This is most certaine, that the pope caused this rumor to be spred of the death and taking of the emperor vpon this consideration, that he might allure vnto him the fidelity of those cities in the kingdom of Naples, which yet kept their allegiance vnto Frederike, of whom they should now hope for no longer refuge. And of that doth the emperor in his epistle intituled Leuate oculos greatly against him complaine.

Blondus reproued that wrote so greatly in the popes fauor.

The third practise of pope Gregory against the emperor.

Great are these iniuries of the pope against Frederike, and most wicked treasons. But herewith could not the cruell and tyrannicall mind of him be contented, nor his lust satisfied, but so far exceeded, as scarce is credible that it could: for he presumed not onely to set variance betweene Henry (whom Frederike his father had caused to be made king of Germanie) and him, but also by his allurements caused him to become an enemie vnto him. To whom when his father had assigned the duke of Boiorie (named Ludouicus) to be his ouerséer and counseller; neither knew hee amongst all the princes of Germany a man more faithfull to him in his office and duty, or else more vertuous, or else more graue and apt to be in authority: Henry fearing lest hee should vnderstand and know of these secret counsels, which he with his cõspirators had in hand against his father, or that he should vtter the same vnto him, or that he should go about to dissuade him from that he was purposed to do by authority of the court and senat of Rome, he put him out of office. And this was the fetch of all their policie, that togither and at one instance (but in diuers and sundry places far one from another) sharpe and cruell war might be made against the emperor, so that his power being distract to the appealing of variable contention, might be himselfe the easier oppressed of a few.

The pope setteth the sonne against the father, as a good father of peace.

Henry Cesar at the popes inticement, putteth from him his trusty counseller Ludouicus.

When the emperor now vnderstood what stir the pope kept in all his dominions in his absence, and that he had somewhat reformed & appeased the troubles which he secretly had wrought him in the kingdome of Hierusalem, thinking to preuent the popes purpose in that he went about, and also to confirme the friendship towards him of them whom in his absence he found his trusty subiects: he left in Asia Renaldus with his garisons, commanding all the other bands to be vnder his appointment, and with all spéed came forth certaine gallies to Calabria. During the time of his there being, which vnlooked for came thither, he assembled his power, and made with his friends all the spéedy preparation that he might. From thence hee went to Berleta, where he taried twenty daies, to whom came the duke of Spoletanum with all his garisons, and so from thence with all his power he came into Apulia, and remoued John Brennus his father in law from the siege of Calatia, and within short time by Gods helpe recouereth againe all his holds and dominions there. And from thence going into Campania, he winneth Beneuentum, and as many other townes and holds as the pope had there, euen almost to Rome, and so after that, Umbria & Picena. And now although the emperor (being moued thereunto vpon good occasion, and vpon the popes worthy desert) had gotten & recouered this so likely an entrance vpon the popes dominions, whereby he might haue reuenged him of all the iniuries done to him: yet notwithstãding for that he preferred nothing before the christian and publike tranquillity (for the loue of which he restraining his wrath so vehemently vrged and kindled) sendeth vnto him his legats to intreat a peace, declaring vnto him, that if no other conceiued grudge towards him were, then that he dissembled and pretended, he promiseth that he would make to him an account voluntarily of all things that euer he had done in his life, and that he would and was contented to submit himselfe vnto the church; and also for that this cause he willingly offered vnto him both duty and obseruance. Furthermore to the intreating of this peace and deciding of all controuersies, hee sent to the pope eight or ten of the noblest and chiefest about him that were princes and dukes of the empire; as Bartoldus the patriarch of Aquileia, and his brother Otho prince of Dalmatia and Histria, Eberhardus Iuuanensis, Sigifridus, Reginoburgensis, Sibbotus, Augustanus a worthy prelat, Leopaldus of Austria and Styria, and Bernhardus, being all dukes; besides others of the nobilitie to accompany them.

The emperor hearing of the popes practises, returneth secretly out of Asia.

John Brennus remoued from the siege of Calatia.

God prospereth Frederike in all his affaires.

Frederike intreateth for the popes fauor although he haue no need.

But yet so great was the insolencie and pride of the stubborne pope, that by no gentlenesse or beneficence he of those princes could be brought that yéere to the profitable concord of the church and christian commonweale. O worthy head, that chalengeth all authority to himselfe in the church of Christ, and in respect of his owne wilfull reuenge, setteth nothing by the health and vtility of all christendome. Then therefore, when nothing could be done in the matter, and the most part of these noble men departed from Rome, the next yéer after (with much adoe) a peace was made and concluded betweene them, by the helpe and industry of Leopaldus of Austria, Hermannus captaine of the Duch souldiors, and the president of Mellania. The pope then absoluing the emperor Fredericus of his excommunication, toke therefore of him 120000 ounces of gold, restoring vnto him againe the titles both of his empire, and also of his kingdomes. Now considering the vncourteous dealing of the pope with Frederike the emperor herein, who can sufficiently muse and marueil at the vnshamefastnesse of Blondus, which hath the face to write, that the pope (yet notwithstanding) had dealt more gently and courteously with Frederike then was méete, or beséemed him to doe) who is it that doth not sée his manifest flattery, coloured neither with reason, nor secret dissimulation? But much more truly and better writeth Cuspinianus concerning this matter, which saith, that the pope doth occupy very profitable merchandize, which for so much mony selleth that he receiued freely, paying nothing therefore, if he had receiued it of Christ in deed, as he saith he had.

The pope refuseth a peace with the emperor.

The price of the emperors absolution.

Vnshamefull Blondus.

Cuspinianus pretily girdeth the pope.

And yet although the emperor Frederike concluded with the pope this vnprofitable peace for himselfe, yet he performed those things that were agréed vpon faithfully and diligently. But the pope, which thought it but a trifle to breake his promise, would not stand to the conditions of that peace he made. For by the way, to passe ouer other things, neither had he restored as he promised, the customes in the land of Sicill, neither yet the city Castellana, which hee before the peace concluded betweene them did occupy and inioy. And that doth both Frederike in his epistles testifie, and also Fazellus in his eight booke writing of the affaires of Sicilia. Yet notwithstanding, Frederike, for the quietnes and vtility of the commonwealth, purposed with himselfe to beare and suffer these small iniuries, and further, studied in all that he might, as well by liberall gifts as otherwise, to haue the pope to be to him a trusty friend. As when the Romans and others of the ecclesiastical number made war against the pope for certaine possessions which he kept of theirs, he comming to him at Reat, and as one that tendered the vnitie of the church, and thinking to help the pope at his earnest request in these matters, sent his legats vnto them, willing them to lay downe their armor which against the pope they bare. And when that would not serue, at the popes further request and desire, he leuied an army against them at his owne charge, and draue them from the siege of Viterbium; with other such like assured tokens of amitie and friendship he shewed him. Who notwithstanding, so soone as the emperor was departed with a small company which he toke with him into Sicilia, leauing with him the greater and most part of his army for the maintenance of his wars, concluded a peace with the Romans (vnknowing to the emperor) whom he had procured to trauell and labor therein with great expences: affirming that without his will and commandement, the emperor had expelled them, and driuen them out of the territories of Viterbium. And hereof doth Frederike also himselfe make mention in his second and third epistle, where he complaineth of the iniuries of the pope towards him.

What beneficence the emperor vseth to haue the popes friendship, which he shall neuer get.

A well recompenced good turne of the pope to the emperor.

Therefore greater commendation had Blondus deserued, if he had written of these treacheries of the pope, then that forgetting himselfe (as vnto liers often it chanceth) in that he writeth both contrary to himselfe in the effect of this matter, and contrary to the verity of Fredericus his story; which saith, that the Romans were incited to these new tumults by his inciting and setting on. As though simple men of vnderstanding could not both by the offering of his sonne in hostage, by the great preparation of the wars, and by the euent specially of the thing it selfe, gather the contrary. But too too impudent will Blondus néeds shew himselfe.

Blondus taken with vntruth.

Whilest that these things were done in Italy and Sicilia, great rebellions were moued in Germany against the emperor by Henricus Cesar and Frederike of Austria, his sons being the chiefe authors thereof. For Henry being disappointed and shaken off from his lord pope, and other conspirators by reason of the peace betweene his father and him (as ye heard) began now to make open chalenge to the empire. And for that cause, he (as before is said) put from him Ludouicus, whom he knew to be vnto the emperor his father so louing & an assured friend; who as willingly (perceiuing and smelling what mischief he went about) forsoke his court, and came to Boiorie, who had not there remained a yéere, but was as he walked abrode at a certaine time stabbed in with a dager of one Kelhemius presently died, his seruants being not far from him; of whose death diuers diuerslie write. Notwithstanding the sequell doth shew them to write truliest, that affirme the said striker to be suborned

The emperors sonnes no longer suborned, make manifest rebellion against their father.

A wicked murther of Henry Cesar for true and faithfull seruice.

suborned by Henrie Cesar: who comming vnto him in the habit of a messenger, deliuered vnto him certaine letters which he fained to be sent from the emperour. And whilest Ludouicus was in reading the same, he strake him in with a dagger and gaue him his mortal wound: and with speed fled vpon the same. After whose death succéeded in that dukedome his sonne Otho, who when solemnly according to the maner of the Boiores he should haue béen created, was also let by the same Henrie Cesar: who forbad the assemblie of the magistrates and citizens the same. They notwithstanding, neglecting his vniust restraint created him: wherefore, he first besieged Reginoburgh, and with another companie sacked, burnt, and wasted Boioria: with many more such great outrages and rebellions.

The outrage of Henrie Cesar against the emperour his father.

When intelligence was brought of these things to the emperour, he sent his legats, and commanded that both the Cesar his sonne and other princes of Germanie which had assembled their armies, should breake vp and disperse the same. And because he saw and perceiued now manifestlie that his sonne made so apparant rebellion against him, and fearing greater insurrections to insue in Germanie, hée thought good to preuent the same with all expedition. Wherefore he determined to go in all haste to Germanie with his armie, from whence he had now béen absent fourteene yeares, and hereunto he maketh the pope priuie. The pope promised the emperour hereupon, that he would write his letters in his behalfe to all the princes of Germanie: but perswaded him to the vttermost of his power, that he should in no case go into Germanie himselfe. For why? his conscience accused him that he had written to the nobles of Germanie euen from the beginning of his papacie (for the hate and grudge he had against the emperour) that they should not suffer him, nor any of his heires to enioy the empire, and further had stirred them all vp to rebell against him; and had moued Henrie the emperors sonne by his bribes and faire promises, to conspire against his father. And to conclude, he was the author and procurer of the conspiracie which the Lombards made then against him: and fearing lest these things should come now to the emperours eare, he was greatly troubled and carefull. But the emperor not thinking it good at so needfull a time to be absent: he (all doubt set apart) with his second sonne Conradus, went spéedilie into Germanie. And assembling there a councell in the citie of Nureburgh: Henrie Cesar his sonne, after his conspiracie was manifestlie detected, which he had in practise with the Longobards (whereof the pope was chiefe author) was by iudgement and sentence of seuentie princes condemned of high treason. And being commanded by his father to be bound, was as prisoner brought to Apulia: where not long after in prison he died. In whose stead he ordained Conradus his second sonne Cesar, by consent of all the péeres and princes. Furthermore, by publike commandement he renounced Frederike Austriacus for his sonne, and for an enemie to the publike weale he caused him to be proclamed. And further, when he saw that neither that punishment could cause him to remember himselfe and acknowledge his abuse, the emperour with a great armie (accompanied with diuers of the noble men of Germanie) toke from him all Austria and Stiria, and brought them againe vnder his owne obedience and fidelitie.

The pope fearéth that his treason should be spied by the emperour going into Germanie.

Henrie Cesar condemned of treason, and dieth in prison.

Fredericus Austriacus proclamed an open enemie to his father, and disherited.

The same yéere married he with his third wife named Isabell, the daughter of king John of England. Then, when he had set Germanie in a stay and quietnesse, he left there Conradus Cesar his sonne: and with his host returneth againe into Italie, there to punish such as had with Henrie his eldest son conspired against him: whose treasons were all detected at the condemnation of Henrie Cesar his son, chiefly set on by the pope. When the pope had vnderstanding that the emperor with warlike furniture marched toward Italie: although he fained himselfe reconciled, and to be a friend to Frederike, yet was hè notwithstanding to him a most secret and infestiue enemie. And vnderstanding that he brought with him such a power, both of horsemen and footmen, to do execution of such as he vnderstood to haue béen conspirators against him in the late tumult and rebellion: those which were faultie herein and guiltie (and all other that toke their parts) he admonished to ioyne themselues together, and that they should furnish strongly their cities with garrisons, that they should send for aid to their friends, and that with all the force they were able they should prepare them for the war. The rest of the cities also in Italie, whether they were the emperours or his owne, he indeuoureth to make them all his, and proper to himselfe.

The emperour marrieth king Johns daughter of England.

The pope againe beginneth to play his part.

Furthermore, vnto the emperour he sendeth his ambassadors: to whom, vnder the pretence of nourishing a peace, he had giuen a secret commandement, that they should interdict him and his host, so soone as he came within the borders of Italy. To the preseruation of which peace, saith he, he had (but late since) promulgat a subsidy to be gathered amongst the christians, when he began the holy war. And also to say (not by way of intreatie, but commandingly) that what cause of controuersie hée had with the Longobards, the same he should commit to him, and stand to his arbitrement. Whereunto the emperour replying, maketh his legat this answere:

The popes ambassage to the emperour.

Shortlie after, saith hée, the peace was made betweéne the pope and me, he called me for a chiefe defense both of the church and himselfe, against the Romans which made war with him, and at his request, with mine owne proper charge I maintained that his war, and gaue his enemies the ouerthrow. And further said, that he should not do well through the pretence of peace, to be a let to him from that which both by law and right he might and ought to do; but rather so he ought to dispose himselfe, with force to restraine and expell them, which gathered them together as rebels, thinking to exclude themselues from the subiection both of him and the empire; and that such rebels as both had restrained the souldiers which the emperor sent for when he was in Asia, and diuers others also (which for necessary causes he had called to him) they had so wickedly dealt with and abused, he (as they had deserued) should rather desire to sée punished and reformed, then to maintaine them (vnder colour of peace) being so wicked and manifest euill doers. And touching that he demandeth of him, that he should commit and defer so great a cause, wherein the wealth and safetie of the empire consisteth, to his arbitrement, by him to be determined, without either assignment of any time when, or adding thereunto anie condition or exception for not doing the same, neither the diminishing and impairing the dignitie and regalitie of his empire considered, he could not but maruell: seeing that neither it appertained to his calling and facultie, nor to the benefit or commoditie of the empire. To this effect also writeth Frederike in his last epistle vnto the pope, the effect whereof amongst other epistles you may reade.

The emperour againe vnto the pope.

And in the same his letters he sheweth, that when the emperour at a certaine time had béen with the pope, at his going away, he requested that when he came againe, he would come into Italie, but with his houshold band and familie; for that if he should come as before he did accustome with his armie, he should terrifie them ouermuch; amongst whom (saith he) you may assure your selfe to be in great safetie, and find all things in rest and quiet; when quite contrarie (as the emperour for a certaintie had tried) he had there all things readie and prepared for his destruction: so that when he pretended vnto him greatest friendship, he was busiest in conspiring his death. The certaine time when the pope had this exercise in hand against the emperour I cannot search out, neither may it be in his epistles vndated easily found out; but that of the certaintie thereof no man need to doubt, I haue alligned you to the emperours epistle, where he maketh mention of the same.

A secret conspiracie of the pope against the emperour.

The emperour then, as he had determined, prosecuteth his purpose and marcheth into Italie, where he brought vnder his subiection those cities that against him rebelled, as Mantua, Verona, Ternillum, Patauium, and others. And then he afterward set vpon the great host of the Mediolanenses, the Brixians, the Placentines, and other confederators, vnto whom the popes legat Georgius Longomontanus had ioyned himselfe, of whom he toke 1000 prisoners, and also their generall, being the chiefe magistrat in the citie of Mediolanum, and Petrus Tenopolus the dukes sonne of Venice, and slew diuers captaines more, and toke all their ensignes. And in this battel, specially at the recouering of Marchie and Ternillana, he vsed the friendly aid of Actiolinus.

The emperour marcheth into Italie, notwithstanding the popes forbidding.

The pope now somewhat dismaid at this ouerthrow of his confederats and mates (though not much) began yet somewhat to feare the emperour, and whereas before, that which he did he wrought secretly and by others, now he goeth to worke with might and maine to subdue and depriue the emperour. And although the emperour saw and perceiued what inward hate and mortall malice he bare towards him, not only by that he so apertly stood with his conspirators against him, but also that on euery side he heard, and from all parts was brought him certaine word how greatly he laboured against him, as with opprobrious words, naughtie reports and slanders, to the intent to pull from him the hearts and fidelitie of his subiects, and make those that were his friends his enemies, neither that he meant at any time to take vp and cease from such euill and wicked practises: yet notwithstanding for that there should be no default in him found for the breach of the league and peace betweéne them a little before concluded, hée sendeth foure legats to the bishop of Rome, which should answere vnto and refute those crimmous obiections which he laid vnto him, as also make him priuie vnto his purpose, and what he meant to do, thereby to declare his innocencie towards him (in such causes) and simplicitie.

The emperour loth to breake the peace of late concluded.

The bishop when he vnderstood these ambassadors to be not farre off from Rome, and knew the cause of their comming, hée thought with himselfe, that in hearing the excuse and reasonable answere of the emperour, perhaps might be prouoked to desist from his purpose, & so degenerat from others of his predecessors, refuseth to speake with them, and at the day appointed pronounceth the sentence of proscription against him, depriuing him of all his dignities, honours, titles, prerogatiues, kingdomes, and whole empire. And that hée had no occasion hereunto, as well Pandulphus and Colonucius, as the letters of the emperour himselfe do both right well declare. For it may appeare, hée dedicated as it were himselfe to his vtter ruine and destruction, when he did sollicitat against Fredericus, Jacobus Tenopolus the Venetian duke, whom for the displeasure hée toke with the emperour in the imprisoning of

The pope refuseth to speake with the emperours legats.

The new sentence of proscription against the emperour.

Digitized by Google

his sonne, was in good hope he should allure vnto him, he being in so troublous a time such a comforter and aider vnto him, that as Blondus writeth in a certaine epistle gratulatory, he calleth him lord of the fourth part of Croatia and Dalmatia, and lord of halfe of the Roman empire. And calling vnto him the Venetian and Genowetian legats, made a peace betwixt them (which for certaine causes about their sea coasts were at variance) and couenanted with them vpon this condition, that at their publike charges, they should rig and man fiue and thirtie gallies, which should spoile and burne all alongst the sea coasts of the kingdomes and dominions of Frederike.

The pope wageth and hireth fiue and thirtie gallies to spoile the coasts of the emperour.

But the pope when he saw the good will and fidelitie which the duke of Venice bare vnto the emperour, and saw also what aid the emperour had of him, neither that he was like to winne him to his purpose: then had he recourse againe to his old craftie practises and subtilties. And further deuised to put forth an edict at Rome to the vniuersall church and people, the beginning whereof is, Ascendit de mari bellica bestia: wherein he declareth the causes wherefore he curseth and giueth the emperor to the diuell of hell, and hath deiect him from all his princelie dignitie. Hee in the same accuseth him of so manie and so huge a heape of mischiefes, as to nominat them my heart detesteth. And besides that, he restraineth his soueraigne lord and emperour of the appellation which euerie priuat man by law may haue. He slandereth him of treason, periurie, crueltie, sacrilege, killing of his kind, and all impietie; he accuseth him for an heretike, a schismatike and a miscreant: and to be briefe, what mischiefe soeuer the pope can deuise, with that doth he charge him and burthen him. All this doth he, saith the pope, that when he hath brought our holinesse and all the ecclesiasticall estate to beggerie, he might scoffe at, and deride the religion of Christ, which as a miscreant he detesteth. And now for that the pope had a great and speciall trust in Albertus Behauus of the noble house called Equestri (as craftie an apostle as the best) as one whom he saw readie to leane to his lust: to him the pope deliuered two other mandats in seuerall letters sealed, in which he commanded all bishops, prelats, and other of the clergie, that they should solemnely recite the same in their churches in stead of their sermon, that by his decree hee had excommunicated Frederike out of the fellowship of christian men, put him from the procuration or gouernment of the empire, and that hee had released al his subiects of their allegiance and fidelity towards him. And furthermore chargeth them, and all other christian men vnder paine of cursing and damnation, that neither they succour the emperour, nor yet so much as wish him well. Thus he, being the popes speciall and trustie seruiter, and made to his hand, caused a most horrible confusion and chaos of publike quietnesse, as shall after appeare.

The popes edict against the emperour.

Ascendit de mari bellica bestia.

Albertus Behauus the popes one hand.

The pope threateneth to curse all those that wish well to the emperour.

Amongst all other noblemen of Germanie at that time towards the emperour, was Otho the gouernor of Rhenus and duke of Boioza, both most seruiceable, and also a prince of great honor, riches, and estimation. This prince, both with faire promises and also rewards he enticed from him: for that being made by him to beleeue, that Ludouicus his father, of whom we spake before, was by the emperour murthered and slaine. And the same Otho againe caused three other princes and dukes to reuolt from the emperor to the pope, which were neighbours and neere adioyning vnto him, as Wencellaus, and Belus, princes of the Hungarians, and Henrie duke of Polonia. To whom came also Fredericus Austriacus his sonne: who because he was proscript or outlawed of his father, and had his dukedome walled and burnt, as you heard, was easily wonne vnto the pope. These gathering a councell (when they had thought to haue translated the empire vnto the kings sonne of Denmarke) desired to haue the popes legats to be sent from him, to the effect of that election.

Otho with diuers other princes of Germanie, by the popes meanes do forsake the emperour.

The emperour was at Patauium when these newes were brought vnto him, what the pope had done at Rome. Therefore he commanded Peter de Veneis his secretarie (vpon Easter day) to make a narration to the people of his great and liberall munificence to the bishops and church of Rome, and againe of the iniuries of them toward him in recompence thereof: of his innocencie also in that whereof he had accused him, and of the vnseemelinesse of such an act or deed, of the right vse of the ecclesiasticall censure, and of the errors and abuse of the church of Rome. By which oration of his, he so remoued the cloud from many mens hearts of blind superstition, and the conceiued opinion of holinesse of the church of Rome, and bishops of the same, and also of their vsurped power and subtill persuasion, that both they plainly saw and perceiued the vices and filthinesse of the church of Rome and bishops of that see, as also their fraudulent deceits and flagitious doings, most vehemently lamenting and complaining of the same. Albertus maketh mention of certaine verses which were sent and written betweene the bishop of Rome and the emperour. The which verses in the latter end of this present historie of Frederike you shall find.

What great good the oration of Peter de Veneis did in the emperours behalfe.

The emperour moreouer both by his letters and legats, giueth intelligence vnto all christian kings, to the princes of his owne empire, to the colledge of cardinals, and people of Rome; as well of the fained crimes wherewith hee was charged, as also of the crueltie of the bishop of Rome against him. The copie of which letter or epistle followeth heere vnder inserted.

¶ The emperour to the prelats of the world.

The emperours letter to all prelats to bridle the pope and restraine him of his will.

IN the beginning and creation of the world, the inestimable foreknowledge and prouidence of God (who asketh counsell of none) created in the firmament of heauen two lights (a greater and a lesse) the greater he created to gouerne the day, and the lesse to gouerne the night: which two so do their proper offices and duties in the Zodiake, that although oftentimes the one be in an oblique respect vnto the other, yet the one is not enemie to the other: but rather doth the superiour communicat his light with the inferiour. Euen so, the same eternall foreknowledge hath appointed vpon the earth two regiments, that is, to wit, priesthood and kinglie power: the one for knowledge and wisdome, the other for defence; that man, which is made of two parts (ouer wanton and dissolute) might haue two raines to gouerne and bridle him withall, that peace thereby and loue might dwell vpon the face of the earth. But alas, the bishop of Rome sitting in the chaire of peruerse doctrine or pestilence, that pharisie annointed with the oile of iniquitie aboue the rest of his consorts in this our time, which for his abominable pride is fallen from heauen; indeuoureth with his power to destroy and vndo all, and thinketh (I beleeue) to stellifie againe himselfe there from whence he fell. His purpose is to darken and to shadow the light of our vnspotted life, whilest that (altering the veritie into lies) his papall letters stuft with all vntruths, are sent into sundrie parts of the world: of his owne corrupt humor, and vpon no reasonable cause, blemishing the sinceritie of our religion. The lord pope hath compared vs vnto the beast rising out of the sea, full of names of blasphemie, and spotted like a leopard. But we say, that he is that monstrous beast of whom it is said, and of whom we thus reade: And there shall come another red horse out of the sea, and he that shall sit on him, shall take peace away out of the earth: let them therefore that dwell vpon the earth destroy him. For since the time of his promotion, he hath not bin the father of mercie, but of discord: a diligent steward of desolation in stead of consolation, and hath inticed all the world to commit offence. And to take the words in right sense and interpretation, he is that great dragon that hath deceiued the whole world: he is that antichrist, of whom hee hath called vs the forerunner: he is that other Balaam hired for money to curse vs: the prince of darkenesse, which hath abused the prophets. This is the angell leaping out of the sea, hauing his phials filled with bitternesse, that he may both hurt the sea and the land: the counterfeit vicar of Christ, that setteth forth his owne imaginations. He saith that we do not rightlie beleeue in the christian faith, and that the world is deceiued with three manner of deceiuers, which to name God forbid we should open our mouth, seeing that openly we confesse only Iesus Christ our Lord and Sauiour to be the euerlasting sonne of God, coequall with his Father and the holy Ghost, begotten before all worlds, and in processe of time sent downe vpon the earth for the saluation of mankind: conceiued, not by the seed of man, but by the holy Ghost: which was borne of the glorious virgin Marie, and after that suffered and died as touching the flesh: and by his Godhead the third day, he raised from death that other nature which he assumed in the wombe of his mother. But we haue learned, that the bodie of Mahomet hangeth in the aire, and his soule is buried in hell: whose workes are damnable and contrarie to the law of the most high. Wee affirme also, that Moses was the faithfull seruant of God, and a true teacher of the law: and that hee talked with God in mount Sinai, vnto whom the Lord said, Rubum, &c. By whom also God wrought miracles in Aegypt, and deliuered the law written to the Israelites, and that afterwards with the elect he was called to glorie. In these and other things our enemie and enuier of our state, causing our mother the church to accuse her sonne, hath written against vs venemous and lying slanders, and sent the same to the whole world. If he had rightly vnderstood the apostles meaning, he would not haue preferred his violent will before reason, which beareth such swaie with him: neither would hee haue sent out his mandats to the suggestion of those which call light darkenesse, and euill good; which suspect honie to bee gall, for the great good opinion they had conceiued of that holie place, which indeed is both weake and infirme, and conuerteth all truth into falsehood, and affirmeth that to be which is not.

Man being made of two parts hath two seuerall regiments, Gods word and the material sword.

The apologie of the emperour to the popes edict. Ascendit de mari, &c.

Antichrist long agone described to the world by the emperour.

The confession of the emperors faith, whereof he was accused by the pope.

The pope vnder pretence of his holinesse deceiueth simple soules and ignorant men.

Trulie my opinion (so indifferent on euerie side) ought not in any case to be infringed and auerted from the faith, to such enemies of so corrupt a conscience. Wherefore wee greatly are inforced not a little to maruell, which thing also doth much disquiet vs to see: that you which be the pillers and assistants in office of righteous dealing, the senators of Peters citie, and the principal beames in Gods building, haue not qualified the perturbation of so fierce a iudge: as do the planets of heauen in their kind, which to mitigat the passing swift course of the great orb or sphere of heauen, draw a contrary way by their opposit mouings. In verie deed, our imperiall felicitie hath bin (almost euen from the beginning) spurned against, and enuied at of the papall see and dignitie: as Simonides being demanded whie

Digitized by Google

The answere of Simonides applied.

while he had no more enemies and enuiers of his state, answered and said; Quia nihil fœliciter gessi: For because (saith he) I haue had no good successe in any thing that euer I tooke in hand. And so, for that wee haue had prosperous successe in all our enterprises (the Lords name be blessed therefore) especially in the ouerthrow (of late) of our rebellious enemies the Lombards, to whom in their good quarrell he promised life and absolution with remission of their sins, is the cause wherefore this apostolicall bishop mourneth and lamenteth. And now, not by your counsels (I suppose) he laboureth to impugne this our felicitie, but of his owne power of binding and loosing, whereof he glorieth so much, he impugneth it. But presently where power and abilitie wanteth to redresse, there doth abuse take place. We see in him which was so mightie a king, and the worthiest prince amongst all the prophets, to desire and craue the restitution of Gods holy spirit, when he had polluted the dignitie of his office. But the prouerbe is, Vti indissolubilia non soluuntur, ita inligabilia non ligantur. As things indissoluble are not to be loosed, so things that cannot be bound, are not to be bound. Which thing manifestlie is proued in him. For why, the Scriptures of God do instruct men how to liue, they mortifie our souls which are immortall, and quicken the same which are dead for want of life. And doubtlesse he is able to humble and bring downe those that are vnworthie of dignitie, as much as him pleaseth, and when him pleaseth. Doubtlesse, if the bishop of Rome were a true bishop indeed, innocent, impollute, and not associat with wicked liuers and euill men, his life should declare him so to be. He would not then be an offerer of dissensious sacrifice, but a peaceable offerer of loue and charitie, and would cense, not with the incense of griefe and hatred, but with the sweet smelling incense of concord and vnitie, neither yet would alter Suum pontificium in maleficium: that is, make of a sanctified office an execrable abuse. If hee were such a bishop as he ought to bee, hee would not wrest or abuse the preaching of the word, into the fruit and gaine of his owne dissension, neither should we bee accused for such an enemie of our mother the true church, as is laid vnto her sonnes charge by such a bishop. Which true and mother church, with all reuerence we honor, and benignitie embrace, so beautified and adorned with Gods most holy sacraments. Some singular persons notwithstanding, faining themselues to be our brethren by that mother, and yet are not, but of a strumpet begot: such, I say, as are subiect and slaues to corruptible things (putting them from amongst vs) we vtterly reiect: especially for that iniuries by them done, are not only transitorie and mundane, wherewith our maiestie is so molested, vexed and grieued. Wherefore we cannot so easily mitigat our mood, neither ought we in very deed so to do, and therefore are we inforced the more to take the greater reuenge of them. You therfore that are men of graue and deliberat counsell, hauing the excellent gift (as from God) of wisedome and vnderstanding; refuse you that roring enemie of ours in these his proceedings, whose beginnings are so wicked and detestable, wisely comparing things past, with those to come. Otherwise, you that are vnder our subiection, as well of our empire as other our dominions, shall feele and perceiue (both of my chiefe enemie and persecutor, as also of the princes that are his fautors and adherents) what reuenge by sword Fredericus Augustus shall take vpon them, God so permitting.

The emperour vpbraideth of the popes fall.

The emperour vtterly reiecteth the pope and church of Rome.

This done, he denounceth a solemne parlement or councell of all the princes and other nobilitie of the empire at Aegra; whither came Conradus Cesar, Moguntinus præsul, the Saxon dukes, the lords of Brandeburgh, Misna, Thuringus, and the legats of all the nobles of Brabant to aid the emperor. But the princes of Boiemus and Palatinus being disswaded by the legats, vnto whom the Austrians had ioyned themselues, refused to come to the councell holden at Aegra. And being at their wits end, not knowing well what they might do, forsoke at last the emperour, and tooke part with the pope and the other conspirators. Then Fredericus Austriacus the emperours second sonne (whom he disherited as ye heard) by the aid of the Boiors and Bohemians, recouered againe the dukedomes of Austria and Stiria, putting to flight and discomfitting the emperours bands and garrisons which he had there. And although the cardinals (especially that honest man Albertus Boiemus) had allured to the pope Otho the duke of Boioria, as ye heard, and diuers other noble men of Germanie: yet notwithstanding certaine bishops in Boioria (as Eberhardus Iuuanensis, and Sigrefridus Seginoburgensis, being at that time the emperors chancellor, Rudicenus Ratheuiensis, Conradus Frisingensis, and others) left not or yet forsoke the emperour. All which the foresaid Albertus not only did excommunicat, but also by processe sought to bring them vp to Rome before the pope, giuing commandement to their collegioners and cloisterers, that they should depriue them of their offices, and chuse such others in their stead as would obey the pope. All which things the pope vnderstanding by Albertus, and of this their fidelitie to the emperour, corroborated and confirmed the same his doings, commanding them to chuse other bishops in their steads.

The emperour called a parlement or councel to appease the popes malice.

The godly bishops of Germanie are obedient to the king and prince.

But the bishops and prelats with one consent contemning the popes mandats and writs, and also the curses and threatnings of Albertus, accused, reproued, and greatly blamed his temeritie and also tyrannie which he vsurped against the churches of Germanie, and especially against the good emperour, that without his consent he durst be so bold as to meddle in churches committed to the emperours gouernment against the old and ancient customes, and that he had excommunicated the emperour without iust cause, that he had condemned the emperours faithfull subiects as enemies to the church for standing with their liege and soueraigne prince (which allegiance to violat, without horrible iniquitie they might not) and so had sought to disquiet them likewise in their charges and administrations, and had also in that quarrell giuen such defiance to the emperour. They accused and condemned the same Albertus also for a most impudent impostour and wicked varlet, and for a most pestiferous botch and sore of the christian commonweale: and giue him to the diuell they do, as a ruinous enemie, as well of the church as of his owne naturall countrie; and further thinke him worthie to haue his reward with the rest of the popes pursuants, being the most wicked inuenters and deuisers of mischiefs that were in all Germanie. This done, they make relation hereof to the emperor by their letters; and further, they aduertise all the princes of Germanie (especiallie those which were of the popes faction or rebellion, and were the fauourers of Albertus) that they should take heed and beware in any case of his subtill deceits and pernicious deceiueable allurements, nor that they should assist the pope for all his words against the emperour. And doubtlesse by the counsell of the high prelat or archbishop of Boioria (whose name was Iuuanensis) and by his industrie and perluasion, Fredericus Austriacus was againe reconciled vnto the emperour his father, from whose aid and obedience after that (by no promises, threatnings, bribes, nor paines, no nor for the execrable curses of the popes owne holy mouth) he would be induced or remoued. But Albertus prosecuteth still his purposed mischiefe, alluring and inciting by all meanes possible (and that not amongst the worst but the best) friends to the pope, and enemies to the emperour. Vnto some he gaue their tithes to fight against the emperour, to other some he gaue the glebe lands of benefices, and to other some he gaue the spoile of such colledges and monasteries as tooke not part with the pope; and to some other also he gaue the colledges and monasteries themselues. And assuredly I find by Iohannes Auentinus, lib. 7, annalium Boiorum, that there were certaine of the popes owne birds, that had their ecclesiasticall tithes taken from them; and other some had the rents and reuenues of their colledges pluckt away by force to the maintenance of the popes quarrell against the emperor. Hereby was there a window opened to do what they lusted (euerie man according to his rauening and detestable lust) and all things lay open vnto their greedie and insatiable desires. Who lusteth to heare more hereof, let him reade Auentinus in his booke before noted, and there shall he see what vastation grew thereby to the whole state of Germanie, who largely intreateth of the same.

The bishops of Germanie excommunicat the popes legat and cardinall.

Iuuanensis the bishop a true subiect to his prince.

The passage of the pope to maintaine the war against his lord and master.

While these things were thus in working in Germanie, Frederike leauing in Lombardie Aciolinus with a great part of his host (he passing with the rest by Apeninum) came to Hetruria and set the same in a stay, after that he had allaied certain insurrections there, and from thence to Pisas, where he was with great amitie and honor receiued and welcommed. This citie was alwaies assured and faithfull to the emperours of Germanie. The pope vnderstanding of the emperours comming into Hetruria, and knowing what power the emperour had also left in Lombardie, he with a great armie besieged the citie Ferraria, that alwaies loued the emperour full well: which citie when the popes legat had assaulted sharpely the space of fiue moneths, and could not win the same; he deuised with himselfe to send for Salingwerra out of the towne, by way of a parlee, promising his faith and truth to him for his safe returne. Who, by the persuasion of Hugo Bambartus, that said without perill he might do the same (being but by way of parlee) was comming to the legat: who preuenting him in his iourney tooke him as prisoner, contrarie to his truth and fidelitie. And thus gat hee Ferraria, and deliuered the keeping thereof to Azones Atensis. And that the popes legat thus falsified his truth, and circumuented the captaine and old man Salingwerra, the same is confessed of the popes friendly historiographers, to be but a stratagem or warlike policie. But to returne againe. About the same time also the Venetian naute, at the mount Garganum chased twelue gallies of the emperours, which were appointed to the keeping of that coast, and spoiled, burnt, and wasted all the region: and further tooke one of the emperours great shippes, being driuen by tempest and weather into the hauen Sipontium, fraught with men and munition.

The pope besieged Ferraria.

The fidelitie of papists learned by this example.

The emperours gallies chased, and one of his ships taken by the pope.

Fredericus againe getting on his side the Lucenses, the Volaterans, the Genenses, the Aretines, and diuers cities besides in Hetruria to helpe that countrie, came to Pisas and Viterbium, which tooke part with him. Some say, that the names and factions of Gibellins and Guelphs sprang from Frederike, that by them he might spie and know (hauing recourse to all the townes and cities in Italie) which tooke part with, and fauoured the pope, and which the emperour; and called the one by the name of Gibellins, and the other by the name of Guelphs. But for that both Blondus, and Platina, and some others, bring no sufficient proofe thereof, but only by slender coniecture, I rather cleaue to the opinion of Nauclerus, Hermannus, Antoninus, Florentinus, and other such writers, which say: that these Guelphus and Gebelins in Italie toke their beginning of Conradus the third, Fredericus his great vncle being emperour; and that these Guelphs were dedicated to the pope, of Guelphs the yonger brother of Henrie the proud: and that those which were called the Gibelins, were appointed either of Conradus himselfe or else of his son, being brought vp in the lordship of Waiblingen. But to our purpose.

Digitized by Google

The Gibelins and Guelphs from whence they came.

The pope afraid of the emperours comming into Italie.

The pope, when he vnderstood that Frederike was come to Viterbium, he was verie heauie: for that he feared he would come to Rome, the good will of which citie the pope much mistrusted. He therefore caused a supplication to be drawne, portraying about the same the heads of Peter and Paul, and with a sharpe and contumelious oration he much defaced the emperour: promising them euerlasting life, and gaue them the badge of the crosse, as many as would arme themselues and fight against the emperour, as against the most wicked enemie of God and the church. Now when the emperour marching somewhat neere to Rome gates, beheld those whom the pope had with his goodly spectacle of S. Peter and S. Paul, and with his alluring oration stirred vp against him, and marked with the badge of the crosse to come forth in battell against him; disdaining to be accounted for the enemie of the church, who had been thereunto so beneficiall, giuing a fierce charge vpon them, put them some to flight: and as many as he toke (cutting off that badge from them) he caused to be hanged. From thence he marching into Campania and his owne kingdoms, leuied a great masse of money, and mustered new bands, and augmented his armie: and in these bands he retained the Saracens also. And to the intent he might find the Saracens the more trustie vnto him; he appointed them to inhabit in a citie named Luceria. For which thing, although the papisticall writers do greatly blame and opprobriously write of Frederike, yet notwithstanding, Nicolaus Machiauellus doth write, that therefore he retained them; lest that through the popes execrable curses he should be quite destitute of souldiers, as was Fredericus Barbarossa a little before, his grandfather, when that of Alexander the pope he was excommunicated, as yee haue heard.

The emperour hangeth all the crossed souldiers.

The emperour retaineth the Saracens in his wars against the pope.

After this, when the emperour had greatly afflicted by battell the popes ecclesiasticall consorts, such as conspired with the pope against him, and that he had wasted and destroyed Beneuentum, the mount Casenum, and Sora, for that they toke part with the pope against him; Frederike, when he had manned the citie of Aquila, marched forth with a great host both of horsemen and footmen to Picenum, that he might banquish his enemies in Italie. And by the way, hee besieged the strong towne of war named Asculinum, which was also conuerted to the popes faction and rebellion. He there hauing vnderstanding what the popes assistents had done with the princes electors and other princes of Germanie, especially with Wenceslaus king of Bohemia, and Otho Palatinus, writeth his letters vnto them. In the which, first he sheweth how that those contumelies and spightful words which the pope blustred out against him, are lighted vpon himselfe, and how the bishops of Rome haue taken to them of late such heart of grace, and are become so loftie, that not only they seeke to bring emperors, kings, and princes vnder their obedience, but also seeke how to be honored as gods, and say that they cannot erre, neither yet be subiect or bound to any religion, and that it is lawfull for them to do all things what they list, neither that any account is to be sought or demanded of their doings, or else to be made of them to any, so impudent are they in these their affirmations. And further, as princes they command (and that vnder paine of cursing) that men beleeue euerie thing they say, how great a lie soeuer it be. In so much that by this couetousnesse of his, all things goe backward, and the whole state of the commonweale is subuerted, neither can there any enemie be found more hurtfull or perilous to the church of God then he. He wrote vnto them furthermore, that he (to whom the greatest charge and dignitie was in the whole commonweale appointed and committed) seeing and perceiuing to his great perill, their good hearts, wils, and practises towards him, would with all the power and abilitie that God had giuen him, do his indeuour: that he which in the likenesse of the shepheard of the flocke, and the seruant of Christ, and chiefe prelat in the church, sheweth himselfe so verie a wolfe, persecutor & tyrant; may be remoued from that place, and that a true and carefull shepheard of Gods flocke may be appointed in the church. Wherefore he exhorteth them, that if they desire the safetie and preseruation of the whole state of the commonweale and empire; that they be vnto him no hinderers, but furtherers of his purpose and procéedings: lest otherwise, they also should happen to fall into the same snare of seruitude with the bishop of Rome. And further, he gaue them to wit, that if he should aspire to that he sought for (that is, to be an emperour and king ouer kings) yet should that be no stay of his insatiable desire, but would be as greedie and rauenous as now he is. Therefore if they be wise, to withstand him betimes, lest hereafter when they would, it should be to late, neither were able to withstand his tyrannie. The effect of this epistle I toke out of Auentine, which more largely dilateth it, who also writeth that the emperour (by his legats) sent the same to Wenceslaus.

No enemy more hurtfull to the church of God then is the pope.

The effect of a letter sent by the emperour to the princes of Germanie.

The emperour volweth to remoue the pope, and put another more carefull shepheard into the church of God.

Boiemus somewhat relenting at this letter, promiseth to accomplish the emperors biddings and precepts, and forthwith gathereth the assemblie of princes and nobles at Aegra; where, by common consent they thinke to renouat with the emperour a new league and couenant. And furthermore they find Otho Boius (which was absent, and would not be at this their assemblie) to be the author of this defection, and an enemie to the commonweale. Otho then seeing himselfe not able to stand against Cesar and the other princes with whom he was associat, desiring aid of the pope by his letters, came with all speed to Boiemus his kinsman, whom when he could not persuade vnto him againe, neither would he to their parts also be wonne, obtaineth notwithstanding yet thus much at their hands, that the league and couenant (which they were in hand to make with the emperour) might for a time be deferred, and that another assemblie might be made, whereat he also would be, and ioyne himselfe with them. Thus had they, who killed (as you heard) his father, bewitched also his sonne, and brought him to be both a rebell and a traytor. In the meane season the pope sent his rescript vnto the king of Bohemia and to Otho, tending to this effect; that in no case they should either forsake him, or else the church, to take the emperours part. And so much preuailed he by the meanes of Bohuslaus and Budislaus (which were the chiefest of the senat regall) and by his faire promises and bribes to such as he before had made to him, that againe at Libusta by Boiemus and Boius new assemblies were gathered for the creation of a new emperour, in despite of Augustus the emperour and Cesar his sonne. And whilest that this was thus in hand, Conradus Cesar calleth Landhuta the wife of Otho (being absent) in the teeth for great benefits and possessions which her husband had, and possessed by the ancestors of him, and that vnlesse her husband toke a better way with himselfe and shewed his obedience to the emperour his father, that he should not inioy one foot of that land which now he had by his predecessors. The promotion and dignities which Otho had by the ancestors of Conradus Cesar came thus: Fredericus Barbarossa in the yeere of our Lord 1180, at a parlement holden at Reginoburgh, condemned Henricus Leo of high treason, and depriued him of his dominions of Boiora and Saronie, and gaue Boiora to Otho Wiltaspachius, for that he had done him so faithfull seruice in his Italian wars. After that, Ludouicus the sonne of this Otho, obtained of this emperour Frederike the second, in recompence of his assured and trustie fidelitie the dition of Palatinatum Rheni so called, which gaue also Agnetes the daughter of Henrie earle of Palatine to Otho his sonne in marriage. This Henrie was the sonne of Henrie Leo the traitor, vnto whom Henrie the first the father of Frederike gaue in marriage Clementia his brothers daughter Conradus Palatine of Rhenus, and gaue vnto him the keeping of the palace of the same. And as touching the inheritance of Boiora, that hee had also now long possessed by the heires of Otho Wiltelspachius. But to our purpose againe.

Boiemus relenteth at the emperours letter.

The practise of Otho with the pope against the emperour.

The popes rescript dasheth all the matter againe.

By what means Otho attained to great possession by the emperour and his ancestors.

At the same time also the gouernour of Colonia Agrippina reuolted to the pope, who not long after in a skirmish betweene Wrabantinus and him, was vanquished and taken prisoner. And doubtlesse, Fredericus Austriacus after he was receiued into fauour againe with the emperor (keeping most constantly his promise and fidelitie renued) during this time, made sharpe war vpon the Hungarians, which toke part with the pope, and greatly annoyed them. As these things thus passed in Germanie, the emperour when he had gotten Ascalum and led his host into Flamminia, hauing Rauenna at his commandement, from thence came to Fauentia, which citie neuer loued the emperour: the circuit of whose wals is fiue miles in compasse, and pitched his campe round about the same. And although the siege was much hindered by asperitie of the time and weather (being in the verie dead time of winter) yet notwithstanding through his great fortitude and courage, so animating his souldiers in the painfulnes of the laborious siege, he indured out the same, who thought it no little shame, hauing once made that enterprise, to come from thence without any assault giuen. And therefore when now the winter (so extreame cold and hard) was well neere ended, and the spring time now hard at hand, and by long batterie had made the same in diuers places saltable: the citizens (being greatly discouraged, and in no hope of the defence thereof) sent their legats to the emperour, craning pardon for their offence, and that he would grant vnto them their liues, and so yeelded themselues vnto his mercie.

The gouernour of Agrippina reuolteth to the pope.

The emperours great lenitie and clemencie, but yet marueilously inforced.

The emperour hauing against them good and sufficient cause of reuenge, yet for that his noble heart thought it to be the best reuenge that might be, to pardon the offence of vanquished men: hee thought it better to grant them their requests, to saue the citie and citizens thereof, with innumerable people, then by armes to make the same his souldiers prey, to the destruction both of the citie, and great number of people therein. So doth this good emperour in one of his epistles, Adacta nobis, confesse himselfe. Which epistle, to declare the lenitie and mercifull heart heart of so worthie a prince, if that with great and marueilous prouocations and wrongs he had not been incited, I thought good in the middest of the historie heere to haue placed. But thus I haue kept you long herein, and yet not finished the same.

In this siege the emperour hauing spent and consumed almost all his treasure both gold and siluer, caused other money to be made of leather, which on the one side had his image, and on the other side the spread eagle (the armes of the empirie) and made a proclamation, that the same should passe from man to man for all necessaries in stead of other money, and therewithall promised, that whosoeuer brought the same money vnto his exchekier when the wars were ended, he would giue them gold for the same, according to the value of euerie coine limited: which thing afterward truly and faithfully hee performed, as all the historiographers do accord.

The emperour inforced to make his money of leather.

Thus when the pope, as before is said, had stopped his eares, and would not heare the emperors legats that came to intreat for peace, but reiected and despised his most courteous and equall demands; neither yet had left any wilie policie vnattempted or force vnpractised, that with his confederats he thought himselfe either able to reuenge or else resist: he by his legats calleth to a councel at Rome, al such prelats out of Italy, France, and England, as he thought to fauor him and his procéedings, that hereby as his last shift and only refuge, he by their helpes might depriue Frederike of his empire, as an vtter enemie to God and to the church. All which things Fredericus hauing vnderstanding of, and knowing that these assemblies should be put to the destruction and supplanting of him, determined to stop and let their passages to Rome, as well by sea as by land in all that euer he might. So that all the passages by land being now stopped and preuented, he commanded his son Henrie with certaine gallies to go and keepe the coasts of Sardinia, which kingdome the Italians call Entimum: and from thence to Pisas, and with the Pisans to rig out a naule to meet with (if it were possible) such as should come to aid the pope at Rome. The popes champions vnderstanding that by land they could not safely repaire to Rome: they procured of gallies and ships out of Genoa (hauing Gulielmus Bzaccius for their chiefe captaine or admirall) fortie saile for their defence: thinking hereby, that if they should fortune to meet with any of the emperours ships or gallies, which should lie for them in watt, they should be able to make their part good, and giue them also the repulse. Encius in like maner and Huglinus (being captaine and admirall of the Pisan naule for the emperour) lanched forth to sea with fortie ships and gallies: and betwixt the iles of Lilium and Mons Christi, which lie betweene Liburnium and Corsica, they met with the Genowaies ships; and straightwaies fiercely began to grapple with them and bord them, in which fight at length were three of the Genowaies ships both bouiged and sunke, and two and twentie taken and brought away, with all the riches and treasure in them. In these were taken three legats of the popes, whereof were two cardinals, Iacobus Columna, Otho Marchio, and Gregorius de Romania (all cruell enemies against the emperour) and many other prelats more: besides a great number of legats and procurators of cities, with an infinit number of monkes and priests, besides of Genowaies souldiers 6000, with diuers others.

The pope sendeth for forren aid and is preuented.

The emperour riggeth forth a naule to the sea.

A great victorie on the sea against the popes confederats by the emperours naule.

Pandolphus Colonutius in describing the circumstances of the great losse & misfortune of these champions of the pope by sea, amongst the rest declareth: that besides the great prey and bootie which the takers had from them, they also found manie writings and letters against Frederike, which much holpe him in the defence of those causes, wherein they had labored against him. The like mischance also almost about that time happened on the popes side, by the emperours souldiers which lay in the garrison at Ticinum, thus: There went forth vpon a time out of Ticinum into the borders of Genowaies, certaine bands to giue them larums in the countrie: which bands, the scuriers of Mediolanum (where lay a great garrison of the popes) discrying, told the captaine of the towne, that now a verie opportune and fit time was to giue an assault to Ticinum: for that (say they) the greatest part are now gone a foraging. Whereupon they immediatly calling togither the captaines and such as had charge, set their souldiers in array and marched forward to Ticinum. And now when they were come almost thither, the Ticinian bands (whom they thought to haue béen far a foraging) were returned and met with them, and fiercely gaue a full charge vpon them: who, being dismaied at the suddennesse of the matter, fought not long but gaue ouer and fled. In which skirmish were taken (besides those that were slaine) three hundred and fiftie captaines, and brought prisoners into Ticinum with all their ensignes with them.

The emperour obtaineth another victorie by land at Ticinum against the pope and his confederats.

The emperour thinketh to make the pope afraid.

Newes hereof was brought to the emperor not long after, who then was remoouing from the siege of Fauentia (as yée heard) to the citie of Bononium, thinking to haue destroyed the same. But vpon the hearing of these good newes, he altereth his purpose, and thinking to haue hereafter a more conuenient time thereunto, leadeth his armie towards Rome: and in the way he reconciled to him the citie of Pisarum. But Fanum, for that the townesmen shut their gates and would not suffer the emperour to come in, he tooke by force and destroyed. For the emperor séeing that neither by petition made to the pope, nor yet by his lawfull excusation hée could doe any good with him, thought, that by his sudden comming thither, and with feare of the perill imminent, he might be brought to some vniformitie, and caused to leaue off his accustomed pertinacie. And although the emperour was too strong for him, yet for that hée regarded nothing more then the publike tranquillitie of the empire, and that he might then take the Tartarian wars in hand, if he could by any meanes conclude, he refused not so to intreat a peace with him, as though he had béen both in force and fortune much his inferiour.

Whilest that this ruffle was betwixt the emperor and the pope, Ochodarius the emperour of the Tartarians his sonne, with a great power and prouision made, inuaded the borders next adioining vnto him, and there wan Rorolanum, Bodolum, Budanum, with diuers other cities, townes, and villages, destroying, wasting, and burning the countries all about, killing and slaying man, woman and child, sparing none of anie ser or age. At whose sudden inuasion, the people being in such feare and perplexitie (hauing no citie, no refuge, nor aid to stand in defence for them) were faine to leaue all that euer they had, and disperse themselues into woods, and flie into marishes and mountaines, or whersoeuer any succour else did offer it selfe to them. And by this time the Tartarian host was come as farre as Uratislauia, where Henricus of Polonia and the duke of Silesia with their armies met with them, who for the inequalitie of the number and small strength they were of, had soone an ouerthrow, and almost all their souldiers being slaine, they themselues were taken and put to the sword. From thence they came to Morauia, and from thence to the kingdome of Bohemia: which countrie while the king kept himselfe in strong defenced forts, and durst not come abroad, hée inuaded and destroyed all Hungarie, putting to flight and vanquishing Colmannus the brother of Belus the fourth king of Hungarie, by whom also was great spoile made in both the Pannonias, Misiarum, Bulgaria, and Seruia. When Belus the king of Hungarie had gotten to Pola (which is a citie of Illiria) vnto Otho the duke of Dalmatia, he sent his legats to Frederike the emperour, promising that if hée would send him aid that the Tartarians might be expelled, then Hungarie should euer after be vnder the iurisdiction of the emperour: which thing if hée refused to doe, that then the same were in great danger to be subiect to the Tartarians, to the no little perill of the whole empire. And said further, that the cause whereof he with more instance required the same, was; that so many christian men and countries made such pitifull lamentation in this their great calamitie and miserie, and that there was none able to help them; which (saith he) is as great shame as may be to the whole christian state and empire. And also said, that if the malice of this barbarous people were not suppressed, that then he thought they would make inuasion vpon the empire and prouinces of the same.

The Turke inuadeth christendome with a great and mightie power.

The vnmercifull crueltie and the slaughter of christian men by the Turke.

The king of Hungarie craueth aid of the emperour, for the which he offereth him his land.

The emperour although he thought it verie requisit, that with all conuenient speed this mischiefe should be remedied and preuented: yet notwithstanding his great enemie the pope with his confederats, was the only let and hinderance thereof. For when he saw and perceiued that he himselfe could do no good, and only laboured in vaine in séeking peace with the pope, he gaue commandement to Boiemus and Boius, to intreat and perswade with him. And (considering the imminent perill like to insue by reason of such ciuill dissension to the whole state of christendome) that he would take vp and conclude a peace, and mitigat somewhat his fierce and wrathfull mood. Wherefore, when he saw further, that neither by that meanes of intreatie, nor any other, the pope would desist from his stubborne and malicious froward purpose, hée writeth againe to the king of Hungarie, that he was right sorie and greatly lamented their miserable state, and that he much desired to reléeue the néed and necessitie that he and all the rest stood in. But why that he could not redresse the same, nor stand him then in anie stead, hée blamed greatly the bishop of Rome, who refusing all intreatie of peace, could not without great perill to himselfe depart out of Italie, lest that when hée should come to the aid of him (by the popes mischieuous imaginations) hée should be in perill of losing all at home. Notwithstanding, hée sent Conradus Cesar king of Bohemia and other princes more of Germanie to resist and withstand the enemie, as much as in them lay to doe. The great armie and number of such souldiers as wore the crosse by the popes assignement, deferred their iourney against the Tartarians, and had commandement giuen vnto them by one Albertus (the popes procurator) to tarie and abide at home, vntill they should be called for in battell to fight against the emperor. This was the louing zeale and affection of the pope and his adherents (to conclude) in this time of calamitie towards the christian state and commonwealth; that he had rather bend his force and reuenge his malice vpon the christian and good emperour, then either hée himselfe to withstand, or suffer and permit by conclusion of any profitable peace, that this most bloodie and cruell Tartarian should be let and restrained from so great hauocke, spoile and slaughter of the christian men: and yet forsooth these men will séeme to haue the greatest regard of all others to the christian preseruation, and thinke to haue the supremacie giuen therein:

The pope will grant to haue no peace.

The popes fault that the Turke is not resisted.

The pope had rather fight against the emperour, then against the Turke.

Digitized by Google

what thing elſe is this, then manifeſt mockerie and deceiuing of the people? But notwithſtanding, euen in the midſt of this ſpoile and hauoke of Polonia, Bohemia, and Hungaria, was it determined: that at Libuſſa, the princes confederat ſhould be aſſembled about the depoſing of the emperour and creation of another.

But now notwithſtanding the prouident foreſight and wiſe policie of the emperour (as you heard before) in reſtraining the paſſages both by the ſea and land, who had ſpeciall regard thereunto, and gaue moſt ſtrict charge that none ſhould paſſe without priuie ſearch and examination, as one hauing ſufficient triall as well in his owne perſon as by the example of his predeceſſours, what great miſchiefe and diſſenſion by their legats euerie way ſent out they had procured, both to the imperiall ſtate and dignitie, and to the whole countrie of Germanie: yet found they ſuch meanes, and wrought ſuch policies, that they had not only ſecret paſſage and repaſſage with their letters and ſpials into all chriſtendome where they liſted, but alſo ſo laboured the matter and handled the ſame; that the long continued league of amitie betweene the French king and the emperour, whoſe predeceſſours as alſo they themſelues had many yéeres reuerently obſerued in chriſtian concord and vnitie, was by this ſeditious prelat and arrogant vicar of ſatan, now either vtterly infringed, or elſe in variable ſuſpence: as by their letters each to other, and héere vnder inſuing, are to be read and ſéene: which for the more probabilitie of this hiſtorie of Frederike (not being long or greatly tedious) I thought meet héere to intert and place.

The emperour as well in his owne perſon, as his predeceſſors haue triall of the popes ſubtill practiſes.

The epiſtle of the French king to Frederike the emperour, touching the impriſoning of certaine cardinals of France.

HItherto (noble emperour) hath the good opinion and great confidence (many yeares in mutuall loue eſtabliſhed betwixt vs) laſted and continued well, hoping that no ſuch cauſe ſhould riſe betwixt vs, to hatch either hatred or other occaſion offenſiue betweene your highneſſe empire and our kingdome. Eſpeciallie, ſeeing that all our predeceſſours kings of France, late of moſt worthie memorie (till theſe our daies) haue béen ſo zealouſlie affected to the moſt high and regall ſtate of your empire: as that alſo after we, whom God hath placed ſucceſſiuelie to raigne as king, haue been no otherwiſe minded nor affected towards the ſame. None otherwiſe alſo on their behalfe haue the ancient and renowned emperours of Rome our neighbours and your predeceſſours ſhewed themſelues towards vs (each other eſteeming the empire and kingdome of France as one) and faithfullie conſeruing together the vnitie of peace and concord. In ſo much that there hath not chanced betweene them theſe manie yeares ſo much as one ſparke of diſcord and diſſenſion. But this notwithſtanding, we for our part cannot but greatly maruell, and not without good cauſe are troubled and vexed: that without deſert or any offence, you haue taken the prelats of our realme vpon the ſea, making their repaire to the ſee apoſtolicall: to the which, as well by their faith as their obedience they ſtand bound and are obedient, neither could they withſtand the pope his commandement: theſe haue you impriſoned, and ſo ſtill detaine the ſame. Whereat (we do your maieſtie to weet) we are not well pleaſed, neither yet take in ſo good part as you peraduenture thinke we do. For by their owne letters we vnderſtand, they had excogitat nothing preiudiciall to your imperiall eſtate and celſitude, although the pope had proſecuted therein more then became him to do. Wherefore, ſeeing that there is no cauſe why yee ſhould detaine them: it is meete and becommeth no leſſe your magnificence, but that you reſtore vnto vs and ſet at libertie the ſaid prelats of our realme: wherin alſo you ſhall appeaſe our grudge, and keepe vs your friend, which account the diſpleaſure you do to them, as our owne and proper iniurie. For why? it were a great diſhonor to our realme and kingly eſtate, if we would winke hereat and ouerpaſſe the ſame with ſilence. Werefore if you will conſider and reſpect the thing that we haue ſaid, we doubt not but that you will releaſe the biſhop of Peneſtrum, with the other legats and prelats of the church, which you to our preiudice doe detaine. In deſiring of our aid doubtleſſe we gaue vnto them a manifeſt nay: neither could they obtaine in our kingdome any thing at all which ſeemed to be againſt or preiudiciall to your maieſty. Let therefore your imperiall prouidence ponder in the balance of iuſtice, thoſe things which we write vnto you, neither let our lawfull requeſt vnto you be fruſtrate or made in vaine. For our realme and kingdome of France is not ſo debilitat or impoueriſhed, that it will be ſpurned at, or troden vnder your feet: Fare ye well.

The great amitie and long continued league between the empire and kingdome of France.

The king not without great allurement of the pope would ſo haue written to the emperor.

Heere it ſhould ſeeme the emperour found the fault of contradiction.

The reſcript of the emperour to the ſame letter of the king of France.

OVr imperial magnificence hath peruſed your kingly letters: wherein if we had not found manifeſt contradiction, they might peraduenture haue obtained at our hands all that they required. But euen as with a little leauen a whole lumpe of dow is ſowred: ſo a manifeſt vntruth alleaged hath made the whole argument of your letter both faultie and vnſauourie. It is apparent that you wanted the vertue of mediocritie in the concluſion of the ſame your graces letter: for that they themſelues bewray no leſſe then we giue you manifeſtly to vnderſtand, and many more beſides do know. It is notorious alſo, and to all the world reuealed, in what ſort that apoſtolicall father hath impugned our innocencie, as well with the one ſword as with the other, and how that whileſt we at his commandement tooke our iourney beyond the ſeas: the ſame our great enemie and hoſtil aduerſarie inuaded our kingdome of Sicilia: and the ſame not in one place or two, but in diuers and ſundrie parts thereof hath waſted, ſpoiled, and deſtroyed. After this, when with great intreatie at our returne from Aſia, we had concluded a peace with him, which with vs at his owne pleaſure he made, and had taken and receiued our deuotion for the ſame, which in ſeruiceable maner we granted him: the ſaid apoſtolicall father (that notwithſtanding) hath ſince that time rather aggrauated his diſpleaſure toward vs, then any thing at all qualified the ſame: and further hath to our depriuation and ſubuerſion, excogitat and deuiſed againſt vs al the miſchiefe he might or hath been able, no cauſe in all the world giuen of vs to prouoke the ſame; and further hath promulgated to our great defamation and ſhame (as well by his letters as legats) the ſentence of excommunication againſt vs vnto all nations. Laſtly, he aſpiring to our imperiall ſtate, and conſpiring our ſupplantation, hath made warre againſt vs, as againſt king Dauid Gods annointed: and hath vnto a priuat councell for that purpoſe called all the prelats he can get, as one that meaneth to ſet al the whole world together by the eares. But ſuch is the maruellous wiſedome of God, by whom we liue and raigne, who beholding the wicked purpoſe he went about (confounding the crafty in their craftines) hath giuen into our hands as wel your prelats of the realme of France, as alſo of other regions and prouinces: all which wee impriſon and detaine, as enemies and aduerſaries to our imperiall crowne and perſon. For where there deſiſted not to be a perſecutor, there hath not wanted alſo a ſufficient withſtander and defender. Let not therefore your kingly highneſſe maruell, although Auguſtus detaineth in priſon your French prelats, which haue indeuoured themſelues to conſpire and ſo to diſturbe our imperiall eſtate and regiment. Fare ye well.

The French kings letters contrarie to themſelues.

A good apoſtolicall father with a two handed ſword.

1 20000 ounces of gold, as before you heard.

The craftie compaſſed in their craftines.

When Frederike now ſaw there was none other remedie, and that in vaine he laboured to haue peace with the pope, he proſecuteth his war to the vttermoſt: and when he had gotten Tudertum and reconciled the ſame, he deſtroyed the towne of Geminum and Narnia, and giueth the ſpoile of them vnto his ſouldiers: he gently receiued the yéelding vp of Siburnium, and wafteth all the countrie round about Rome. The pope herewith diſmaied and troubled with ſuch as otherwiſe diſſuaded and counſelled him, and that things not ſo well proſpered with him and againſt the emperour as he wiſhed and deſired, being in deſpaire of obtaining his purpoſe, died for very anger and thought.

Gregorie the ninth dieth for thought and cruell heart.

What opinion the prelats of Germanie at that time had of this Gregorie, is extant and to be ſéene by the oration of Eberhardus biſhop of Iuuauence, that he made to the nobilitie of Boioria in the parlement at Reginoburgh, written by Iohannes Auentinus in his ſeuenth booke. Doubtleſſe he not onlie brought great and ruinous calamities to the whole chriſtian commonweale and alſo empire, whileſt he ſought thus to depreſſe and bridle the emperour, and aduance his papall ſée and dignitie, but alſo brought into the church of God much horrible impietie, blaſphemie and wickedneſſe, whereof both Blondus, Platina, Balæus and others make mention: and amongſt others that moſt deteſtable cantilene Salue Regina, in the which he attributeth the honor and worſhip proper only to Chriſt, vnto the virgin his mother. This is he in whoſe name the booke of the decretals was ſet out, which (to omit the opinion of diuers other learned men) Iohannes Balæus calleth it the ſinke or puddle of ſolliſhneſſe and impietie. Doubtleſſe Carolus Molinæus a man both of ſingular iudgment in that law, which in tribunal courts and iudgements is vſed, as alſo in this, painted forth the decree of this Gregorie in his booke of annotations vnto Platina, whoſe words thereof are theſe: Certum eſt, multa capita in ijs mutila & decurtata eſſe, vt inuidioſum argumentum lateret, &c. That is; Doubtleſſe diuers chapters in the ſame booke of decretals be mangled and vnperfect, that many contentious arguments therein might lurke. For when the ambitious deſire of raigning like kings tooke them, they ſtudied nothing elſe but how to inlarge and aduance their ſée and dominion with the empire it ſelfe and other kingdomes (oft ſhaken and weakened through contention:) and this purpoſe and end had they and none other in all their conſtitutions. The proofe whereof Molinæus declareth in his booke De regibus Galliæ & Angliæ. But manie more examples by the emperours, princes, and lords electors of the empire may be gathered, whereof to ſpeake, more conuenient place ſhall ſerue hereafter.

Carolus Molineus vpon the decretals of pope Gregorie the ninth.

In the ſtead of this Gregorie was placed Celeſtine borne in Mediolanum amongſt the Caſtellians: who as Blondus declareth by fained promiſes offered a league with Fredericus, and the eightéenth day after he was created pope he alſo died.

The creation and death of pope Celeſtinus.

Thus when the author of all this conſpiracie was gone, Fredericus

Digitized by Google

Fredericus now thinking himselfe free and void of that feare which before he had, and durst not be absent out of Italie, with all his indeuor leuieth an armie, and prepareth his furniture and other necessaries for the deliuerie of the christians, so mightilie oppressed as ye heard by the Turke or Tartarians. Who hearing of the comming of the emperour, left the straight way through Hungarie, which they came, and returned by the riuer of Danubium to Taurica, and so through the fenz of Meotida, and by the riuer Tanaum, into Sarmatia Asiatica. When the cardinals had now a long time protracted the creation of the pope, & would not agree vpon the same, the emperor put them in remembrance of their dutie, and blameth them for their disagreeing, and exhorteth them to be more carefull for the christian common wealth. His two epistles touching this matter are extant, whereby appeareth, that onely for the care and desire of peace he had to the christian vnity and state, he did the same: and for that (peraduenture) the cardinals refused to make peace with him before they had created a new pope: the one for more breuitie I haue omitted, and here the other inserted.

The emperour prepareth an armie to fight with the Tartarians: the Tartarians flie.

An epistle inuectiue of the emperour vnto the cardinals, for that they cannot agree vpon the creation of the pope.

Fredericke against the cardinals.

VNto you I write, oh you children of Ephraim, which euill haue bent your bowes, and worse haue shot your arrowes, filthilie turning your backs in the day of battell; vnto you I speake, O you children of Belial, and disparkled flocke, you insensible people and assistants of the great iudge, vnto you I write, O you dissensious cardinals, whom the world for your deserts doth hate; for whose causes the whole world being at variance is euill spoken of. Doubtles, I cannot speake vnto you, but to your detractation, because I am worldly and you spirituall. I am vnperfect, wherefore I must do as the vnperfect world doth: neither can the part be dissonant to the whole, nor I contrarie to my selfe that writeth. Attend ye therefore my rude epistle, wanting the dignitie of rhetoricall stile. My prouoked tongue bursteth forth into words, before my conceiuing spirit hath deliuered the same; and so not attending to the higher regiment, hath hastened to expresse my words not fullie conceiued or premeditat. Thus, I say, a troubled mind oftentimes doth beget vnordered talke, and vntimelie vttereth the same. This therfore it is that our hart hath conceiued, that we beleeue and all men confesse, that Iesus Christ the mediator betweene God and man, which came from heauen to make peace vpon the earth, is not diuided and at variance, being also the master and Lord of the apostles. But Satan being diuided in himselfe, that blustring prince is amongst you, as those to whom he ministreth: hee, euen he, the perswader of discord and dissension, that mankiller, father of lies, and spirit of darkenesse, that hath diuided your tongues, and set dissension amongst your selues: neither do ye good one to another, nor yet to the world, being by you into so perillous a state brought; & the little ship of Peter, which is tossed vpon the sea by the vehement winds, you nothing regard; which ship, though it need not indeed vtterly to feare drowning, yet suffereth it by your negligence many great stormes and perillous tempests. Doubtlesse, if ye would diligently consider how the nations and people whom ye were wont to iudge, in scorne shake their heads at you: euery one of you would bee ashamed of another. And to say the truth, they cannot doe too much to detect your so detestable opprobrie: for whilest euerie one of you aspireth to the chaire, euery one is at variance with his fellow; and whilest one of you cannot agree with another, none is promoted; and whilest none is promoted, the cathedrall dignitie vanisheth. And thus by your discord, the peaceable state and concord of the church is confounded, and the perfection of the faith and religion whereby yee should liue, perisheth. And surely, through your default it perisheth; so that whereas nature hath placed the sense and vnderstanding to bee, that partly like a monster remaineth with you, both senseless and headles. And no maruell, for why, your hearing is impared, and that sound of the mouth which shrilly was heard throughout the whole earth, is vtterly dumbe, and become a scoffing echo. For why, the thundrings of Peter and Paul are now no more heard, the preachers are become dumbe dogs, and are commanded to silence. Perhaps you haue hands readie to receiue, but there be no bribes; for why, those that were wont to come from Saba, and bring gold with them, now come no more, seeing the Lord is not in the manger, and the celestial shining star refusing to be their guide. Moreouer, ye want feet to walke withall, for seeing there is no man to giue you ought, you will not remooue one foot for any mans pleasure. Fie shameless people, the least and simplest beast may learne you obedience, for the birds haue their captaine, and the silly bees their king, but you wil come vnder no gouernement, &c.

Peters ship by the dissention of the cardinals greatly afflicted.

Peters shrill voice turned into a scoffing echo.

The emperour releaseth the cardinals out of prison.

The emperor yet after this at the request of Baldwinus, the emperour of Constantinople, who came to Fredericus to Parma, released the cardinals out of prison, thinking thereby not onely to gratifie the emperour Baldwinus, but also thinking that thereby things would haue the better growne to publike tranquillitie on euery side. When the cardinals were all assembled at Auignia, they made Sinibaldus a Genowaie pope, whom by a contrarie name, for that he had determined (as I suppose) to bee hurtfull to the commonwealth, they called Innocentius the fourth. Of which election when Frederike vnderstood, he was well pleased therewith. And for that he had in all this troublous time been his friend, he well hoped that the christian commonwealth should by him haue been brought to much peace and concord. Wherfore he sent both his legats and letters gratulatorie vnto him, letting him to vnderstand how well it contented and pleased him that he was made pope, and what peace and quietnesse thereby he promiseth (as it were to himselfe) he maketh full relation thereof: offering againe vnto him, obseruance, helpe and aid in all things, commending his dignitie to the publike state and quietnesse of the christian commonwealth and empire, &c.

Innocentius, the fourth created pope.

The emperour reioyceth of the popes election, but without cause why.

He also wrote his letters to Otho duke of Boiozia, who a little before was reconciled to the emperour, that he which was elected pope was a good man, a louer of peace, and studious as well for the tranquillitie of the christian commonwealth as of the empire.

The legats of Frederike also with the furtherance of Baldwinus the emperor of Constantinople, laboured very diligentlie for the conclusion of the promised peace. And to bee briefe, euerie man was in good hope, and looked for no lesse. But far otherwise fell the matter out, and contrarie to all their expectation. For the pope (set on and incouraged by the cardinals and others against Frederike) secretly and amongst themselues wrought contrary to that they openlie pretended, and not a little disappointed both Frederike and others of their expectation and good opinion they had in the popes holinesse. For whilest the emperors legats attended the answer of their peace before promised, Rainerus the cardinall went secretly to Viterbium with a certaine number of souldiers, and tooke the towne which before was on the emperors part.

The pope taketh Viterbium while the emperour hoped for peace.

The emperor hauing vnderstanding hereof, mustereth his bands, and with a sufficient power entreth the popes dition, againe to recouer Viterbium. But yet, taking this warre so in hand (not thinking thereby to expell all conditions of peace) at the request of certaine of the cardinals was contented to leaue Viterbium, being furnished by the emperor of warlike prouision before, and came to Aqua. From thence he sent againe other ambassadors to Rome, and with them also the emperor of Constantinople, with the earle of Tholouse, who he thought were able to doe much with the pope in the prosecuting of this peace. And although at the time of Easter the matter seemed to haue been through, and peace concluded, for that his legats had sworne in the behalfe of the emperour (and as hee willed them) that hee would submit himselfe to the pope. And againe, for that the cardinals and others, commonly called and named him Fredericus the christian prince; yet all this was no more but for a further fetch and purpose. Not for that they meant indeed to conclude any peace with him, or to goe through therewithall, but that through this dissimulation and likelihood of peace which they vnderstood the emperor much desired, he should set free and open the passages which he straitly kept, that no man could passe and come to Rome, whither a great multitude dailie resorted and flocked for religions sake. But when all came to al, and that the legats perceiued no conclusion of peace was simplie purposed on their behalfe, they began to despaire of the matter; letting the emperor so to vnderstand. The emperor yet notwithstanding doubted not, but if hee might himselfe speake with the pope, hee vpon reasonable conditions should well inough accord with him; wherefore hee by his legats and letters desired him to appoint a place where the emperor might resort to him. The pope seemed to be contented herewithal, and appointed a day at Fescennia, where they would talke together, and that the pope would be there before him, and expect the emperours comming. But the pope in this while had made a confederacie with the French king against Fredericus, who when he knew those three gallies to be readie and brought vnto Centuncellas, which hee before had spoken for vnto the Genowaies, secretly in the night with his companie (hastening thither in post speed) tooke ship, and first came to Genoa, and from thence to Lions in France, where he (calling a councell) with a loud voice summoneth Frederike, and appointing him a day commanded him there personallie to plead his cause.

The dissimulation of the subtill pope Innocent the fourth.

The emperour hath too much confidence in the pope.

The pope mocketh the emperour and goeth to Lions, where he proscribeth the emperour.

And yet although hee vnderstood the sudden departing of him out of Italie, made plaine demonstration of no conclusion or meaning of a peace, and also knew the councell which the pope had called, wherein hee was himselfe both plaintiffe and iudge; and at the same councell those which he had by bribes allured, pretended the destruction of the emperor; with many other such euident demonstrations, both of his enuious and hatefull heart towards him: yet the most modest emperour hoping the innocencie and vprightnesse of his cause, and as one most desirous of peace and christian concord, sent the patriarch of Antioch, which lately was come out of Syria, the bishop of Panormia & Thadeus Suessanus the president of his court (a most skilfull and prudent ciuilian) to the councell at Lions: which signified vnto them that the emperor would be there for the defence of his owne cause: and for that the day was verie short, required a time more conuenient for him thither to make his his repaire. The emperor also being onward on his way, and come as far as Taurinum, sent before other messengers (as the maister of the Flemish order, and Peter de Vineis) to giue them vnderstanding of the emperors comming, and that hee would prorogue the day of hearing, till that he might conuently trauell thither. But for any thing that could be either said or done, or vpon how iust cause soeuer required, the pope would not giue so much as three daies space, in the which time the ambassadors assured them of the emperours presence; as though there had been no common prouiso for euerie man in that case, by the law to haue vsed vpon any reasonable let. What should I longer protract the time? When the day by them appointed was come, the pope with his confederats (whom for monie and bribes he had gotten to that councell) against Gods law, against christian doctrine, against both the prescript of the law of nature and reason, against the rule of equitie, against the order of law appointed, against the constitutions of emperors, and also the decrees of the empire, without any obseruation of the law, or granting dilatory daies, without probatiõ of any crime, or his cause suffered to be pleaded vnto, or heard what might be answered therin, taking vpõ him to be both aduersarie and iudge, condemned the emperour being absent. What more wicked sentence was euer pronounced? What more cruell fact (considering the person) might be committed? Or what thing more brutish and beastly could haue bin imagined or deuised? And yet hereat were those bishops nothing ashamed; but meaning to leaue their doings in writing (as an impudent testimonie to their posteritie) established the same for a law to continue.

Digitized by Google

The emperour comming to make his appearance before the pope.

The extremitie of the pope to the emperour.

Vengeance falleth vpon the pope for his false iudgement.

But marke what vengeance God tooke vpon this wicked iudge. The writers of the annals record, that when Fredericus the emperour, and Conradus his son being Cesar, were both dead, the pope gaping for the inheritance of Naples and Sicilie, and thinking by force to haue subdued the same, came to Naples with a great host of men, where was heard in the popes court manifestlie pronounced this voice, Veni miser ad iudicium Dei, Thou wretch come to receiue thy iudgement. And the nert day after the pope was found in his bed dead, all blacke and blew as though hee had been beaten with bats, as before in the historie of king Iohn is declared.

When the emperour had vnderstanding of this cruell and tyrannical sentence of the pope, passed and pronounced against him (considering his furious purpose and mind therein) thought good by his letters, to let all christian princes and potentats vnderstand, as well what iniuries and manifold displeasures he had sustained by the foure popes in all their times, as also the crueltie and tyrannie of this pope, in pronouncing the sentence of iudgement and condemnation against him (passing the bounds both of iustice, equitie, and reason) which letter as he wrote the same, heere vnder followeth to be seene.

The letter of the emperor to the French king, and other princes, for the sentence giuen against him in the councell of Lions by the pope and cardinals.

ALthough we suppose not the contrarie, but that both by true certificat and common rumor you haue heard of the indifferency of our cause and good handling therof: yet for that more credit is commonly giuen to that the eie seeth, then to that the eare receiueth, wee thought good to present vnto you the naked truth of such things, which the popes successiuely haue put forth, and forged against vs. To the perusing and consideration of which my case and letter, I beseech your gentlenesse amongst other times of leisure, you will spie out some fit and conuenient time therefore. And all other whatsoeuer that shall haue desire to heare princes counsels and affairs, let them in like sort attentiuely consider. First, whether our predecessors haue been destitute or not of godlie zeale, iust dealing, and righteousnesse: or whether we may not lawfully reuenge our selues, being so much prouoked, of such euils and iniuries as haue been wrought against vs. Secondly, let thẽ consider whether Christs vicar doth follow Christs steps or not; and whether Peters successors do follow his example or not; and also by what law, equitie and right, that sentence which they haue pronounced against vs, may be maintained and allowed: as also what name they may iustly giue it, and whether that may be said to be a sentence which is giuen by an vnsufficient iudge or not. For although we acknowledge that the Lord hath giuen full power in spirituall things vnto his church, that whatsoeuer the same bindeth in earth is bound in heauen, and whatsoeuer the same looseth, is also loosed; yet wee read neither by Gods law, nor by any law of man, that wee ought of dutie to be subiect vnto him, or that an empire ought at his pleasure to be transformed and transposed, or that he may giue any such sentence or iudgement to punish princes temporallie, and depriue them of their kingdoms. For why? although our consecration belongeth vnto him by right and custome (as he challengeth) yet our deposing and depriuing doth no more belong to him, then doth that presumption belong to any other prelat of other realmes, which doe consecrat and annoint their kings, as the custome and maner is. Or put case it were so (we nothing hindred hereby) that he had such power: hath he that power to the intent to reuenge himselfe vpon whomsoeuer his malicious mind consenteth, and without all equitie and law to bring them vnder his iurisdiction? He hath proceeded of late against vs as is said, but not by the order of accusation, forsomuch as neither was there any sufficient accuser, neither went there out any inscription or processe before; neither yet by denunciation, forsomuch as there lacked a lawfull denouncer; neither yet by the way of inquisition, for that there went before it no manifest accusation. But hee peraduenture will say, that all things that hee laieth against vs were manifest and notorious. But that doe we denie, and nothing to be notorious but that which may by a sufficient number of witnesses be approoued and tried. For so may euery iudge himselfe (contemning the order of law) affirme what hee list to be notorious, and thus condemne whom he list. There were against vs (as well it may be said in counsell) certaine false witnesses, although not many, of whom the bishop of Calin was one, whose neere kinsman or nephue (by our lawes condemned for treason to be hanged) maketh also to vs an infestiue enemie. ¶ To such like effect prosecuting the rest of his epistle, which for breuitie sake I omit.

This policie vsed the pope to vexe and disturbe both the countrie of Germanie and the whole empire, and not so onelie, but also vtterly to destroy and subuert the same: by the ruinous decay whereof, the pope and his prelats thought to make vp their mouthes. And thus, whilest that Germanie was now newly againe diuided, some taking part with Frederike the emperor and Conradus Cesar his sonne and other nobles and princes of the empire; some with those that should by the popes procurement be the electors of the new emperor, other some with neither of both, as men not minding nor tending the publike vtilitie, but to serue their owne purposes, armed themselues; and thus was the publike peace and quiet broken and disturbed, and altogether in tumult and hurlie burlie. For whilest the one part laboured by all force to retaine the dominion by publike and common consent first to him committed, the other part in like sort indeuored themselues with all their force and power to vse and occupie the same, according vnto the decree of the bishop of Rome, and to take it from Frederike, and thus great conflicts grew on all parts.

Germanie altogether in hurlie burlie through the popes malitious mind.

By these ciuil wars, Germanie suffered no little calamitie, in euery place was manslaughter and murther, the countrie spoiled, the townes and villages set on fire and burnt, the churches and temples violated and robbed, wherein the husbandmen had put their goods and substance: houses were pulled downe, the goods diuided, & euery mans cattell driuen away. To conclude, in this turmoile and contention of deposing and chosing another emperor, in this faction of princes, in this libertie of wearing armour, in this licence of hurting and sinning, the impudent boldnesse of diuers priuat souldiers, and especially of such as were the horsemen, then counted the better sort of souldiers, was so great, and their vnbridled and vnsatiable desire in robbing, spoiling, and taking of booties, catching and snatching all that came to hand, so much, that nothing could be sure and in safety that any good man inioyed. Wherefore a little before the death of Gulielmus the king, three score cities & townes which were belonging to Ludouicus Palatinus duke of Boioria and Rhenus, and Otho his sonne, and other princes, whose names Auentinus in his seuenth booke of the annals of the Boiores maketh mention of, ioyned themselues in a league for the expelling of these rebels and repressing of their so great iniurious rapins, and slaughter of men. Of which armie the said Ludouicus being captaine, chased and draue the whole rout of them to the vttermost parts of Germany, and pulled downe and ouerthrew their castles and fortresses, and euery other place where they had intrenched themselues.

Germany spoiled by ciuill dissension through the popes onelie practise against the emperour.

The robbers and rebels chased out of Germanie.

Otho Boius yet notwithstanding keepeth his promise and faith most constantlie made before to the emperor Frederike and Conradus his sonne. Wherupon Philippus Iuuauensis, Albertus and others, calling a councell at Wildorsus (by the popes commandement) sent for Otho vnto them, vnto whom they opend the popes pleasure and commandement. To all which, when he had heard, Otho answered: I cannot maruell at some of you inough, that when as heretofore you perswaded me to leaue & forsake the part I took with the bishop of Rome, whom you your selues affirmed to bee antichrist, and that I should take part with the emperor, why that you your selues will not keepe your fidelitie and promise made vnto those good princes: and said that he perceiued in them a great inconstancie and leuitie, both in their words and deeds, which now call that wicked, vniust, and violent wrong, but latelie that they thought equall, iust and right. Hee said further, that they were ouercome with pleasures, corrupted with superfluitie, wonne with bribes, gaping for honor and estimation: and that they neither regarded honestie, godlinesse, nor their dutie and office, but studied how to make dissension and commotions, and longed after war and bloudie battell.

The fidelitie of Otho to the emperour.

The answer of Otho to the legats.

He said further, that for his part he would obay God and his prince, to whom he had sworne fidelitie; and that he nought esteemed the fained holinesse and detestable practises of such prelats. He said he beleeued in Christ, and would trust in his mercie; and that he beleeued how those whom they cursed and gane

Otho excommunicated for turning from the pope to take the emperors part.

gaue to the diuell, were in greatest fauor with God. Howbeit, and notwithstanding those prelats toke in good part this expostulation with him, and seemed to beare Otho no malice or grudge for that he had said, but to be desirous of peace and vnitie: yet not long after Otho was cursed as black as all the rest, and counted as bad as the worst.

Albertus the popes champion now in Germanie playeth not rex only amongst the citizens, but also bethought him of a mischieuous deuice against Conradus Cesar the emperors sonne; when by fraud and subtiltie hee had gotten and taken many of the rich burgesses and citizens of Reginoburgh, which bare the emperour good will, and had sent them prisoners to Stakkum. Conradus ioyning with other noble men of the empire (after he had spoiled and wasted much of his lands and others his companions) draue him so neere, that vpon certain other conditions he deliuered againe the citizens. And shortlie after comming againe to Reginoburgh, and being receiued and welcommed into the colledge of D. Pameranus: Albertus with certaine of his confederats by the meanes of Ulricus a chiefe officer of the monks, came in the dead time of the night into the chamber, where the Cesar with a few others about him did lie; and falling vpon them, some they tooke, and other some they slue: and finding no other bodie in the chamber or lodging, they thought that Cesar had been slaine among the rest. But he hearing the noise, forsoke his bed, and hid himselfe vnder a bench and so escaped their hands. The next day he outlawed or proscribed the bishop and his mates, and also the monks bailiffe of treason, and seized vpon all the goods of the house. But at the sute of the guiltlesse monks he released all to them againe, taking by way of fine 100. pounds. Ulricus lost his office, and Albertus thereby to escape danger of punishment, tooke vpon him the habit of a monke. Conradus Hochenkolleus, which was the murtherer of these men (though he escaped the punishment of mans hand) yet the vengeance of God for the fact he escaped not. For as he rid in the day time abroad, he was suddenly stricken with a thunderbolt and died.

Cesar in danger of Albertus.

Albertus to escape punishment taketh the order of monkerie.

During all this busie and contentious time, it may well be gathered, that Frederike the emperor lay not still, but had his hands full: who notwithstanding (by Gods helpe) ouercomming and suppressing these or the greater part of these rebellious popish tumults, and had done strict execution on these especially that had conspired against his person, calling a councell, and setting in some stay the troublesome affaires of his kingdome, came to Cremona with Fredericus prince of Antioch, Richardus earle of Umbria, the gouernor of Flamminia, and Encius king of Sardinia, with a great number besides of soldiers and men of war. And besides, he toke with him (which he sent for out of euerie part) the wisest, most vertuous, and best learned men that there were, thinking with them to haue gone himselfe to Lions to the pope, and there to haue with him communication, as well concerning the sentence definitiue, as also about the conclusion of any peace, if by any meanes hee might. And when all things were prepared and readie, he toke the iournie in hand, and came to Taurinum, hauing with him both a great armie of souldiers, and also a great company of legats and ambassadors. From thence sending his carriages before, within three daies iournie of Lions, he was certified that Parma was taken and kept by the outlawes of diuers and sundrie factions of the pope, his neere neighbors and friends; as by the popes legat, and other citizens, as of Biria, Placentia, and such like. Which thing when hee vnderstood, and that the pope herein was the onlie and chiefe doer, he saw manifestly it should little preuaile, to attempt any further the thing hee went about, and then at length, when he saw no other remedie, putting from him all hope of peace, determined himselfe to the wars with all his force and might. Thus altering his purpose and iournie, hee toke the straightest way into Lombardie, and with an armie of 60000. men hee besieged Parma. And to the intent he might more aptlie and neere the town plant his siege and battrie without disturbance, first he intrenched his campe, and fortified the same about with bulworks & other defensible munition. After that, he caused diuers victualling houses & tauerns in his campe to be sleightly builded of timber; and without the campe he appointed the place where the market should be kept, and al victuallers resort that would. He appointed places for their churches and temples, and in seemelie maner adorned the same: and for the most part, their tents were builded with wood, so that it was like another Parma. All which things when he had finished, which was not long in doing, for this happy and prosperous successe he called and named it Victoria, and had thought to haue made the same to be in the stead of the citie Parma, the which he purposed to haue made leuell with the ground. And in the beginning, both there and elsewhere, all things prospered well with Frederike and had good successe; for hee sharplie laid to their charges that defended and kept the citie of Parma. And further, Robertus Castilioneus, which was the emperors lieutenant in Picenum neere vnto Aurimum, discomfited the popes armie, and slue of them more then 4000. and took many such as were of the confederat cities prisoners. And when the factions or companies of the Gibelines and Guelphs in Florentia were at controuersie, when Fredericus of Hetruria came to the Gibelines, to whom they had sent for aid: the Guelphs therewith dismaid, fled from thence to Bondnia, whose goods and substance came al to the emperors coffers, and Florentia also it selfe to the emperors obedience. But this good successe and prosperous fortune lasted not long. For as at a time Fredericus to recreat himselfe (which seldome had his health) rode about the fields with certaine of his horsemen to hauke and hunt: many of the emperors souldiers thinking nothing lesse then of such a matter to bee attempted of a many staruelings within the towne of Parma, wandred and ranged vnarmed out of their citie Victoria about the fields. The souldiers in Parma hauing this occasion offered, with all force and speed possible entred the emperors campe or towne Victoria, which being not stronglie fenced, nor hauing gates to shut against them, was a thing easie enough to doe. The sudden strangenesse of the matter much abashed the souldiers, and rang out their larum bell. The first assault was giuen vpon Marcus Malaspina his charge, whom when the emperor returning in all hast found to be hard beset, had thought to haue rescued him. But when that was perceiued of the enemie, they bent all their force altogether on that side: insomuch that the emperor was inforced to take the trench, least he should haue bin of the enemie inuironed, and from thence he retired into the citie or campe, where he had thought to haue gathered further aid. But the enemie giuing not so much time thereunto, with all force entred the citie Victoria. The emperor now, when the enemies were entred, left the campe and came to Dominum, who when they had killed and slaine a great number of the emperors souldiers, and had burnt and destroyed the same campe Victoria, came againe to Parma. The emperor then suspecting this thing to be wrought by treason, wherby the enemie had vnderstanding as wel of the emperors absence, as also of the negligence of his souldiers, imprisoned certaine of ỳ chiefest about him, amongst whom also was Petrus de Vineis. Yet whilest he was at Dominum, gathering together his souldiers & residue of his bands; Encius getteth a great victorie of the Mansuanos, who comming to the rescue of Parma, lost fiftie of their ships, and all that they had in them.

The negligence of the souldiers offereth an occasion to the enemie.

The discomfiture of the emperour at the siege of Parma.

The emperour vpon suspition of treason imprisoneth diuers of his captains.

After this also, Richardus in another conflict in Picenum, discomfited the popes souldiers, and slue their captaine Hugolinus, besides 2000. others slaine and taken prisoners. When now Fredericus had gathered againe, and new mustered his bands at Dominum, he marched forth to Cremona: and notwithstanding that there he vnderstood of the good successe and victorie that Encius had at Rhegium, yet for that he perceiued the defection and backsliding of all or most part of Lombardie from him, he determined to take his iournie into Apulia: and when he had there leuied a strong and sufficient power, he purposed to make his speedie returne againe into Lombardie. Therefore, in his iournie through Hetruria into Apulia, he ioined with his sonne Fredericus, which besieged Capras, and tooke the same: and led with him diuers of the chiefest captains prisoners, and after that subduing vnto the obedience of the empire Miniatum, he came into Apulia.

The emperor when he had somewhat suppressed these tumults, came to Cremona.

The emperour thinketh to go to Lions to the pope.

Parma taken and kept by the popes legat and other friends of his.

The emperour altereth his iournie from Lions to the siege of Parma.

Capras besieged and taken of the emperor.

When newes was brought him thither, that Encius his sonne (comming to aid the Mutinenses against the Bononians) was taken prisoner two miles from Mutina; and that in his absence, the popes captains with their bands and garrisons went throughout all Lombardie, Emilia, Flamminia, and Hetruria, to stir and procure the cities to reuolt from the obedience of the emperor; and the same, partlie working by subtill policies, and partly by force and sinister meanes to bring them to his purpose: determined with himselfe, that with all the force and power he might by any means procure and make, to haue begun afresh, and prosecuted this war to the vttermost. Neither was it to be doubted (as Pandolphus Colonucius writeth) but that he would haue wrought some marueilous exploit and great attempt, but that he was of this his purpose (whereunto he was both willing and bent) preuented by vnlooked for death. For when he fell into this ague, being at a certain castell of his in Apulia called Florentinum, and saw by the extremity therof his daies to be short, he remembred that which was once shewed him, how hee should die at Florence; whereupon, hee made and ordained his testament. And when vnto Conradus and others of his children he had giuen and appointed the great and innumerable masse of monie which he had colleated and leuied for the maintenance of his wars, and godly purpose (as it is called) and vnto them also had giuen all other his kingdoms and dominions (to euery one according to their ages and yeers) he departed this wretched and miserable world.

The emperour purposeth to make some great attempt.

Pandolphus writeth, that Fredericus was very willing to die, and as they made certaine report to him which were present at his death, that his mind was altogether set and bent on the heauenly ioy and felicitie. Which thing also Gulielmus Puteanus, Andreas Pandalus, and Manardus the bishop, being Italian writers doe all affirme, of whom this last writeth, that he assuredlie beleeueth Frederike to be one of the number of Gods elect.

The emperour preuented by death.

Frederike one of Gods elect.

The writers notwithstanding are of sundrie iudgements and opinions touching this good emperors death. Some write that he was traitorouslie poisoned by his cupbearer, being hired thereunto. Some others, that he was strangled with a pillow of Manfredo the sonne of Pherus. But Pandolphus as good

Sundrie opinions of the death of Frederike the emperour.

The popes armie discomfited by the emperours lieutenant at Aurimum.

Digitized by Google

good a writer as the best, maketh no mention of any poison that was giuen him, but only that he died of an ague. The last opinion of Manfredus he manifestly refuteth, and that there is no maner of likelihood of the same: and further, that the contrarie is affirmed by diuers other writers that were of that time. He died in the yeere of our Lord 1268. the thirteenth day of December, in the seuen and fiftith yeere of his age, and seuen and thirtith yeere of his raigne, whose corps was brought to Panormum, and there intombed.

The issue of Frederike the emperour.

Frederike had three wiues, the first was Constantia, the daughter of the king of Arragon, of whom he begat Henrie the duke of Sueuia and king of the Romans: the other Iole the daughter of Johannes Brennus king of Hierusalem, by whom he had the inheritance of Hierusalem, Naples and Sicilie, of whom hee begat Conradus duke of Sueuia, king of Hierusalem and Naples, being Cesar: the third Isabell the daughter of king John of England, by whom he had a sonne named Henrie, which is said to die in his childhood. This Fredericus had not his peere in martiall affaires to be compared vnto him, and warlike policies amongst all the princes of that age: a wise and skilfull souldier he was, a greater indurer of painefull labors & trauels, most bold in greatest perils, prudent in foresight, industrious in all his doings, prompt and nimble about that hee toke in hand, and in aduersitie most stout and couragious. But as in this corruption of nature, few there be that attaine perfection, neither yet is there any prince almost of such gouernement and godly institution, both in life and doctrine as is required of them: so neither was this Frederike without his fault and humane fragilitie: for the writers impute to him some fault of concupiscence, wherewith he was stained and spotted. And it appeareth that he was not all cleare therof, forsomuch as by sundrie concubines he had sundrie children; as Encius the king of Sardinia, Manfredus the prince of Sarentinum, and Frederike king of Antioch. And this is all that I find of the discription of Frederike by Colonucius, which hee affirmeth to haue gathered out of good and probable authors. But as touching the hainous acts and flagitious deeds, which the pope burtheneth him withall, and in his sentence against him maketh mention of; Fredericus not only purgeth himselfe thereof, but also diuers historicians (as well Germane writers as Italians) affirme the same to bee false and of the popes owne braines, to doe him skath and teene withall, inuented. Of which matter those things which Pandolphus (touching the commendation or dispraise of Fredericus writeth) I thought good out of Italian to translate; whose words be these.

Frederike a most puissant prince in martiall affaires.

Frederike was not without his fault of humane fragilitie.

The words of Pandolphus touching the praise and dispraise of the emperor.

Albeit the emperour Fredericus was indued with many godly gifts and vertues, yet notwithstanding was he accounted an enemie of the church, and a persecutor of the same: of which, both Innocentius the fourth in his sentence hath pronounced him guiltie, and the same sentence haue other popes registred in their fiue books of decretals, and stablished the same for a law, how that he ought to be taken for no lesse. Therefore peraduenture it should not become me to falsifie or call in question that, which others haue confirmed, or els to dispute and argue much of that matter. Yet notwithstanding as much as his acts and deeds in writing declare, and the bookes of the chiefest authors affirme, as also his owne epistles doe testifie: I cannot precisely say, whether the bishops of Rome so call him and iudge him therefore. Or else for that hee was somewhat too bold in speaking and telling them but the truth, and reprouing the ecclesiasticall order of their great abuses. Or els, whether for that he would haue had them gone somewhat more nere the conditions and liues of the ancient fathers of the primitiue church and disciples of Christ. Or whether for that he defended and stood with them for the prerogatiue and dignities belonging to the empire, or not. Or else whether they stood in feare and awe of the great power he was of in Italie (which thing indeed Gregorie the ninth in a certaine epistle of his confesseth:) but of these things let them iudge and discerne, that shall read the monuments and histories of Frederike. Truly (saith he) when I consider with my selfe that Christ (whose vicar the Romane bishops boast themselues to be) said vnto his disciples, that they should follow him, and also imitat his example, as of their maister and teacher; and commanded them furthermore, how they should not draw the sword, but put vp the same into the skabberd; and further gaue them in precept that they should not only forgiue iniuries seuen times, but seuentie times seuen times to those that offended them; and when I now compare the liues of the bishops of Rome, how neere they follow him whose vicar they say they be; and consider so many and great conspiracies, treasons, rebellions, disloialties, lyings in wait, and treacherous deuices, so many legats of the popes (being ecclesiasticall persons) which will needs be called the shepheards of Christs flocke, to be such warriors and captains of souldiers in all & parts of Italie, Campania, Apulia, Calabria (being the emperors dominions) in Picenum, Emilia, Flamminia, and Lombardie, to be sent out against him; and also when with my selfe I meditat the destruction of so many great and famous cities, the subuersion of such commonweales, the slaughter of so many men, and the effusion of so much christian bloud; and lastly when I behold so victorious, prosperous and fortunat emperors to be, and so many miserable, vnfortunat and banquished popes put to flight: I am perswaded with my selfe to thinke and beleeue, that the iudgements of God are secret and maruellous, and that to be true which Aeneas Syluius in his history of Austria writeth: that there is no great and maruellous slaughter, no notorious and spectall calamitie (that hath happened either to the publike weale, or els to the church of God) of the which the bishops of Rome haue not bin the authors. Nicolaus Machiauellus also saith, that all the ruinous calamities and miserable chances that the whole christian common weale and also Italie hath suffered, haue been brought in by the popes and bishops of Rome.

Many epistles of Fredericus there be, which he wrote vnto the bishops of Rome, to the cardinals, and to diuers other christian princes, al which I haue read; and in them is to be seene nothing contrarie vnto christian doctrine, nothing wicked and vngodly, nothing iniurious to the church of God, nothing contumelious or arrogantly written of Frederike. But indeede I deny not the same to be fraught and full of pitifull complaints and lamentations, touching the auaricious ambition of the ecclesiasticall persons, and pertinacie of the bishops of Rome, and that he would receiue and take no satisfaction nor yet excuse in the defence of the right and priuiledge of the empire, which he maintained: also of their manifold and infinit conspiracies which they practised both secretly and openly against him: and of the often admonitions which he gaue to the whole multitude and order ecclesiasticall, to attend vpon and discharge their functions and charges. And who that further is desirous to know & vnderstand the truth, and coueteth to search out the renowned vertues of magnificent princes, let them reade the epistle of Frederike dated to all christian princes, which thus beginneth: Collegerunt principes, pontifices & Pharisæi concilium: and another, wherein he perswadeth the colledge of cardinals to take vp the dissension betweene the emperor and the pope, which beginneth: In exordio nascentis mundi: and also another which thus beginneth: Infallibilis veritatis testem: besides yet another, Adreges & principes orbis christiani: with diuers others more, wherein may well be seene the princely vertues of this so worthie a peere: all which epistles collected together in the Latine tongue, the learned sort I wish to read, whereout they may picke no little benefit and commoditie to themselues. In his epistle last recited these are his words: Non existimetis id me à vobis ideò contendere, ac si ex sententia pontificia priuationis maiestas nostra sit persulsa. Cùm enim nobis sit rectæ voluntatis conscientia, cùmq; Deum nobiscum habeamus, eundem testem inuocamus id nos spectasse, cùm totum ordinem ecclesiasticũ tum præsertim primores, neruis potentiæ dominationísque eorum succisis extirpatisq; tyrannidis radicibus, ad primitiuæ ecclesiæ conditionem & statum reuocaremus. That is: Thinke ye not that wee so earnestly desire or craue this peace at your hands, as though our maiestie were terrified with the popes sentence of depriuation: when as God (vpon whom we trust and inuocat) is our witnesse, and iudge of our conscience, that when we went about to reforme the ecclesiasticall state, but especially the ringleaders of the same, and should restraine their power, and extirpat their great tyrannie, and reduce the same to the state and condition of the primitiue church, we looked for no lesse at their hands. For these causes peraduenture, those which had the gouernement of the ecclesiastical dignity, decreed and pronounced Frederike to be an enemie to the church: which (as I haue said) I leaue others to iudge thereof. Hitherto Pandolphus Colonucius.

Deserued commendation vpon the epistles of Frederike.

Frederike purposed with the hazzard of the imperiall state to reforme the church of Rome.

Frederike.

The popes church compared with Christ his church, are as like as black and white.

And doubtlesse examples to the contrary doe appeare, that Frederike was no enemie to the church of Rome, for that he both gaue large and great gifts thereunto, and also franchised the same with great priuileges and immunities, which things by his owne constitutions, statutes and customs may bee perceiued and vnderstood. But rather contrariwise, that the bishops of Rome most filthilie recompenced the same his great liberalitie and princelie beneuolence againe, which hee gaue and bestowed vpon the same, as partly in the discourse of this history you haue heard: who notwithstanding they so molested and tired him with such and so many iniuries as you haue seene, he neuertheless forgiuing and pardoning al the same, for the great zeale he had to the common christian wealth (whereof he more forced, then of any other thing) sought by all meanes he might for to haue peace, although it were to his owne great hinderance. Therfore seeing he was of necessitie by the bishops of Rome prouoked to that war, if he did them any skath in reuenge of his imperiall dignitie, let them thanke their owne selues, which might otherwise haue remedied the same. Notwithstanding vpon this occasion diuers (both Italian and German writers, which at that time sought for fat benefices, and euer since euen vnto these our daies haue done the like, by flatterie rather to obtaine that which they hunted for, then to beare true and faithfull testimonie of things as they were indeed) toke great occasion to write and slander this good emperour. But let vs passe ouer these parasits, and returne to those, which although they themselues were of that calling, I meane of the ecclesiasticall order: yet notwithstanding, for that they rather preferred the studie of veritie, and to reuerence the truth before popish

Frederike sheweth himself no enemie but a friend to the church of Rome.

Selfe doe, selfe haue, the prouerbe is.

Hope of gaine alureth many to flatter and to write vntruths.

Digitized by Google

popish authoritie, and flattering seruitude: greatly extolled and commended this good emperor Frederike. So did Nicolaus Culanus a cardinall in his writing affirme this emperor to be an Alter Carolus Magnus, both for his wisdome and also diligent regard to the commonweale. So also writeth Aegidius Biturigum the bishop, in his bookes of the institution and bringing vp of a prince, which he wrote to the French king, exhorting him and all others, to take a paterne of this most worthie and excellent prince: in commendation of whose worthie praise and vertue these verses are written on his tombe.

Si probitas, sensus, virtutum gratia, census,
Nobilitas orti possent resistere morti:
Non foret extinctus, Fredericus qui iacet intus.

Wherefore, insomuch as it appeareth by the approued writers, of whom I haue made mention; who and what maner of prince Frederike this emperor was, and for that he diligently laboured as well in the preseruation of the christian commonweale, as in the conseruation of the imperiall dignitie, procured to himselfe the great hatred and displeasure of the Romane bishops (who haue bin to all ỹ good emperors for the most part bitter foes and enemies) and with what wicked slanders and other iniuries both by them and by their ministers they continually molested him withall: this lesson ought to be ours, that hauing the same in our memorie, we imitat and follow his vertues, hating and detesting the wicked and flagitious doings of those holy fathers that will so be called, and bishops of Rome; desiring God that he will so guide the hearts of all kings and princes, that they may by his grace aduance and set forth his glorie, and reforme the corrupt and vicious manner and order of the church to all sinceritie and puritie both of life and doctrine.

These verses which héere insue were sent and written betweene the emperor and pope Innocentius the fourth, which for that to the learned they are both commodious and profitable, at the end of this historie I thought good to place.

Fredericus imper. Innocent. 4. Papæ.

Fata monent stellaque docent, auiúmque volatus,
Totius subitò malleus orbis ero:
Roma diu titubans longis erroribus acta,
Corruet, & mundi desinet esse caput.

Innocent. papa Frederico imper.

Fata silent, stellaque tacent, nil prædicat ales,
Solius est proprium nosse futura Dei:
Niteris incassum nauem submergere Petri:
Fluctuat; at nunquam mergitur illa ratis.
Fama refert, scriptura docet, peccata loquuntur,
Quòd tibi vita brevis, pœna perennis erit:
Quod diuina manus potuit, sensit Iulianus,
Tu succedis ei, te tenet ira Dei.
Fre. fremit in mundo, de deprimit alta profundo;
Ri. mala rimatur, cuſ. cuspide cuncta minatur.

Fredericus Innocentio.

Fata monent stellaque docent auiúmque volatus,
Lapsurum te mox ad stygis antra nigræ:
Cymba Petri non est, sed Christi, qua natat vndis:
Fluctuat, at nusquam mergitur illa ratis.
Fama refert, tua scripta docent, peccata nefanda
Interitum ostendunt, exitiúmque tuum.
Strangulat Adrianum musca, annon ira tonantis?
Cogitat & de te sumere supplicium.
Carcere suspendit sese Benedictus, & alter
In stupro captus, saucius ense perit.
Syluestrum extinguit satan sceleratior ipse:
Ergo tuis factis præmia digna feres.
Innocuum te voce notas, cùm sis nociturus
Orbi terrarum christianóque gregi.

Fredericus Innocentio de integro.

Esses si membrum, non te caput orbis & vrbis
Iactares, cùm sis orbis & vrbis onus:
Nunc membrum non es, sed putre cadauer & vlcus,
Ense recidendum ridiculúmque caput.
A Daniele βδελυγμα, nefásque caputque malorum
Diceris, à Paulo filius exitij.
Nos solum Christum nostrum caput esse: malorum
Totius orbis te caput esse facis.
Et caput est vnum, quod Paulus dicit vbique;
Tu vecors balatro, dic mihi quale caput?
Corporis ergo caput monstrosi monstra parisque,
Monstra paris monachos, scorta nefanda foues.
Est tua religio stuprum, ira, superbia, cædes,
Error, delicia, fulmina, turpe lucrum.
Ex his ergò liquet Christum te spernere: Christo
Hostem esse inuisum, dedecorique Deo.
Rex tandem veniet cœlo delapsus ab alto,
Tunc non defendent te, sacra, missa, cruces,
Non in sublimi surgentes vertice cristæ,
Non diploma potens, non tua sacra cohors.

Nec diadema triplex, nec sedes sanguine parta,
Nullus honos soliỹ, purpura nulla tui:
Triginta argenteis Christum vendebat Iudas,
Tu Christi vendis corpora plura tui.
Corpora tu vendis Christi paruo ære, polúmque,
Cœlestes genios, sidera, iura, deos.

Certaine preachers in Suevia.

As yee haue heard of the iniquitie and raging pride of the popish church against their lawfull emperour: now shall yee heare (Christ willing) how God begineth to resist and withstand the corruption of that whorish church, by stirring vp certaine faithfull teachers in sundrie countries: as in the countrie of Suevia about the time of this emperor, Anno 1240. or neere vpon the same, where were many preachers, mentioned in the chronicle of Vrspergensis, and also in Crantzius, lib. 8. cap. 16. & 18. which preached frèelie against the pope. These preachers (as Crantzius saith) ringing the bels, and calling the barons in Hallis of Suevia, there preached that the pope was an heretike, and that his bishops and prelats were simoniaks and heretikes; and that the inferior priests and prelats had no authoritie to bind and lose, but were all seducers. Item, that no pope, bishop or priest could restraine men from their dutie of serving and worshipping of God, and therefore such cities or countries as were then vnder the popes curse, might notwithstanding lawfully resort to the receiuing of sacraments as well as before. Item, that friers, Dominike and Franciscan, did subuert the church with their preaching. And that the indulgence of the pope and his popelings was of no regard; so that remission which they did preach vnto them, they preached it not from the pope, but as from the Lord. And thus much I thought heere to recite, whereby it may appeare how the resisting of the popes vsurped power and corrupt doctrine is no new thing in these daies in the church of Christ, &c.

Ex chro. Abbat. Vrsperg. Crantz. lib. 8. cap. 10.

Resistance against the pope no new thing in Christs church.

Arnoldus de noua villa condemned of heresie.

And not long after these aforesaid, rose vp Arnoldus De noua villa, a Spaniard, a man famouslie learned and a great writer, Anno 1250. whom the pope with his spiritualtie condemned among heretikes for holding and writing against the corrupt errors of the popish church. His teaching was, that Satan had seduced the world from the truth of Christ Iesus. Item, that the faith (which then christian men were commonlie taught) was such a faith as the diuels had; meaning belike (as we now affirme) that the papists doe teach onlie the historicall faith, which is the faith Historiæ, non fiduciæ. Item, that christian people (meaning belike, for the most part) are led by the pope vnto hell. Item, that al cloisterers are void of charity and damned: and that they all do falsifie the doctrine of Christ. Item, that the diuines doe euill in mixing philosophie with diuinitie. Item, that masses are not to be celebrated; and that they ought not to sacrifice for the dead. Certaine other opinions there be, which the slanderous sects of monks and friers doe attribute vnto him; but (as they are wont in all other to do) rather vpon enuious taking, then of any iust cause giuen.

Vide librum de testibus veritatis.

Iohannes Semeca the glosse-writer of the popes decrees excommunicated.

And as this Arnoldus was condemned, so also the same time Johannes Semeca, the glosse-writer of the popes decrées, and prouost of Halberstat was excommunicated and depriued of his prouostship, for resisting pope Clement the fourth, gathering certaine exactions in Germanie; and therefore he appealed from the pope to a generall councell, and had many great fauorers on his side, till at last both the pope and he died.

Gulielmus de S. Amore.

Consequently in this order and number followeth the worthie and valiant champion of Christ and aduersary of antichrist Gulielmus de S. Amore, a maister of Paris, and chiefe ruler then of that Vniuersitie. This Gulielmus in his time had no small adoe writing against the friers, and their hypocrisie, but especiallie against the begging friers, both condemning their whole order, and also accusing them; as those that did disturbe and trouble all the churches of Christ by their preaching in churches against the will of the ordinaries and pastors, by their hearing of confessions, and executing the charges of curats and pastors in their churches. All the testimonies of scripture that make against antichrist, he applieth them against the clergie of prelats, and the popes spiritualtie. The same Gulielmus is thought to be the author of the booke, which is attributed to the schole of Paris, and intituled, De periculis ecclesiæ: where he proueth by nine and thirtie arguments, that friers be false apostles.

The plaie of the gospell expounded, Goe and sell all and come follow me.

Moreouer, he doth well expound this saying of Christ (If thou wilt be perfect, goe and sell away all thou hast, and come follow me) declaring there pouerty to be inioyned vs of Christ, Non actualem, sed habitualem; not in such sort as standeth in outward action, when no need requireth; but in inward affection of heart when need shall require. As though the meaning and precept of our Lord were not that we should cast away actuallie all that we haue: but that when the confession of the name of God and the glorie of Christ shall so require, that then we be readie to leaue and relinquish what things so euer for the sake of him, &c. As when he requireth in vs after the like phrase, hatred of father and mother, and of our owne liues: he biddeth vs not to dishonor father or mother, much lesse to hate them: but that then, when case shall require, wee set all things behind the loue of Christ. Many other worthie workes hee compiled, wherein albeit he uttered nothing but what was truth, yet notwithstanding he was by antichrist and his rabble condemned for an heretike, exiled, and his books burnt; whose heretical arguments, as they called them, that thou maist better iudge thereof, heere vnder I thought good to place.

Digitized by Google

Gulielm. de S. Amore condemned of the pope for an heretike.

Against false prophets with signes to know them by, in these his words do follow. For because these seducers (saith he) name themselues to be apostles, and that they are sent of God to preach, to absolue and dispense with the soules of men, by means of their ministerie, read the saying of the Apostle in his second epistle to the Corinthians, cha. 11. For such apostles are subtill and craftie workemen, disguising themselues to bee like the apostles of Christ. Therefore, we meane to shew some certaine infallible tokens and probable, by the which false apostles may be discerned from the true preachers & apostles of Christ.

The first signe and token to know a false frier and prophet by.

The first signe or marke is, that such as be true preachers do not enter into simple womens houses laden with sinne, and take them as it were captiue, as many of the false preachers do; as in the second epistle of S. Paul to Timothie the third chapter is manifest, saying: Of those sorts are they, which enter into womens houses, &c. Therfore those preachers which come into womens houses, to the intent they may take them captiue, be not true preachers, but false apostles.

True preachers doe not deceiue men with painted flattering words.

The second signe and token is, that those that be true preachers doe not deceiue simple men with painted and flattering words, whereby they prefer their owne trash and traditions, as all false prophets doe, as in the last chapter to the Romans appeareth, saying: By their pleasant and sugred talk, and by their blessing and crossing they deceiue and beguile the hearts of innocent men and women. Glos. With gay glorious words they extoll and set forth their traditions, wherby they deceiue simple men. Very greatly do they deceiue the soules of simple men, which cause them to enter into their sect, which they terme religion. And they which before led a naughtie life, by reason of their ignorance or simplicitie; after their entrance, become subtill and false deceiuing hypocrits, entring together with the rest into poore mens houses: yea and oftentimes become worse then the others. Wherupon Matth. 22. Wo be vnto you Scribes and Pharisies, hypocrits which goe about, &c. Therefore they which doe this, are no true messengers but false apostles.

The third signe is, that true apostles take in good part when they be reproued.

The third signe is, that the true apostles if they be reproued, suffer the same patiently, 2. Cor. 12. saying: The tokens of my apostleship are accomplished among you, in all patience and sufferance, meaning that patience, which pertaineth to the maners of the preachers. Therfore they which suffer not correction or punishment, be no true apostles, but rather shew themselues to be no christians at all: 1. Cor. 12. No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghost. Glos. It is meet that christians should be humbled, to the intent that they may suffer themselues to be reproued, and not to be holden vp with yea and nay. And also such men do shew themselues to bee carnal, and not spirituall at all, although they faine themselues to be spirituall: Gal. 3. Therefore am I become an enemie vnto you. Notwithstanding the glosse saith: No carnall man will be reproued although he erre. Wherfore, those preachers which suffer not correction, seeme not to be true apostles, but false prophets.

The fourth signe, is that true preachers commend not themselues.

The fourth signe is, that true apostles commend not themselues: 2. Cor. 4. For we dare not ioyne our selues, nor yet compare our selues vnto others which commend and boast many of their acts, when God alloweth none of them at all. Also true preachers although they be indeed praiseworthie for their good deserts, in the consciences of men are they praiseworthie, and not to the outward shew alone: 2. Cor. 3. We commend our selues (saith the apostle) to the consciences of all men. Then they doe not commend themselues in comparison of others. Wherefore the glosse saith vpon the same place: Those that deserue no commendation but in comparison of others, doe challenge to themselues other mens deserts and praise. Wherefore in the second epistle of S. Peter the last chapter it is said: Euen as our welbeloued brother Paul, according to the wisedome that God hath giuen vnto him, hath written vnto you. Glossa: The chiefest of the apostles hath heere forgotten his papall authoritie, and also his keies that were deliuered vnto him: for he is astonied as it were at the great wisdome giuen vnto his brother Paul. For indeed it is the maner of the elect children of God, to be more in loue with the vertues of other men, then with their owne. Wherefore in the second chapter to the Philippians it is written: Let those that are superiors esteeme of themselues in all humilitie. They therefore that doe the contrary, saying that their state or doings be better then other mens, although they bee preachers, yet are they no true apostles indeed, but false prophets.

The fifth signe is, that true preachers need no letters commendatorie.

The fift signe is, that true apostles need no letters of commendation: nor yet desire to haue themselues praised of men: as in the 2. Cor. 3. the apostle saith, We need not the letters of commendation of any man; that is to say, of false prophets.

The sixth signe is, that true apostles preach not vnlesse they be sent.

The sixt signe is, that true apostles preach not vnlesse they be sent, as in the tenth chapter to the Romans: How shall they preach vnlesse they be sent? Glossa: There be no true apostles but those that bee sent: for they haue no need of signes which are true witnesse bearers, but those that be not sent and doe preach are false prophets.

The seuenth signe is, when those false prophets preach that were neuer sent.

The seuenth signe is, forsomuch as false prophets haue their authoritie in their owne names: wherefore in the second epistle of S. Paul to the Corinthians it is written; For we dare not boast of our selues or make comparison: Glossa: That is to say, with those that be false prophets, not taking their authoritie from God, but vsurping the same, desirous to beare rule, claiming in their owne name their authoritie. And therfore although peraduenture by presumption they say that they are sent of God, as all heretikes will say: yet notwithstanding, vnlesse they shall prooue their sending either by spirituall prophecie, as Iohn Baptist did, saying: I am the voice of a crier in the desert; as out of the prophet Esay in the first chapter of S. Johns gospel is alleaged; or else by miracles, as Moses did, which turned his rod into a serpent, and againe, from a serpent to a rod, as in the seuenth chapter of Exodus: they ought for to be excommunicated, till such time they cease from preaching. Yet notwithstanding, a miracle ought not to be a sufficient testimonie of their sending, for so much as they be done oftentimes and that of euill and wicked men: 1. q. 1. we may perceiue towards the end. But miracles ought to be suspected, for so much as our sauior saith in the three and twentith of Matthew, Then shall false prophets arise, &c. Therefore they which doe challenge authority in their own name, for so much as they haue not their authoritie from God, they are not true apostles but false preachers.

The eight signe is, that false prophets pretend great holines in superstition.

The eight signe is, that false prophets pretending great wisdome and holines to be in superstition, haue named their owne traditions to be religion, the which are rather to bee counted sacriledge or church robberie, and do vsurpe vnto themselues for due deserts of other men by boasting and bragging among strange and vnknown people. Wherefore the apostle speaking of false prophets in the second chapter to the Colossians, saith: According to the precepts of men, which hauing a face of wisedome consist in superstition, interlaced with humilitie. Glossa: That is to say, mingled with fained religion, that it might bee called religion, when in very deed it is nothing else but sacriledge, because it is contrary to all authoritie: that is, contrary to God himselfe, that any man should desire to haue gouernment of a multitude without publike commandement, as in Deuteronomium the three and twentith chapter; Thou hast entred into thy neighbors vineyard. Glossa: That is to say, Into the church of another bishop. May a man warne and admonish others, or els correct that congregation which is not lawfull for him to gouerne, nor yet to take so great a charge on him: No. And that it is not lawfull to enter into another bishops diocesse, it is apparant, because it is not lawfull for the archbishop so to doe. To this effect appertaineth that which is read, 6. q. 3. And also it is written 9. q. 2. throughout. Therefore those preachers which against God and his diuine scriptures do call their owne traditions religion, are not apostles, but false prophets.

The ninth signe is, that when they neither preach nor minister, yet liue vpon other mens labors.

The ninth signe is, by the authoritie which they haue: forsomuch as they be no preachers of the gospell or ministers of the sacraments, yet they will liue by the gospell, and not by the labor of their owne hands, against the text in the 2. Thes. 3. Neither haue we eaten any mans bread for nought, or of free cost. Glossa: Then those false prophets ought much more to liue by their labour, which haue not that authoritie which we ought to haue: that is to say, to liue by the gospell. And S. Augustine speaketh of this more expresly in his booke De opere monachorum, by these words: Those our brethren do claime to themselues (verie rashly as mee thinketh) that they haue any such authoritie, to liue by the gospell. If they be preachers of the gospell, I grant that indeed they haue such authoritie; if they be ministers of the altar, if they bee disposers of the sacraments, they cannot well but take to themselues this authoritie, as also manifestly to challenge the same; if at the least they haue not wherewithall to sustaine this present life, without labor of their hands. As though he would haue said; If they be not such maner of men, then haue they no authoritie to liue by the gospell. Therefore those preachers which haue no authoritie to liue by the gospell, or else minister the sacraments, because they haue no congregation whereby to take charge of soules; yet for all that will needs liue vpon the gospell: they be no true apostles, but false prophets.

The tenth signe is, that false prophets take that to them which perteineth to the word of God.

The tenth signe is, that false teachers reioyce more to bee commended themselues, then the word of God to haue the commendation and praise. But they that are true preachers and apostles, are farre otherwise minded, as to the Thes. 2. Not seeking the praise of men, &c. And heerein he toucheth those false prophets, which desire rather to bee commended themselues, then that the word of God which they preach should haue the commendation: but he is an apostle which not seeking the glorie of this present world, but for the glorie to come, doth abase himselfe, to the intent that the preaching and word of God might be commended and exalted. They therefore which desire to haue praise and to be commended of others, rather then that the word of God should haue the praise, bee no true apostles, but false prophets.

The eleuenth signe is, that false prophets doe preach for gaine, and not for Gods cause.

The eleuenth signe is, that true apostles doe preach only for Gods cause, and for the health of soules, and for no temporall gaine, as in the 2. Cor. 4. saying: We preach not our selues, &c. Glossa: Our preaching tendeth not to our glorie and gaine, gaine, but only to the glory of Christ. But the preaching of Christ by those that are false prophets, tendeth to the contrary. Whereupon in the Philip. 1. is said: Whether it be vpon occasion giuen, or else for the verities sake, let Christ be preached, &c. Glossa: False prophets do preach the gospell vpon some occasion, as either by seeking some commoditie at the hands of men, or else because of getting goods, honor, or praise among men. Which notwithstanding that they be readie and willing as it should seeme to beare and sustaine iniuries: yet they seeke not so much the health of him to whom they preach, as in verie deed they do their owne commoditie and gaine. Whereupon, 2. Corinth. 12. Because I seeke not the things that be yours, that is to say, not your treasure, as gold and siluer, but only you your selues. Glossa: For otherwise it could by no meanes be gathered that they should vnderstand him to speake or meane of their substance, because he more esteemeth them then their money, to the intent that they might vnderstand his great good will towards them. Therefore these euil and naughtie preachers which preach for worldly gaine or honor, or else for the praise and commendation of men, be no true apostles but false prophets. But it may be asked, how shall men vnderstand when these good fellowes preach for their owne vaine glorie sake? It may be answered thus, when they preach before they be called, as in the 2. Cor. 11. Whosoeuer boasteth, let him boast and reioyce in the Lord. Glossa: Which thing to do cannot he by any meanes that hath not his authoritie from God. For if any such prophet preach, he seeketh his owne glorie, and that may easily be perceiued. Because he is not called of God, he hath no such authoritie of him, that is to say, of his church or congregation, as to the Heb. 7. No man taketh to himselfe any dignitie, but he that is called of God as Aaron was. Glossa: He is called of God, that is lawfully chosen of the congregation.

Digitized by Google

The twelfth signe is, that false prophets do counterfeit to loue where they hate.

The twelfth signe or token of a false prophet, is, because such prophets do counterfeit themselues to haue greater care and loue to mens soules, then those that be their verie gouernours and pastors haue, although they haue no charge at all of them, against whom the glosse speaketh, and the 1. Thes. 2. We are become meeke and louing towards you, euen as the nurse which giueth her child sucke. Glossa: A woman nurseth other mens children for wages, and not for loue alone; but she giueth her owne sucke of verie loue without respect of money. Therefore those preachers which faine themselues to haue a greater loue and affection to the soules of men, then they that haue the charge ouer them, seeme not to be true apostles. The apostles study not for eloquence, nor for the curious placing of their words, but false prophets do them both, as in the 2. Cor. 11. If the simple and vneloquent man, &c. Glossa: The apostles were not eloquent, but false prophets are full of curious eloquence. Also vpon the same another glosse: The Corinthians were led away from the gospell by ouer nice eloquence: 2. Cor. 7. Let vs shew our selues before all men as the ministers of God. Glossa: The ministers of God do not flatter as false prophets do. And for this occasion those that be true apostles haue not their abiding in princes courts and noble mens houses knowing this saying of Christ in S. Matthewes gospell; Behold, those that are clothed with silkes, dwell in kings courts. And therefore true apostles are not conuersant in princes courts and noble mens houses. Glossa: Hard and strict life with the preaching of the gospell loueth not to come neere princes palaces and noble mens houses. Oftentimes it commeth to passe that courtiers are found great flatterers, therefore those preachers that haue their abode in princes courts, or that in any other place do vse to flatter, are no true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirteenth signe is, that false prophets do circumuent men to haue their goods, and care for nothing else.

The thirteenth signe is, that true apostles or messengers do not circumuent or subtilly go about to deceiue men, that they should giue vnto them their goods, either in their life time or else at the time of their death, as in the 2. Cor. 7. We haue falsly deceiued no man. Glossa: By the subtill and deceitful getting away of your substance as false prophets do, which get away from you those things that be yours vnder pretence of great friendship. Also Matthew 22. Wo be vnto you Scribes and Pharisies, you hypocrites, which spoile widowes houses by your long prayers; which meane nothing else by your superstition, but that you may spoile and rob the people, as Luke 20; Which deuour widowes houses by dissembling of your long prayer. Glossa: The which make ouer long prayers, to the intent they may seeme more deuout, and that they may get both money and great commendation of all such as be sicke and troubled with the burthen of their sinnes, whose prayers be turned into sinne, which neither are profitable for themselues nor anie other, but rather shall haue for making those prayers greater damnation, for so much as by the same they deceiue others: for by this that they receiue and take both gold and siluer, it appeareth that they preach not for soules health sake, but only for filthie lucre & gaine sake: Mat. 10. Be ye possessors neither of gold nor siluer. Glossa: If they then haue these things, they cannot seeme or be thought to preach for the health of the soule, but for lucres sake. And so saith Hierome vpon the prophet Malachie; Because some prophets tooke monie, their prophecie became diuination, ý is to say, their prophecie appeared not to be prophecie, but diuination, or inchantment: that is, that such prophecie procedeth not from God but from the diuel. And this appeareth in 1. q. 1. hauing this beginning, Nunquam diuinatio, &c. Therefore those preachers which circumuent & beguile men, to the intent ý they should giue them their goods, either in their life time, or after their death, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The fourteenth signe is, that false prophets cannot abide to haue the truth preached.

The fourteenth signe is, that false prophets when any veritie is preached, which for the most part they are not acquainted withall, or that toucheth them: then begin they to chase and barke against the same. Whereupon the apostle in the third chapter to the Philippians, saith: Behold the dogs. Glossa: Vnderstand you that they are not dogs by nature, but by their vsage and conditions, barking against the truth, which they were neuer acquainted with. And so he compareth them right well to dogs, because dogs follow rather custome then reason: so false apostles do keepe the custome of the law, and do bite and barke against the truth, as though they were without the gift of reason. And also in the second epistle to Timothie, the fourth chapter, saying; They get them instructors according to their owne desires. Glossa: Which may teach them what things they themselues are willing to heare, because the truth seemeth nothing pleasant vnto them. Therefore those preachers which barke against the late reuealed truth, which toucheth them very neere, and therefore cause the same to be hidden and kept vnder, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The fifteenth signe is, that false prophets do inforce them to heare that are not willing to heare.

The fifteenth signe is, that the true apostles do not inforce any to receiue or heare them which be vnwilling thereunto, but send them alway rather, lest they should seeme to seek after some earthly and transitorie thing: Matth. 10. Whosoeuer will not receiue you, get you out of that citie, and shake the dust from off your feet, &c. Glossa: That you may thereby shew that the desire of earthly things hath no power in you. Therefore those preachers which striue and wrestle (as it were) to the intent they would be receiued and heard, are no true apostles, for so much as the apostle saith, 1. Corinth. 11. If any man appeare among you to be ouer contentious or full of strife, such custome haue we none, nor yet the congregation of Christ.

The fifteenth signe is, that false prophets do cause princes to hate and punish them that will not heare them.

The sixteenth signe is, that the apostles did not procure the indignation of those princes, with whom they were esteemed and regarded, against such persons as would not receiue them and heare them, according as we reade in the life of Simon and Jude the apostles. The chiefe ruler being very angrie, commanded a very great fire to be made that the bishops might be cast into the same, and all other which went about to defame the doctrine of the apostles of Christ. But the apostles fell downe before the emperor, saying; We beseech you sir let not vs be the authors or causers of this destruction or calamity; nor that we which are sent to be the preseruation of men, and to reuiue those that are dead through sinne, may be killers of those that be aliue. Therefore those preachers which seeke to stir vp the displeasure of princes against them (whose fauours now they enioy) that will not receiue and heare them, or rather whom they themselues hate, are no true apostles, but false prophets.

The seuentéenth signe is, that false prophets do not know neither what God hath done, nor yet will do, as true prophets do.

The seuentéenth signe is, that the apostles of Christ haue not only the knowledge of those things which God hath already done, but also of those things which he will hereafter do, as in the Apocalypse 3. chapter: The beasts were full of eyes both behind and before. Glossa: Obtaining the knowledge of those things which God had done, as also what he would do hereafter in the end of the world. Therefore those that say they know not the perils of the church in the latter time which are prophesied before, or that they care not for them, or else if they know them not, they haue not eyes behind nor before, and no true apostles, therefore what time as they call themselues apostles, they are false prophets.

The eighteenth signe is, that false prophets do preach for money, and are not to be discerned from wolues.

The eighteenth signe is, that true apostles do not desire the riches and goods of them to whom they preach, whereby they are discerned from wolues, that is to say, from false prophets: Acts 20. I haue desired no mans gold nor siluer. Glossa: By this are wolues discerned, for they desire such things. And againe in the same place; For those things which I had need of, and to those which were with me, these hands haue ministred. Glossa: This example also of labouring is a spectacle for bishops whereby they are discerned from wolues. For such as aske or beg of those to whom they preach, or set any other to aske or beg in their names, do seeme to commit simonie like Gehezi, of whom it is read in the 3. booke of Kings the fift chapter, that he craued certaine apparell of Naaman the Syrian, to whom his master Elizeus had restored the benefit of health, notwithstanding he had gotten those garments vnwitting to his master. Whereupon Gregorie Nazianzen saith, 1. q. 1. Qui isti debetur. But some man perhaps will say, Cannot the preacher aske money or money worth of those to whom he preacheth? Or at the least, may not he beg? To this may be answered; If the preacher by authority preach and feed his flocke as a true pastor with the food of Gods word, hee may take money or money worth; but then it is not begging or crauing, but it is by authoritie, as the 2. to Timothie 2. chapter. It is meet that the husbandman that tilleth the ground, should first and afore others receiue the commoditie of his increase. Glossa: He putteth the vertuous preacher out of doubt, not preaching for that intent to make merchandize of the gospell; and giueth him to vnderstand, that it is lawfull for him to take of them whom he feedeth as his flocke, what things soeuer he hath need of, and doth it not

If the preacher do his dutie in preaching, he may take lawfully for his necessarie things.

Digitized by Google

in begging or craning, but by good authority. It is manifest that it cannot in any place of the holy Scripture be found, that the preacher ought to beg. But begging is forbidden of all the apostles of Christ, and is abhorred of Salomon, and S. Augustine, and reproued by diuers other holy men. Therfore it is manifest that the true apostles do not desire the temporall goods of them to whom they preach, neither do they beg or craue the same. They therefore that require any thing of them to whom they preach, or else that any other man asketh for them, or in their names, do not seeme to be true apostles, but false preachers.

The nineteenth signe is, that true apostles are patient in tribulation, neither do they render euill for good; Matth. 10. Behold I send you as sheepe among wolues. Glossa: They that occupie the place of preaching, ought not to procure any euill toward their brethren, as the example of Christ teacheth, 1. Pet. 2. saying; Who when he was reuiled, reuiled not againe, but did submit himselfe to him that iudged him vniustly. They therefore that suffer not iniurie, but rather do wrong themselues, are not true apostles, but false apostles.

The nineteenth signe is, that true apostles are patient in tribulation, neither do they render euill for good, as false do.

The twentith signe is, that true apostles at their first comming are euill intertained, as the Lord saith in the 24. of Mat. Ye shall be hated of all men for my names sake; but yet at the length such get the victorie, according to that saying of the first of S. John the 5. chapter; Euery thing that is of God ouercommeth the world. They therefore that in the beginning reioyce and are well intertained, but in the end are reiected, seeme not to be true apostles but false.

The twentith signe is, that true apostles at their first comming are euill intertained, as the Lord saith in the 24. of Mat. Ye shall be hated of all men for my names sake; but yet at the length such get the victorie, according to that saying of the first of S. John the 5. chapter; Euery thing that is of God ouercommeth the world. They therefore that in the beginning reioyce and are well intertained, but in the end are reiected, seeme not to be true apostles but false.

The twentie one signe is, that true preachers go not to preach vnto those which haue preachers appointed vnto them, because they haue not to reioice of a company belonging to another mans charge, as to the Romans the 15. chapter; I haue preached the gospell where Christ was not before preached, lest I should build vpon another mans foundation. And in the second epistle of S. Paul to the Corinthians, the 10. chapter, hee saith: We are no boasters, nor busie in other mens matters. Glossa: Where another man had laid the foundation. Likewise in the same chapter: Not hauing pleasure to boast of other mens labours, that is to say, of those which be committed to the gouernment of another man. Likewise Augustinus saith; Honor ought to seeke thee, and not thou honor. Also Chrysostome: Authoritie is in loue with such a man as refuseth her, and yet abhorreth her not. They therefore that procure and haue a desire to preach vnto the people committed to another mans charge, which is an office of honor, especially in councels, synods and great assemblies, also in kings and princes courts, and prelats palaces, are not true apostles, but false teachers.

The twentie one signe is, that true preachers build not vpon any other mans foundation.

Authoritie loueth them that refuse her, and yet abhorreth her not.

The twentie two signe is, that true apostles when they know themselues to do much good in the church and congregation of God; yet notwithstanding are not puffed vp with pride: Ezechiel 3. O sonne of man I haue made thy face as an adamant stone. The adamant stone when it draweth iron vnto it, is not thereby either lifted vp or altered. Likewise a true preacher when he draweth sinners vnto him by his preaching (whose hearts were as hard as iron) is neuer the more lifted vp or higher minded therefore. But as in Luke the 18. chapter, When ye haue done all that ye can, and as well as ye can, yet say that you are vnprofitable seruants: Psal. 115. Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy name be giuen the glorie. They therefore that do arrogantly boast themselues of the fruit and benefit that they haue done in the church of God, saying: We haue giuen light to the vniuersall church, which was blind before our time, and we haue put out the flame of sin in the church of God (when perhaps they haue more furthered hypocrisie then either truth or veritie) they are not true prophets but false, of whom it is spoken in the Psalmes, The mouth of them that speake proud things, &c.

The twentie two signe is, that true apostles when they know themselues to do much good in the church and congregation of God; yet notwithstanding are not puffed vp with pride: Ezechiel 3. O sonne of man I haue made thy face as an adamant stone. The adamant stone when it draweth iron vnto it, is not thereby either lifted vp or altered. Likewise a true preacher when he draweth sinners vnto him by his preaching (whose hearts were as hard as iron) is neuer the more lifted vp or higher minded therefore. But as in Luke the 18. chapter, When ye haue done all that ye can, and as well as ye can, yet say that you are vnprofitable seruants: Psal. 115. Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy name be giuen the glorie. They therefore that do arrogantly boast themselues of the fruit and benefit that they haue done in the church of God, saying: We haue giuen light to the vniuersall church, which was blind before our time, and we haue put out the flame of sin in the church of God (when perhaps they haue more furthered hypocrisie then either truth or veritie) they are not true prophets but false, of whom it is spoken in the Psalmes, The mouth of them that speake proud things, &c.

The twentie two signe is, that true prophets are not proud and vainglorious, as false prophets be.

The twentie third signe is, that false prophets be alwaies men pleasers.

The twentie third signe is, that false prophets be alwaies men pleasers. Glossa: Seeking to please, because we haue not the pleasing spirit. Therefore those preachers that seeke the fauour of the world, and do labour to this intent that they might please men, are not true apostles, but false.

The twentie fourth signe is, that true apostles when they haue meat and drinke they are contented, neither do they desire ouer daintie fare according to the saying of Mat. 10. chap. Eating and drinking those things that are set before them. Glossa: The gospell condemneth not altogether costly and delicat fare, yet so alloweth the same, that if we haue meat and drinke, we ought not to grudge, but to be therewith contented. Therefore those preachers, which although that neither they be sent, nor haue authoritie to preach, and yet are offended when they haue not fine & delicat fare, are not true apostles, but false preachers.

The twentie fourth signe is, that true prophets eat what is set before them, and giue God thankes, but that do not the false prophets.

The twentie fifth signe is, that true apostles do loue more the law of God then their owne estimation amongst their neighbours, according to that in the 7. chapter of the Prouerbs; Keepe my law as the apple of thine eye, and bind the same vpon thy fingers, and write the same in the table of thy heart. Whereupon in the 119. Psalme; The law of thy mouth is dearer vnto me then thousands of gold and siluer. Glossa: Charitie doth more loue the law of God, then the desire of gold and siluer a thousand fold. He therefore that seeth the gospell of Christ troden vnder foot, which is the eternall glad tidings, to be taken away by that cursed one, and doth neglect and contemne the same, or else peraduentate consenteth vnto the same, to the outward appearance of the world; and yet because he will keepe his temporall dignitie and estimation, refuseth not to stirre vp strife and contention about the same, and so to be euill spoken of, seemeth not to be an apostle of Christ, but rather a false prophet, if he be a preacher.

The twentie fifth signe is, that true apostles do loue more the law of God then their owne estimation amongst their neighbours, according to that in the 7. chapter of the Prouerbs; Keepe my law as the apple of thine eye, and bind the same vpon thy fingers, and write the same in the table of thy heart. Whereupon in the 119. Psalme; The law of thy mouth is dearer vnto me then thousands of gold and siluer. Glossa: Charitie doth more loue the law of God, then the desire of gold and siluer a thousand fold. He therefore that seeth the gospell of Christ troden vnder foot, which is the eternall glad tidings, to be taken away by that cursed one, and doth neglect and contemne the same, or else peraduentate consenteth vnto the same, to the outward appearance of the world; and yet because he will keepe his temporall dignitie and estimation, refuseth not to stirre vp strife and contention about the same, and so to be euill spoken of, seemeth not to be an apostle of Christ, but rather a false prophet, if he be a preacher.

The twentie sixth signe is, that true apostles seeke not after such fine lodgings and wealthie habitations, where they may haue all things at their commandements; but rather such honest resting places where they may haue necessarie things for themselues, with their good wils of whom they haue it. And they take nothing of such whom they see to be so readie and liberall in giuing, as to thinke the one doth him more pleasure in receiuing the gift, then the other doth in giuing him the same. According to that in the 10. of Matthew, saying: Into what citie or towne soeuer ye shall enter, inquire out those that be of good report in the same, & abide you with them so long as you tarie in the same citie or towne. Glossa: Your host with whom ye lodge, ought to be chosen by the good report of neighbours, lest your preaching be euill spoken of by reason of his infamie. Neither ought such men to run from house to house. But whom shall we call worthie of good report? Glossa: Him who knoweth better to do other men good, then to receiue a good turne of another. And this is he which giueth willingly for Christs cause, and not in respect of any commoditie. Also true apostles receiue nothing of such men as lie waltering in their sinnes, but rather of those that are washed and clensed from their sins, whereupon the 2. to the Cor. the 7. chapter; They haue giuen themselues first to the Lord. Glossa: Because they now amending their old errors and vicious manners haue vowed themselues vnto the Lord, and afterward gaue of that which they had to their brethren: for otherwise they ought not to haue taken any thing of them, because gifts do blind the eyes; but those that giue where there is no cause of reproofe in their doings, haue no iust cause to giue. Therefore those preachers that seeke how to come by daintie fare, & do receiue bribes and rewards of naughtie men that haue this world at will, to the intent that those preachers may couer and hide their faults, and get of others what they can by subtiltie, which giue indeed rather to remoue the shamelesse importunitie of the crauer, or else for auoiding of present shame, then for any loue they haue to God, are not true apostles, but false prophets, according to that in the 2. to the Cor. the 9. chapter; The Lord doth loue a willing giuer. Glossa: He that giueth for present shame, or else for that he may be free from the importunacie of him that asketh, doth lose his substance and merit: therefore he that hath respect to these things, doth not seeke the fruit and profit of the giuer, but the gift it selfe, as the apostle to the Philippians the 4. chapter, saith; Seeke not the gift, but the fruit or benefit of the giuer.

The twentie sixth signe is, that true apostles seeke not after such fine lodgings and wealthie habitations, where they may haue all things at their commandements; but rather such honest resting places where they may haue necessarie things for themselues, with their good wils of whom they haue it. And they take nothing of such whom they see to be so readie and liberall in giuing, as to thinke the one doth him more pleasure in receiuing the gift, then the other doth in giuing him the same. According to that in the 10. of Matthew, saying: Into what citie or towne soeuer ye shall enter, inquire out those that be of good report in the same, & abide you with them so long as you tarie in the same citie or towne. Glossa: Your host with whom ye lodge, ought to be chosen by the good report of neighbours, lest your preaching be euill spoken of by reason of his infamie. Neither ought such men to run from house to house. But whom shall we call worthie of good report? Glossa: Him who knoweth better to do other men good, then to receiue a good turne of another. And this is he which giueth willingly for Christs cause, and not in respect of any commoditie. Also true apostles receiue nothing of such men as lie waltering in their sinnes, but rather of those that are washed and clensed from their sins, whereupon the 2. to the Cor. the 7. chapter; They haue giuen themselues first to the Lord. Glossa: Because they now amending their old errors and vicious manners haue vowed themselues vnto the Lord, and afterward gaue of that which they had to their brethren: for otherwise they ought not to haue taken any thing of them, because gifts do blind the eyes; but those that giue where there is no cause of reproofe in their doings, haue no iust cause to giue. Therefore those preachers that seeke how to come by daintie fare, & do receiue bribes and rewards of naughtie men that haue this world at will, to the intent that those preachers may couer and hide their faults, and get of others what they can by subtiltie, which giue indeed rather to remoue the shamelesse importunitie of the crauer, or else for auoiding of present shame, then for any loue they haue to God, are not true apostles, but false prophets, according to that in the 2. to the Cor. the 9. chapter; The Lord doth loue a willing giuer. Glossa: He that giueth for present shame, or else for that he may be free from the importunacie of him that asketh, doth lose his substance and merit: therefore he that hath respect to these things, doth not seeke the fruit and profit of the giuer, but the gift it selfe, as the apostle to the Philippians the 4. chapter, saith; Seeke not the gift, but the fruit or benefit of the giuer.

The twentie sixth signe is, that false prophets are not contented with necessarie things, but look after superfluous.

The twentie seuenth signe is, that true apostles do not endeuour themselues to seeke and inioy the fruit of other mens labours that they may be fed thereby, because that the bellie is such mens god, according to that in the 2. to the Thessal. the 3. chap. We haue heard of some amongst you which walke inordinatly, not labouring at all, but liuing delicatlie or idlelie. Glossa: Of other mens labours, and deserue they to be fed? The discipline of the Lord cannot away with that doing: for the bellie is their god, which prouide to haue more then necessarie dishes of meat. Therefore those preachers which so do, are no true apostles, but false.

The twentie seuenth signe is, that true apostles do not endeuour themselues to seeke and inioy the fruit of other mens labours that they may be fed thereby, because that the bellie is such mens god, according to that in the 2. to the Thessal. the 3. chap. We haue heard of some amongst you which walke inordinatly, not labouring at all, but liuing delicatlie or idlelie. Glossa: Of other mens labours, and deserue they to be fed? The discipline of the Lord cannot away with that doing: for the bellie is their god, which prouide to haue more then necessarie dishes of meat. Therefore those preachers which so do, are no true apostles, but false.

The twentie seuenth signe is, that those be false prophets, whose bellie is their god.

The twentie eight signe is, that true apostles do not reioyce only of the miracles or other excellent workes, which the Lord doth by them; but they reioyce rather of the saluation which they looke for from the Lord, then that by doing those miracles they desire any honor; according to that which is written in Luke the 10. saying: Reioyce ye not for that the spirits be subiect vnto you, but because your names are regiſtred in heauen. They therefore that boast of their owne miracles, or of any that belong vnto them, for this cause that they are saued by the doing of them, as many do say, seeme not to be true apostles, but false.

The twentie eight signe is, that true apostles do not reioyce only of the miracles or other excellent workes, which the Lord doth by them; but they reioyce rather of the saluation which they looke for from the Lord, then that by doing those miracles they desire any honor; according to that which is written in Luke the 10. saying: Reioyce ye not for that the spirits be subiect vnto you, but because your names are regiſtred in heauen. They therefore that boast of their owne miracles, or of any that belong vnto them, for this cause that they are saued by the doing of them, as many do say, seeme not to be true apostles, but false.

The twentie eight signe is, that true prophets reioyce not in miracles, as false prophets do.

The twentie ninth signe is, that the true apostles do neuer seeke their owne glorie in this life, but the glorie of Christ; as in John the 7, He that speaketh of himselfe, doth seeke his owne glorie, but he that seeketh the glorie of him which sent him (that is, of whom he is sent) is a true apostle. Therefore those which seeke the things that pertaine to the glorie of this world, of the which one is; to be assistant to those that beare rule and authoritie, according to that saying of Boetius De consolatione; Those that do desire to be extolled, either they raigne and beare rule themselues, or else do desire to be neere about them that haue such dominion. Another is, they desire to haue the fame and victorie of that which they haue nothing at all deserued before God. Whereupon is written that saying of the apostle in the Gal. 5. Let not vs become desirous of vain glorie. Glossa: To be desirous of vain glorie, is, to haue victorie without any merit or desert, and those, I say, that do such things seeme not to be true apostles, but false.

The twentie ninth signe is, that true prophets seeke not their owne glorie, as false prophets do.

The

The thirtith signe is, that true apostles care not for the solemnities of men, neither their salutations, nor feastings, nor any other benefit of theirs. They therefore which loue and seeke the company and fellowship of men, their feastings, and other their commodities, do not seeme to be true apostles, but false.

The thirtie one signe is, that true apostles do not commonly resort to other mens tables, lest that they should for a meales meat become flatterers, as in the 2. Thess. 3. That we should giue an example to follow vs. Glossa: He that commeth oftentimes to another mans table being giuen to idlenesse, cannot chuse but flatter him which feedeth him; but Christs religion calleth men to libertie and to no such bondage: they therefore that resort oftentimes, and that of their owne minds, to other mens tables (liuing idlely) are not true apostles, but false.

The thirtie two signe is, that true apostles do not hate their enemies, and such as hate them; which doctrine the Lord taught, Matthew the first, saying: Loue your enemies, do well to them which hate you; but false prophets do both hurt and defame their neighbors, according as S. Hierome 14. saith; The prophets of Hierusalem haue defiled the whole earth. Glossa: They are not contented only to hurt their neighbours, but also whom they before this time haue hated, they defame and speake euill of in euerie place they come: therfore those preachers which hate them whom they thinke are their enemies, and do defame them, are not true apostles, but false preachers.

The thirtie three signe is, that false prophets when they are examined and proued whether they be true apostles or liers, take that verie grieuously, and persecute all those that can proue them to be so, and also do stir vp and prouoke others to persecute the same men, which also ioyne themselues together by secular power, euen as certaine false prophets did in the primitiue church against the bishop of Ephesus: to whom the Lord said, Apoc. 2. I know, that is to say, I do allow thy workes and thy labour; that is, thy tribulation, because thou canst not away with those that be euill men. Glossa: But that thou hast a desire to amend them, or else to expell them, and hast examined those which say that they are apostles, and are but liers, and also hast suffered this patiently. Glossa: The euils which these false prophets ioyned together by secular power do bring in, are not the doings of true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie fourth signe is, that true apostles go not to preach to those which are conuerted alreadie by other men, but rather do conuert those which are not yet conuerted, lest that they should build vpon another mans foundation, as S. Paul, Romans 15, saith: I haue laboured so, that from Hierusalem to Illyricus, I haue replenished the gospell in euerie place. Glossa: That is, I haue preached the same abundantly, in whom the great vertue of the holy ghost appeareth, because so many nations, that is, the Gentiles haue receiued the gospell by my preaching. But I haue preached the gospell there where Christ was not preached before, lest I should build vpon another mans foundation. Glossa: I should not preach to those that were conuerted by another man. Also 2. Corinth. 10. We are not such as boast & glorie in other mens labours. Glossa: Where another man laid the foundation, for that should be to boast inordinatly. Also in the same place, not thinking to boast where another man hath gouernment, but in those things which are put in experience. Glossa: Of other preachers. Because the apostle did preach to those to whom the gospell was neuer preached, that he might get praise by his owne proper labour. Therfore, those preachers which go not to that people which haue need to be conuerted, but to those which are conuerted alreadie, which haue apostles of their owne, that is to say, bishops and priests, and yet do boast ouer another mans flocke, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie fifth signe is, because true apostles when they are sent, go to their owne diocesse, and not to another mans diocesse, euen as Paul being sent, went to the Gentiles when he purposed to preach, Acts 13. Separat Paul and Barnabas for the businesse which I haue chosen them vnto. Glossa: According to the appointment and decree of James, Cephas, and John, went he forth to be a teacher vnto the Gentiles. But those preachers that stand vpon their feet; that is to say, those preachers which haue but small worldly substance, for which cause they are more readie to go which way soeuer it shall please the Lord to send them, I say, the Lord hath sent them to preach, not to those which be sufficiently learned, but to those that are infidels, as we reade in Ezech. 2. After that, the spirit of the Lord set Ezechiel vpon his feet, In quam spem situs vnus tangitur, and he said vnto him: O sonne of man, behold I send thee to the nations which haue start backe from their profession, which haue gone from me, that is, to the Jewish heretikes, and to those nations which sometime haue been christians, as the Egyptians, the Babylonians, and all those that obserue the law of Mahomet. Therefore, if such go to those that are alreadie instructed, and hauing both apostles, bishops, and priests of their owne; they go not into their owne diocesse, but into another mans diocesse, and are not true apostles, but false preachers. And it is greatly to be feared, lest the church be in hazard and danger by such, vnlesse they be thrust out of the same betime; euen as Jonas, which when he was sent to Ninuie of the Lord, which is interpreted large or wide, and leadeth to the hill; that is, to the infidels we spake of before. They go not to those infidels according to the commandement of the Lord, but they turne another way, take their iourney into Tharsis, which is interpreted, seeking after ioy and pleasure; that is, they go vnto those which receiue them with ioy and gladnesse, and do well prouide for them, that is to say, to godly and deuout christians: and therfore it is to be feared, lest the ship in which they be (that is, the church) be in great perill, vnlesse they be throwne forth. And therefore the apostle spake of such false prophets not without good cause, 2. Tim. 2. And shun thou those. Glossa: That is, such men as those be.

The thirtie sixth signe is, because true apostles do not boast, neither do they attribute vnto themselues any other thing, but in that God hath wrought the same by them. Paul, Rom. 15, saith: I dare not say any thing but that which Christ hath wrought and accomplished by me. Glossa: That is, I speake only those things (which by me) that is, by my ministerie Christ hath wrought. They therefore that boast of many things, and do attribute much vnto themselues which they neuer did, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie seuenth signe is, that true apostles do not applie themselues or leane to logicall or philosophicall reasons. Therefore those preachers which do indeuour themselues to such kind of reasons, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie eight signe is, that true apostles do not loue carnallie or after the flesh, but hate what thing soeuer doth resist them in the seruice of God, as Luke 14. He that doth not hate his father and mother, his sonne and sister, and also himselfe, he cannot be my disciple. Glossa: That is, he that doth not hate what soeuer doth resist or let him in the seruice of God, is not worthie to be a disciple, neither can he abide in that office. Therefore for so much as true preachers are the true disciples of the Lord, it must needs follow that those preachers which do promote their nephewes and kinsfolkes (how vnworthie soeuer they be) to ecclesiastical promotions and liuings, contrarie to the will of God, or do any other thing that letteth or hindereth them in the seruice of God, are not true apostles, but false prophets.

The thirtie ninth signe is, that true apostles do not hunt for the friendship of this world: for he that is the friend of this world, is the enemie of God, therefore those preachers which purchase the friendship of this world are not true apostles, but false prophets. Therefore for so much as the scripture is infallible, as in the twentie fourth chapter of Matthew, saying: Heauen and earth shall perish, but my words shall endure for euer; and the holy Ghost which spake in the apostles cannot lie: for prophecie (for the most part) is not spoken by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake by the inspiration of the holie Ghost, as it is read in the first epistle of Peter, the first chapter: it remaineth, that all men, which are bound to defend the church, may rise vp in the defence of the same, according vnto that in the 24. chapter of the Prouerbs; Deliuer those that are led to death, and cease thou not to rescue those which are drawen to destruction. Neither may he alleage vaine accusations, because it is said in the same place: If he say he is not able or strong enough, he that beholdeth the thoughts of mens hearts, shall know it, &c. Whatsoeuer perisheth in the church of God for want of preachers, all that shall be demanded of them at the day of iudgement; as Jacob confesseth to Laban, whose sheepe he fed, Genesis 31, I did restore all thy losse, and that which was stolne I made answere for. I will demand his blood at thy hands, Ezechiel 3. This is said to the pastor or prelat. But if the other things which we haue spoken of before could not moue the prelats and cardinals, this at the least should moue them; because that then the spirituall power which doth consist for the most part in the exercise of preaching, in hearing confessions, and enioyning of penance, shall be taken away from them by little and little, for by piece meale doth the wolfe deuour the poore and needie man: 3. quest. chap. 1. When the authoritie ecclesiastical therefore shall be quite taken from them and disposed to others, such as either by their order or apostolicall grant, do challenge to haue the same; then doubtlesse shall neither the iurisdiction of ciuill causes and pleadings, nor anie authoritie that such prelats haue yet remaining, neither yet the possessions of the temporall goods of the church, any longer remaine amongst them. Shall such haue the temporall goods of the church which minister not the spirituall treasure thereof? 1. Cor. 9. Know ye not that they which kill the sacrifice, ought to eat of the sacrifice; and they that serue at the altar, are partakers of the altar? For as the bodie without the soule cannot stand, so corporall things without spirituall things cannot continue, 1. quest. 1. if any shall take away the same. Thus haue you had the 39 arguments, for the which both he the said Gulielmus was condemned, and his bookes burned.

In the dates of this Gulielmus, there was a most detestable and blasphemous booke set forth by the friers (mentioned also in Matth. Parisiensis) which they called Euangelium æternum, or Euangelium Spiritus sancti: That is; The euerlasting gospell, or the gospell of the holy Ghost. In which booke many abominable errours of the friers were contained, so that the gospell of Jesus Christ was vtterlie defaced, which this booke said, was not to be compared with this euerlasting gospell,

The thirtith signe is, that true prophets do not force vpon the solemne salutations of men, as false prophets do.

The thirtie one signe is, that false prophets resort to other mens boords, and flatter them for a meales meat, which true prophets do not.

The thirtie two signe is, that true prophets do not hate their enemies, as the false prophets doe.

The thirtie three signe is, that true prophets do not persecute men, as the false prophets do.

The thirtie fourth signe is, that true prophets preach to those which be not yet conuerted, which the false prophets do not.

The thirtie fifth signe is, that true prophets chiefly preach in their owne diocesse, and not in other mens.

The thirtie sixth signe is, that false prophets do attribute to themselues that which they neuer did.

The thirtie seuenth signe is, that false prophets do cleaue and leane to logicall and philosophicall reasons.

The thirtie eight signe is, that false prophets do loue carnally and not spiritually.

The thirtie ninth signe is, that false prophets do hunt after the friendship of this world.

Whatsoeuer doth perish in the church of God for want of preachers, shall be required.

A detestable booke of the friers, called Euangelium æternum.

Digitized by Google

no more then the shell is to be compared with the kernell, then darknesse to light, &c. Moreouer, that the gospell of Christ shall be preached no longer but fiftie yeares, and then this euerlasting gospell should rule the church, &c. Item, that what soeuer was in the whole Bible, was in the said gospell contained. At length this friers gospell was accused to the pope, and so six persons chosen of the whole Vniuersitie to peruse and iudge of the booke: as Christianus canonicus Baluacensis, Odo de Doaco, Nicolaus de Baro, Iohannes de Sicca Villa Anglus, Iohannes Belim Gallus. Among whom this Gulielmus was one, who mightily impugned this pestiferous and diuellish booke. These sir, after the perusing of the booke were sent vp to Rome. The friers likewise sent their messengers withall, where they were refuted, and the errours of the booke condemned; but so, that the pope with the cardinals commanded the said booke to be abolished and condemned not publikely (tendering the estimation of the religious orders, as of his owne most chiefe champions) but that they should be burned in secret wise, and the bookes of the foresaid Gulielmus to be burnt withall.

The eternall and spirituall gospell of the friers condemned with much ado of the pope.

Besides other his bookes, two sermons we haue of his yet remaining, one vpon the gospell of S. Luke, of the Pharisie and the Publican, the other vpon the epistle read in the church on May day; wherein the first he resembleth the Pharisies to our monkes, and that he proueth by all the properties of the Pharisies described in the gospel. The Publican he resembleth to the laitie, such as for because the sooner they are reduced to acknowledge their sinnes, the more hope they haue of mercie. The other, because they stand confident in their owne righteousnesse, are therefore further from their iustification. In the latter sermon he setteth forth and declareth what perils and dangers be like to fall vpon the church by these religious orders of monkes and friers.

Among the other besides of that age, which withstood the bishop of Rome and his antichristian errors, was one Laurence an Englishman, and master of Paris. Another was Petrus Iohannes a Pinozit, of whom the foresaid Laurence was about the yeare of our Lord 1260, who in his teaching, preaching and writing, did stoutly defend the part of the foresaid Gulielmus and the rest of his side against the friers. Against the which friers he wrote two bookes; one in the defence of William afore mentioned; the other vpon this argument and title: To beware of false prophets, &c. Certaine other things also he wrote, wherein by diuers proofes and testimonies he argued and proued that antichrist was not far off to come.

Laurentius Anglicus condemned of the pope.
Defensio Gulielmi.
Cauendum à pseudoprophetis.
The pope antichrist.
The synagogue of Rome to be great Babylon.
Ex Nicolao Emerico in libro suarum inquisitionum.
Petrus Iohannes burned after his death.

The other Petrus Iohannes was about the yeere of our Lord 1290, which taught and maintained many things against the pope, prouing that he was antichrist, and that the synagogue of Rome was great Babylon. He wrote vpon Matthew, vpon the epistles, and vpon the Apocalypse. Mention of this Petrus Iohannes is made in Nicolaus Emericus, in libr. Inquisitionum, &c. And saith moreouer that Michael Cesenas (of whom Christ willing shall follow hereafter) tooke of him a great part of his opinions; and because the pope could not burne him aliue, after his death he caused his bones to be taken vp and burned.

To these and with these aboue specified, is to be added Robertus Gallus, who being borne of a right noble parentage, for deuotion sake was made a Dominike frier, about the same yeere of our Lord aboue touched, Anno 1290. This man, as appeareth by his writing, had diuers and sundrie visions, whereof part is annexed with the visions and prophecie of Hildegardis. His visions all tend against the spiritualtie of Rome, where in the first chapter he calleth plainly the pope an idoll, which hauing eyes seeth not, neither lusteth to see the abominations of his people, nor the excessiue enormitie of their voluptuousnesse, but only to see to the heaping vp of his owne treasure, and hauing a mouth speaketh not, but saith; I haue set good men ouer them (which is sufficient for me) to do them good either by my selfe, or by some other. And it followeth in the same chapter; Woe to that idoll, woe to the mighty and proud, who shall be equall in all the earth to that idoll? He that exalted vp his name in earth, saying: Who shall bring me vnder? Is not my house compared with the mightie potentats of the land? I am higher then dukes, knights on their horsebacke do seruice vnto me; that which my fathers had not before me, that haue I done to me. My house is strowed with siluer, gold and perle are the pauement of my palace, &c.

Robertus Gallus prophesieth against the pope.

Againe in the twelfth chapter and also in the first, vnder the name of a serpent he painteth out the pope, whom he declareth to extoll himselfe aboue measure, and to oppresse the few that be godly, and to haue many false prophets about him, which neglecting the word and name of Christ, do preach and extoll him only, obscuring the name of Christ. The church of Rome and the pope he describeth in these words: I was praying (said he) on my knees, looking vpward to heauen neere to the altar of S. Iames in Paris, on the right side of the altar, and saw in the aire before me the bodie of a certaine high bishop all clothed in white silke, who turning his backe on the east, lift vp his hand towards the west, as the priests are wont in their masse turning to the people, but his head was not seene. And as I was considering aduisedly whether he had any head or no: I perceiued a certaine head in him all drie, leane and withered, as though it had been a head of wood. And the spirit of the Lord said to me: This signifieth the state of the church of Rome.

The pope described.
The visions of Robertus Gallus.
The state of the church of Rome described.

Moreouer, the same author in his visions well describing the manner of the schole sophisters and Sorbonists addeth in this wise: Another day as I was in like contemplation as before, I beheld in spirit: and behold I saw a man apparelled like to the other before, which went about hauing fine bread and excellent wine that hanged about him on both sides, and the same hauing in his hand a long and an hard flint stone, was gnawing hungerly vpon the same, as one being hungrie is wont to bite vpon a loafe of bread; out of the which stone came two heads of two serpents, the spirit of the Lord instructing me and saying: This stone purporteth the friuolous, intricat, and curious questions, wherein the hungrie do trauell and labour, leauing the substantiall food of their soules. And I asked what these two heads did meane: And he said, The name of the one is vain-glorie, the name of the other is the marring and dissipating of religion.

The schoolemen and the friuolous questions described.

Also, concerning reformation of the church, this vision he declareth: It hapned as I was (saith he) in the same citie in the house of a certaine noble man (a Britaine) and was there speaking with certaine; I saw a crosse of siluer very bright, much like to the crosse of the earle of Tholouse. But the twelues apples which did hang beside in the armes of the crosse were very vile, like the apples which the sea is wont to cast vp. And I said; What is this Lord Iesu? And the Spirit answered me: This crosse which thou seest is the church, which shall be cleare and bright in pureneesse of life, and shall be heard and knowne all ouer through the shrill voice of the preaching of sincere veritie. Then being troubled with the apples, I asked what these apples so vile did signifie? And he said; It is the humiliation of the church, &c.

The reformation of the church prefigured.

This godly man did forewarne (as in a certaine chronicle is declared) how God would punish the simonie and auarice of the clergie with such a plague that riuers should run with blood, &c. It is said that there is remaining a great volume of his visions which are not yet abroad, for these that be abroad are but a briefe extract out of his visions and reuelations.

The simonie and auarice of the clergie to be punished.

After that we haue thus long strayed in these forren stories of Frederike, and in the tractation of other matters pertaining to other countries, now after this sufficient digression, it is time that we returne to our owne countrie againe. Where, in following the continuation of time and course of the church, we will now adioyne to these good fathers and writers, the historie of the learned bishop of Lincolne named Robert Grosthead, a man famously learned (as that time serued) in the three tongues both Latine, Greeke, and Hebrew, also in all liberall sciences; whose works and sermons yet to this day are extant, which I haue seene in the Queenes maiesties librarie at Westminster. Wherein is one speciall sermon written and exhibited in foure sundrie scrols to the pope, and to other foure cardinals, beginning Dominus noster Iesus Christus, &c. Nicolas Triuet in his chronicle writing of this bishop, affirmeth that he was borne in Suffolke, in the diocesse of Northfolke: who giuing him the praise to be a man of excellent wisdome, of profound doctrine, and an example of all vertue, witnesseth, that he being master of arts, wrote first a commentary In librum posteriorum of Aristotle. Also that he wrote tractations, De sphæra, & de arte comput. and that he set forth diuers bookes concerning philosophie. Afterward being doctor in diuinitie, and expertly seene in all the three tongues, drew out sundrie treatises out of the Hebrew glosses, also translated diuers workes out of the Greeke, as namely the testament of the twelue patriarches, and the bookes of Dionysius, commenting vpon the new translation with his owne glosse: Hæc ille. Many other works and volumes besides were written by the said Grosthead, as De oculo morali, De dotibus, De cessatione legalium, paruus Cato, Annotationes in Suidam, in Boetium, De potestate pastorali, Expositiones in Gen. in Lucam, with a number more, besides diuers epistles, sermons & inuectiues sent to the pope for his vnmeasurable exactions wherewith he ouercharged & oppressed the church of England.

The troubles of Robert Grosthead with the pope.
Ex Nic. Triuet.
Robert Grosthead a Suffolke man borne.
The commendation of Robert Grosthead.
The bookes and workes of Robert Grosthead.

This godly and learned bishop after diuers conflicts and agonies sustained against the bishop of Rome, after the example of Frederike, of Guliel. de sancto amore, of Nico. Gallus, and other after minded; at length after great labors and trauels of life finished his course, and departed at Bugden in the moneth of October, An. 1253. Of his decease thus writeth Matth. Paris, pag. 278. Out of the prison and banishment of this world (which he neuer loued) was taken the holy bishop of Lincolne Robert, at his manor of Bugden in the euen of S. Dionyse, who was an open reprouer of the pope and of the king, a rebuker of the prelats, a corrector of the monkes, a directer of the priests, an instructer of the clerkes, a fautor of scholars, a preacher to the people, a perseruter of the incontinent, a diligent searcher of the Scriptures, a mall to the Romans, and a contemner of their doings, &c. Hæc Matth. What a mall he was to the Romans, in the sequell hereof (Christ willing) shall better appeare. The storie is this:

Anno 1253.
The death of Robert Grosthead.
Mallens Romanorum Grosthedus.

It so befell among other daily and intollerable exactions, wherein pope Innocent was grieuous and iniurious (manifold waies) to the realme of England, hee had a certaine cosin or nephew (so popes were wont to call their sonnes) named Frederike, being yet yong and vnder yeares, whom the said Innocent

Innocent the pope would needs prefer to be a canon or prebendarie in the church of Lincolne, in this time of Robert bishop of the said church; and vpon the same directed downe letters to certaine his factors heere in England for the execution thereof. The copy of which letter by chance, yet not by chance, but by the opportune sending of God came to my hands, as I was penning this present storie written in the end of an old parchment booke, and otherwise rare I suppose to be found, as is this.

The vnreasonable letter of the pope.

Dilectis filijs archdiacono Cant. & magistro Innocent. scriptori nostro in Anglia commoranti: salutem & apostolicam benedict. Cùm dilectus filius noster G. Sanct. Eustachij diaconus cardinalis dilecto filio Frederico de Lauania, clerico nepoti nostro, de speciali mandato nostro canonicatum Lincolnien. cum plenitudine iuris canonici duxerit conferẽdum, ipsum per suum annulum corporaliter & præsentialiter inuestiens de eodẽ, vt ex tunc canonicus Lincolnien. existat, & plenum nomen & ius canonici consequatur ibidem, ac præbendam, si qua vacauerit in ecclesia Lincol. à tẽpore quo dudùm literæ nostræ super receptione, ac prouisione faciendæ sibi in eccles. eadem de præmissis venerab. fratri nostro episcopo Lincoln. præsentatæ fuerunt, alioqui post vacaturam conferendã sibi donationi apostolicæ reseruarit: decernendo irritum & inane, si quid de præbenda huiusmodi à quoquam fuerit attentatum, nec non & contradictores & rebelles excommunicationis sententiam vbique promulgando, prout in literis eiusdem exinde de* constitutis plenius cõtinetur. Nos ipsius Frederici deuotis supplicationibus inclinati, quod ab eodẽ cardinale factum est super hoc & ratum & gratum habentes, idem autoritate apostolica duximus confirmandũ. Quocirca discretioni vestræ per apostolica scripta mandamus, quatenus eundem Fredericum, vel procuratorem suum eius nomine in corporalem possessionem prædictorum canonicatus & præbendæ, autoritate nostra inducatis, & defendatis inductum, contradictores per censuram ecclesiasticam appellatione postposita compescendo. Non obstantibus aliquibus consuetudinibus vel statutis, iuramentis, vel confirmationibus sedis apostolicæ, seu quacunque alia infirmitate roboratis, vel quòd dictus Fredericus præsens non fuerit ad præstandum iuramentum de obseruandis cõsuetudinibus eiusdem eccles. consuetis; siue si prædicto episcopo vel capitulo ipsius ecclesiæ communiter vel singulatim: seu alijs quibuscunque personis à dicta sede indultum existat, quòd ad receptionem vel prouisionem alicuius compelli nequeant, siue quòd nullus alius in eorum ecclesia nemini prouidere valeat: vel quòd interdici, suspendi, aut excommunicari non possint, per literas apost. sub quacunque forma verborũ obtentas, vel obtinendas, etiamsi totus tenor indulgentiarum huiusmodi de verbo in verbum in ijsdem literis sit insertus, siue quibus alijs indulgentijs quibuscunque personis, dignitati, vel loco, sub quacunq; forma verborum concessis à sede apost. vel etiam concedendis, per quas effectus huiusmodi prouisionis posset impediri aliquatenus vel differri. Tamen volumus ea de certa scientia, quantum ad prouisionem factam & faciendam Frederico prædicto in ecclesia Lincoln. viribus omnino carere. Cæterum, si aliqui prædicto Frederico vel procuratori super præmissis, vel aliquo præmissorum, aliquatenus duxerint opponendum: illos ex parte nostra citari curetis, vt peremptoriè infra duorum mensium spacium post citationem vestram personaliter compareant coram nobis, eidem Frederico super præmissis legitimè responsuri. Non obstantibus priuilegijs, siue quibuslibet indulgentijs personis regni Angliæ generaliter vel cuiuis alij personæ, vel dignitati, vel loco specialiter à prædicta sede sub quacunq; forma verborum concessis. Quod non possunt vltra mare, seu extra ciuitatem vel diœcesin suam in iudicium euocari per literas apost. sub quacunque forma verborum obtentas, quod priuilegium & indulgentias eisdem personis de certa scientia nullatenus volumus suffragari, & constitutione edita de duabus dictis in concilio generali non obstante. Diem autem citationis & formam nobis, vestris literis tenorem præsentium continentibus fideliter intimetis. Quòd si non ambo his exequendis interesse poteritis, alter vestrum nihilominus exequatur. Datum Perus. 7. Cal. Febr. pontificat. nostri anno decimo.*

* Rectè dictum fortassis filio.

* Confectis.

Which forelaid letter is thus in English.

The popes vnreasonable letter.

Vnto our welbeloued sonnes the archdeacon of Canturburie, and to master Innocent our scribe abiding in England, greeting and apostolicall benediction. For so much as our welbeloued sonne G. of S. Eustace deacon cardinall, vpon our speciall commandement hath giuen and granted to our welbeloued son Frederike de Lauania (a clerke and our nephew) a canonship in the church of Lincolne with full power and grant of the same: inuesting him also corporally and presently with his owne ring in the said canonship, to be from henceforth canon of Lincolne, and to haue full power of the said canonship in the church, and a prebend when any shall fall in the church of Lincolne: from that time, since which our former letters of late, concerning this receiuing and prouision to be giuen to him in the said church, were presented and exhibited to our reuerend brother the bishop of Lincolne, or else after the next auoiding the said prebendship to be reserued to the apostolicall donation, and to be giuen to him, making it void and frustrat if the said prebendship shall be giuen to any other man beside, and also denouncing the sentence of excommunication against all them that shall rebell and gainsay the same, as in the letters of the said cardinall is more fully contained.

Excommunication abused.

We therefore gratiously inclined by the deuout supplication of the said Frederike, ratifying and gratefully approuing that which hath been done by the said cardinals in the premisses, haue thought good by the authoritie apostolicall to confirme. Wherefore we giue in commandement by our letters apostolicall to your wisedomes, that you will see the said Frederike (or his proctor in his behalfe) to be really and corporally possessed in the said canonship or prebend by our authoritie, and also defend the said partie being therein possessed, denouncing the sentence of excommunication against all such as shall withstand the same, all maner of customes or statutes to the contrarie notwithstanding, corroborated either with oth, or confirmations of the see apostolike, or by what stay or let soeuer; or whether that the said Frederike be not present to take the oth accustomed to be giuen for obseruing the customes of the said church, or whether it be giuen and granted by the said see to the foresaid bishop, or to the chapter of the said church iointly and seuerallie, or to what person or persons else, that no man by compulsion should haue admission or prouision for any person in their church whereby they cannot be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicat by the letters apostolicall obtained, or to be obtained hereafter, vnder what forme or words soeuer; yea although the whole tenour of the said indulgence bee inserted word for word in the said your letters, or by any other indulgences to what person or persons soeuer, of what estate, dignitie or place soeuer, vnder any manner or forme of words, granted hereafter by the see apostolike, by the which indulgences the effect of the said prouision may bee by any manner of waies hindered or deferred: yet of our certaine knowledge wee will that they shall want their strength in the prouision made or to be made for the said Frederike in the church of Lincolne. And if anie vpon the premisses or anie of them shall alleage against the foresaid Frederike, or his procurator, that you will cause them to be cited on our behalfe: so that they being cited peremptorilie, shall within the space of two moneths of your citation, personally appeare before vs there according to the law to make answere to the said Frederike vpon the premisses: any priuiledges or indulgences whatsoeuer giuen and granted either generally to the kingdome of England, or peculiarly to anie other person of what state, degree, and place soeuer, granted by the foresaid see, vnder whatsoeuer manner and forme of words for them not to be called vp beyond the sea, or out of their owne citie or dioceese by letters apostolicall, vnder whatsoeuer forme of words obtained, to the contrarie in any wise notwithstanding. Al which priuiledges and indulgences, we wil in no case shall stand in any force or effect to the said parties. Moreouer, the day and forme of the citation we will that ye faithfullie do intimat vnto vs by your letters containing the tenour thereof, and if both of you cannot be present at the execution hereof, yet we will notwithstanding, that one of you doe execute the same without faile. Dated the 7. kal. Februarie, the 10. yeare of our popedome.

As there is no man which hath any eyes to see, but may easilie vnderstand in reading this letter of the pope, how vnreasonable his requests is, how impudently he commandeth, how proudly he threatneth, how wickedly he oppresseth and racketh the church of God, in placing boyes and strangers in the ministerie and cure of soules, and also in making them his prouisors, to rauen vp the church goods: so is it no great maruell, if this godly bishop Robert Grosthead was offended therewith, who in my mind deserueth herein a double commendation, not onlie that he so wisely did discerne error from sinceritie and truth; but also that he was so hardie and constant to stand to the defence thereof against the pope, according as in this his answere to the pope againe may appeare, as followeth.

A double commendation of bishop Grosthead.

The answere of Robert Grosthead.

The answere of Robert Grosthead to the pope.

SAlutem. Pleaseth it your wisdome to vnderstand, that I am not disobedient to any the apostolike precepts, but both deuoutly and reuerently with the naturall affection of a sonne obey the same, and also am an vtter enemie to all those that resist such apostolike precepts, as a child zealous of his fathers honor. And truly I am no lesse then bound thereunto by the precept and commandement of God. For the apostolike precepts are none other, nor can be, then consonant and vniforme to the doctrine of the apostles, and of our Sauiour Christ being the maister and Lord of all the apostles: whose type and person, specially in the consonant and vniforme hierarchie of the church, the lord pope seemeth to beare (the same our Lord and Sauiour Jesus Christ, saying) Whosoeuer is not with me, the same is against me. Therefore, against him neither is nor can be the most diuine sanctitie of the see apostolicall. The tenour then of your foresaid apostolicall letter is not consonant to true sanctitie, but vtterly dissonant and disagreeing to the same. First, for that vpon the clause of this your letter and many such other letters like, which clause alwaies ye so much do vrge (Non obstante) induced and brought in vpon no necessity of any naturall law to be obserued; doth swarme and flow with all inconstancie, boldnesse, pertinacie, impudencie, lying, and deceiuing, and is also a sea of mistrust in giuing credit to no man. Which as it swarmeth with these, so in like manner with innumerable other vices which hang and depend vpon the same:

Digitized by Google

mouing and disturbing the puritie of christian religion and life agreeable to the same, as also the publike tranquillitie of men. Moreouer, next after the sinne of Lucifer (which shall be in the latter time, to wit, of antichrist the child of perdition, whom the Lord shall destroy with the breath of his mouth) there is not nor can be any kind of sinne so repugnant and contrarie to the doctrine of the apostles and holy scripture, and to our Sauiour Christ himselfe more hatefull, detestable and abominable, then to destroy and kill mens soules, by defrauding them of the mysterie of the pastorall office, which by the ministerie of the pastorall cure ought to saue and quicken the same. Which sinne by most euident places of the scripture such men are discerned and knowne to commit, which being in the authority of the pastorall dignitie, do serue their owne carnall desires and necessaries, with the benefit of the milke and woll of the sheepe and flock of Christ, and do not minister the same pastorall office and charge to the benefit and saluation of those their sheep. The same therfore by the testimonie of the scripture is not the administration of the pastorall ministerie, but the killing and destruction of the sheepe. And that these two kind of vices be most vile and wicked (although after a differing sort) and far exceeding all other kind of wickednesse, hereby it is manifest: for that the same are directly contrary to two vertues most chiefly good (although differing in themselues) and vnlike together. For that is called most wicked, which is contrarie to a thing most best. So much then as lieth in the offenders, the one of their offences is directlie against the deitie, which of himselfe is alwaies essentiallie and supernaturally good: the other is against the deification and the image of God in man, which is not alwaies, but by the participation of Gods lightsome grace essentially and naturally good. And for so much as in things being good, the cause of good is better then the effect; and like as againe in euill things, the cause of euill is worse then the effect of euil proceeding therof: hereby it is manifest, that the inducers of such wicked destroyers of Gods image and deification in the sheepe of Christ (that is, the church of God) are worse then those chiefe destroyers, to wit, Lucifer and antichrist.

And as in these degrees of wickednesse how much more excellent such be, who hauing a great charge committed to them of God (to edification and not to destruction) are more bound to keepe away and exclude such wicked destroyers from the church of God: so much is it also off that, that this holy seat apostolicall, to whom the Lord Jesus Christ hath giuen all maner of power (to edification as the apostle saith, and not to destruction) can command, or will go about any such thing, vrging vnto so great wickednesse, so odible, detestable and abominable to our Lord Jesus Christ, and also so pernicious to mankind. For this should be a great defection, corruption, and abuse of the said seat and fulnesse of power, and an vtter separation from the glorious throne of our Lord Jesus Christ, and a neere neighbourhood vnto the two most principall princes of darknesse, sitting in the chaire of pestilence, prepared to the paines of hell. Neither can any man, which is subiect and faithfull to the said see (and not cut away from the bodie of Christ, and from the said holy see) with sincere and vnspotted conscience obey such maner of precepts and commandements, or whatsoeuer other attempts proceeding, yea though from the high order of angels themselues, but rather ought of necessitie with all their strength to withstand and rebell against the same. Wherefore my reuerend lord, I like an obedient child vpon my bound dutie of obedience and fidelitie which I owe to both the * parents of this holy apostolike see, and partly for loue of vnitie in the bodie of Christ ioyned with the said see, do not obey but withstand and vtterly rebell against these things in the said letter contained, and especially which vrge and tend to the foresaid wickednesse, so abominable to the Lord Jesus Christ, so repugnant to the holinesse of the holie apostolike see, and so contrarie to the vnitie of the catholike faith. Neither for this cause can your discretion determine any extremitie to me, because all my doing and gain-saying in this matter is no resistance nor rebellion, but a childly obedience to the diuine precept, and honor due both to * father and mother. Briefely therefore repeating my words I say, that this holy apostolike see cannot do any thing but to edification, and nothing at all to destruction: for this is the fulnesse of power, to be able to do all things to edification. But these which you call prouisions be not to edification, but to manifest destruction. The holy apostolike see therefore cannot nor ought to attempt any such thing, because that flesh and blod which cannot enter into the kingdome of God hath reuealed the same, and not the father of our Lord Jesus Christ which is in heauen.

Power giuen to ministers to edification only, not to destruction.

Two principall princes of darknesse, Lucifer and antichrist.

* He meaneth either Christ and the church, or else Peter and Paul.

* Id est, both to Christ and his church.

Then followeth it in the storie both of Matth. Parisiensis, and of Florilegus, in these words: That when this epistle came to the knowledge of the pope, he fuming and fretting with anger and indignation, answered with a fierce looke and proud mind, saying: What old doting frantike wretch is this, so boldly and rashly to iudge of my doings? By sweet S. Peter and Paul, were it not but that vpon our owne clemencie and good nature we are restrained, we would hurle him downe to such confusion, that we would make him a fable, a gazing stocke, an example and wonderment to all the world. For is not the king of England our vassall? and to say more, our manciple or page (to vse the very words of mine author) which may at our pleasure and becke both hamper him, imprison him, and put him to vtter shame? This when the pope in his great fury and rage had vttered amongst his brethren the cardinals, who were scarce able to appease the furious violence of the pope, with milde moderation of words they said vnto him; that it was not expedient for them to proceed against that bishop in such rigorous maner. For, said they, to confesse the truth to your holines, it is but verie truth that he affirmeth, neither can we condemne him therefore. He is a catholike man, yea also a holy man; more holie and also religious then we our selues; a man of excellent wit, and excellent life; so as it is thought, among all the prelats he hath not his better, nor yet his like. This is not vnknowne both to the French and English clergie vniuersally, neither can our contradiction preuaile against him. The truth of this his epistle perhaps is knowne now to many, and shall stir vp many against vs: for he hath the name to be a great philosopher, and singularly seene in all the tongues, both Greeke, Latine and Hebrue: zealous in iustice, a reader of diuinitie in the schooles, a preacher amongst the people, a louer of chastitie, and a persecutor of simonie. These words spake L. Giles a Spanish cardinall to the pope, and others more moued by their conscience to speake. And this counsell they gaue to the pope, that he should dissemble and winke at these things, as one not seeing or regarding them; lest otherwise perhaps some tumult might rise and spring thereof: especially seeing this is manifest and knowne to all men, that once must needs come a defection and parting from the church of Rome.

Giles cardinall defendeth Robert Grosthead to the pope.

Not long after this (about the canicular daies) this reuerend and godly Robert bishop of Lincolne lying at his manor place in Bugden, fell grieuously sicke; and thereupon within few daies departed. In the time of his sickenesse he called to him a certaine frier of the preaching order, named M. John Giles, a man expert and cunning both in physike and diuinitie; partly to receiue of him some comfort of his bodie, and partly to confer with him in spirituall matters. Thus vpon a certaine day, the said bishop conferring with the foresaid M. John, and reciting to him the doings and proceedings of the pope, did grieuously rebuke and reprehend his fellow brethren the preaching friers, and the other order also of the minorits; that for so much as their order being planted in willfull pouertie of the spirit, to the intent they should more freely carpe and reproue the vices of the mightie, and not to flatter or spare them, but sharpely to rebuke and reprehend the same: the said friers contrarie to their profession did not boldly enough crie out and inueigh against the abuses of their superiours and men of power: nor did vncouer nor detect their faults and wickednesse; and therefore, said the bishop, I iudge them to be no better then manifest heretikes. And addeth moreouer (demanding of M. John) what is heresie: and that he should giue him the true definition thereof. Whereat when the frier did stay & pause, not remembring the solemne definition of that matter; the bishop thereupon inferreth, giuing this definition in Latine by the true interpretation of the Greeke word: Hæresis Græcè, electio Latinè, est sententia humano sensu electa, scripturæ sacræ cõtraria, palam docta, pertinaciter defensa. That is: Heresie is a sentence taken and chosen of mans owne braine, contrary to holy scripture, openly maintained, and stiflie defended. And this definition giuen, consequently he inferred, sharpely reprehending the prelats of the church, but especially the Romans, which commit the charge of soules vnto their kinsfolkes, being both in age vnworthie, and in learning vnsufficient. To giue (saith he) the charge of soules to a boy, is a sentence of a prelat chosen and taken of mans owne head, only for carnall and earthly respect, and also is contrarie to holie Scripture, the which forbiddeth any such to be made ministers or pastors, which are not sufficient to driue away the wolues. And moreouer it is also openly maintained, because it is manifestly borne abroad and commanded, with charts anbulled both with wax and lead; and finally, it is stiffely defended. For if any man shall dare to presume to withstand the same, he is suspended and excommunicated, and open war cried out against him: therefore to whom the whole definition of an heretike doth agree, he is a very heretike. But euery faithfull christian man ought to set himselfe against an heretike as much as he may. Wherefore he that can resist him and doth not, he sinneth, and seemeth to be a fautor thereof, according to the saying of Gregorie; He lacketh not conscience of secret societie, which ceaseth to resist open impietie. But the friers both Franciscans and Dominikes are most chiefly bound to withstand such, seeing both of them haue the gift of preaching committed to them by their office, and be more apt to the said office, by reason of their pouertie: and therefore doe not only offend in not resisting such, but also are to be counted maintainers of the same, according to the sentence of the apostle to the Romans, saying; Not only they which commit such things, but also they that consent are worthie of death. Wherefore it may be concluded, that as well the pope (vnlesse he cease from that vice) as also the same friers, vnlesse they shew themselues more earnest and studious in repelling the same, are both worthie of death, that is perpetuall damnation. Item saith the canon decretall, that vpon this vice of heresie the pope both may and ought to be accused.

The godlie talke of Robert Grosthead in time of his sickenesse.

Definition of heresie.

The pope named heere an heretike.

The saying of Gregorie.

The pope accused of heresie.

Ex Matth. Paris. ad verbum.

Well sworne maister pope.

After

Certaine aphorismes or articles laid of Robert Grosthead against the bishop of Rome.

After this the vehemencie of his disease more and more increasing, and because the nights were somewhat longer; the third night before his departure, the bishop feeling his infirmity to grow vpon him, willed certaine of his clergie to be called to him, therby to be refreshed with some conference or communication. Vnto whom the bishop mourning and lamenting in his mind for the losse of soules, through the auarice of the popes court, said on this wise, as by certaine aphorismes.

1 Christ came into the world to saue and win soules: Ergo, he that feareth not to destroy soules, may he not worthilie bee counted antichrist?

2 The Lord created the whole world in sixe daies, but in reparing of man he laboured more then thirtie yeeres. Wherefore he that is a destroyer of that, about which the lord so long laboured, is not hee worthie to be counted the enemie of God, and antichrist?

The pope accused of his wicked clause, Non obstante.

3 The pope shameth not impudently to annihilat and disannull the priuiledges of his holy predecessors of Romane bishops, by this obstacle (Non obstante) which is not done without the preiudice and manifest iniurie of them. For in so doing he doth reproone and destroy that which so many and so holy men haue builded vp before, and thus seemeth he to bee a contemner of the saints. Worthilie therefore he that contemneth shall bee contemned, according to the saying of Esay: Woe to thee that doest despise, for shalt not thou thy selfe be despised? And who shall keepe his priuiledges, which so breaketh the priuiledges of others?

The pope accused for arrogating more then his due to him, and prooued not to be equall but inferiour to his predecessors.

4 The pope answering thereunto thus defendeth perhaps his error: He that is equall, hath no superioritie ouer his equall: Therefore, no pope hath power to bind me being pope as well as he. To this answer againe (quoth the bishop) It seemeth to me, that he that now presently is sailing in the dangerous seas of this world, and hee that is safely arriued in the hauen, hauing past all ieopardies, are not both like and equall. Grant that some popes be saued (God forbid any should say contrarie:) Then saith our sauior: He that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater then John Baptist, a greater then whom did neuer rise amongst the children of men. Is not therefore some pope greater, being a giuer and confirmer of priuileges, then this that is aliue? Truely me thinks hee is greater, therefore he hath dominion ouer his inferior.

The pope accused for vndoing the acts and foundations of his predecessors. Prooued that the pope aliue is inferior to his predecessors before him, and therefore to haue no authoritie to infringe the priuiledges of other popes.

5 Doth not the pope thus say, speaking of all his predecessors for the most part: This our predecessor, and this our predecessor of most worthie memorie, &c. And againe, We (saith hee) cleauing to, or following the steps of our predecessors, &c. And why then do such popes as come after, destroy these foundations which their predecessors haue laid?

Prooued by the example of Benet, that men more ancient in time ought to be preferred in higher reuerence.

6 Many apostolike men comming after, haue confirmed some priuiledge being granted by others before; and be not many bishops being alreadie saued by the grace of God, to bee counted greater and better then one bishop which hath not yet attained, but standeth in danger to obtaine that which the other haue got alreadie?

7 Also other former fathers and bishops of the apostolical see, in preferment of time go before the others which in time come after. And those whom the estimation of ancient time doth aduance, such are we bound to esteeme and to haue in more reuerence. This did the holy man Benedict well consider, who in his rule preferreth such as came first in time, whatsoeuer men they were before them, which (albeit being more ancient in yeeres) came after them into the order, and commandeth them to be their superiors, and to haue the preheminence. Which being so (as it is) true and certaine, how commeth then this iniurious and rash presumption, which dare repeale and disanull the old priuiledges of many ancient holy bishops, in time and in reuerence going before them?

The pope accused for maintaining of vsurie.

8 Moreouer, and though many popes haue been grieuous to the church, yet this pope most speciallie hath brought it most into seruitude and manifold waies hath dammified the same. For these Caursini, these open vsurers, whom our holy forefathers and doctors, whom we haue seene, and namely our learned maister in France preacher, also the abbat of Flay a Cisstercian, maister Iacobus de Veteri, and maister Stephan, archbishop of Canturburie in the time of his banishment, and also maister Robert Curcun, with his preaching, banished out of France, for before that time these kind of vsurers were neuer knowne in England; the same Caursini, these wicked vsurers, I say, were by this pope induced, supported and maintained; so that if any doe speake against them, hee is miserablie tolled and trounsed for his labour, whereof partly Roger bishop of London hath some experience.

Against vsurers.

9 The world doth know, that vsurie is counted a detestable thing in both the testaments, and is forbidden of God. But now the popes vsurers or exchangers, the verie Iewes crying out against them, being openly suffered in London to exercise their vsurie, to the great damage and detriment of all ecclesiasticall persons, but especially houses of religion, compelling such as bee in pouertie to counterfet and to put to their seales to forged writings, which is no lesse then to commit idolatrie and to abrenounce the veritie which is God himselfe. As for example: I borrow 100. marks for a yeere in stead of a hundred pounds; I am compelled to make my writing and to seale the same, confessing that I haue receiued and borrowed one hundred pounds, to bee repaied againe at the yeeres end to such a man, &c. And if it shall chance that your occupying be such, that within a month you bring againe the principall to the popes vsurer, hee will receiue no lesse notwithstanding then his full hundred pounds: which condition of vsurie is much worse then that of the Iewes. For to the Iew what principall you bring, hee will require no more then proportionallie for the commensuration of so much time, wherein his monie hath been out of his hands.

The craftie practise of vsurers.

The popes vsurers worse then the Iewes.

10 Moreouer, we haue seene and knowne the pope to haue giuen in charge and commandement to the friers preachers, and minorits, to inquire diligently for such as lie sicke and like to die, and so comming to them diligently to perswade them to make their wils and testaments fauorablie to the profit and subsidie of the holy land, and to take the crosse vpon them, that if they doe amend, they may wring them in the law; and if they die, they may wrest the monie from their executors.

Craftie subtiltie of the pope to get monie.

11 We haue knowne likewise and seene men that haue taken the vow and signe of the crosse vpon them, to bee sold vnto lay men, as sheepe and oxen were wont in time past to bee sold in the temple.

Men signed to the holy land, sold for monie like sheepe by the pope.

We haue seene with our eies the popes letter, in which we haue found this to be written: That they which bequeath any thing to the behoofe or subsidie of the holy land, shall receiue so much indulgence as they haue disbursed monie.

Remission of sinnes sold for monie.

12 Ouer and besides all this, the pope in diuers and sundrie his letters, hath willed and commanded prelats to receiue into ecclesiasticall benefices, and to prouide some such liuing in their churches, as shall be sufficient to such and such a stranger (being both absent and also vnworthie) which haue neither learning, nor yet the language of the countrie: whereby they are neither able to preach nor to heare confessions, nor to keepe residence for to refresh the poore and trauailers.

The pope accused to be iniurious to churches in his prouisions and reseruations.

13 Item, we know and haue seene our selues, that the pope hath written to the abbat of S. Albons, to prouide for one called John de Camezana whom he neuer saw, in some competent benefice. Whereupon, in few daies after, when prouision was made for him in a certaine church, worth fortie marks by the yeere and more, the partie being not therewith contented, complained to the pope; who then writing to the foresaid abbat commanded him to prouide for the foresaid M. John in some better thing, reseruing notwithstanding the gift of the former benefice to himselfe.

The pope accused to be iniurious to the abbat of saint Albons.

14 Againe, not long after came also to the house of the foresaid abbat, two other persons like begging vagabonds, bringing with them the popes letters: in the tenor whereof the abbat was commanded, that incontinent vpon the sight thereof, he should giue and disburse to the said persons for the expedition and dispatch of his affaires ten marks in hand, without any delay or sticking: the which persons vttering vnto the abbat proud and threatning words, he was faine to agree with them and send them away.

The pope accused for violent extortion.

15 Item, of men which are both holy and well learned, which haue left the world for the following of God in such order as they ought not to turne backe againe, the pope of them maketh his tolners and bankers to get in his monie: the which charge they are compelled against their wils to take vpon them, lest they should seeme to be disobedient, and so of spirituall men are made more secular then the most secular. And so the basenesse of their chimmers and scapillers which they weare, doth proue them to be liers: whilest vnder the habit of pouertie and humiliation there lurketh the spirit of pride and elation. And because no legat may be sent into England, but being first required of the king: the pope sendeth sophisticall legats and such as bee disguised and counterfet in apparell, and are garded with great might and power: neither is it hard to bring forth examples thereof: For so many such dailie do come into the realme, that to heare the names of them recited, it would be tedious for any man to heare.

The pope accused for troubling and corrupting learned men of the spiritualtie with his temporall affaires.

16 Furthermore (as we haue seene our selues) the pope granteth for secular fauour, that a man may haue a bishoprike, and yet be no bishop conserrated, Sed electus sempiternus, that is, elect for euer. Which is as much to signifie, to haue the milke and the woll of the sheepe, and not to keepe the wolues away from the sheepe: to retaine the rents of a bishop, and not to discharge the function of a bishop.

The pope accused for vnlawfull dispensations.

And when this godly bishop had thus reproued these and such other detestable enormities of the court of Rome; as all kinds of auarice, their vsurie, their simonie, their extortion, all kinds of filthinesse, fleshlie lust, gluttonie, and their sumptuous apparell raigning in that court: then saith hee, this old verse may be trulie verified vpon it:

Eius auaritiæ totus non sufficit orbis;
Eius luxuriæ meretrix non sufficit omnis.

All the world cannot suffice their greedie couetous mind,
Nor all the drabs and naughtie packs their filthie lusting kind.

Afterwards he went about more to prosecute, how the forsaid court like a gulfe neuer satisfied, euer gaping so wide, that that the floud of Iordan might run into his mouth) aspired how to vsurpe the goods of them that die vntested, and of legacies bequeathed without forme of law; and whereby more licentiouslie to bring this to passe, they vsed to ioyne the king to bee fellow and partaker with them in their spoiles, extortions, and robbing. Neither, saith he, shall the church bee deliuered from the seruitude of Egypt but by violence and force, and with the bloudie sword. And albeit, saith he, these be yet but light matters, yet shortly more great and grieuous things then these shall be seene.

Digitized by Google

Ex Mat. Paris.

The death of Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne.

And in the end of this his prophesying, which he scarsly could vtter without sighing, sobbing, and weeping, his tongue and breath began to faile, and so the organ of his voice being stopped, he made an end both of his speech and life. Ex Matthæo Pariensi.

And for so much as mention hath been made before of the insatiable auarice of the popes court by his inordinat prouisions and reseruations, it is testified by the said author Matthew Paris, that the foresaid Robert Grosthead being bishop of Lincolne, caused to be viewed and considered diligentlie of his clerks what the reuenues of forreners and strangers within England sent in by the pope, came to by the yeere, and it was found and euidently tried, that this pope now present, Innocentius the fourth, did impouerish the vniuersall church throughout christendome, more then all his predecessors from the time the pope first began. So that the reuenues of forreners and clerks placed by him heere in England, mounted vnto the summe of threescore and ten thousand marks and aboue, whereas the mere reuenues of the crowne came not to thirty thousand.

What the reuennes of the popes clerks here in England came to by the yeere.

Ex Cestrensi, lib. 7.

Of this Robert Grosthead writeth Cestrensis in his seuenth booke of his historie, that partly for that it grieued him to see the intollerable exactions of the pope in this realme, and partly because he refused to admit a certaine young nephue of the pope to be canon of his church (as hath been before recited) hee therefore writing vnto the pope, and signifying that he could not admit any such persons into his church, which neither knew themselues nor the tongue of the people, nor the charges committed vnto them: was called vp to Rome, and there excommunicatted, who then appealing from the pope, shortlie after departed, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1253. It chanced within two yeeres after his decease, the said pope Innocent being asleepe, a certaine bishop apparelled bishoplike, appeared vnto him, and striking him with his staffe on the left side, said, Surge miser veni in iudicium: that is, Rise wretch and come to thy iudgement. The nert day after, the pope was found amazed, as a man stricken on the side with the stroke of a staffe. This Robert though he was greatlie commended for his sanctimonie, and as Cestrensis saith, for his miracles: yet was he not permitted in the court of Rome to bee ascribed in the catalogue of saints. And thus much out of Cestrensis concerning this matter. But Mat. Paris and the author of Flores historiarum, prosecuting this storie more at large, addeth this more vnto it and saith, that pope Innocent the nert yeere following, which was An. 1254. being passing angrie, contrarie to the mind of his brethren the cardinals, would haue the bones of the foresaid bishop of Lincolne cast out of the church, and purposed to bring him into such spite and hatred of the people, that he should be counted an ethnike, a rebell, and disobedient person through the whole world. And thereupon caused his letters to bee written and sent downe to the king of England, knowing that the king would gladlie serue him therein, to haue the spoile of the bishop and of his church. But in the night following the said bishop of Lincolne appeared vnto him as comming in his pontificalibus, and with a seuere countenance, sterne looke, and terrible voice speaking vnto him being in his rest, and smiting him on the side with a vehement stroke with the end of his crossestaffe thus said; O thou scuruie, lazie, old, bald, louslie, wretched, doting pope: hast thou purposed to cast my bones out of the church to the shame and slander of me? How commeth this rash wilfulnesse in thy head? It were meet for thee being thus aduanced by God, and honored, to make much of the zealous seruants of God, although departed. The Lord will not suffer thee henceforth to haue any more power ouer me. I haue written vnto thee in the spirit of humilitie and loue, that thou shouldest correct thy manifold errors; but thou with a proud eie and disdainfull hart hast despised my wholesome admonitions. Wo to thee that despisest, shalt not thou also be despised? And so the bishop departing from the pope, stricken, as is said, on the side, left him for halfe dead, and so lying in sorrow and lamentation. Whereupon his chamberlains being amazed, hearing these things, came running to the pope to know what him ailed. To whom the pope much troubled and vered in his spirit, said: that great terrors in his sleepe vehemently disturbed and molested him, in such sort that he thought he should neuer recouer it, nor bee restored to himselfe againe. Oh (saith he) how sore is my side, and how egerlie it vereth me, as being run through with a speare! Neither did the pope eat or drinke all that day, but fayning himselfe to be sicke of a burning ague, kept in. And yet the indignation of the irefull hand of God (saith the storie) so left him not.

The pope stricken with the staffe of Grosthead bishop of Lincolne.

{Anno 1254}

Ex Mat. Paris. Ex Flor. hist. Senibalde papa miserrime.

The popes new and true stile giuen by Grosthead bishop of Lincolne.

The pope disquietted in his mind.

For after these wholsome admonitions giuen to him by the seruant of God, the pope not regarding them, but all set vpon war, suppression of his enemies, and secular affairs, gaue his mind wholie vnto them; and yet all his labors, counsels, and expences bestowed vpon them, could neuer prosper after that day in that he went about. For the pope the same time hauing war with the Apulians, all his armie fighting vnder the popes nephue their captaine, were slaine and confounded the number of many thousands: whose lamentable slaughter all the countrie of the Romans did much bewaile. The pope not yet quiet in his mind, directeth his iourny towards Naples, although sore vered in his side like a man sicke of a pleuresie, or smitten rather with a speare, neither could any physicke of his cardinals helpe him. For Robert of Lincolne (saith the story) did not spare him; and hee that would not heare him gentlie correcting him being aliue, his stripes did he feele when he was dead, so that he neuer after that inioyed any luckie or prosperous day, till the time of his death, nor yet any prosperous or quiet night vntill the morning. And so continued he vnto his death, which shortly after insued he being at Naples. An. 1255. or as N. Triuet recordeth, An. 1254. And thus haue ye the whole discourse betweene Robert Grosthead and pope Innocent.

The reuenge of God vpon pope Innocent.

The popes armie vanquished and confounded.

The death of pope Innocent the fourth.

{Anno 1255}

In the which storie is to bee noted, gentle reader, that although in the storie of Cestrensis, of Matthew Paris, and of Flor. hist. it is expressie testified and reported, that the pope was smitten with the staffe of Robert the foresaid bishop of Lincolne; yet thou must wisely vnderstand, that howsoeuer Gods hand dealeth heere in this world in punishing his enemies, or howsoeuer the image of things not seene but fantasied, offer themselues to the secret cogitation of man, his senses being asleepe, by the operation or permission of God, working after some spirituall influence in our imaginations: certaine it is, that no dead man materially can euer rise againe or appeare before the iudgement day, to any man with his staffe or without his staffe, to worke any feat, after he haue once departed this life.

A note to the reader concerning the appearing of dead men.

After the death of this Robert Grosthead bishop of Lincolne, great dissension fell betweene the archbishop of Canturburie Boniface, and the canons of the said church of Lincolne, about the right of giuing prebendships, and about the reuenues of the said church, in time of the bishops see being now vacant. Which right and power the archbishop claimed to himselfe, but the canons of that church (maintaining the contrarie side) stood against him, and for the same were excommunicated of the archbishop. Among whom one master Woolse resisting the archbishop to the face, in the name of all the other canons, made vp his appeale to Rome, where much mony on both sides was spent. At length after this Grosthead was elected Henrie Lerinton in the see of Lincolne.

Dissention betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and the church of Lincolne.

Excommunication abused. Appellation made to Rome.

Henrie Lerinton bishop of Lincolne.

About which time the wicked Iewes at Lincolne had cruelly crucified, whipped, and tormented a certaine child named Hugo of nine yeeres of age, An. 1255, in the moneth of August: Ex Gualt. Gisburne. At length the child being sought and found by the mother, being cast in a pit; two and thirtie of those abominable Iews were put to execution. Whereof Mat. Paris reciteth a long story. The same or like fact was also intended by the like Iewes at Norwich twentie yeeres before vpon a certain child, whom they had first circumcised, and detained a whole yeere in custodie, intending to crucifie him, for which the Iewes were sent vp to the towre of London, of whom eighteene were hanged, and the rest remained long in prison: Ex Cestrens. lib. 7. Of this wicked Iewish people I find also in the booke Flor. hist. that about this yeere of our Lord 1255. they began first to be expelled out of France, by the commandement of the French king, being then in Palestina, warring against the Turks: by the occasion that it was obiected them by the Turke against him and other christian princes, for the retaining the Iewes amongst them, which did crucifie our sauiour, and warring against them which did not crucifie him. Ex Flor. histor. Of these Iewes moreouer king Henrie the same yeere, 1255. eracted to be giuen vnto him eight thousand marks in paine of hanging. Who being much grieued therewith, and complaining that the king went about their destruction, desired leaue to be giuen them of the king, that they might depart the realme, neuer to returne againe. But the king committed the doing of that matter vnto earle Richard his brother, to inforce them to pay the monie whether they would or no. Moreouer of the same Iewes mention is made in the storie intituled Eulogium. Of the Iewes in Northhampton, who had among themselues prepared wild fire, to burne the citie of London, for the which diuers of them were taken, and burned in the time of Lent, in the said citie of Northhampton, which was two yeeres before, about the yeere of our Lord 1252. Ex Eulogio. And for somuch as mention heere is made of the Iewes, I cannot omit what some English stories write of a certaine Iew, who not long after this time about the yeere of our Lord 1257. fell into a priuie at Teukesburie vpon a sabbath day, which for the great reuerence he had to his holy sabbath, would not suffer himselfe to be plucked out. And so lord Richard earle of Gloucester, hearing thereof, would not suffer him to bee drawne out on sunday for reuerence of the holy day. And thus the wretched superstitious Iew remaining there till monday,

A child crucified of the Iewes at Lincolne.

Ex N. Triuet. Ex Cestrensi, lib 7. cap. 34. Ex Flor. hist.

The Iewes expelled out of France.

A child circumcised of the Iewes, and kept a whole yeere to be crucified.

The Iewes ask leaue to depart the realme of England.

Ex Eulogio.

Iewes burned at Northhampton.

A Iew fallen into a priuie would not be taken out for keeping his sabbath day.

Digitized by Google

day, was found dead in the dung.

And to note the blind superstition of that time, not onelie among the Iewes, but also among the christians, to omit diuers other stories, as of Walter Gray archbishop of Yorke, who comming vp to the parliament at London, An. 1255. with vnordinat fasting did so ouercharge nature, and pined himselfe, and (as the storie mentioneth) did so drie vp his braine, that he losing thereby al appetit of stomach, going to Fulham, there within three daies died, as in the compiler of Flor. hist. is both storied and reprehended. Let this also be adioyned, which the forenamed author, and in the same yeere is recorded of one named Peter Chareporre, who dying in France, An. 1255. left in bequest of his testament 600. marks for lands to be purchased to the house of Merton for God to be serued there perpetually Pro anima eius, & omnium fideliu̇, that is, For his soules health, and all faithfull soules. As who would say, christian faith were not the ordinarie means sufficient to saluation of faithfull soules, without the quire-seruice of the monks of Merton.

Superstitious fasting noted in Walter archbishop of Yorke.

Ex Flor. hist.

Superstition in seeking saluation by wrong meanes.

We haue heard it often complained before, how the vsurped power of the pope hath violently and presumptuouslie incroched vpon the church of England, in giuing and conferring benefices and prebends to his Italians and strangers, to the great damage and ruine of Christs flocke manifold waies. This violent iniurie and oppression of the pope, as by no lawfull and gentle meanes could be reformed: so by occasion and meanes inordinat about this time, it began somewhat to bee bridled. The matter whereof was this, as it is in the collector of Flor. hist. recited: In the yeere of the raigne of this king fortie and foure, the bishop of London named Fulco, had giuen a certaine prebend in the church of S. Paul, to one master Rustandus, the popes messenger heere in England. Who entring into the profession of the Gray friers, and shortlie after dying on the other side of the sea, the pope immediatlie conferred the said prebend to one of his specials, a like stranger as the other was before. About the same instant it befell, that the bishop also of London deceased, whereby the bishoprike now vacant fell into the kings hands; who hearing of the death of the forenamed Rustandus, gaue the said prebendship, giuen of the pope before, to one John Crakehale his vnder treasurour; who with all solemnitie tooke his installation, vnknowing as yet that it was bestowed of the pope before. It was not long after, as time grew, but this being noised at Rome, forthwith commeth downe a certaine proctor named John Gras, with the popes imbulled letters, to receiue the collation of the benefice by his commission procuratorie giuen by the pope, wherein John Crakehale had been alreadie installed, as is aforesaid, by the kings donatiõ. This matter comming in trauise before Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, he inquiring and searching which donation was the first, finding the popes grant to be the former, gaue sentence with him against the king, so that in conclusion, the Roman clerke had the aduantage of the benefice, although the other had long inioyed the possession thereof before. Thus the popes man being preferred, and the Englishman excluded, after the partie had been inuested and stalled after the vse and manner, he as thinking to be in sure possession of his place, attempted with the rest to enter the chapter house, but was not permitted so to doe: whereupon the popes clerke giuing place to force and number, went toward the archbishop to complaine. This being knowne, certaine recluses pursued him, and so being compassed about, one in the thicknesse of the throng being neuer after knowne, suddenly rushing vpon him, a little aboue his eies so pareth off his head, that hee fell downe dead; the same also was done to another of his fellowes in flying away. This hainous murder being famed abroad, strait inquirie thereof was made, but the deed doer could not be knowne; although great suspicion was laid vpon Crakehale the kings chaplen, yet no proofe could bee brought. But most men thought, that bloudie fact to be done by certaine ruffians, or other light persons about the citie or the court, disdaining belike that the Romans were so inriched with Englishmens liuings, by whom neither came relefe to any Englishman, nor any godly instruction to the flocke of Christ. And therefore becaule they saw the church and realme of England in such subiection, and so much to be troden downe by the Romans and the popes messengers: they thought thereby something to bridle, as with a snaffle, the popes messengers from their vntemperat ranging into this land. Ex Flor. hist.

The popes iniurious to the church of England.

A prebendship of Pauls giuen both of the pope and of the king at one time to two seuerall persons.

Two Roman clerks going to complaine, were slaine by the way.

Heere by the way is to be noted, that vnto the death of this foresaid Fulco bishop of London, continueth the historie of Matthew Paris monke of saint Albons, which was to the yeere of Grace 1260. The residue was continued by another monke of the same house, but not with such like commendation, worthie to make any autentike storie, as I haue seene it noted in a written booke.

The storie of Mat. Paris heere ceaseth.

It were too curious and tedious in order to prosecute what happened in euery yeere, through this kings raigne, as how it was prouided by the king, that whosoeuer could dispend fiftéene pounds land by yeere, should be bound to make to the king a souldier, that watch should be kept euery night in cities, that whosoeuer was robbed, or otherwise damnified in any countrie, he that had the custodie should bee compelled to make vp the losse againe, or else to pursue the malefactor: which was

The popes donation preferred before the kings.

An. 1253. witnessing Flores hist. Item, how the king making his voiage into Vascon, his expenses were reckoned to mount to 270000. marks, beside thirtie thousand marks beslowed vpon his brethren by the mothers side, & besides other great gifts giuen abroad. By reason whereof, great tares and tolonies and tenths were required of his subiects: especially of the churchmen, who were wont to receiue tithes of others, now were constrained to giue tithes to the laitie: Flores hist. An. 1254. Item, how in the yeere next following, the Londoners offring one hundred pounds for a gift to the king with a pretious cup of gold, at his returne out of France, were shortly after compelled by the king to pay three thousand marks for the scape of a certaine prisoner being a clerke condemned: which clerke being granted of the king to the bishop, and hee hauing no prison sufficient for him borrowed of the Londoners to haue him kept in the prison of Newgat, who escaping thereout, they, as is said, were demanded this recompence aforesaid, An. 1255. Item, how the king greatly complaining of his debts the same yeere, required the whole tenths which should bee gathered in three yeeres, to be taken vp all at once. To whose request the nobles and commons agreed to straine themselues, so that the charter of their liberties and customs might bee ratified, and fully by him confirmed: and so for that yeere they were: Flores hist. Item, how pope Alexander the third to destroy the citie Mychera, with king Menfred the sonne of Frederike the emperor, sent forth the same yeere Octauianus his cardinall with a puissant armie, who comming to the citie with his siege, through the counsel of Marchisius one of ỳ chiefe captains, discharged a great part of his host, whereby the most of the popes armie was slaine and destroyed, almost all, saue onely the familie of Marchisius, An. 1255. Flor. Mat. Paris.

Pope Alexander the third maketh war.

The popes armie slaine.

Many other things during the time of this king might be congested, as the rising of Lewlinus king of Wales, and of the Welchmen against the king, and walking the land vnto the towne of Chester, who destroyed diuers of the Englishmens horsemen taken in the marish, with whom at length they fell to agreement by the meanes of Octobonus, that his successors should be called princes onlie of Wales, and should doe the king his homage: and the king of him to receiue three thousand marks. And this being established in writting, was confirmed by the popes seale, in the yeere of our Lord 1257. Ex Polychron.

Lewlinus king of Wales wareth against the king.

Lewlinus and the king concord.

Ex Polychro. l. 7.

About the same time, such famine oppressed the land and lacke of victuals, that a sum of corne was then sold for fire and twentie shillings, in so much that the pouerty was forced to eat nettle roots, thistell roots; and what soeuer they could get: Ex Eulogio. Although some refer this to the yeere 1262.

Ex autore Eulogij.

Heereunto moreouer might be adioyned, how pope Alexander abusing and mocking the kings simplicitie, made him beleeue that he would make his sonne Edmund king of Apulia, so that hee would sustaine the charges and cost thereof, to maintaine the war which thereto should appertaine. Whereby the king cast in a sudden hope, caused his sonne incontinent to bee proclamed king of Apulia; and vpon the same sent vp to the pope all the riches he could well make in his realme. And thus was the realme manifold waies miserablie impouerished to inrich the pope: Ex Flor. hist. About which season, Richard earle of Excester the kings brother, was made king of Almane by the electors.

Anno 1257

Pope Alexander to make shift for monie maketh the king beleeue his son should be king of Apulia.

Richard the kings brother made king of Almane.

Heere might be shewed moreouer and added to the stories aboue, how the next yeere following, which was 1259. as Nicolas Triuet writeth, the king entring into France, required the restitution of such lands in Normandie and Anion, as of old right were due vnto him, and wrongfullie withholden from him. But the French king againe alleaged saying, that the countrie of Normandie by old time was not giuen away from the crowne of France, but vsurped, and by force extorted by Rollo, &c. In conclusion, the king fearing and suspecting the hearts of his nobles, and looking for none other but for rebellion at home, durst not trie with them, but was compelled to agree with them vpon such peace and conditions as hee could get, which was this: That hee should haue of the French king thirteene hundred thousand of Turen pounds, with so much lands else as came to the value of twentie thousand pounds in yerelie rent: so should he resigne fullie and purely to the hands of the French king, all such lands and possessions which he had in France. Whereby the king giuing ouer his stile and titles which he had in those parts, ceased then to bee called duke of Normandie, or earle of Anion.

What ciuill discord worketh

Resignation of the earledom of Normandie and Anion.

Albeit it be true that Gisburne writeth, the king afterward repenting of his deed, did neuer receiue the monie in all his life, neither did he cease during his life to intitle himselfe duke of Normandie. But after him, his sonne Edward and his successor in their stile left out the title to bee called duke of Normandie, &c. Ex Gisburn.

Ex Gual. Gisburn.

Besides many other matters omitted, heere I ouerpasse also the sore and vehement conflict, not betweene the frogs and the mise which Homer writeth of, but the mightie pitched field fought in the yeere of our Lord 1259. betweene the young students and scholars of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, hauing no other occasion, as I read in Mat. Paris, but onelie the diuersitie of the countrie where they were borne. For the Northerne men

The conflict and skirmish betweene the Northerne Welchmen, and the Southerne men in Oxford.

Digitized by Google

men ioyning with the Welchmen, to trie their manhod against the Southerne part, fell both parts together in such a broile, with their ensignes and warlike aray, that in conclusion diuers on both sides were slaine. This heauie and bloudie conflict during and increasing among them, the end was this: that the Northerne lads with the Welch had the victorie. After that furie and fiery fiercenesse had done what it could, the victorers bethinking at length with themselues, partly what they had done, partly how it would be taken of the higher powers, and fearing due punishment to fall vpon them, especiallie seeing the brother of Leolin prince of Wales, and sonne of Griffine, was newlie dead in prison, drawing their counsell and helps together, they offer to king Henry 4000. marks, to Edward his sonne 300. and to the quéene 200. to bée released of their trespasse. But the king answering them againe, that hee set more price by the life of one true subiect, then by all which by them was offered, would in no wise receiue their mony. And so the students without hope of peace, went home with small triumph, learning what the common prouerbe meaneth, Dulce bellum inexpertis. Notwithstanding, the king being then occupied in great affaires and warres, partlie with Leolin and the Welchmen, partly inwrapped with discord at home with his nobles, had no leisure to attend to the correction of these Vniuersitie men, which was, An. 1259. Ex Matt. Parisiensi. Likewise concerning the dissension following the next yéere after, in the Vniuersitie of Paris betweene the students there, and the friers, the number of whom then did so much increase, that the commons vneth was able to sustaine them with their almes. Also betwéen the Vniuersities both of Oxford & Cambridge, for a certaine prisoner taken out of prison by strength, and brought into sanctuarie the same yéere, as is testified in Mat. thew Paris, An. 1259. In like manner touching the variance betweene the archbishop of Canturburie, and the chapter of Lincolne. Againe, betweene the said archbishop of Canturburie, and the chapter and bishop of London; and how the said bishop at his consecration would not make his profession to the archbishop but with this exception, Saluis iure & libertate ecclesiæ Londinensis, quæ pro posse meo defendam in omnibus, &c: recorded in Flor. hist. All which wranglings and dissensions, with innumerable others raigning daily in the church at those daies, if I had so much leisure to prosecute them as I find them in stories remaining, might sufficiently induce vs to vnderstand what small peace and agréement was then ioyned with that doctrine and religion in those daies, during the state and raigne of antichrist.

Variance betweene the students and the friers in Paris.

Variance betweene the Vniuersitie of Oxford and Cambridge.

Variance betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and the chapter of Lincolne.

Variance betweene the archbishop of Canturburie and the chapter of London.

Ex Flor. hist.

Little peace in the popes church.

These with many such other matters more, which heere might bee discoursed and storied at large, being more forren then ecclesiasticall, for breuitie I doe purposely contract and omit, cutting off all such superfluities as may séeme more curious to write vpon, then necessarie to be knowne.

Histories profitable for example.

This that followeth, concerning the pitifull and turbulent commotion betwéene the king and the nobles, which lasted a long season; because it is lamentable and containeth much fruitfull example, both for princes and subiects to behold and looke vpon, to sée what mischiefe and inconuenience groweth in common weales, where studie of mutuall concord lacketh, that is, where neither the prince regardeth the offending of his subiects, and where the subiects forget the office of christian patience, in suffering their princes iniuries by Gods wrath inflicted for their sinnes: therefore, in explaning the order and story thereof, I thought it not vnprofitable to occupie the reader with a little more tariance in perusing the full discourse of this so lamentable a matter, and so pernicious to the publike weale.

The occasion of commotion betweene the king and the nobles.

And first to declare the occasions and first beginnings of this tumult, heere is to be vnderstood, which before was signified, how king Henrie married with Eleonor, daughter of the earle of Prouans a stranger, which was about the yeere of our Lord 1234, wherupon a great doore was opened for strangers, not onely to enter the land, but also to replenish the court: to whom the king séemed more to incline his fauour, aduancing them to more preferment, then his owne naturall English lords, which thing was to them no little grieuance. Moreouer, before was declared how the king by Isabell his mother, who was a stranger, had diuers brethren, whom hée nourished vp with great liuings and possessions, and large pensions of monie, which was another hart sore to diuers, and also an hinderance. Ouer and beside, hath also béen declared, what vnreasonable collections of monie from time to time, as quindecims, subsidies, tenths, mercements, fines, paiments, loues, and taxes, haue béen leuied by the king, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the lay sort, partly for maintaining the kings wars against Wales, against Scotland and France, to recouer Normandie; partly for helping the kings debts, voiages, and other expenses; partly for the kingdome of Apulia, which was promised the kings sonne by the pope; partlie for monying and supporting the pope in his wars against the emperour. By reason of all which sundrie and importable collections, the common wealth of the realme was vtterly exhaust, to the great impouerishment of more Englishmen. Neither did it a little ver the people, to sée the king call in so many legats from Rome euery yéere, which did nothing else but transport the English monie vnto the popes coffers. Besides all this, what variance and alteration hath béen betweene the king and his subiects about the liberties of Magna charta, and Deforesta, granted by king John, and after confirmed by this king, in the former councell holden at Oxford, hath been before declared.

Perhaps this might be also some péece of a cause, that the king considering and bearing in mind the old iniuries done of the lords and barons to his father king John before him, did beare some grudge therefore, or some priuie hatred vnto the nobilitie, to reuenge his fathers quarrell: but of things vncertaine I haue nothing certainely to affirme. This is certaine by truth of history, that the yeere next insuing, which was 1260. thus writeth Nic. Triuet, that the kings iustices called Itinerarij, being sent thither to execute their office, were from thence repelled: the cause being alleaged, for that they were against the king in proceéding & enterprising against the forme of the prouisions enacted and established a little before at the towne of Oxford.

✣ In this yéere it pleased the king after sute to him made, to licence a Vniuersitie or academicall schoole to bee planted in the towne of Northhampton; and of a speciall fauour which he pretended to beare (and like inough did indéed) vnto the scholars that went there to seat themselues, and to prosecute the exercises of studies, wrote his letters mandatorie vnto the chiefe officers and others of the said burrow, in the said students behalfe; the tenor whereof followeth agréeing with the record.

Anno 1260

The kings letter to the maior, bailiffes, and others the inhabitants of Northhampton, in the behalfe of certaine scholars minded to plant themselues there as in an Vniuersitie.

Rex dilectis & fidelibus suis, maiori, balliuis, & cæteris probis hominibus suis de Northampton, salutem. Cum quidam magistri & alij scholares proponant, &c. In English thus. Turris Lond.

The king to his beloued and trustie the maior, bailiffes, and other honest men his subiects of Northhampton, greeting. Whereas certaine masters and other scholars doe purpose to tarrie in your towne corporat, there to exercise scholarlie discipline, as we heare: wee heereupon regarding the seruice of God, and the greater profit of our kingdome, taking in good part the comming thither of the said scholars, and liking well their abode there, doe will and grant that the said scholars in the said towne corporat vnder our protection and defence, doe safelie and securely abide, and there exercise and doe such things, as to such scholars shall belong. And therefore we command you and straitly charge you, that when the said scholars shall come vnto you, to tarrie in your said corporat towne, you receiue them courteouslie, and as becommeth the state of scholars vse them, not doing or suffering to bee done vnto them any impediment, molestation, or grieuance. In witnesse whereof, wee haue caused these our letters patents to bee made. Witnesse the king at Windesore, the first day of Februarie, in the fiue and fortith yeere of his raigne.

Touching a Vniuersitie for scholars to be kept at Northhampton.

It befell moreouer in the same yéere, aboue other times (as Gualter Hemingford writeth) that a great number of aliens comming out of France and other prouinces, resorted into England, and had heere the doing of all principall matters of the realme vnder the king. Vnto whom the rewards and reliefs, and other emoluments of the land did most chiefly redound: which thing to sée, did not a little trouble and ver the nobilitie and baronage of England. In so much that Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, offering to stand to death for the liberties and wealth of the realme, conferred together with other lords and barons vpon the matter; who then comming vnto the king after an humble sort of petition, declared vnto him how all the doings of his realme, and his owne affaires, were altogether disposed by the hands, and after the wils of strangers, neither profitable vnto him, nor to the weale publike: for so much as his treasures being wasted and consumed, hee was in great debt, neither was able to satisfie the prouision of his owne house, but driuen to tallie for his owne cates, to no small dishonor vnto his owne state. And now therefore, said they, pleaseth your highnesse to be informed by our aduice, and to commit your house to the guiding and gouernment of your owne faithfull and naturall subiects, and we will take vpon vs to discharge your whole debt within one yéere, of our own proper goods and reuenues, so that wee within fiue yeeres may cléere our selues againe. Neither weill we diminish your familie, but rather increase it with a much greater retinue; prouiding so for the safetie and séeing to the custodie of your roiall person, as your highnesse shall find and vnderstand our diligence most trustie and faithfull vnto you in the end.

Strangers hauing all the wealth of the realme vnder the king.

Ex Gualt. Gisburn.

The words of the nobles to the king.

To these words so louingly declared, so humblie pretended, so hartily and freely offered, the king as willinglie condescended, assigning vnto them both day and place where to confer and to deliberat further vpon the matter, which should be at Oxford the fifteenth day after Easter. At which day and place, all the states and lords, with the bishops of the realme, were summoned to appeare at the said towne of Oxford for the

The king graunteth to his lords.

A sitting of the king and lords at Oxford.

Digitized by Google

The prouisions or lawes made at Oxford.

The king sweareth vnto the prouisions made at Oxford.

for the behalfe of the king and the realme conuented together. Where first of the king himselfe, then of the lords, an oth was taken, that what decrees or lawes in the said assemblie should be prouided to the profit of the king and of the realme, the same vniuersallie should be kept and obserued to the honor of God, and vtilitie of his church, and wealth of the realme. Besides these lords and the king, were also nine bishops, which swearing vnto the same, did excommunicat all such as should gainstand the said prouisions there made, the king holding a burning taper in his hand, and the lords openly protesting to rise with all their force against all them that shall stand against the same.

The kings brethren against the prouisions at Oxford.

There were at that present in the realme foure brethren of the kings (most part of them by the mothers side) which would in no case agree hereunto, but in anger departed priuilie vnto Winchester. The nobles hearing thereof, in all speedie wise pursued them, fearing lest they should take the citie of Winchester and for ceablie keepe the same. Wherefore the lords preuenting their purpose, and seeing them stiffly to persist in their stubborne sentence, wrought no other violence against them, but returning to Oxford againe, prescribed to them these conditions, that they departing the realme should repaire to their owne lands and possessions, which they had beyond the sea: and that forthwith they should put this iniunction in execution. Notwithstanding that the king made for them great intercession, yet it toke no place. And because this should seeme to proceed of no speciall displeasure against them, they enacted moreouer, that all strangers and aliens of what state or condition soeuer, should forthwith auoid the realme in paine of death.

The prouisions of Oxford.

Diuers other prouisions the same time were ordained & stablished; that if any did hold of the king in whole or in part, and should chance him to depart (his heire being vnder age) the wardship of him should belong to the king, as hath partlie before been specified.

Exhibit. Gualt. Gisburnensis. God grant this law might take place againe. God grant the like law againe for the wealth of the realme.

Moreouer, it was there decreed, that the woll of England should be wrought only within the realme, neither should it be transported out to strangers.

Item, that no man should weare any cloth, but which was wrought and made onely within the realme.

Item, that garments too sumptuous shuld not be brought in nor worne.

Item, that all excessiue and prodigall expences vsed vpon pleasure and superfluitie, should be eschewed of all persons.

Diuers in this councell impoisoned.

Many other lawes and decrees (saith the author) in this assemblie were ordained, wherein they continued the space of fiftéene daies; and many of them were impoisoned, of whom was the abbat of Westminster, a man in that order, much commended. Also William brother to the earle of Gloucester: also the earle himselfe being impoisoned, hardly escaped with life, his haire and nailes falling off his bodie, whereof the author not long after was taken, and dulie executed at Winchester. In the meane time, the nobles considering those dangers and ieopardies, were constrained to breake off for that time, appointing the fourteenth day of October next following to conuent together at London with weapō and harnesse, to prosecute and finish the residue that was in the said councell to be concluded. All which at the time and place appointed was fully accomplished, and the acts thereof in order of writing promulgated, and so committed to execution.

The king repenteth of his oth.

Anno 1261

After the promulgation whereof many things therein displeased the king, and it began to repent him of his oth. But because he could not at that present otherwise chuse, he dissembled for a season. Thus time passing on, within a yeere following, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1261. the king seeing himselfe more and more to grow in debt, and not to bee relieued according to promise made, but especially being egged (as may be thought) by his brethren taking it to stomach, sent vp to the pope, both for him and his sonne Edward to bee released of their oth made before at Oxford. The benefit of which absolution being easilie obtained (or rather bought at the popes hand) the king stepping backe from all that was before concluded, calleth another parliament at Oxford: where hee before the lords and nobles declared, how in the late councell of Oxford they had agreed among themselues for the common vtilitie of the realme and of the king, as they pretended, for the increasing of his treasure, and his debt to be diminished. And thereupon bound themselues with an oth, causing also himselfe and his sonne Edward to bee bound vnto the same. But now by experience proouing and trying the matter to bee otherwise then their promise was; and that they contrarie to their couenant made, sought not so much the profit of him and of the realme, as their owne, taking him not as their lord, but going about to bring him vnder their subiection as an vnderling; and for that moreouer his treasure greatly decreasing, his debts increased, and his princely liberalitie was cut short and troden vnder foot: they should not maruell therefore, if he henceforth would bee no more ruled by their counsell, but would prouide himselfe of some other remedie, such as hee might. And moreouer, as touching the oth wherewith he and his sonne stood bound vnto them, he had sent alreadie to Rome, and had obtained absolution and dispensation of the same, both for him and his sonne Edward also, and for all others that would take his part. And therefore hee required of them to be restored againe to that state and condition he had inioyed in times past.

The king releaseth to the pope to release him of his oth.

The popes absolution abused.

The answer of the nobles againe to the king.

To this againe gaue answer the state of nobilitie on the other side, being in the same place present: in the number of whom was Symon Mountfort earle of Leicester, Richard Clare earle of Gloucester, Humfrey Bonne earle Ferrence with a great number of barons, as lord John Fitz John, lord Hastings, lord Geffreie Lucie, lord John Welcie, lord William Segraue, Hugh Spenser, lord Robert Uespoint, with diuers and many more; whose answer to the king againe was this: That the prouisions made at the councell of Oxford (thereunto they were sworne) they would hold, defend and maintaine to their liues end: for so much as they did sound, and also were agreed vpon, both to the honor of God, to the profit of the prince, and stable wealth of the realme, &c. And thus parts on both sides discording amongst themselues, would so haue departed, had not certaine of the bishops comming betweene both, laboured betweene them to take vp the matter. By whose meane (saith Gualter Gilburne) and procurement, the determination of the cause was brought in compromise, and referred to Ludouike the French king to iudge betwixt them; who hearing both the allegations (saith he) like no equall iudge but a partiall friend, inclined wholly and fully to the kings sentence, and condemned the nobles. But the author of Flores historiarum saith, that by the mediation of discréet men, two were chosen, one for one side, the other for the other, to whom the third also was annexed, who hearing as well what was brought of the kings part, as also what was answered of the other, should define betweene them both, and so peace was betweene them concluded till the comming of Edward. All this while as yet the popes absolution for the king, although it was granted and obtained at Rome, yet was it not brought downe in solemne writing, neither was prince Edward as yet returned out of France into England.

The controuersie betweene the king and the nobles put in compromise.

At length, the writing of the kings absolution being brought from Rome, the king eftsoones commanded the same to bee published throughout the realme, and sendeth to the French king and other strangers for helpe; moreouer seizeth all his castels into his owne hand, reiecting the counsell of the lords, to whose custodie they were before committed; also remouing the former officers, as iustices, and the chancellor, with other placed afore by the lords, hee appointed new in their stead.

The pope releaseth the king of his oth.

To this foresaid absolution procured from Rome for the king and his sonne, Edward returning out of France, at that time did not giue his consent, but held with the lords. Who then putting themselues in arms, with a great power repaired vp to London, keeping there in the suburbs and places about, while the king kept within the towre, causing the citie gates to bee watched and lockt, and all within the said citie being aboue the age of twelue yéeres, to be sworne vnto him. But at length through the meanes of certaine comming betweéne, this tumultuous perturbation was somewhat appeased, at least some hope of peace appeared, so that the matter was taken vp for that time without war or bloudshed. Notwithstanding, some false pretenced dissemblers there were, which secretly disclosing all the counsels and doings of the lords vnto the king, did all they could to hinder concord, and to kindle debate. By the means of whom the purpose of the lords came not to so good effect, as otherwise it might. Ex Flor. hist.

Wicked make bates.

Ex Flor. hist. in An. 1261.

✻ In this yéere the archbishop of Canturburie with his suffragans (after their wonted manner) standing against the king, had made their appeale to Rome: whereupon the king was faine to answer by proxe, as appeareth by this briefe note drawne out of record. Rex constituit Iohannē Hemingford procuratorem suum in causa appellationis, &c. The king hath appointed and made Iohn Hemingford his proctor in a cause of appeale which is mooued in the court of Rome, betweene the king on the one part, and the archbishop of Canturburie with his suffragans on the other part, about certaine ordinances, constitutions, and decrees lately in a councell prouinciall at London by them published, to the preiudice of the kings right, his dignitie royall, the liberties, lawes and customs of his kingdome.

Ordinances in a prouinciall councell at London against the kings right.

This matter no doubt was laboured verie diligentlie by the said John Hemingford, who was to that end authorised by the king to make his abode at Rome, during the time that any manner of processe was held and maintained against him, to the impeaching of his roialtie. Whereof the king had a speciall regard, perceiuing the wailwardnesse of his owne clergie, or rather rebellioulnesse in daring to decree and ordaine lawes against him. And therefore he was the more carefull to haue all matters depending in the court of Rome concerning him and his, to be earnestly followed. In so much as he ioyned to the foresaid Hemingford in the charge of procuration, one Roger Louell: vnto which two residing at Rome, the king sent his letters, charging them so to manage his affaires, as that nothing might passe to the derogation of his roiall title: the copie of the said letter followeth agreeing with the prototypon or originall.

Digitized by Google

A letter of the king sent to his proctors at Rome concerning a case of his in the said court depending.

Turris Lond.

Against the proceedings in the court of Rome tending to the hurt and preiudice of the king.

R Ex magistris Iohanni de Hemingford & Rogero Louell procuratoribus suis in curia Romana agentibus, salutē, &c. Cum vobis tanquam fidelibus nostris, &c. In English thus.

The king to master Iohn of Hemingford, and Roger Louel his proctors pleading in the court of Rome, greeting. Forsomuch as vpon you our trustie and vowed seruants the defense of our right and honour doth lie; and (as we heare) certaine of our realme pleading in the court of Rome, doe mooue diuers matters to the preiudice of our right and honour, presuming and intending to preuaile against vs, we command you, and straitlie charge you, that on our behalfe you straitly forbid all and euery of them, that they presume not any further to vndertake such things as tend to the hurt of our maiestie, and the derogation of our honour, but wholly forbeare so to do, as they will auoid our indignation, and the perill of them and theirs. This inhibition also we will by you all and euery of you (so often as you shall see needful) to be made knowne, and thereupon by you or some of you to bee certified of the contemners of the same. Witnesse the king at Westminster the six and twentith of March, in the six and fortith yeere of his raigne.

Bishops going about to recouer benefices appropriat from religious houses.

Ex Florilego ibid.

In this present yeere also (as affirmeth the forenamed author) it was rumored abrode (as Flores historiarum reporteth) that all the bishops of England went about to recouer againe out of the hands of religious men, all such churches and benefices, (which were to them impropriated or appropriated: and that they, for the expedition of the same, had sent vp to Rome both messengers and monie, nothing misdoubting to obtaine their purpose. But as little good fruit in those daies vsed to spring out of that see, so I doe not find that godlie suite and labour of the bishops to take any fruitfull effect. The same yeere died pope Alexander, after whom succeeded pope Vrban the fourth.

Pope Alexander dieth. Pope Vrban.

Anno 1262

A new release of the kings oth from Rome, with this epitaph:

Hic pudor Hypoliti Paridis Genasensis Vlyssis. Aeneæ pietas, Hectoris ira iacet.

Of the which pope Vrban the king also obtained (or rather renued) a new releasement from his oth made to the prouisions and statutes of Oxford. Which being granted, hee commandeth incontinent all the foresaid lawes and prouisions through England to bee dissolued and broken. This done, the king with the queene taketh his voiage into France, where he fell into great infirmitie of sickenesse, and the most part of his familie taken with the feuer quartane, of which many died. In the number of whom beside others, died Richard the worthie earle of Glocester and Hereford, after whom succeeded Gilbert Clare his sonne.

The Welchmen rebell.

The Welchmen this yeere breaking into the borders of England, did much annoiance in the lands of Roger lord Mortimer; but mightily againe by him were expelled, not without great slaughter of the inuaders. About which time, the king through some discreet counsell about him, inclined to peace and concord with his nobles, granting of his meere voluntarie will the constitutions and prouisions of Oxford to take place in the realme directing his commandement to euerie shire. Albeit the realme yet was not altogether pacified for all that.

The prouisions of Oxford againe granted by the king.

The kings palace at Westminster burnt with fire.

In the latter end of this yeere, the kings palace at Westminster was burnt, and for the most part was all consumed with fire, which seemed to many an euill prognosticat against the king. Ex Flor. hist.

Vsurie punished for taking aboue two pence a weeke in a pound.

In some English chronicles it is also recorded, that the same yeere, fiue hundred Iewes at London were slaine for taking vsurie more then two pence a weake for twentie shillings, being before forbidden by the king to take aboue that rate by the weeke.

Anno 1263

After this followeth the yeere 1263. in which the barons of England confederating themselues together, for maintaining the statutes and lawes of Oxford, and partly mooued with old grudge conceiued against the strangers (maintained by the king and the queene, and Edward their sonne, in the realme of England) ioyned powers in all forceable wise, and first inuaded the said strangers, namelie them which were about the king. Their goods and manors they wasted and spoiled, whether they were persons ecclesiasticall or temporall. Among whom, besides others, was Peter a Burgundian (bishop of Hereford a rich prelat) with all his treasure apprehended and spoiled: also his countriemen, whom he had placed to be canons of the same church. With like order of handling other aliens also, to whom was committed the custodie of diuers castels, as of Glocester, of Worcester, of Bridgenorth, were spoiled, imprisoned, and sent away. Briefly, whatsoeuer he was in all the land that could not vtter the English tongue, was of euery rascall disdained, and happie if he might so escape. By reason whereof it so came to passe, that a great number, as well of other forrenners, as especiallie religious men, and rich priests (which here had gathered much substance) were vrged to that extremitie, that they were glad to flee the land. In the catalogue of whom was one most principall, named John Maunsell, a priest notoriouslie growne in riches and treasures not to bee told, hauing in his hand so many and rich benefices, that neere no bishop of this realme might compare with him in riches. Who notwithstanding he kept with the king at London, yet was compelled priuilie to voide the realme, and was pursued by Henry the sonne of Richard king of Almaine. Certaine other strangers there were, to the number of 200. and more, which hauing the castell of Windsor, there immured and intrenched themselues, to whom at length prince Edward also adioyned himselfe.

The nobles rising against the strangers hauing the commoditie of the realme.

Peter of Hereford a Burgundian a rich bishop.

John Maunsell a rich priest.

The king againe agreeth with the nobles.

In the meane time while this stir was abroad, the king keeping them in the Tower, and seeing the greatest part of his nobles and commons with the Londoners to be set against him, agreed to the peace of the barons, and was contented to assent againe to the ordinances and prouisions of Oxford; albeit the queene by all meanes possible went about to perswade the king not to assent thereto: who as it seemed, was a great worker in kindling this fire of discord betweene the king and the barons. Insomuch that when as the said queene Elenor should passe by barge from the Tower to Windsor, the Londoners standing vpon the bridge, with their exclamations, cursings, and throwing of stones and dirt at her, interrupted her course, causing her to returne to the Tower againe. Notwithstanding, the peace yet continued with the nobles and the king, the forme wherof was this. First, that Henrie the sonne of Richard king of the Romans should bee deliuered by the king and queene. Secondly, that the castles againe should be committed to the custodie of Englishmen, not of strangers. Thirdly, that the prouisions and statutes decreed at Oxford, should as well by the king, as by all others inuiolablie be obserued. Fourthlie, that the realm henceforth should bee ruled and gouerned not by forrenners, but by personages borne within the land. Fiftly, that all aliens and strangers should void the land, not to returne againe; except only such, whose abode should by the common assent of the kings trustie subiects be admitted and allowed.

The queene a great cause of this debate.

The forme of peace concluded betweene the king and the nobles.

Thus the king and the nobles ioyning together after this forme of peace aboue prefixed, although not fullie with heart, as after appeared, put themselues in armes with all their power to recouer the castel of Windsor out of the strangers hands. But Edward in the mid way betweene London & the castell, meeting with his father and the barons, entred communication vpon the matter. Which being finished, and he thinking to returne into the castell againe, by the policie of the earle of Leicester, and William bishop of Worcester, was not permitted to reenter. Whereupon the strangers within the hold (destitute of all hope to withstand the great force approching) rendered the castell vnto the king and the barons vpon this conuention: That with horse and harnesse they might be suffered safe to depart the land, not to returne any more. Which being granted, certaine of the barons conducted them in their iourny towards the sea side, and there they left them.

The castell of Windsor recouered out of the hands of strangers.

In the same yeere about the beginning of October, the king and queene made ouer to France, with Simon Mountfort and other nobles, to heare and stand to the arbitrement of Lewis the French king, concerning the controuersie betweene the states of England, and all through the procurement of Elenor the queene. For shee not forgetting the old contumelie of the Londoners, exclaming against her vpon the bridge, wrought alwaies what reuenge shee could against them. Concerning the arbitrement of this matter put to the French king, partlie hath been said before, and more shall be said (Christ willing) hereafter. Some stories do ad moreouer, that the king continuing long in France, word was sent to him out of England, that vnlesse he returned againe to the realme, they would elect a new king. Whereupon the king returning out of France to Douer, would haue entred the castell, but hee was stopped. Wherfore the king in fierce anger and great indignation prepared his power towards London; where Simon Mountfort the worthie earle of Leicester, through a subtill traine was almost betrayed and circumuented in Southworke, by the sudden pursuing of the kings armie; had not the Londoners with more speed breaking bars and chaines, made way to rescue him, by the meanes of whom the earle at that time escaped the danger.

Manet alta mente repositum iudicium Paridis, &c. Virg.

The sentence of the French king, with the king of England against the barons.

Now to come to the sentence of the French king. Forsomuch as the arbitrement of this matter was committed to him, as hath before been specified; he in a great frequencie both of French and English persons about him, considering and pensing the cause on both sides, betweene the king and the nobles; clearely and solemnelie pronounced on the kings side against the barons, ordaining that the king of England all this while had suffered wrong, and that hee should be restored againe to his pristine state, notwithstanding the prouisions made at Oxford, which hee ordained to be repealed and abrogated. Ex Flor. hist. Gisburn.

Ex Flor. hist. Ex Gisbur. & alij.

The sentence of the French king thus awarded, as it gaue to the king of England with his retinue no little incouragement, so it wrought in the nobles hearts great indignation; which, notwithstanding that partial decrement of the French king, sped themselues home out of France to defend themselues with all their strength and power. And not long after followeth also the king, by whose traine Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester (as is aboue recited) was well neere circumuented

Warr betwixt the king and the barons beginneth.

Digitized by Google

uented in Southwarke. Then the king calling his councell together at Oxford (from whence hee excluded the Vniuersity of ſtudents for a ſeaſon, who were then at Northhampton, as you haue heard before) there conſulted, conferring with his friends and counſellors what way was beſt to be taken. And hearing that the barons were aſſembled in a great number at the towne of Northhampton, went thither with his hoſt and with his banners diſplaied, accompanied with Richard his brother king of Almaine, alſo with Edward his ſonne, John Comin of Scotland with many other Scots, John of Dalliolo lord of Galoway, Robert of Bruſe, lord Walter of Annand, Roger of Clifford, Philip of Marmion, John of Maus, Roger of Laiburne, Henrie Perſie, Philip Baſſet, Roger of Mortimer, and William of Valence, and many others. Therefore the king commanded the barons, that were within, to yeeld vnto him preſently the citie and the pledges, or elſe hee would immediatlie deſtroy them. But they counſelling with the younger Simon De Monte forti, which by his fathers commandement had got the reſidue thither to take counſell together (for his father & the earle of Gloceſter were not yet come) boldlie and with one mind anſwered, that they would not obay the kings will, but would rather defend themſelues and the citie if neede were euen to the death. Which the noble men of the kings part hearing, ſent word againe, that at the leaſt they ſhould come to the wall of the citie to ſpeake to the king, if by any meanes peace might bee made. And they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed their counſell, and leauing their holds, came to the wall towards the medow, for there lay the king and his ſtrong hoſt hard by. But in the meane ſpace, whileſt diuers matters were reaſoned and intreated of betweene the king and the lords: the lord Philip Baſſet (which before was appointed to worke that feate) with mattocks and other inſtruments of iron and men prepared for the nonce, neere to the monaſterie of S. Andrew, did vndermine the wall of the citie: and by this meanes, the wall fell downe lightly, and there was made a great plaine, ſo that in one forefront there might haue gone together on a row fortie horſemen. And of this ſubtiltie the alien monks that were there, were thought to be the workers, becauſe they made way and entrance for them that came in. But when they that paſſed by ſaw this, and the kings banners were erected readie to enter in; there was a great howling made, and the noiſe of the people came to the eares of the barons, and they made ſpeed to reſiſt them: but it was all in vaine, becauſe they were alreadie preuented of a great company of their enemies. But Simon Mountfort the younger, after he had valiantly fought a while in the middeſt of his enemies with Peter Mountfort, and a few that were with him, when Edward the kings ſon came, was by his commandement taken and led away priſoner. But the clerks of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford (which Vniuerſitie by the barons commandement was tranſlated thither) did worke againſt the kings men more hurt then the other barons, with their ſlings, long bowes, and croſſebowes: for they had a banner by themſelues, and that was ſet vp on high againſt the king. Wherewithall the king being greatly moued, ſware at his entring in, that they ſhuld all be hanged. Which when they heard, many of them ſhaued their crownes, and they that were able ran away as faſt as they could. And when the king entred the citie, many fled in their armor into the caſtell; others left their horſe and harneſſe and ran into churches; and a few were ſlaine, and thoſe were of the common people; but there was not much bloudſhed, becauſe all things were done as vpon the ſudden. When the city was at length ſet in quiet, the king commanded his oth to bee executed vpon the clerks. But his counſellors ſaid vnto him: This be far from thee O king, for the ſonnes of thy nobles, and of other great men of thy kingdom were there gathered together into the Vniuerſitie; whom if thou wouldeſt cauſe to bee hanged or ſlaine, euen they that now take thy part would riſe vp againſt thee, not ſuffering to the vttermoſt of their powers the bloud of their ſonnes and kinſfolks to be ſhed. And ſo the king was pacified, and his wrath againſt the clerks was ſtaid.

In the ſame day, after little more then an houre, the kings hoſt aſſaulted the caſtel, and the new hold keepers were afraid, for that they had not victuals and other things neceſſarie for their reſiſtance, therfore they ſent immediatly meſſengers vnto the king, and yeelded themſelues to the kings mercie. There were taken that day theſe knights and barons vnder written: lord William de Ferrers, lord Peter Mountfort companion of the ſaid Simon de Mountfort the younger, lord Baldwin de Wake, lord Adam de Newmarch, lord Roger Bertram, lord Simon the ſon of Simon a valiant warrior, which firſt erected his banner againſt the king, lord Berengarius de Materuile, lord Hugo Gubium, lord Thomas Maunſell, lord Roger Botemlam, Nicholas Wake, lord Robert de Newton, lord Philip de Dribie, and Grimbald de Pauncefot. All theſe aforehand did the king take priſoners and many more, of whom he committed ſome to the lord Nicholas of Hauerſam to be kept in the ſame caſtell well defenced: ſome he led away with him, and ſome hee ſent to diuers caſtles, and appointed Simon Mountfort to be caſt into Windſor caſtle. And al theſe things as touching the taking of Northhampton, were done on the ſabbath day in paſſion weeke, being the third of April, in the yeere of our Lord 1264. and the king went forward euen to Nottingham, burning and waſting the manors of the lords and others his enemies, and there he gathered together his nobles, and greatly increaſed his number.

When this ill lucke was told of them that there were run away to Yearle Simon, which was comming towards Northhampton with a great hoſt, he was in a great rage, & yet was not diſcouraged: but immediatly going to London, cauſed a chariot to be made him after the manner of litters or coches, wherein he might ride as though he were ſicke: for he ſemed himſelfe to be feeble and weake, whereas he was indeed a ſtout and valiant warrior: and there gathered to him other noble men that were confederat with him, earles and barons, euery one bringing with them their ſeuerall armies, and preparing their engins of wood, they went to beſeege Rocheſter: for the earle of Worceſter in the kings behalfe kept both the towne and caſtell. When they had gotten the firſt gate and the bridge, they were partly wounded and compelled to retire, and there that valiant knight Roger de la Bourne was wounded, and very ill handled. And whileſt they continued ſeege there a while, it was told them that the king was comming towards London with a mightie hoſt. And they ſaid one to an other, If the king at his comming ſhould take London, we ſhall be ſhut in as it were in a ſtrait corner: let vs therefore returne vnto London, that we may keepe in ſafetie both the place and the people. Therefore appointing certaine perſons to keepe the ſeege, they returned to London. At the length when the king came, they went forth with the citizens to meet him, not with flowers and palmes in their hands, but with ſwords & ſpeares. The king ſhunned them, and after he had the caſtell of Kingſton, which was the earle of Gloceſters, hee went from thence to Rocheſter, where after he had killed a few, he brake the ſeege, and from thence the king went to Tunbridge, and the towne and caſtell now being giuen vp to him, he tooke there the counteſſe of Gloceſter, and put her into an abbey, not to be kept in hold, but to go at libertie whither ſhe would. And he left for the cuſtodie of the caſtell and citie a great part of his hoſt to the number of aboue twentie picked out enſignes, for that it was commonly ſaid that the earle of Gloceſter would come out of hand to aſſault them. Which being done, he continued on his iourney to Wincheſter, where he receiued to peace the ſeamen of the hauen townes. And three daies after, vpon the ſunday following, he came to the towne of Lewis, and was receiued into the abbey, and his ſonne Edward into the caſtell. Then the barons ſent letters to the king the twelfth day of May, the tenor whereof followeth.

Vniuerſitie of Oxford remoued for a time to Northhampton.

Anno 1264

Earle Simon Mountfort faineth himſelfe ſicke.

Rocheſter beſeeged of the barons.

The nobles taken at Northhampton.

The king ſhunneth London.

Simon Mountfort the younger taken priſoner.

The ſcholars of Oxford ſtout againſt the king.

The ſtudents of Oxford ſpared.

The lords taken at Northhampton.

TO their moſt excellent lord Henry by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, his barons and others his faithfull ſubiects, being willing to keepe their oth and fidelitie to God and him, ſend greeting and due obedience with honor & reuerence. Whereas by many experiments it is manifeſt, that ſome of your graces aſſiſtants haue reported to your maieſtie manie lies of vs, working miſchiefe, as much as in them lieth not onlie againſt vs, but againſt you alſo, and your whole realme: be it knowne to your hignes, that wee haue beene alwaies willing to defend the health and ſafegard of your perſon with all our power & fealtie due to your grace, purpoſing to vex to the vttermoſt of our power and eſtate not onelie our ill willers, but alſo your enemies, and the enemies of your whole realme. If it be your good pleaſure giue no credit to them, we ſhall be alwaies found your faithfull ſubiects. And wee the earle of Leiceſter, and Gilbert of Clare, at the requeſt of others, for vs and them haue put to our ſeales.

The letter of the lords to the king.

Theſe letters being read and heard, there was a councell called, and the king writ backe to them, eſpecially to the two earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, in maner & forme following.

HEnry by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitaine, &c. To Simon Mountfort, & Gilbert de Clare, and their confederats. Forſomuch as by the war and generall diſquietnes by your means raiſed vp in our whole realme, and alſo the burnings and other hurtfull enormities, it appeareth manifeſtlie that you keepe not your fidelitie to vs ward, nor care anie thing for our health or ſafetie; and for that ye haue vnorderlie grieued our nobles, and others our faithfull ſubiects ſticking faithfullie and conſtantlie to vs (as you haue certified vs) we accounting their loſſe as our owne, and their enemies as ours; and ſeeing theſe my aforeſaid faithfull ſubiects for the keeping of their fidelitie, do aſſiſt vs manfullie and faithfullie againſt your vnfaithfulneſſe: we therefore care not for your fidelitie or loue, but defie you as our and their enemies. Witneſſe my ſelfe at Lewis the day and yeare aforeſaid.

The anſwere of the king to the lords.

Alſo Richard king of Almaine, and lord Edward the ſonne of king Henry writ to the barons in this wiſe.

Richard by the grace of God, king of the Romains alwaies Auguſtus, & Edward eldeſt ſonne of the king of England, and all the other barons and nobles conſtantlie and faithfullie in heart & deed cleauing to the foreſaid king of England, to Simon Mount-

The letter of Richard king of Almaine and prince Edward to the barons.

Digitized by Google

Mountfort, and Gilbert de Clare, and to all and singuler other their adherents in their conspiracie. By your letters which you sent to our lord the noble king of England wee haue vnderstãding that you defie vs, although before any such word, your defiance toward vs was apparant inough by your cruell persecution in burning our possessions, and spoiling our goods: We therefore giue you to wit, that wee all and euery one of vs, as your enemies, doe defie you all as our open enemies. And further, that we will not cease, whersoeuer it shall lie in our power, to the vttermost of our force and might, to subuert your persons, and all that you haue. As touching that you lay to our charge, that we giue neither faithfull nor good counsell to our lord the king, you say not the truth. And if your lord Simon Mountfort, or Gilbert de Clare, will affirme the same in our lord the kings court, we are readie to get safe conduct for you to come to the said court, to trie & declare the truth of our innocencie, and the falsehood of you both, as forsworne traitors, by some man equall with you in nobilitie and stocke. All wee are contained with the seales of the foresaid lords, the lord Richard, and the lord Edward. Dated the day aforesaid.

Both which letters being read, they drew nére to the king: for they were not farre distant from the place which is called Lewis. And for that there wanted to the kings store prouision for their horses, it was commanded them, on tuesday to goe forth to séeke for hay & prouender: which when they were gone forth, were preuented of their enemies, and most of them killed: but the residue returning, saw their enemies comming very earlie on the wednesday morning, and making outcries, stirred vp the king and his host to arme themselues. Then the barons comming to the full plaine, descended there, and girding and trimming their horses, made fit their harnelle to them. And there the earle Simon made the earle of Glocester, and Robert de Méere, and many other new knights. Which being done, he diuided and distinсted his host into foure seuerall battels, and he appointed noble men to guide and gouerne euery battell. And ouer the first battel were ordained captains, Henrie Mountfort the eldest sonne of the earle Simon, and Guido his brother, lord John de Bruch the yonger, and lord Humfrey de Bohun. Ouer the second battell, lord Gilbert Clare earle of Glocester, lord John the sonne of lord S. John, and lord William of Mountchersie. And ouer the third, in which ẏ Londoners were, at their requést, the lord Nicholas Segraue was assigned: which required also very instantlie, that they might haue the first stroke in the battell, at the aduenture, come what come would. But ouer the fourth battell the earle himselfe was captaine with the lord Thomas of Pinelkon. In the meane season came forth the kings host, preparing themselues to the field in thrée battels, of which Edward the kings sonne led the first, with the earle of Warwike, and Valence the kings brother: and the second the king of Almaine guided, with his sonne Henry: but the king with his nobles guided the third: and the fourth legion the king appointed not, by reason that he had left many of his chiefe souldiers behind him, to kéepe the castell and towne of Tunbridge against the earle of Glocester. And the most part of the kings armie were but yong men, for the king thought not that his barons had béene come so nigh hand. Their armies béeing on both sides set in aray and order, they erhorted one an other on either partie to fight valiantly: and after they buckled together, the battell was great, and many horsemen were ouerthrowne euen in a moment. But by and by Edward the kings sonne with his band, as a fierce yong gentleman & valiant knight, fell vpon his enemies with such force, that he compelled them to recule backe a great way, so that the hindmost (thinking by reason of their giuing backe, that the formost were slaine) ran many of them away, and taking water to passe ouer, were almost thrée score souldiers drowned, and a few of them being slaine, all the rest fled. Straightway the Londoners which had asked the first fight, knowing not how the battell went, tooke their héeles: whom Edward pursued with his band, killing the hindmost of them the space of two or thrée miles: for he hated them because they had rebelled against his father, and disgraced his mother when she was caried by barge vpon the Thames, from the Tower to Windlor: as is before touched.

Whilest that prince Edward was thus in the chase of the Londoners, who had the vaward of the barons battell: in the meane time the maine battell of the barons set vpon the kings maine battell, of the which the king of Almaine the brother of king Henry had the leading, which being sone discomfited, and he with his sonne Henry and Robert de Brus, John Cowen, with diuers other Captaines taken prisoners, the reareward wherein the king himselfe fought, being immediatly so hardly beset, and seeing his knights and souldiers on euery side about him beaten downe and slaine, and diuers others of his souldiers to forsake the field & shift for themselues, thought good to take againe the towne, and so retired into the abbey from whence he came, shutting & rampering vp the gates, and caused the same to be stronglie warded with souldiers. To be briefe, the barons thus getting the field, after long fight, and many men on either side slain, entred also the town of Lewis, pursuing in chase such souldiers as thither fled for succour.

The battell of Lewis betwixt the king and the barons beginneth.

Richard king of Almain with his sonne taken prisoners.

The kings maine battell at Lewis discomfited, and the king faine to take the Abbey.

In the meane time, prince Edward returning from the chase of the Londoners, as yee heard, who desired to giue the first onset, and espying the chariot of the earle Simon (which he caused purposely to be made for him) and the horses in the same, without either waggoner or any other to gouerne the same, fell immediatly vpon the chariot, and brake it all in péeces, and slew two burgesses that were within the same. But when he came nérer to the place where the bloudie battell had been fought, and saw the great discomfiture and ouerthrow which in his ablence with great mortalitie and slaughter had happened, his heart was much dismaid, and his countenance altered. Yet notwithstanding, comforting & incouraging his knights and souldiers, of whom he had a valiant compante, in battel aray he marched toward the towne: against whom came the barons againe with all their power. And thus was begun betwixt them a freth field and new battell, and many men slaine on either side. But at length, the earle de Warenia, with the kings two brethren, forsoke the field and fled: after whom went more then seuen hundred chosen souldiers, which were of their house and familie, who the same day came to Peuensie, and there tooke shipping ouer the sea. Also Hugh Bigot with diuers others fled, and left the valiant prince fighting in the field: which thing he also perceiuing, tooke the towne. And when he found not the king his father at the castell, he went from thence to the abbie where he was. In the meane season the towne was diuided in parts, some fighting, some spoiling, some getting of booties, neither could scarsely one of them know and discerne another whether he were his friend or enemy. But when within a while the barons had assembled some companie, they gaue an assault vpon the castell, thinking to haue rescued John Gifford and others whom the kings souldiers had taken prisoners and put therein. But the souldiers within defended manfullie the same, and in throwing out bals of wild fire, as for the defence thereof they had, they also fired part of the towne. Then the barons retired and left the castle, and purposed to haue set vpon the abby where the king and prince Edward his sonne was, which also was set on fire by the assault giuen to the castell: but yet it was shortly recouered and quenched. Then Edward the kings sonne perceiuing the bold enterprise of the barons, prepared with courageous knights and souldiers as were yet remaining and within the abbie, to haue issued out, and to haue giuen a new charge vpon them. But the barons perceiuing that, sent vnto the king messengers to intreat a truce for that day, and on the morrow to talk and conclude of a further peace betweén them. This battell was fought vpon the nineteenth day of May, being the yéere of our Lord 1264.

The prince Edward returning from the first chase, findeth all together lost.

The prince fighteth a new battell.

Prince Edward also put to the worst and faine to take the towne.

The castle of Lewis beseged.

The next day, which was Thursday, there were sent on either side two preaching friers betweene the king and the barons, with certaine articles and demands of peace, so that with certaine others, these conditions were agréed on: that on the morrow being Friday, the prince should giue himselfe in hostage for the king his father and others of his parts. And Henrie the kings sonne of Almaine also should giue himselfe the like for his father. That those things which should be concluded vpon for the benefit and commoditie of the realme, and peaceable quietnesse thereof might be performed, and that all such prisoners as were taken on either side, should be frely ransomed and sent home.

A peace intreated betweene the king and the barons.

The two princes giuen in hostage.

The next day which was Saturday, the king discharged all his souldiers, and others that were with him in the abbie, licensing them to depart whither they liked. And furthermore, by the aduice of his sonne and the barons, he gaue commandement to those which he had appointed to the keeping of Tunbridge, that they should make no attempt to the preiudice or hurt of the barons; but in hope of the peace which was now at the point to be concluded, they should also depart euery man to their houses and habitations. But they giuing no credit thereunto, went with their furniture to Brikstow, where they kept themselues in garrison, vntill the escaping of Edward the kings sonne out of prison. But first before that, when they heard at Tunbridge that the king was vanquished in battell, and that the Londoners in the forward were put to flight by prince Edward (by a messenger that escaped from the same) and that also the same Londoners were at Crowdowne, they set vpon them in the euening tide, and taking from them much spoile, slue also many of them.

The kings souldiers in Tunbridge after they had spoiled the Londoners at Crowdowne, kept themselues in garrison at Brikstow.

But when Roger Mortimers part began to decrease, and Simon the earles part on the other side to encrease, hee bare himselfe more stoute, for that both the king and all that was his, did depend vpon the good will and fauor of the earle, and led with him the kings sonne to such holds & castles as he thought to bee most strong; as though all were in his hands to doe as him liked; and kept the hostages more straitlie then hee was wont to doe. Insomuch that when it was blowne abroad that the kings sonne was kept as prisoner, diuers counselled him that were his friends, that he should desire to disport himselfe at the barriers, that the people might haue a sight of him. But he being narrowly garded as hee knew, and fearing some tumult to arise, thought good to refuse their counsell, and so did.

Earle Simon after this victorie beareth himselfe so stout that he impildneth the hostages of the king.

In this troublesome yeers, which was Anno 1264, as the Londoners with the nobles were thus occupied in warre and dissension, the malignant Iewes thinking to take vantage of of that time with priuie treason conspired against the whole citie and state of the nobles, who being taken with the manner, were almost all slaine that dwelt in the citie of London.

* In this yeere also Boniface archbishop of Canturburie the sonne of Peter erle of Sauoie, and a stranger, hauing been certaine yeeres beyond the seas in disgrace with the king of England, vpon occasion of some misdemeanor belike (for he was, as Matthew Parker writeth of him, Vt moribus gestisque peregrinus, sic nomine ipso & appellatione cæteris archiepiscopis dissimilis) howbeit the king being of a relenting nature, and bearing much with clergie mens insolencies, which for a while he might perhaps gainstand, but at last bare with them as supported by the court of Rome, did consult with his nobles about the returne of the said Boniface into England, conditionallie as followeth.

Acts passed in the kings councell touching the archbishop of Canturburies returne into England vnder certaine conditions.

Turris Lond. ANno Domini 1264, mense Martio, in præsentia illustris regis Angliæ, de concilio procerum & magnatum eiusdem regni actum est, quod venerabilis pater Bonifacius Dei gratia Cantuarienſis archiepiscopus, totius Angliæ primas in Angliam reuertatur, sub conditionibus infra scriptis, in regno pacifice moraturus. In primis igitur, &c. In English thus.

In the yeere of our Lord 1264, in the moneth of March, it was enacted in the presence of the renowmed king of England, by the councell of the peeres and states of the said realme, that the reuerend father Boniface by the grace of God archbishop of Canturburie, primat of all England, should returne into England, and abide in the realme peaceablie vpon the conditions vnderwritten.

1 First therefore it is enacted, that the archbishop at his returne doe without any difficultie release in forme of law his sentences of excommunication, published against all persons whatsoeuer, occasioning much trouble in the realme of England: but yet so, that they which shall be found excommunicate, be readie to make satisfaction for their excesses and defaults, and for the same receiue as they are bound by the canonicall commandements of the archbishop, in forme hereunder in the next article contained.

2 Secondly it is enacted, that in making amends for defaults done to churches and churchmen, within such places as are immediatly subiect vnto his iurisdiction, the archbishop may arbitrate according to the counsell of all his suffragans, or the greater and sounder part; and of waightie affaires belonging to the church and realme of England, may in time to come after his returne, order and dispose likewise by their counsell, and the counsell of other discreet men of the realme.

3 Thirdly it is enacted, that he bring with him maister Henrie * Mortimer archdeacon of Canturburie, and Pont Sabler his familiar clerks or household chaplens, and these clerks only being strangers borne, he keepe and retaine of his counsell and household.

* Henricus de mortuo mari.

4 Fourthly it is enacted, that other clerks whersoeuer, beneficed in the church of England, meaning and willing to returne with the archbishop, may safely returne and abide in their benefices, and dispend the church goods within the realme as they are bound, carrying or sending nothing out of the realme, vnlesse necessarie occasion, and allowed of the kings councell doe so require.

5 Fifthly it is enacted, that the archbishop or the clerks comming with him shall bring nothing with them in letters, message, or commandement, nor shall procure any thing else during their abode in this realme, either by themselues or by others, whereby any damage, danger, or prejudice may redound to the king or to any of his realme. And for memorie of the premisses, the seale of the said renowmed king of England is hanged vnto these presents.

By the whole councell.

Notwithstanding this conclusion, the archbishop did not presently returne, but continued in Prouance and elsewhere, behauing himselfe imperiouslie as a prelate of the right Romish stampe. In the meane time many matters incident to his place were omitted and neglected, which personallie by him should haue been executed: but by reason of his absence the same were dispatched by deputation, and the same ordered likewise according to his owne fantasie, which he preferred before the kings authoritie and commandement. This to be true, the copie of a letter describing the contumacie of the said Boniface doth sufficiently testifie, the same being set downe agreeable to the prototypon.

A letter of the king to Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, charging him to returne into England, there personallie to discharge his archiepiscopall function.

Turris Lond. REx Bonifacio Cantuarienſi archiepiscopo, totius Angliæ primati, salutem. Licèt hactenus per patientiam pluries sustinuerimus electos in episcopos, abbates, ac prælatos alios in regno nostro, &c. In English thus.

Against the archbishop of Canturburie in forren countries abiding.

The king to Boniface archbishop of Canturbury primat of all England, greeting. Although hitherto by patience wee haue suffered oftentimes bishops elect, abbats, and other prelats in our realme, for the benefit of their confirmation to be obtained, to passe ouer beyond sea vnto you, we thought not to receiue at your hands any such reward, as that against the right and custome of our realme, to the which we meane not by this our patience that preiudice shall any way bee procured or bred, you should attempt this to be followed. We do maruell therfore and are mooued that you, at the request of vs, haue refused to commit the examination of the election of our welbeloued in Christ master Walter Gifford late of Bathe and Wels bishop elect, and the confirmation of the same election, vnto some discreet persons of our realme, we hauing detained and as yet detaining the same Gifford against his will, that he might not repaire personallie vnto you: whereunto common right and the very custome of the realme ought to haue lead you vnrequested, whilest you abide out of the realme. Lest therefore our too much patience might breed in you a contempt, wee will you to vnderstand that henceforward we meane to beare lesse with such dealing, specially in these daies, wherein there is no safe passage for Englishmen vnto you through the parts of France, as it is reported. Wherefore wee thought good to desire your fatherhood and also to admonish you, giuing you moreouer in charge and commandement, and vpon the fealtie wherein you are bound vnto vs firmelie inioyning, that in respect of the forsaid election, and other ceremonies, you come personallie into England to execute your office and charge, or send some other in your roome; or at least procure and cause some discreet persons of our realme, whom you shall repute more meete for this matter, to serue the turne for you in this behalfe: lest if with contumacie you refuse to heare our requests and commandements the second time, which you are by dutie bound to obay, wee bee compelled to take indignation against you, as a contemner of the rights, liberties, and the customs of our kingdome, and so to proceed against you more sharplie by way of reuenge: neither will we suffer, if you shall do otherwise, that the reuenues of your said archbishoprike shall hencefoorth be conueyed vnto you out of our realme; but as you refuse the burthen, so wil we in like sort do what we can to withdraw hereafter the profits and commodities from you during your abode out of our land. Finally we, if need shall be, are redie to giue you a sure and safe conduct. Witnesse the king at S. Pauls of London, the 25. of June, and the 48. yeere of our raigne.

Now after all this adoe, we read that at last Boniface returned, and becomming more holy towards his end, he went with other bishops to the king, requesting him that being mindfull of the decaie of his kingdome, by ecclesiasticall liuings bestowed vpon strangers, he would hereafter preferre learned and godly men of his owne nation. To whom the king answered that he would willinglie doe it. Wherefore I thinke it meete that you, which are a stranger and vnlearned, and also my brother Ethelmer bishop of Winchester, whom I haue preferred to such dignities onely for kindreds sake, should first giue example to others, and forsake your churches, and I will prouide other learned men to serue in them. Which answere of the king so pierced this Boniface, that he alwaies after liued a wearisome life in England. Wherefore perceiuing himselfe to be misliked of the king and the people, he desired to returne into his countrey. And thereupon first selling and felling the woods, letting out the archbishoprike, taking great fines of his tenants, and making a great masse of money of the clergie of his prouince, he went with the curse of all men vnto Sauoy, where in the castle of S. Helens, after he had misgouerned the see six and twentie yeeres, six moneths, and sixteene daies from his consecration, being nine and twentie yeeres from his first election, he died the fifteenth kalends of August. And so ceased the troubles betweene the king and the said bishop, whose contumacie in stories, with others of the like brood, doth largely appeare in this booke.

Boniface his aduice disaduantageable to himselfe.

Boniface maketh spoile of the archbishoprike, he is hated, and dieth.

¶ But to leaue Boniface now dead, note ye this, that in this yeere, after the death of pope Urban, succeeded in the said yeere of our Lord, An. 1265, pope Clement the fourth: which Clement, as affirmeth Nic. Triuet. was first a married man and had wife and children, and was the sollicitor and counsellor to the French king; then after the death of his wife, was bishop intituled Podiensis, after that archbishop of Narbon, and at last made cardinall; who being sent of pope Urban in legacie, for reformation of peace, in his absence was elected pope by the cardinals. About this time florished Thomas of Aquine, reader at Paris among the Dominike friers, and Bonauenture among the Franciscan frers. Ex Nic. Triuet.

The death of pope Urban.
Pope Clement the fourth.
Pope Clement first a married man, and had a wife and children.
Thomas Aquin, Bonauenture readers at Paris.
Anno 1265

* Now after all the foresaid tumult and broile of the king and his barons to the veration of the whole land, it was thought meet and necessarie that all parties at variance should be reconciled. Whereupon it was concluded amongst them as followeth.

A forme of peace betweene the king and his barons.

Turris Lond. HÆc est forma pacis à domino rege & domino Edwardo filio suo, prælatis & proceribus omnibus, & cõmunitate tota regni Angliæ communiter & concorditer approbata, &c. In English thus: This is the forme of peace allowed of the king our lord, of the lord Edward his sonne, of all the prelats and peeres and the whole communaltie of the realme of England with common consent and agreement; to wit, that a certaine ordinance or decree made in a parlement holden at London about the feast of the nativitie of S. John Baptist last past, for the maintaining and keeping of the peace of the realme, and the same to continue all the daies of the said king our soueraigne lord, and the time of the lord Edward, after he shall be received as king, euen till the end and terme that shall be thought meet and conuenient. The said ordinance or decree is thus.

For the redressing of the state of the realme of England, let there be chosen or named three discreet and trustie persons of the realme, which may haue authoritie and power from the lord the king to chose or name in the kings behalfe, nine counsellors: of which nine, three at least by course or turnes may alwaies be present in the court. And let the lord the king by the counsell of the said nine, order and dispose of the keeping of castles, and the managing of all the affaires in his realme. Let the lord the king also by the aduice of the foresaid nine, appoint iustices, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers, greater and lesser in those matters that pertaine to the gouernment of his court and realme.

The choosers or namers shall sweare first, that according to conscience they will chose or name such counsellors, as they verily beleeue will be profitable and trustie in respect of Gods honor, the church, the lord the king, and his realme. The counsellors likewise and all the officers greater and lesser in their creation shall sweare, that to the vttermost of their power they will faithfullie execute their offices to the honor of God and of the church, and to the profit of the lord the king and his realme, without bribe or gift; meate and drinke which are commonlie wont to be set vpon the table excepted. And if so be that the foresaid counsellors, or some or any of them, in the charge to them committed (whether they be he or she) haue behaued themselues ill, or that vpon some other occasion such officers are to be changed: the lord the king by the counsell of the three former choosers or namers may remoue such as he shall see meet to be remoued; and in their romes by the same mens aduice may appoint and place other persons trustie and seruiceable.

And if so be that either the greater officers or the lesser doe disorderedlie demeane themselues in their offices, the lord the king by the counsell of the foresaid nine may displace them, and without delay by the same aduice set others in their roms. And if so be that the three first or chiefe choosers or namers, in the choice or naming of counsellors, or perhaps the counsellors in the creating of officers, or in other affaires of the lord the king and the realme to be ordered or done, shall be at disagreement, then whatsoeuer by consent of two parts shalbe concluded or decreed, let the same be firmely kept & obserued; so that of those two parts one be a prelat of the church in the businesse belonging to the church. And if it so happen, that two parts of the said nine in some matter disagree; then shall they for their variance stand to the ordinance of the three first choosers or namers, or the greater part of them. And if so be it seeme expedient by consent to all the prelats and barons, that some or one in place of some or one of the three first namers be put and appointed: then let the lord the king by the counsell of all the prelats and barons ordaine some others, or one other. And let the lord the king doe all the premisses by the aduice of the said nine in maner aboue mentioned; or let them doe it in the lord the kings behalfe and by his authoritie by this present ordinance, to continue and hold out till such time as this agreement made and afterwards sealed by the parties, be perfected by consent, or some other prouiso be had which the parties by consent shall iudge allowable.

This ordinance was made at London by the consent, will, and commandement of the lord the king, and also of the prelats, barons, with the communaltie then and there present. In witnesse whereof R. bishop of Lincolne, and H. bishop of Elie, R. earle of Norfolke and marshall of England, Robert de Vere earle of Oxford, Humfrey de Bohume, William de monte Canisio, and the maior of London to this writing haue set their seales. Acted in the parliament at London in the moneth of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1264.

Reformation of the church. It is also ordained, that the state of the English church shall be reformed into a state meet and conuenient.

It is also ordained, that the three choosers aboue said and counsellors, of whom mention is made in the said ordinance at London, and the keepers of castles, and others the kings bailiffs be homebred. And as for strangers borne, let them come, tarrie, and depart peaceablie, as well lainen willing to dwell vpon their possessions, as clergimen residing vpon their benefices.

No strangers to be keepers of the kings castels, &c. Merchants also, and all others, to further and see to their affaires shall come freelie, and tarrie peaceablie; but yet conditionallie, so they come without armor and a suspected multitude. And that none of them be received in any sort, into any office or bailiwike in the realme, or otherwise into the kings house & seruice be entertained. As for the charters of generall liberties and forrests granted vnto the homebred of late by the king, and the statutes made vpon reuoking of grieuances which the lord the king the third yeere past in euery shire by his letters patents hath caused to be published, with the commendable customs of his realme, & a long time allowed, be for euer obserued: and that it might be prouided how they may be better and more soundlie obserued: It is also prouided, that the lord the king, and the lord Edward, the barons & those that stand with them, let go all iniurie and rancor, so that they neither grieue, or suffer to be grieued by any of theirs, no one of them by occasion of things done in the hurlie burlie past; and also cause all their bailiffes at the vndertaking of their bailiwiks, that they shall grieue none by the occasion aforesaid, but shall doe iustice and right to euery body with equalitie. And let there be good securitie prouided how all these things may be firmlie obserued.

¶ When this agreement was dispatched, to set the realme in some quietnesse, a little leisure was allowed to loke into the losses and damages of the church, whereupon it was prouided as followeth.

Of the repairing of trespasses committed against the church.

It is prouided by common assent of the king, of the prelats, earles, and barons of the land, that the trespasses which are committed against the church of England, by reason of the tumults and wars that haue béene in this realme of England, shall be reformed and amended in this maner.

There shall be chosen by the earles and great estates of the land, with the liking and assent of the prelats, three bishops authorized, and hauing full power to establish and prouide for such reasonable amends as are to be made for the foresaid trespasses committed against holie church, so far forth as shall be fit and conuenient.

Those that shall be found excommunicated, shall be absolued in forme of right, by such as haue power and authoritie so to doe.

The authoritie of the prelats shall be established in this maner. First, it shall be faithfullie vndertaken by the earles, iustices, and the other laimen of the kings counsell, and other great barons of the realme, that all those things which the prelats that shall be chosen, shall reasonablie ordaine and appoint by way of reformation, they themselues shall obserue & fulfill, and shall doe their indeuor faithfullie to cause it to be obserued by others; and thereof they shall deliuer their letters patents.

Moreouer, vnto the prelats, after they shall be chosen, full power shall be granted by the king, and the communaltie, the earles, barons, & great men of the land, to ordaine those things which are needfull and profitable to the full reformation of the estate of holie church, to the honor due to the fealtie of our lord the king, and to the profit of the realme. And that the promise made by the king, and by the earles, and barons aforesaid, and by the other great men of the land may appeare to be made in good faith, they shall thereof make their letters patents; to wit of things that haue bin done a yeere past before the last Easter.

If any be found that will not stand to the ordinance and appointment of the foresaid prelats in the causes aforesaid, and according to the forme aforesaid, he shall be compelled thereunto by dome of holie church; yea if need be he shall be thereunto forced by the secular power. And that it may the better be done, the iustice shall haue a hundred or more of choice men at armes, or sargeants souldiers elect, to distraine the malefactors when by the said prelats he shall be required. Those souldiers to be sustained of the common goods of holie church, during the time they shall be imploied in that businesse. And this ordinance shall continue for a yeare or two, till such time as matters be quieted, and that the prouisions of the prelats, and the peace of the land be well obserued.

Prouided alwaies, that the profits of benefices of holie church belonging to aliens, and others that haue béen enemies to the land, shall be collected, and safely kept in the hands of the prelats, vntill such time as order be taken by common aduice what is to be done therewithall. And for the more assurance and further testimonie hereof, the king and the high estates of the land haue vnto this writting set their seales.

¶ Besides all this it was considered, that non residencie, being a default blameworthie, deserued reformation. Whereof the king hauing speciall regard, wrote his mind to the bishop of Hereford for the redresse of the same; whose letter because it is memorable, and conuenient matter therein contained for non residents of our time, we haue heere intertered according to the record.

A letter of king Henry the third directed to the bishop of Hereford concerning non residents.

R Ex episcopo Hereford salutem. Pastores gregibus præponũtur, vt diei noctísque vigilias exercendo, &c. Turris Lond. In English thus.

The

Against non residence of prelats.

The king to the bishop of Hereford sendeth greeting. Pastors or shepherds are set ouer flocks, that by exercising themselues in watching ouer them day and night, they may know their owne cattell by their looke, bring the hungerstarued sheepe into the medowes of fruitfulnesse, and the straying ones into one fold by the word of saluation & the rod of correction; and to doe their indeuor, that vnitie indissoluble may be kept. But some there be, who damnablie despising this doctrine, and not knowing to discerne their owne cattell from anothers, doe take away the milke and the wooll, not caring how the Lords flocke may be nourished: they catch vp the temporall goods, and who perisheth in their parish with famishment, or miscarrieth in maners they regard not: which men deserue not to be called pastors, but rather hirelings. And that we euen in these daies remouing our selues into the marches of Wales, to take order for the disposing of the garrisons of our realme, haue found this default in your church of Hereford, we report it with griefe; for that we haue found there a church destitute of a pastors comfort, as hauing neither bishop nor officiall, vicar nor deane, that may exercise any spirituall function & dutie in the same. But the church it selfe, which in time past was wont to flow in delight, and had canons that tended vpō daies & nights seruice, and that ought to exercise the works of charitie, they forsaking the church, and leading their liues in countries far hence, hath put off her stole or robe of pleasure, and fallen to the ground, bewailing the losse of her widowhood, and there is none among all her friends and louers that will comfort her. Verily whiles we beheld this, and considered it diligentlie, the pricke of pitie did moue our bowels, and the sword of compassion did inwardlie wound our heart verie sore, that we could no longer dissemble so great an iniurie done to our mother the church, nor passe the same ouer vncorrected.

Non residents strictlie charged to be personallie incumbent and abiding vpon their cures: note.

Wherefore we command and straitly charge you, that all occasions set aside, you indeuor to remoue your selues with all possible speed vnto your said church, and there personallie to execute the pastorall charge committed vnto you in the same. Otherwise we will you to know for certaintie, that if you haue not a care to doe this, we will wholly take into our owne hands all the temporall goods, and whatsoeuer else doth belong vnto the baronie of the same church; which goods for spirituall exercise sake therein, it is certaine our progenitors of a godlie deuotion haue bestowed thereupon. And such goods and duties as we haue commanded hitherto to be gathered and safelie kept and turned to the profit and commoditie of the same church, the cause now ceasing, we will seize vpon; and suffer no longer, that he shall reape temporall things, which feareth not vnreuerētlie to withdraw and keepe back spirituall things, whereunto by office and dutie he is bound; or that he shall receiue any profits which refuseth to vndergoe and beare the burthens of the same. Witnesse the king at Hereford, the first of Iune in the 48. yeare of our reigne.

An assemblie of ill disposed people called harlots, whereby may be gathered the antientnesse of that name.

About this time (as appeareth by course of record, & thereby may well be gathered) a redresse of certaine sects was intended, among which, one by name speciallie occurreth, and called the assemblie of harlots: a kind of people of a leaud disposition and vncivill. Of whose maners and life the king hauing beene informed, addressed his letters to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire, a place which they haunted, and wherein they practised their euill conuersation: whose letter here followeth.

A letter of king Henrie the third to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire, concerning the banishment of an vnlawfull assemblie called harlots, out of that countrie.

Turris Lond.

Against an assemblie or meeting of men which called themselues harlots.

Rex vic. Oxon. salutem. Quia intelleximus quòd quidam, qui se harlotos appellant, vagi & otium fouentes, in diuersis partibus regni nostri, congregationes & conuenticula, nec non contractus illicitos, &c. In English thus.

The king to the shiriffe of Oxfordshire sendeth greeting. Because we vnderstand that there be certaine vagarant persons which call themselues harlots, maintaining idlenesse in diuers parts of our realme, most shamelesselie making their meetings, assemblies, and vnlawfull matches against the honestie of the church and good maners, which abuse we will not, neither ought we to suffer; we charge thee that on our behalfe thou forbid the said harlots hencefoorth in the said countries to make anie more such meetings, conuenticles, or contracts; or to presume according to their leaud maner and wonted fashion to rogue about our realme: and heereto thou shalt (if need be) bind them, as by law may be done. Wherein so behaue thy selfe in this behalfe, as we may commend thy diligence. Witnesse the king at Reading the 23 of Nouember, in the 48 yeare of our reigne.

What maner of persons these were, or what their conuersation was, it doth not further appeare: neuertheles by the premisses it may seeme to be some pretensed order of religion. And it is most probable that the reprochfull name of harlot had his beginning from hence.

To conclude with speciall matters of the church, wherein we haue made somewhat the longer delay, by occasion of such necessarie records as came to hand, & brought with them their necessarie vse; this one remembrance notwithstanding remaineth, no lesse noteworthie then the rest, and falling within the reuolution of the fortie eight yeere of this kings reigne, a yeere of great trouble, as by the premisses may be gathered.

You are therefore to note, that at this time the prelats of England stood vpon their pantophles, and tollie fellowes (I tell you) they would be knowne to be. For in an inquisition made after the death of one Aluredus de Lincolne, being, as is supposed, a baron of this realme, there is found (Inter alia) as followeth: Quòd prædictus Aluredus tenuit quandam particulam parcæ de Dunetish & Tilei de abbate de Cerne, per seruicium tenendi stropem suum, quando abbas debet ascendere equum suum, & dare ei locum in comitatu quando præsens fuerit. That is: That the forenamed Aluredus held a certain peece of the parke of Dunetish and Tileie of the abbat of Cerne, by seruice of holding his stirup when the abbat should take horsebacke, and to giue him place in the shire at such time as he should be present. The circumstances hereof being considered, together with the time wherein it was done, giueth probable cause to coniecture that the occasion of this matter came by this meanes: viz. That whereas the said Alured was desirous to inlarge his parke, and could not so doe but by purchasing of part of some other ground next adioining, whereof the said abbat was owner: he was therefore constrained either to lacke that he liked, or to admit such conditions as pleased my lord abbat; who like a lord (as you see) was content to let him haue his land, reseruing such seruice as is abouesaid. Wherein would be noted the pompe of prelats in those daies, and how neere they drew in imitation to the pope, in whose treading they traced.

But leauing these affaires of the church and churchmen, wherein we haue beene somewhat large, we will now enter into other troubles of the temporall state. You heard before of a pacification concluded betweene the king and his barons in the yeere of our Lord 1264, the same hauing beene admitted by mutuall and common consent of the temporaltie and clergie. Nevertheless, as a sore not well searched and tented, but superficiallie and ouerlie skinned, doth breake out into a more dangerous botch; so it came to passe among the lords and barons, betwixt whom no such firme reconciliation was made as was like long to last. Whereupon insued after secret grudge and priuie hatred open armes and conflicts. For in this yeere 1265 the sonnes of Simon the earle, to wit, Henry, Simon, and Guido, being all puft vp, and with the pride of their successe elevated, did that which nothing contented the earle of Glocester: insomuch that he challenged Henry the eldest sonne of the earle Simon Mountfort at the barriers, to be tried at Northhampton. But that challenge was taken vp, lest some further inconuenience might haue risen thereof. But the earle of Glocester being moued therewith in his mind, sent vnto his father the earle that he should deliuer him such prisoners being noble men, as he tooke at the battell of Lewis; among whom the king of Almaine was named first. But he by countermand answered him, and said, that it might content and satisfie him, for that he had saued and preserued to him his lands, that day the battell was fought at Lewis; and that furthermore he would not send him such prisoners as he demanded; but that he himselfe kept more noble then they in the castell of Douer: among whom was John Ballet, which vndermined and burst downe the walles of Northhampton at that conflict, as is said before and specified.

Dissension betweene earle Simon and the earle of Glocester.

The earle of Glocester being herewith displeased, so soone as he heard this answer, sent incontinentlie to the lord Roger Mortimer, which alwaies tooke the kings part, desiring that they two might talke together touching the benefit and commoditie of the king. Who, doubting some deceit, desired sureties and pledges for his safe returne, and he would come and talke with him, and so had. When they met, and had a while talked familiarlie, the earle of Glocester shewed him all that he was purposed to doe; and that further he lamented he had so much and greatlie offended the king: and that he would with all his power and abilitie make amends for that offence, in the restitution of the king againe to his kinglie dignitie, as much as he possiblie might. Therefore they sent secretlie to Robert the brother of the earle of Glocester, which was neere about the earle Simon, and made him to consent with them therein. And to worke this thing more circumspectlie, when opportunitie serued thereunto, Roger Mortimer sent vnto the kings sonne an horse excelling all others in fastnesse, vnto whom he might be sure to trust, when he saw conuenient time thereunto. After which things thus contriued, prince Edward desired leaue of the earle to proue his courser against such time as he should ride at the tilt, as they might when they liked. Assone as he had gotten leaue, and that with galloping and ranging the field he had wearied diuers of their horses: at the last, getting vp vpon the horse which for that purpose was sent, and spying a seruant on horsebacke comming toward him with two swords, he turned about vnto his keeper, whose name was Robert de Rose, and to others his plaifellowes that were with him, saying: My louing lords, thus long haue I kept you companie, and haue beene in your custodies: and now not purposing to vse your companies any longer, I betake you to God. And quicklie turning his horse about, put to the spurs and away went he. The other pricked after apace, but yet came far inough behind, and ouertake him they could not. At last, when they saw Roger Mortimer comming from his castell of Wigmore, accompanied with many armed men to meete him as before it was appointed, they returned againe home as wise as when they came forth. And when this ỹ princes escape was diuulgated, much people came vnto him out of euery quarter, with great ioy thereof. Amongst whom, the first was the earle of Glocester, and the other souldiers of the king, which had now long lien at Bristow, and thereabouts, and within a short space he had a great and a mightie host.

The earle of Glocester and Roger Mortimer conspire togither against earle Simon.

Prince Edward escapeth from out of the custodie of earle Simon by a traine.

Which thing when the earle Simon vnderstood, he much doubted and mistrusted himselfe: and sending into Wales, he gat from thence a great many men, and augmented his power as strongly as he might, from euery part of England. He sent also Simon his sonne to the noble men of the north parts, that with all possible speede he might bring them with him: who with a great companie came with him, and at Kenelworth a while they staid, and there pitched their tents. But leauing Kenelworth for a certaine time, they went to Winchester, and spoiled the same, and then returned againe to Kenelworth. And when this by a certaine spiall was declared to Edward the kings sonne, who then was at Worcester, which he had gotten after he came from Glocester a little before; he prepared himself with his souldiers, in the night season to goe to the place where the spie should bring him, which was into a deepe valley, neere vnto the place where Simon and his companie had pitched. And when in the morning they were very earlie about to arme themselues, and prepare their horses, they heard a great noise of their enemies comming towards them. Then thinking that they had prepared themselues against their comming, and so had beene betrayed; they set forth in battell aray, marching forwards, till that they met certaine of their enemies straggling in long wings, thinking to haue gone a forraging, and to haue sought for victuals; whom they tooke, and with their freth horses new horsed their souldiers that had their horses tired with long trauell. And so marching forward, came verie earlie in the morning vpon their enemies, whom for the most part they found sleeping; and laying lustilie about them, they slue diuers; some they tooke, the rest they put to flight; and fiftéene of their chiefest ensignes they tooke, with many other rich spoiles. But yong Simon himselfe lodged in the castell, who with a few with him escaped and fled. And this was the fourth day before the nones of August, An. 1265.

The earle Simon sendeth about, and in all hast gathereth a power.

The first enterprise of prince Edward after his escape by the meanes of a spie.

But when Edward heard that earle Simon was comming toward Kenelworth, to ioine with his sonnes battell, he marched forward to meet him the third day after at Eusham, where he diuided his host into three battels, he himselfe hauing the leading of one, the earle of Glocester the second, and Roger Mortimer the third, which came vpon their backs. The kings sonne Edward came northward, as though he came from Kenelworth to Eusham: and because he would not be descried, he caused his owne standards and ensignes to be taken downe, and yong Simons which he had taken before to be aduanced. But the earle Simons scurier, whose name was Nicolas, shewed the earle that such bands and companies were marching towards him; who thinking the same to haue beene Simon his sonnes power, not knowing of the ouerthrow which he had before, gaue small credit thereunto, till that the said Nicolas the better to view and descrie them, went vp to the abbey steeple of Eusham, where he might plainely discerne them all and their standards: for by this time they were mounted the hill which they labored to attaine, thinking to haue that vantage, when they should giue their charge as they had purposed: and had also aduanced againe his owne standards, and pulled downe Simons, whereby they were the more easier descried and knowne. Then he cried aloud to the earle Simon, and said: We are all but dead men: for it is not your sonne, as you suppose, that commeth, but it is Edward the kings sonne that commeth from one part, and the earle of Glocester from another part, and Roger Mortimer from the third part. Then said the earle: The Lord be mercifull vnto our soules, forsomuch as our bodies and liues are now in their hands: commanding that euerie man should make himselfe readie to God, and to fight out the field, for that it was their wils to die for their lawes, and in a iust quarell. And such as would depart, he gaue leaue to goe their waies, that they should be no discomfiture to the rest.

The disposing of the princes battell against earle Simon fought at Eusham.

Prince Edwards host descried, whereat the earle was much abashed.

Then came vnto him his eldest sonne Henrie, and comforted him, desiring him to haue no despaire, nor yet mistrust in the good successe of this victorie, with other such chéerefull words. No my sonne (saith he) I despaire not: but yet, it is thy presumption, and the pride of the rest of thy brethren that hath brought me to this end you see: notwithstanding, yet I trust I shall die to God, and in a righteous quarell. After words of comfort giuen to all his host, and the oration made as is the maner, they all armed themselues. The king also (whom the earle alwaies kept with him) he armed in an armor of his owne; and then diuiding their battels, they marched toward their enemies. But before they ioined, the Welshmen ran their waies, and thinking to scape ouer the riuer of Dée, were there some drowned, and some slaine. Then when the battels ioined and came to handie strokes, within short space many of the earles part fell and were slaine: and the king himselfe being stricken at, cried with a loud voice to them, saying: Kill me not, I am Henrie your king. And with these the kings words the lord Adam Honhawt knew him, and saued him. At whose voice and crie came also prince Edward his sonne, and deliuered him to the gard and custodie of certaine knights. In the meane season the earle Simon was hard bestead and beaten downe, and also slaine before Edward the prince came at him. Howbeit, before he fell, when as he fought for life, and Henrie his sonne, and other noble men on his part were about him, he brake out into these words vnto his enemies, saying: What, is there no mercie and compassion with you? Who againe answered: What compassion should there be shewed to traitors? Then said he: The Lord be mercifull vnto our soules, our bodies are in your hands. And so sone as these words were spoken, they mangled his bodie, and diuided his members, and cut off his head, which head Roger Mortimer sent vnto his wife. And not far off from him also was slaine Henrie his eldest sonne, the lord Hugh Spenser, the lord Radulph Basset, the lord Thomas de Heskle, the lord William Vandeuile, the lord John Beauchampe, the lord Guido Bailloser, the lord Roger Mowleie, and many other noble men besides, with a great multitude of people, the Lord knoweth how many. This battell was fought in the moneth of August, and continued from one of the clocke till it was night; in the which was not so much as one man on the earles part, of any estimation, fortitude, and courage, but in that battell lost his life, more than the lord John, who by the great grace of God escaped death. Neither is this to be forgotten, that the same day being tuesday, at that instant houre, when the battell began, which was at one of the clocke at afternoone, there was such a darkenesse ouer all, such thunder and such tempest, that the like before that time was neuer seene, being very calme and faire weather both immediatlie before and after; which seemed (saith mine author) to giue a plaine demonstration of that which afterwards chanced and followed.

The words of earle Simon to his sonne.

King Henry almost slaine in the battell, at length known by his voice, and reskued by his sonne.

Earle Simons sonne, and many mo lords and barons slaine at this battell of Eusham.

After this great slaughter and ouerthrow, there was a parliament summoned at Winchester by the earle of Glocester, and others of his part. Heere by the way is to be considered, that the king although he was in the campe of the earle of Leicester, being then in custodie, and his sonne Edward with the earle of Glocester, yet the king was on that side against his will, and therefore in the said parliament the king was restored to his kinglie dignitie, which was before that time vnder the custodie of the barons. But after the battell was ended and done, certaine of them that loued the earle, vpon an old ladder, gathered vp such parts of his bodie as remained, and couering the same with an old gowne, brought it to Eusham, where they putting the same in a faire linnen cloth, buried it in the church. But not long after, by such as thought not themselues sufficientlie reuenged with his death (to wreake them of the dead corps) tooke vp the same and threw it in another place, saying, that he which was both accursed, and a traitor, was not worthie of christian buriall.

{Anno 1266}

A parliament summoned at Winchester, where king Henry was againe restored to his regalitie.

The same yeere also died Walter Cantilupus bishop of Winchester, after whom succeeded Nicolas of Elie, the kings chancellor.

The same yeere the king perceiuing that vnlesse the castell of Kenelworth were recouered, and the boldnesse of them restrained that kept the same, many euils and inconueniences might ensue thereupon, to the preiudice of his kingdome; for that the number increased euery day more and more, wasting and spoiling the countrie all about: therefore he gathered an armie and came downe to Warwike, where he a while tarried expecting the meeting and assembling of his marquesses and lords, with ensignes and other munition conuenable. Who when their bands were furnished and mustered, and all things readie, the morrow after Midsummer day he displaied his banner, and began his voiage, marching toward Kenelworth, and besieged the same. During which siege, by the aduice and counsell of the king, the popes legat, and other noble men, twelue persons were chosen which should haue ỹ disposing of those things that pertained to the state of the realme, & of those that had lost their lands and inheritances, who amongst other things made & established this one prouiso, that was commonly called Kenelworth decree: That all those which had lost their lands by atteindor (although yet not atteinted) should fine therefore at the kings pleasure, and take their lands of him againe; paying some three yeeres, some foure yeeres, some two yeers reuenues of the same, according to the qualitie of the crime and offence committed. All which prouises or prouisions were established & confirmed as well by the corporall oth, as by signement of the same with the hands and seals of all the prelats and clergie of England, there assembled for that purpose by the popes legat

Kenelworth castell besieged of the king.

Kenelworth decree against the disherited.

vpon

vpon the feast of All saints. When these things were thus finished, messengers were sent on the kings behalfe, as well to those that kept the castell of Kenelworth, as also to those that were assembled in the ile of Elie: willing them to come vnder the protection of the kings peace, and yeeld to the foresaid prouisoes, established by the twelue commissioners. Who all together answered and said: that they would in no wise condescend thereunto, both for that it was done without their consents not being called vnto it, and also for that the said decree was ouer strait and intollerable. Within short space after, great famin and pestilence chanced amongst them which kept the castell, insomuch that they were without all hope of keeping the same: wherefore sone after, the king sending againe to them to yeeld the castell and take their pardons, they consulting together of their owne estate, thus answered the kings messengers; If it please the king and his counsell to permit vs to send our messenger to the lord Simon Mountfort, which is beyond the sea, that he may come by a certaine day to the defence of this his garrison and fort, and that in the meane space we be not disturbed by the kings army that hath inuironed vs, till the returne of our messengers: if by the day appointed he come not, we will yeeld vp the same, so that we may be pardoned of life, limbe, and moueables.

Kenelworth decree gainsaid by diuers.

Kenelworth castell yeelded vp to the king, before the returne of the messengers out of France.

When the messengers were returned, and had declared to the king their answer; he consulting with his nobles about the matter, agreed vnto their petitions, and caused the truce to be proclaimed throughout all his campe, after that sufficient hostages were on either side giuen for the performance of the same: whereupon they set forward their messengers, as before was said they would. But after that, many of them within the castell being very greeuously vexed with the bloudie flix, and other diseases, insomuch that the whole men might not abide the corruption and annoiance of those that were diseased, deliuered vp the castell before the returne of the messengers againe, and were permitted to go whither they would to refresh themselues, as men molested with great vexations and miseries. After the rendering vp of the castell, the king committed the custodie thereof to his sonne Edmund, and so with his host departing from his siege, came vpon Christmas euens euen to Ditie, where hee with great solemnitie and triumph kept his Christmas during seuen daies, and from thence with his host came to Windsor, from whence after a few daies he marched towards Elie: in which iland hee besieged those which were disherited, and sharply also assaulted them.

The same yeere, pope Clement the fourth promoted master Walter Gifford bishop of Bathe, to bee archbishop of Yorke.

In which yeere also the church of England began to pay the tenths of all their reuenewes, as well spirituall as temporall, to the king, to continue for three yeers space: and this was done by the authority apostolicall.

The tenths granted to the king by authority apostolical.

Within a while after, the barons which were yet remaining, gathered themselues together againe: amongst whom John Daiuill (being a subtill and stout man of war) began to haue a name; and was wel esteemed amongst them; who al together did what mischiefe they might, and in the month of May they assembled at Chesterfield, vnder the said John Daiuill and the earle of Ferarence, vpon whom the kings souldiers, comming suddenly in the night, tooke them sleeping, and slew many of them. Then the said John Daiuill quickly arming himselfe came forth, thinking with more defence both to saue himselfe and to escape. Who in the way strucke the lord Gilbert Humfard such a blow with his demilance, that he feld both him and his horse to the ground, and so fled with a few more after him. And thus while the poore souldiers fought and were slaine, the barons fled away, and saued themselues. Also the earle Ferarence fled, and hid himselfe in a church; but being bewraied by a woman he was taken forth, and led away prisoner. After this, the king kept a parliament at Northhampton, where he disherited all those that tooke part with the earle Simon & all their children. Where also the popes legat Octobonus held a conuocation, and excommunicated all such bishops as had taken any part with Simon against the king: of whom diuers he sent vp to Rome, to be absolued of the pope; and further the said legat caused to be proclaimed certaine decrees, which he himselfe had made: and also the new grant of pope Clement, to the king and queene, of all the tenths for seuen yeeres to come. And shortly after, a tax also was fined vpon the country of Norfolk; to the gathering whereof Walter the bishop of Norwich was appointed. Ex Scala mundi.

A new assembly of the barons at Chesterfield, where they had the ouerthrow.

All the confederats of Simon Montfort with their children, disherited by the king.

Simon Montfort and his confederats excommunicated by the popes legat.

Tenths granted by the pope to the king and queene for seuen yeeres.

Anno 1267

After this, in the yeere of our Lord 1267, king Henry besieged againe the castell of Kenelworth, from the seuenth day before the first day of July, vntill the beginning of December: whither came Octobonus the popes legat, by whose intreatie Henry Hastings deliuered the same vnto the king, which stoutly had defended the same and resisted the king, hauing pardon granted both for him and his, of his life, lands, goods, and cattels. In which time also the barons againe assembled, with John Daiuill in the ile of Axioline, and so proceeded till they came to Lincolne, which they also tooke, and spoiled the Iewes, and slew many of them; and entring their synagogue tare and rent the booke of their law, and burnt the same, and all other writings & obligations which they could come by. Which thing when the king heard, he sent thither his sonne prince Edward: but as sone as they heard that, they fled into the ile of Ely, and fortified the same with bulwarks as strongly as they might, at euery entrance into the same. This was in the month of Aprill, when Edward the kings sonne came thither; who for the great abundance of waters in the same, could by no meanes enter the iland, till at length by the counsell of the inhabitants of that prouince, hee caused with a number of workmen great trenches and ditches to be made, somewhat to conuay away the water: and so long vsed the counsell of them, in making bridges with planks and hurdles, till at the last they entred the iland; who as sone as they were entred, the barons fled to London, where they were of the Londoners well entertained. The rest which were in the iland yeelded themselues (amongst whom was Roger Wake, Simon the ponger, and Peches) sauing their liues and members. After this, both the king and Edward his sonne came to London with a great power, but yet were kept out of the citie by the barons and citizens for the space of forty daies. And Octobonus the legat (who for feare was fled into the tower) they narrowly laid for, that he should not escape. At length by the intreatie of the earle of Glocester, and other earls that were his friends, both the barons and citizens were pardoned, and admitted to the kings fauor. And foure bishops and eight other noble men were chosen, such as were at Couentry first nominated, that they should order and dispose all matters betwixt the king and such as had lost their inheritance, as also the forme of their peace and ransome. And proclamation was made vpon the feast of All saints, of perfect peace and accord throughout all the realme.

The Iewes spoiled and slaine at Lincolne.

The barons fortified the iland of Ely.

The ile of Ely assaulted and entred by prince Edward.

The king kept out of London forty daies by the barons and citizens.

A peace concluded betweene the barons and the king.

In the fifty and two yeere of this king Henries raigne, eight daies after the feast of S. Martin, he held a parliament at Marleberge, in the yeere of our Lord aboue recited; where by the aduice of wise and discreet men, and with all the consents of the nobles, he ordained and enacted diuers good and profitable statutes for the reformation and bettering of the state of the realme and execution of common iustice, which are called the statutes of Marleberge.

The statutes of Marleberge.

The same yeere vpon S. Gregories day, Octobonus the legat called a councell at London, where were fiue archbishops, and a great number of bishops, abbats, and other prelats: which councell also within three daies brake vp againe.

A conuocation holden at London by Octobonus the popes legat.

The same yeere vpon S. Johns day the Baptist, Edward the kings sonne and diuers other noble men of England tooke vpon them the crosse by the legats hands at Northhampton, to the reliefe of the holy land, and the subuersion of the enemies of the crosse of Christ. Which done, the legat the same yeere went out of England, not purposing after that to returne againe. This holy legat (saith mine author) which might well be resembled to Lynx the monstrous beast, whose quicke sight penetrateth euery thing, inrolled to perpetuall memory the valuation of all the churches in the realm of England so narrowly, as by any meanes possible he might inquire the certainty thereof. The same was he that made all the cathedrall and conuentuall churches to pay pensions; so that those churches which gaue not the vacancy of their benefices to their clerks and strangers, should pay vnto them a certaine yeerly pension, during the vacancie of the benefices which they should haue.

The legat departing out of England.

Valuation taken of all churches by Octobonus the popes legat.

Pensions out of cathedrall and conuentuall churches paid to the popes clerks.

The same yeere died pope Clement the fourth, after whose death the church of Rome was two yeeres vacant: and then was chosen an archdeacon cardinall, whose name was Thearduus, as he was taking his iourny into the holy land, and called him Gregory the tenth.

Pope Clement the fourth dieth.

Pope Gregorie the tenth.

Then also did Edmund earle of Lancaster and Leicester, and second sonne of king Henry, take to wife the earle of Albemarle his daughter, and the neece of the earle of Glocester: at which marriage was the king and the queene, and all the nobilitie of England.

The marriage of Edmund earle of Lancaster.

The same yeere was the body of S. Edward the king and Confessor, by Walter Gifford archbishop of Yorke and other bishops, intombed in a new and rich shrine of gold and siluer, beset with precious stones, in the presence of Henry the king of England. In which yeere also fell a great raine and inundation of waters, such as hath not lightly been seene, which increased and continued the space of forty daies and more.

Edward the king and confessor shrined.

The same yeere died Walter de Langton, bishop of Sarum, the third day before the nones of January. After whom succeeded Robert of Northhampton, the dean of the same church. And because the sea of Canturbury was then vacant, he was confirmed by the chapter of Canturbury; which chapter had alwaies the iurisdiction in spirituall causes, during the vacancie of that sea, in as ample maner as the bishop himselfe had being aliue. After this, the bishop elect comming thither, thinking to haue had his consecration, was notwithstanding put backe for two causes: one was, for that there was present then no more but one bishop: the other was, for that all the other bishops had appealed, that he might not be consecrated to their preiudice: that is, by the authority of the chapter of Canturburie, saying that they would not be vnder the obedience of the monks.

The bishop of Sarum consecrated.

After

Digitized by Google

After this, solemne messengers were for this cause sent to the cardinals of Rome, for that then the sea of Rome was vacant: who receiued answer, that during the vacation of that sea, the confirmation and consecration of the bishop elect, pertained to the foresaid chapter of Canturbury.

The death and slaughter of L. Richard the kings sonne of Almaine at Viterbium.

The same yeere also was the lord Henry, the son and heire of the lord Richard king of Almaine, and brother to king Henry the third, slaine at Viterbium, in a certaine chapell hearing masse, by the lord Simon and Guido the sonnes of the lord Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester.

During this kings raigne, there was made a great and generall expedition of diuers and sundry christian princes to Hierusalem, taking vpon them the Lords character, that is, the crosse: among whom was also Edward the kings sonne, vnto the which expedition was granted him a subsidie throughout all the realme. And the month of Maie, the yeere of our Lord 1270, or as saith Florilegus, An. 1269, he set forward on his iourny.

Anno 1270

The death of Boniface archbishop of Canturbury. Adam Chelenden elected archbishop of Canturbury.

About the time when prince Edward was preparing his iourny, toward Asia, Boniface, of whom ye heard before, the archbishop of Canturbury, ended his life in the country of Sabaudia, going belike to Rome, or comming thence. After whose death the monks of Canturbury proceeding to a new election granted by the king, agreed vpon the prior of their house, named Adam Chelenden. But the king and his sonne prince Edward consenting and speaking in the behalfe of Robert Burnel their chancellor, did sollicit the matter with the monks, partly intreating, partly threatning them, to chuse the said Robert to be archbishop. Notwithstanding the monks being stout, would neither relent to their courteous requests, nor yet bow to their boisterous threats, but constantly persisting in their former election, appealed from the king and prince to the pope. Prince Edward being now on his iourny, and seeing himselfe thus frustrated of the monks, writeth back to the king his father; deuoutly praying and beseeching, in no wise to admit the election of the foresaid monks. And so passing to Douer with Henry, the sonne of Richard his vncle king of Romans, with their liues, tooke their passage in the moneth of August. After this, the prior thus elected, as is foretold, but not admitted by the king to be archbishop, went vp to Rome.

Appellation from the king to the pope by the monks of Canturbury.

Adam Chelenden goeth vp to Rome.

In the meane time, the monks in the absence of their elect, ordained one Geffrey Pomerall to be their officiall, who seeing himselfe aduanced to that dignity, and bearing belike some old grudge against the prior of Douer, caused him to be cited vp to appeare in the chapter house of Canturbury. The prior of Douer seeing this citation to be preiudicial to him and to the church of Douer, whereas the monks of Canturbury haue no such iurisdiction (the sea of Canturbury being vacant) but that all things appertaining to that church, ought to be reserued whole to the consecration of the new archbishop, therefore, for the state both of him and of his church, he appealed vp also vnto Rome. But to returne to the archbishop againe.

Variance between the officiall of Canturbury, and the prior of Douer.

Appellation to Rome.

The second yeere after, Chelenden the foresaid archbishop elect, remaining all this while at Rome, at last resigned vp his election to the popes hand, being Gregory the tenth; who then gaue the same to Robert Kilwarby. Who then comming to Douer, restored againe the prior of that house, being before excluded vpon certaine causes. By these contentions iudge good reader of the religion of these men, and of these times. And now to returne to our former story.

Adam Chelenden resigneth to the pope. Robert Kilwarby archbishop of Canturbury.

About this time came out the great concordance by an English frier, called John Dernington. Ex Eulogio.

The concordance.

It was aboue declared, how a generall voyage being proclaimed to war against the Turks, and a subsidie being collected in England vpon the same: prince Edward with others was appointed to take their voiage, and now were onward in their iorney. Who at Michaelmas following, with his companie came to Egermorth, which is from Marsilia eight leagues westward: and there taking ship againe (hauing a merrie wind and prosperous) within ten daies arrived at Sunes at Tunicium, where he was with great ioy welcommed and entertained of the christian princes that were to this purpose assembled, as of Philip the French king, whose father Ludouicus died a little before, of Carolus the king of Sicilia, and the two kings Nauar and Aragon. And as the lord Edward came thither for his father the king of England, thither came also Henry the sonne of the king of Almaine for his father, who at his returne from the voyage, was slaine in a chapell at Viterbium hearing masse, by the lord Simon and Guido, the sonnes of the lord Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester.

When prince Edward demanded of these kings and princes what was to be done, they answered him againe and said: The prince of this citie, said they, and the prouince adioining to the same, hath been accustomed to pay tribute vnto the king of Sicilia euery yeere. And now, for that the same hath been for the space of seuen yeers vnpaied and more, therefore we thought good to make inuasion vpon him. But the king knowing the same tribute to be iustly demanded, hath now according to our owne desires satisfied for the time past, and also paied his tribute before hand.

Then said he: My lords what is this to the purpose? Are we not here all assembled, and haue taken vpon vs the Lords character to fight against the infidels and enemies of Christ? What meane you then to conclude a peace with them? God forbid we should doe so, for now the land is plaine and hard, so that we may approch the holy city Hierusalem. Then said they; Now haue we made a league with them; neither is it lawfull for vs to breake the same: but let vs returne againe to Sicilia, and when the winter is past, we may well take shipping to Acra. But this counsell nothing at all liked him, neither did he shew himselfe well pleased therewith: but after that hee had made them a princely banket, hee went into his closet or priuie chamber from amongst them, neither would be partaker of any of that wicked mony which they had taken. They notwithstanding continuing their purpose, at the next merrie wind tooke shipping, and for want of ships, left two hundred of their men ashore, crying out and pitiously lamenting for the perill and hazard of death they were in. Wherewith prince Edward being somewhat moued with compassion, came back to the land, and receiued and stowed them in his owne ships, being the last that went aboord. Within seuen daies after, they arriued in the kingdome of Sicilia, ouer against the citie Trapes, casting their anchors a league from thence within the sea, for that their ships were of great burthen & throughly fraught. And from the hauen of the citie they sent out barges and botes to receiue and bring such of the nobilitie to land as would: but for their horses for the most part, and all their armor they kept still within board. At length towards the euening, the sea began to be rough, and increased to a great tempest and a mightie, insomuch that their ships were beaten one against anothers sides; and drowned there were of them at that tempest lying at anchor, more then an hundred and twentie, with all their armour and munition, with innumerable soules besides, and that wicked mony also which they had taken before likewise perished and was drowned. But the tempest hurt not so much as one ship of prince Edwards, who had in number thirteene, nor yet had one man lost thereby, for that, as it may be presupposed, he consented not to the wicked counsel of the rest. When in the morning the princes and kings came to the sea side, and saw all their ships drowned, and saw their men and horses in great number cast vpon the land drowned, they had full heauie hearts, as well they might. For of all their ships and mariners, which were in number 1500, besides the common souldiers, there were no more saued then the mariners of one onely ship, and they in this wise. There was in that ship a good and wise matron (a countesse or an earles wife) who perceiuing the tempest to grow, & fearing her selfe, called to her the master of the ship, and asked whether in attempting to the shore, it were not possible to saue themselues? Who answered, that to saue the ship it was impossible, howbeit the men that were therein by Gods helpe he doubted not. Then said the countesse, For the ship force no whit, saue the soules therein, and haue to thee double the valor of the ship. Who immediatly hoising the sailes, with all force ran the ship a ground so neere the shore as possible was. Thus with the vehemencie of the weather and force he came withall, brast the ship, and saued all that was within the same, as the master of the same ship had shewed and said before.

The great expedition to inuade the Turk, stated by the concluding of a peace.

The great rage of the French king against the Turks turned into a mony matter.

The almesdeede of prince Edward to the poore souldiers.

A great shipwracke of the christians lying at anchor a little from Trapes. Mony euill got, as euill lost. Non habet euentus sordida præda bonos. Ex scala mundi. Ex Gualt. Gisburn. Ex Flor. hist.

Prince Edward and his men preserued from the tempest.

The integritie of prince Edward rewarded of God.

Then the kings and princes (altering their purpose after this so great a shipwracke) returned home againe euery one vnto their owne lands; onely Edward the kings sonne remained behinde with his men and ships, which the Lord had saued and preserued. Then prince Edward (renouating his purpose) tooke shipping againe, and within fifteene daies after Easter arriued he at Acra, and went aland, taking with him a thousand of the best souldiers and most expert, and tarried there a whole moneth, refreshing both his men and horses, and that in this space he might learne and know the secrets of the land. After this, he tooke with him six or seuen thousand souldiers and marched forward twenty miles from Acra, and tooke Nazareth: and those that he there found he slew, and afterward returned again to Acra. But their enemies following after them, thinking to haue set vpon them at some strait or other aduantage, were by the prince premonished thereof, and returning againe vpon them, gaue a charge, and slew many of them, and the rest they put to flight. After this, about Midsummer, when the prince had vnderstanding that the Saracens began to gather at Cackhow, which was forty miles from Acra: he marching thither, set vpon them very early in the morning, and slew of them more then a 1000, the rest he put to flight, and tooke rich spoiles, marching forward till they came to a castell named Castrum peregrinorum, situat vpon the sea coast, and tarried there that night, and the next day they returned toward Acra. In the meane season, the king of Hierusalem sent vnto the noble men of Cyprus, desiring them with speed that they would come and aid the christians; but they would not come, saying, they would keepe their owne land and goe no further. Then prince Edward sent vnto them, desiring that at his request they would come and ioine in aid with him. Who immediatly thereupon came vnto him with great preparation and furniture for the war, saying, that at his commandement they were bound to doe no lesse, for that his predecessors were sometimes Prince Edward arriueth at Acra and taketh Nazareth.

The noble men of Cyprus shew their fidelitie to the prince and king of England.

gouer-gouernors of their land, and that they ought alwaies to shew their fidelity to the kings of England. Then the christians being herewith animated, made a third voyage or rode, and came as far as the fort called Vincula S. Petri, and to S. Georges: and when they had slaine certaine there, not finding any to make resistance against them, they retired againe from whence they came.

A grieuous deceit of the Saracens practised against prince Edward. Ex Gib. Scala mundi.

When thus the fame of prince Edward grew amongst his enemies, and that they began to stand in doubt of him; they deuised among themselues, how by some policie they might circumuent him and betray him. Whereupon, the great prince and admirall of Joppa sent vnto him, faining himselfe vnder great deceit to become a christian, and that hee would draw with him a great number besides, so that they might be honorably entertained and vsed of the christians. This talke pleased the prince well, and perswaded him to finish the thing he had so well begun, by writing againe: who also by the same messenger sent and wrote backe vnto him diuers times about the same matter, whereby no mistrust should spring. This messenger, saith mine author, was one Ex caute nutritus, one of the stony hearted that neither feared God, nor dreaded death. The fifth time when this messenger came, and was of the princes seruants searched, according to the maner and custome what weapon and armor he had about him, as also his purse, that not so much as a knife could be found about him, he was had vp into the princes chamber, and after his reuerence done, he pulled out certaine letters, which he deliuered to the prince from his lord, as he had done others before. This was about eight daies after Whitsuntide, vpon a tuesday, somewhat before night; at which time the prince was laid vpon his bed bare headed in his ierkin, for the great heat and intemperature of the weather.

The messenger searched before he came to the princes presence.

When the prince had read the letters, it appeared by them, that vpon the saturday next following, his lord would be there ready to accomplish all that he had written and promised. The report of these newes by the prince to the standers by liked them well, drawing somewhat backe to consult thereof amongst themselues. In the meane time, the messenger, kneeling and making his obeisance to the prince (questioning further with him) put his hand to the belt, as though he would haue pulled out some secret letters; and suddenly he pulled out an inuenomed knife, thinking to haue stricken him into the belly therewith as he lay: but the prince lifting vp his hand to defend the blow, was stricken a great wound into the arme. And being about to fetch another stroke at him, the prince againe with his foot tooke him such a blow, that he feld him to the ground. With that the prince gat him by the hand, and with such violence wrested the knife from him, that he hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead, and immediatly thrust the same into the belly of the messenger and striker, and slew him. The princes seruants being in the next chamber not far off, hearing the buskling, came with great haste running in. And finding the messenger lying dead on the floore, one of them tooke vp a stoole, and beat out his braines; whereat the prince was wroth, for that he stroke a dead man, and one that was killed before. The rumor hereof, as it was strange, so it soone went throughout all the court, and from thence amongst the common people: wherefore they were very heauy and greatly discouraged. To him came also the captaine of the temple, and brought him a costly and precious drinke against poison, lest the venome of the knife should penetrat the liuely bloud, and in blaming wise said vnto him; Did I not shew your grace before of the deceit and subtiltie of this people? Notwithstanding, saith he, let your grace take a good heart, you shall not die of this wound; my life for yours. But straightway the surgeons and physicians were sent for, and the prince was dressed, and within a few daies after the wound began to putrifie, and the flesh to looke dead and blacke; whereupon they that were about the prince began to mutter amongst themselues, and were very sad and heauy. Which thing he himselfe perceiuing, said vnto them; Why mutter you thus amongst your selues? What see you in me, can I not be healed? Tell me the truth, be ye not afraid. Whereupon one said to him; and like your grace you may bee healed, we mistrust it not; but yet it will be very painfull for you to suffer. May suffering, saith he againe, restore health? Yea, saith the other, on paine of losing my head. Then, said the prince, I commit my selfe vnto you, doe with me what you thinke good. Then said one of the physicians; Is there any of your nobles in whom your grace reposeth speciall trust? To whom the prince answered, yea, naming certaine of the noble men that stood about him. Then said the physician vnto the two whom the prince first named, the lord Edmund, and the lord John Moise: And doe you also faithfully loue your lord and prince? Who answered both, Yea vndoubtedly. Then saith he; Take you away this Gentlewoman and lady (meaning his wife) and let her not see her lord and husband, vntill such a time I will you thereunto. Whereupon they tooke her out of the princes presence, crying out and wringing her hands. Then said they vnto her; Be ye contented good lady and madam, it is better that one woman should weepe a little while, then that all the realme of England should weepe a great season. Then vpon the morrow they cut out all the dead enuenomed flesh out of the princes arme, and threw it from them, and said vnto him: How thereth your grace? We promise you within these fifteene daies you shall shew your selfe abrode (if God permit) vpon your horse backe, whole and well as euer you were. And according to the promise he made the prince, it came to passe, to the no little comfort and admiration of all his subiects. When the great Soldan heard of it, and that the prince was yet aliue, he would scarcly beleeue the same; and sending vnto him three of his nobles and princes, excused himselfe by them, calling his gods to witnesse, that the same was done neither by him, nor his consent. Which princes and messengers standing aloofe off from the kings sonne, worshipping him, fell flat vpon the ground. You (saith the prince) doe reuerence me, but yet you loue me not. But they vnderstood him not, because he spake in English vnto them, speaking by an interpreter. Neuertheless, he honorably intreated them, and sent them away in peace.

The prince restored to health, and the Soldan forsweareth himselfe.

This when prince Edward had beene eighteene moneths in Acra, he tooke shipping about the assumption of our lady (as we call it) returning homeward, and after seuen weekes he arriued in Sicilia at Trapes, and from thence trauelling through Palestina and Metmes, and so through the midst of Apulia, till he came to Rome, where he was of the pope honorably entertained: from thence he came into France, whose fame and noble prowesse was there much bruted among the common people, and enuied of the nobilitie, especially of the earle de Chalons, who sent vnto him and required him that he might breake a launce with him at the tilt in his country. Which thing to doe, for that the prince would not diminish his honor and fame (although he might haue well alleaged a sufficient cause and excuse by meanes of his trauell) yet he would not, but willingly consented thereunto: whereupon it was proclaimed, that prince Edward by such a day, with those that were with him, had challenged all commers at the tilt and barriers. Whereupon great assemblies were made in the country all about, and diuers, as well horsemen as footmen, had conioured amongst themselues and conspired against the Englishmen, selling their horses and armor aforehand, and drinking one to another in boun tokage of the spoile of them whom they would take as their prisoners. Prince Edward in the meane time sent into England for diuers earles and barons, which came vnto him. When the day appointed was come, the prince had with him more then one thousand horsemen, which were knights, besides his footmen, but yet there was as many more on the other side both in horsemen and footmen. When the parties should meete, the French footmen which had before cõspired, began both to spoile, rifle, and kill. The Englishmen resisted and defended themselues both with bowes and slings, many of them they slew and draue them to the gates of their citie, the other they chased ouer a riuer, where many of them were drowned. In the meane season the earle with fiftie of his knights which followed him, came forth and ioined together so many for so many, and a long time together they tried it with their swords, laying one at another. At the last the earle perceiuing himselfe not able to match with him at the armes end, enclosed with him, and taking him about the neck, held him with his armes very strait. What meane you my lord (saith the prince) thinke you to haue my horse? Yea marry (quoth the earle) I meane to haue both thee and thy horse. Hereat prince Edward being ascorned, lifted vp himselfe, and gaue him such a blow, that therewithall he forsaking his horse, hung still about the princes necke, till that hee shooke him off to the ground. Herewith the prince being somewhat in a heat, left the preasse to take the aire, thereby to refresh himselfe. But when he saw the iniurie of the Frenchmen towards his men, and how they had slaine many of them, he then said vnto them, that they vsed rather the exercise of battell, then of torney. Spare you not therefore (saith hee) from henceforth none of them all, but giue them againe as good as they bring. Then they assaied to kill each other freely on either part, and let their swords walke.

The prince returneth out of Turkie into England againe.

A day of sport in France appointed, which turned to good earnest.

A conspiracie of the Frenchmen against the Englishmen.

Exercise of battell, in stead of barriers and torney.

And when by this time the English footmen were againe returned, and saw the conflict of horsemen, and many other Englishmen ouerthrowne, they put themselues amidst the preasse, some panching the horses, some cutting asunder the girths of the Frenchmens saddles, ouerthrew the riders and gaue them holy bread. Then when the foresaid earle was horsed againe by some of his men and amongst the throng, prince Edward also rushed in amongst the thickest, and coped againe with him; to whom he often spake and cried, that he should yeeld himselfe as vanquished: but that he would not doe. Notwithstanding, when his strength began to faile him, he was faine to yeelde himselfe vnto a simple knight, according as prince Edward him bad, and all the rest of his horsemen and knights fled and saued themselues. Howbeit, many of them in that place were slaine, and our men returned hauing the victory. But when after this they thought themselues to be quiet and at rest, they were killed by two and by three at once as they went in the streets of the citizens. Which thing when the prince heard, he sent for the maior and burgesses, commanding them to see the same redressed, and that immediatly: for otherwise, of his knighthood he assured them, that vpon the morrow he would fire the cite, and make it leuell with the ground. Whereupon they

The victory of the prince and Englishmen against the earle of Chalons and the Frenchmen.

Prince Edward wounded and hurt with an inuenomed knife by the Turks messenger.

The prince in perill of death by reason of his hurt, is comforted of the physicians.

Digitized by Google

they went their waies, and set watchmen in diuers places of the same to keepe the peace, by which meanes the prince and his men were in safety & quiet. Thus in this passime of tourning and barriers, much blood was spilt, whereupon the name of the place was changed: so that it is not called Torniamentum de Chalons, but Paruum bellum de Chalons.

From thence the prince came to Paris, and was of the French king honorably entertained: and after certaine daies, he went from thence into Vascónia, where he taried till that he heard of the death of the king his father.

Prince Edward was in Vascónia at the time of his fathers death.

In the yeere of our Lord 1272, died pope Clement the fourth: after whom succeeded pope Gregory the tenth; who in the next yeere following, which was the yeere of our Lord 1273, called a generall councell at Lions, about the controuersie betweene the Greeke church and the Latin church, and for the vacancie of the sea apostolicall, &c.

Anno 1272

Pope Clement the fourth dieth.

Pope Gregory the tenth.

Certaine notes of other occurrents chanced in forren countries abrode, within the compasse of the yeeres and raigne of the foresaid king Henry the third.

HAuing thus accomplished the life and history of king Henrie the third, with such accidents as happened within this realme, I thought good to adioine vnto the same some other forren matters not vnworthy the note, incident in other countries during the time of the said king: namely from the yeere of our Lord 1217, vnto this yeere 1272, which I thought the rather not to be omitted, for that euen from and about the beginning of this kings raigne, sprang vp the very welsprings of all mischiefe, the sects of monkish religions and other swarmes of popish orders, which with their grosse and horrible superstitions haue incumbred the church of Christ euer since.

First, to omit the repetition of pope Innocent the third, the great grandsire of that foule monster transubstantiation and auricular confession, with the friers Domonike, and Franciscan friers, Thomas Aquinas, Iacobus de Uoragine, Vincentius, with pope Honorius the third, coiner of the canon law, and the cardinall Hostiensis, as also Bonauenture, Albertus Magnus, with pope Urban the fourth, first founder of the feast of Corpus Christi, and procurer of the adoration of the body of Christ in the sacrament, besides Durandus and many more: followeth further to be noted, that the Tartarians about the yeere 1240, issuing out of Mulcouia into the parts of Polonia, made great waste in Christendome, so much the rather because the princes about Polonia being at variance amongst themselues, bled none other remedy for their defence, but heaps of masses, inuocation of the dead, and worshipping of images, which indeed did nothing relieue them, but rather increase their trouble.

Ex Annalibus Sileſiæ.

The Tartarians make great spoile in Christendome.

The next yeere following, the whole nation of the Scythians (muttering like locusts) inuaded the parts of Europe with two mighty armies; whereof the one entring vpon Polonia, made great hauocke and carried away many christians from thence captiues, the other ouerrunning Hungaria, made no lesse spoile there. Adde hereunto another fresh army of Tartarians, to the number of 5000000, who at the very same time ioining themselues together, entred into Mulcouia and Cracouia, and made most horrible slaughter, sparing neither sex nor age, noble nor vnnoble within the land. From thence passing to Vratislauia, made great spoile there also, and thinking there to win the castel, were by the miraculous working of the Lord, at the instance and praiers of good people discomfited beyond all expectation of man, by thundering and lightning falling vpon them from heauen in most terrible wise.

The Scythians army like locusts.

The same yeere immediatly after Easter, another army of Tartarians were gathered against Lignicium, drawing neere to Germany; by the brute whereof, the Germans being put in great feare, were altogether dismaied, but yet not able to helpe themselues, by reason they lacked a good guide and gouernor amongst them. All which came to passe, specially by the mischieuous practise of the Roman popes, raising variance & discord among them. Notwithstanding Henry prince of Polonia and Silesia, gathering a power as wel as he could, did incounter with him; but in fine, his whole army was vanquished, and the king himselfe slaine. Notwithstanding which ouerthrow of christians it pleased God to strike such a feare into the hearts of the said Tartarians, that they durst not approch any further or neerer into Germany, but retired for that time into their country againe: who recounting their victory by taking each man but one eare of euery of the christians that were slaine, found the slaughter so great, as that they filled nine great sacks full of eares. Nevertheless, after this in the yeere 1260, the same Tartarians hauing the Mulcouits to their guides returned againe into Polonia and Cracouia, where in the space of three moneths, they ouerran the land with fire and sword euer to the coasts of Silesia. And had not the princes of Germany put to their helping hand in this lamentable case, they had vterly wasted the whole land of Polonia and the coasts thereabouts.

King Henry slaine, and his army vanquished.

Nine sacks full of christians eares being slaine.

This yeere also in the moneth of Aprill, Richard king of Almaine died at the castell of Berkhamsted, and was buried at the abby of Hailes, which he built out of the ground. The same yeere also at Norwich there fell a great controuersie betweene the monks and the citizens, about certaine tallagies and liberties. At last, after much altercation and wrangling words, the furious rage of the citizens so much increased and preuailed, and so little was the feare of God before their eies, that all together they set vpon the abby and priory, and burned both the church and bishops palace. When this thing was heard abrode, the people were very sory to heare of so bold and naughty an enterprise, and much discommended the same. At the last, king Henry calling for certaine of his lords and barons, sent them to the citie of Norwich, that they might punish and see execution done on the chiefest malefactors; insomuch that some of them were condemned and burnt, some of them hanged, and some were drawne by the heeles with horses throughout the streetes of the citie, and after in much misery ended their wretched liues.

Richard king of Almaine dieth.

A great variance betweene the monks and citizens of Norwich.

Execution done at Norwich by the commandement of king Henry the third.

The same yeere Adam the prior of Canturbury, and bishop elect, in the presence of pope Gregory the tenth, refused to be archbishop, although he was elect. Wherefore the pope gaue the same archbishoprick to frier Robert Kilwarby the pronoll of the preaching friers, a man of good life and great learning. He was consecrated at Canturbury the fourth day of March, by six bishops of the same prouince. The same yeere also at Michaelmas, the lord Edmund, the sonne of king Richard of Almaine, married the sister of Gilbert earle of Glocester. Also in this yeere of our Lord 1273, the sixteenth day before the kalends of December vpon S. Edmunds day, the archbishop and confessor, died king Henry, in the six and fifty yeer of his raigne, and was buried at Westminster, leauing after him two sons and two daughters, to wit, Edward the prince, and Edmund earle of Lancaster and Leicester, Beatrice and Margaret; which Margaret was married to the king of Scots. This king Henry in his life time began the building of the church and steeple at Westminster, but did not throughly finish the same before his death.

Adam prior of Canturbury, refuseth to be archbishop of Canturbury.

Robert Kilwarby archbishop of Canturbury.

The death of king Henry the third.

King Edward the first.

IN the time of the death of king Henry, Edward his eldest son was absent in Vascónia, as a little before you heard; yet notwithstanding, by Robert Kilwarby archbishop of Canturbury, and other bishops and nobles, he was ordained heire and successor after his father; who, after he had heard of his fathers death, returned home to his country, and was crowned in the yeere of our Lord 1274, who then laid downe his crowne, saying he would no more put it on, before he had gathered together all the lands pertaining to the same. This Edward as he had alwaies before been a louing and naturall child to his father, whom he had deliuered out of prison and captiuity: and afterward hearing both together of the death of his sonne, and of his father, wept and lamented much more for his father then for his sonne, saying to the French king (which asked the cause thereof) that the losse of his child was but light: for children might after increase and be multiplied, but the losse of his parent was greater, which could not be recouered: Robert Auesburie. So almighty God for the same his pietie to his father shewed, rewarded him againe with great successe, felicitie, and long raigne: insomuch that he being young, as he was playing at chesse with a certaine souldior of his, suddenly hauing occasion giuen, rose vp and went his way; who was not so sone voided the place, but incontinent fell downe a mighty stone from the vaut aboue, directly vpon the place where he sat, able to haue quashed him in peeces, if hee had tarried neuer so little more. In the preseruation of whom, as I see the present hand and mighty prouidence of the liuing God: so in the kings order againe, I note a fault or error worthy of reprehension: for that he receiuing such a liuely benefit at the hand of the liuing Lord, going therefore on pilgrimage to Walsingham, gaue thanks not onely to our Lord, but rather to a rotten blocke. Ibidem. Of the gentle nature of this couragious prince, sufficient prose is giuen by this one example: that what time he being in his disport of hawking, chanced sharply to rebuke the negligence of one of his gentlemen, for what fault I cannot tell about his hawke; the gentleman being on the other side of the riuer, hearing his menacing words, was glad (as he said) that the riuer was betweene them. With this answer the couragious blood of this prince being moued, vpon present heat he leaped straight into the flood, both of a swift stream & of a dangerous deepnesse, and no lesse hard in getting out. Notwithstanding, either forgetting his owne life, or neglecting the danger present, but hauing a good horse, ventureth his owne death to haue the death of his man. At length, with much difficultie recouering the banke, with his sword drawne pursueth his prouoker. Who hauing not so good an horse, and seeing himselfe in danger of taking, reineth his horse, and returning backe barehead vnto the prince, submitteth his necke vnder his hand to strike. The prince, whose feruent stomacke the water of the whole riuer could not quench, a little submission of his man did so extinct that the quarrell fell, his anger ceased, and

Edward the first.

Pietie to parents rewarded of God. Ex Chron. Tho. Walsinghami.

A miracle of God in preseruing king Edward.

False worship reprehended. God giueth the benefit, and a dumbe blocke hath the thanks.

Example of princely clemencie to be learned of kings and princes.

Digitized by Google

Ex chron. Nic. Triuet. & Tho. Walsingami.

and his swoꝛd put vp, without any stroke giuen. And so both returned to their game, good friends againe. Auesb. Nico. Triuet.

Wales subdued.

In the first begining of his raigne, the king had much ado in Wales, where he had diuers conflicts with the Welshmen, whom at last he subdued and cut downe their woods, suppꝛessed rebellions, and vanquishing their kings, Lewline and his bꝛother, oꝛdained his eldest sonne Edward, boꝛne in the same country, to be pꝛince of Wales. This Lewlin captaine of the Welshmen here mentioned, rebelling against king Edward, asked counsell of coniuration, what euent should come vpon his attempt. To whom it was told, that he should goe foꝛward boldly, foꝛ doubtlesse he should ride thꝛough Chepeside at London, with a crowne on his head. Which so came to passe. Foꝛ being slaine, his head was carried thꝛough Chepe, with a crowne of siluer to London bꝛidge. Whereby men may learne not to seeke noꝛ sticke to these vaine pꝛophecies, which though they fall true, yet are they traines of the diuell to deceiue men.

The kings first sonne: prince of Wales.

Vaine prophecies not to be sought to.

About this time was a great earthquake, and such a rot, that consumed a great multitude of sheepe in the land, thꝛough the occasion (as they say) of one scabbed sheepe that came out of Spaine. The king returning from Wales to England, oꝛdered certaine new lawes foꝛ the wealth of the realme. Among many other, this was one: that authoꝛity was giuen to all maiors, bailiffes, and other officers to see execution and punishment of all bakers making bꝛead vnder the size, with pilloꝛy. Of millers stealing coꝛne, with the tumbzell, &c. And within two yeeres after the statute of moꝛtmaine was first enacted, which is to meane, that no man should giue vnto the church any lands oꝛ rents, without a speciall licence of the king.

Punishment foꝛ bakers and millers.

The statute of moꝛtmaine first enacted.

Anno 1279

About which time also, being the seuenth yeere of his raign, 297 Iewes foꝛ mony-clipping were put to execution. In which same yeere began first the foundation of the blacke friers by Ludgate. And the towne of Boston was greatly wasted the same yeere with fire. The halfe penny and farthing began first to be coined the selfe time, which was the eighth yeere of his raigne. The great conduit in Chepe began the fourth yeere after to bee made, An. 1248. And the nexte yeere following, the new woꝛke of the church of Westminster (begun as is afoꝛe pꝛemonished in the third yeere of Henry the third) was finished, which was sixtie six yeeres in edifying. The Iewes were vtterly banished this realme of England the same time, foꝛ which the commons gaue to the king a fiftéenth, &c.

Blacke friers by Ludgate builded.

Boston blemished with fire.

The great conduit in Chepe.

Westminster church finished.

After that, the country of Wales was bꝛought in a full oꝛder and quiet, by the hewing downe of the woods, and casting downe the old holds, and building of new; which all was bꝛought to perfect end, about the 24 yeere of this kings raigne. Then ensued another bꝛoil as great oꝛ greater with Scotland, to the great disquiet of the king and the realme of England many yeeres after. This trouble first began by the death of Alexander king of Scots, who died without issue left aliue behinde him. Although Fabian in the 7. booke of his chꝛonicles affirmeth; that he left thꝛee daughters, the eldest married to sir John Baliol; the second, to Robert Bꝛuce; the third, to one Hastings. But this in Fabian is to be coꝛrected, as which neither standeth with it selfe, and is cléerely conuicted by the witnesse and histoꝛy of Rob. Auesburie, and also of Gisburne.

A place in Fabian corrected. Ex Tho. Walsingham & Gualtero Guisburnensi.

Foꝛ first, if king Alexander had left his eldest daughter married to sir John Baliol, then what controuersie might rise among the loꝛds about succession, néeding so diligent and anxious deciding by the king of England? Secondly, what claime oꝛ title could the king of Noꝛway haue to the crowne of Scotland, which was one of the challengers, claiming the said crown in the behalfe of Margaret, the néece of the foꝛesaid king Alexander her grandfather, if the eldest daughter of the father had been left aliue? Thirdly, what can be moꝛe plaine, when by the affirmance of the foꝛesaid stoꝛy is testified, that king Alexander had two wiues? Of the second thereof he had no issue. Of the first had two childꝛen: Alexander which died befoꝛe his father; and Margaret married to the king of Noꝛway, which died also befoꝛe her father, of whom came Margaret the néece of Alexander, and daughter to the king of Noꝛway afoꝛe mentioned. And she also died in the iourney betweene Noꝛway and Scotland, the fourth yeere after the decease of her grandfather. Wherefoꝛe, as this matter standeth most cléere, so let vs now returning from whence wee digressed, pꝛosecute the rest that followeth. After that Alexander thus, as is said, departed without issue, and also Margaret his néece in Noꝛway was deceased, the matter came in a great doubt among the nobles of Scotland (especially twelue by name) to whom the right of the crowne should next pertaine. After much variance among parties, at length the election and determination of the matter was committed to the iudgement of king Edward of England: who after sufficient pꝛoofe made to the Scots and firme euidence, bꝛought out of all the ancient histoꝛies both of England and Scotland, testifying from time to time that he was chiefe head and Soueraigne of the realme of Scotland: first by necessitie of the law, and by all their consents toke full possession of the same. And that done, adiudged the right of the crowne to John Baliol, who descended of the daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, bꝛother to Dauid K. of Scot. in the daies of king Henry the second. This earle Dauid had thꝛée daughters, Isabell, married to Robert Bꝛuse; Margaret, to Allen earle of Galloway; and Ellen, to Henry loꝛd Hastings: Allen earle of Galloway had Ellen, married to Roger Quincie earle of Winchester, Constable of Scotland; and Doꝛuagile, married to John Baliol, father to Edward king of Scots.

Lacke of succession, what disturbance it woꝛketh in a realme.

The king of England pꝛoued by old recoꝛds, chiefe head and soueraigne of Scotland.

Anno 1291

When these things were thus finished in Scotland, and sir John Baliol as vtlost rightfull inheritoꝛ had receiued the crowne of Scotland at the hands of king Edward thankfully, and foꝛ the same, in the pꝛesence of the baronie of England and of Scotland, did vnto the said king Edward his homage, and sware to him fealtie: the Scots with their new king returned into Scotland, and king Edward remoued againe to England.

Sir John Baliol made king of Scotland by king Edward.

King of Scots doth homage to the king of England.

But not long after, the falsnesse of this Scotish king some appeared. Who repenting him of his homage done, vntruly foꝛsoke his foꝛmer oth and pꝛomise, and made warre against king Edward, thꝛough the counsell of the abbat of Pentos. Wherefoꝛe, the king with a great host sped him into Scotland, and in pꝛocesse laid siege to the towne of Barwicke, which the Scots did eagerly defend, not only to the discomfiture, but also to the deriision of the king and his English host. But in conclusion, the Englishmen pꝛeuailed and wan the towne, where were slaine of the Scots the number of twenty and fiue thousand. And while the king was there busied in winning other holds about the same, he sent part of his host to Dunbar, where the Englishmen againe had the victoꝛy, and slew of the Scots twenty thousand: Gisburne saith but ten thousand; so that vertie few were lost of the English company. The king with a great number of pꝛisoners returning into his realme, shoꝛtly after sped him ouer vnto Flanders, where he sustained great trouble by the French king, till truce foꝛ a certaine space was betweéen them concluded. But in the meane while that king Edward was thus occupied beyond the seas; the French king (reSoꝛting to his pꝛactised manner) set the Scots secretly against the Englishmen to kéepe the king at home. Which Scots making themselues a captaine named William Walets, warred vpon the boꝛders of Noꝛthumberland, where they did much hurt. At length the king returning from Burdeaux into England, shoꝛtly vpon the same toke his iourney into Scotland. Where meeting at Yoꝛke with his host, he marched into the realme of Scotland, winning as he went, townes and castels, till at length comming to the towne of Frankyth on Mary Magdalens day, he met with the power of Scotland, and had with them a soꝛe fight, but thꝛough Gods pꝛouidence the victoꝛy fell to the right cause of Englishmen: so that of the Scots were slaine in the field, as it is of diuers writers affirmed, ouer the number of thirty and two thousand; and of Englishmen, but barely xxbiij. persons. Whereupon, the king againe taking possession and fealty of the whole land, returned home.

Fall of Bamburgh castell.

Fallnesse iustly punished.

The Scots rebell againe.

The second voiage of king Edward into Scotland.

Anno 1298

And yet the false vntruth of the Scots would not thus be ruled, but rose vp in a new bꝛoile: so that the king was inforced to make his power againe the yeere following into Scotland, where he so suppꝛessed the rebellion of the loꝛds and of the commons, that they swearing to the kings allegiance, pꝛesented themselues by great companies, and put them wholly in the kings grace and mercy: so that the king thinking himselfe to be in peaceable possession, and in a great suretie of the land, caused to be sworne vnto him, the rulers of the boꝛoughs, cities and townes, with other officers of the land, and so returned vnto Barwicke, and so into England, and lastly to Westminster.

Ex Fabiano. A notable victoꝛy against the Scots.

Anno 1299

The Scots sworne to the kings allegiance.

These martial affaires betweéne England and Scotland, although they appertaine not greatly to the purpose of our storie ecclesiasticall, yet so much by the way I thought bꝛiefly to touch, whereby the better it might bee vnderstood by these pꝛemisses, that which followeth in the sequell hereof. As the Scots were thus warring and raging against the king, and saw they could not make their party good, they sent pꝛiuily to pope Boniface foꝛ his aid and counsell: who immediatly sendeth downe his pꝛecept to the king, to this effect, that hee should hereafter surcease to disquiet oꝛ molest the Scots, foꝛ that they were a people exempt, and pꝛoperly pertaining to his chapell. And therefoꝛe it could not otherwise be, but that the citie of Ierusalem must néedes defend his owne citizens: and as the mount Sion, maintaine such as trust in the Loꝛd, &c. Whereunto the king bꝛiefly maketh answer againe, swearing with an oth, that he would to his vttermost kéep and defend that which was his right, euidently knowne to all the woꝛld, &c. Thus the Scots bearing themselues bold vpon the popes message, and also confederating themselues with the Frenchmen, passed ouer that yeere. The next yeere after that (which was 29. of the kings raigne) the said pope Boniface directeth his letters againe to the king, wherein hee doth vendicate the kingdome of Scotland, to be pꝛoper to the church of Rome, and not subiect to the king of England. And therefoꝛe it was against God, against iustice, and also pꝛetudiciall to the church of Rome, foꝛ him to haue oꝛ hold dominion vpon the same, which he pꝛoued by these reasons:

Ex Chron. Thom. Walsingham, Auesb.

The popes message vnto the king.

The kings answer to the pope.

The pope challengeth the realme of Scotland to be free from the dominion of England.

First,

Digitized by Google

First, that when king Henry the father of this king, receiued aid of Alexander king of Scots in his warres against Simon Mountford, he recognised and acknowledged in his letters patents, that he receiued the same of king Alexander, not of any duty, but of speciall fauor.

Item, when the said king Alexander comming to England, did homage to the said king Henry; he did it not as king of Scotland, but only for certaine lands of Tyndall and Pereth, lying in England.

Item, where the said king Alexander left behind him Margaret his heire, being neece to the king of England, and yet vnder age; yet the tuition of the said Margaret was committed not to the king of England, but to certaine lords of Scotland, deputed to the same.

Moreouer, when any legacie was directed downe from Rome to the realme of England, for collecting of tenths or other causes, the said legacie toke no place in the realme of Scotland, and might well be resisted (as it was in king Alexander his daies) except another speciall commission touching the realme of Scotland, were coyned withall. Whereby it appeareth, these be two seuerall dominions, and not subiect vnder one.

Adding furthermore, that the kingdome of Scotland first was conuerted by the reliques of the blessed apostle saint Peter, through the diuine operation of God, to the vnitie of the catholike faith.

Wherefore vpon these causes and reasons, pope Boniface in his letters to the king, required him to giue ouer his claime, and cease his wars against the Scotish nation: And to release all such both of the spiritualty and laity, as he had of them prisoners. Also to call home againe his officers and deputies, which he had there placed and ordained to the grieuance of that nation, to the slander of all faithfull people, and no lesse preiudice to the church of Rome. And if he would claime any right or title to the said realme, or any part thereof, he should send vp his procurators specially to the same appointed, with all that he could for himselfe alleage, vnto the sea apostolike, there to receiue what reason and right would require.

Anno 1301

The king replieth to the pope.

The king, after he had receiued these letters of the pope, assembled a councell or parliament at Lincolne: by the aduice of which councell and parliament, he addressed other letters responsall to the pope againe: wherein first in all reuerend manner hee desireth him not to giue light eare to the sinister suggestions of false reporters, and imaginers of mischiefe.

Scotland all one with England.

Then hee declareth out of old records and histories from the first time of the Britaines, that the realme of Scotland hath alwaies from time to time been all one with England, beginning first with Brutus in the time of Helie and Samuel the Prophet: which Brutus comming from Troy to this Ile called then Albion, after called by him Brittannia, had three sonnes: Locrinus, to whom he gaue that part of the land, called then of him Loegria, now Anglia: Albanactus his second sonne, to whom he gaue Albania, now called Scotia: and his third sonne Camber, to whom he gaue Cambria, now called Wales, &c.

Brutus. Locrinus. Albanactus. Camber.

And thus much concerning the first diuision of this Ile, as in ancient histories is found recorded. In which matter, passing ouer the death of king Humber, the acts of Dunwalde king of this realme, the diuision of Belyn and Brene, the victories of king Arthur, we wil resort (saith the king) to more neerer times, testified and witnessed by sufficient authors, as Marianus Scotus, William Malmesbury, Roger Abyndon, Henry Huntington, Radulph de Bizoto and other. All which make speciall declaration, and giue manifest euidence of the execution of this our right (saith he) and title of superioritie, euer continued and preserued hitherto.

And first to begin with Edward the senior, before the conquest, sonne to Aluredе king of England, about the yeere of our Lord 900, it is plaine and manifest, that he had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Marian the Scot writing that story in those daies, granteth, confesseth and testifieth the same: and this dominion continued in that state 23 yeeres. At which time, Athelstane succeeded in the crowne of England, and hauing by battell conquered Scotland, hee made one Constantine king of that party, to rule and gouerne the country of Scotland vnder him, adding this princely word: That it was more honour to him to make a king, then to be a king.

Alias 907.

Twenty foure yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 947, Eldred king our progenitor, Athelstanus brother, tooke homage of Irise then king of Scots.

Thirtie yeeres after that, which was the yeere of our Lord 977, king Edgar our predecessour tooke homage of Kynald king of Scots. Here was a little trouble in England by the death of saint Edward king and martyr, destroied by the deceit of his mother in law, but yet within memory.

Forty yeers after the homage done by Kynald to king Edgar, that is to say, in the yeere of our Lord 1017, Malcoline the king of Scots did homage to Knute our predecessor. After this homage done, the Scots vttered some peece of their naturall disposition, whereupon (by warre made by our progenitor saint Edward the Confessor, thirty and nine yeeres after that homage done, that is to say, the yeere of our Lord 1056) Malcoline king of Scots was vanquished, and the realme of Scotland giuen to Malcoline his sonne by our said progenitor saint Edward, vnto whom the said Malcoline made homage and fealtie.

Within fortie yeeres after that, William Conqueror entred this realme, whereof hee accounted no perfect conquest, vntill hee had likewise subdued the Scots: and therefore in the said yeere (which was in the yeere of our Lord 1068) the said Malcoline king of Scots did homage to the said William the Conqueror, as his superiour by conquest king of England.

Twenty and fiue yeers after that, which was the yeer of our Lord 1093, the said Malcoline did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, sonne to the said William Conqueror: and yet after that, was for his offences and demerits deposed, and his sonne substitute in his place: who likewise failed in his dutie, and therefore was ordained in that estate by the said William Rufus, Edgar brother to the last Malcoline, and son to the first, who did his homage and fealtie accordingly.

Seuen yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1100, the said Edgar king of the Scots, did homage to Henry the first our progenitor.

Thirty seuen yeers after that, Dauid king of Scots did homage to Matild the Emperatrice, as daughter and heire to Henry the first. Wherefore being after required by Stephan, then obtaining possession of the realme, to make his homage: he refused so to doe, because he had before made it to the said Matilde, and thereupon forbare. After which Dauids death, which ensued shortly after, the sonne of the said Dauid made homage to the said king Stephan.

Fourteene yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1150, William king of Scots, and Dauid his brother, with all the nobles of Scotland, made homage to Henry the seconds sonne, with a reseruation of their dutie to Henry the second his father.

Twentie fiue yeeres after that, which was in the yeer of our Lord 1175, William king of Scotland, after much rebellion and resistance, according to their naturall inclination, (king Henry the second then being in Normandy) knowledged finally his error, and made his peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within fifteene yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1190, the said William king of Scots came to our citie of Canturbury, and there did homage to our noble progenitor king Richard the first.

Fourteen yeeres after that, the said William did homage to our progenitor king Iohn, vpon a hill besides Lincolne, making his oth vpon the crosse of Hubert, then archbishop of Canturbury, being there present, and a maruellous multitude assembled for that purpose.

Twenty six yeeres after that, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1230, Alexander king of Scots married Margaret the daughter of our progenitor Henry the third, at our citie of Yorke, in the feast of Christmas: at which time the said Alexander did his homage to our said progenitor, who raigned in this realme 56 yeeres. And therefore betweene the homage made by the said Alexander king of Scotland, and the homage done by Alexander, sonne to the said king of Scots, to vs at our coronation at Westminster, there was about fiftie yeeres. At which time, the said Alexander king of Scots repaired to the said feast of our coronation, and there did hee his dutie as is aforesaid.

¶ Besides these letters of the king, the lords temporall also in the name of the whole communaltie and parliament, wrote another letter to the pope, answering to that, where as the pope arrogated to him to be iudge for the title of the realm of Scotland, which the king of England claimed vnto himselfe: which letter I thought good also here to annex, containing, as in the words of the same here followeth to be read and seene.

The lords temporall, and the whole Barony of England to the pope.

A letter of the lords temporall to the pope.

THe holy mother church, by whose ministery the catholike sea is gouerned, in her deedes (as wee throughly beleeue and hold) proceedeth with that ripenesse in iudgement, that shee will be hurtfull to none: but like a mother would euery mans right to be kept vnbroken as well in other, as in her selfe. Whereas therefore in a generall parliament called at Lincolne of late by our most dread lord Edward, by the grace of God the noble king of England: the same our lord caused certaine letters receiued from you to be read openly, and to bee declared seriously afore vs, about certaine businesses touching the condition and state of the realme of Scotland: wee did not a little muse and maruell with our selues, hearing the meanings concerning the same, so wondrous and strange, as the like we haue haue not heard at any time before. For wee know most holy father, and it is well knowne aswell in this realme of England (as also not vnknowne to other persons besides) that from the first beginning of the realme of England; the certaine and direct gouernment of the realme of Scotland in all temporall causes, from time to time belonged to the kings of the same realme of England, and realme of Scotland: as well in the times both of the Britaines, as also of Englishmen. Yea rather, the same realme of Scotland of old time was in fee to the ancestors of our foresaid lords kings of England, yea and to himselfe. Furthermore, the kings of Scots, and the realme, haue not been vnder any other then the kings of England, and the kings of England haue answered, or ought to answere for their rights in the foresaid realme, or for any his temporalities afore any Iudge ecclesiasticall or secular, by reason of free preheminence of the state of his royall dignitie and custom kept without breach at all times. Wherefore, after treatie had and diligent deliberation of the contents in your foresaid letters, this was the common agreeing and consent with one mind, and shall bee without faile in time to come by Gods grace: that our foresaid lord the king, ought by no meanes to answere in iudgment in any case, or should bring his foresaid rights into doubt: nor ought not to send any proctors or messengers to your presence: specially seeing that the premises tend manifestly to the disheriting of the right of the Crowne of England, and the plaine ouerthrow of the state of the said realme, and also hurt of the liberties, customs and lawes of our fathers: For the keeping and defence of which wee are bound by the dutie of the oth made. And we will maintaine them with all power, and will defend them (by Gods helpe) with all strength. And further, we will not suffer our foresaid lord the king to doe, or by any meanes to attempt the premises, being so vnaccustomed, vnwont, and not heard of afore. Wherefore, we reuerently and humbly beseech your holinesse, that ye would suffer the same our lord king of England (who among other princes of the world, sheweth himselfe catholike and deuout to the Romish church) quietlie to enioy his rights, liberties, customes, and lawes aforesaid: without all impairing and trouble, and let them continue vntouched. In witnesse whereof wee haue set our seales to these presents, aswell for vs, as for the whole communaltie of the foresaid realme of England. Dated at Lincolne in the yeare of our Sauiour 1301. & anno Edwardi primi 28.

Digitized by Google

sent vnto London, &c. Sir Robert Bruse after this discomfiture, when hee had thus lost both the field and chiefe friends, The Scots againe subdued. seeing himselfe not able to make his partie good, fled into Norwaie, where hee kept his abode during the time while king Edward liued. When this noble Edward had thus subdued the Scots, he yeelded thanks to God for his victorie, and so setting the land in a quiet, and an order, hee returned vnto London, which was the 35. yeare and last of his reigne, &c.

Now returning to that which I promised before touching the variance and grieuous dissension betweene Philip the French king, and pope Boniface the eight of that name: After the bishoprike of Rome had been long voide through the dissension of the cardinals, for the space of two yeares and three moneths; at length, pope Celestinus was chosen successor to pope Nicolas the fourth. Which Celestinus in his first consistorie, began to reforme the clergie of Rome, thinking to make it an example to all other churches. Wherefore, he procured to himselfe such a hatred among his clergie men, that this Boniface, then called Benedictus, speaking through a reed by his chamber wall nightly admonished him, as it had beene a voice from heauen, that he should giue ouer his papacie, as being a burthen bigger then hee could wield.

A grieuous variance betweene Philip the French king and pope Boniface.

Pope Nicolas the 4.

Popedome vacant two yeers.

This pope Celestine after hee had sat sixe moneths, by the trecherie and falshood of this Boniface, was induced to giue vp and resigne his bishoprike, partly for the voice spoken of before, partly for feare: being told of certaine craftie suborned in his chamber, that if hee did not resigne, hee should lose his life. Who then after his resignation going to liue in some solitarie desert (being a simple man) was vilely taken and thrust into perpetual prison by pope Boniface: craftilie pretending that hee did it not for any hatred vnto Celestine, but that seditious persons might not haue him as their head to raise vp some stirre in the church. And so was brought to his death. Wherefore, this Boniface was worthilie called the eight Nero: of whom it was rightly said, He came in like a Fox, he reigned like a Lion, and died like a dog.

Pope Celestinus 5.

Crafty iuggling among popes and cardinals. Ex Massæo.

The 8. Nero.

This pope Boniface succeeding, or rather inuading after Celestinus, behaued himselfe so impertinently, that hee put downe princes, excommunicated kings, such as did not take their confirmation at his hand. Diuers of his cardinals he draue away for feare, some of them as schismatickes hee deposed and spoiled them of all their substance. Philip the French king hee excommunicated, for not suffering his mony to goe out of the realme, and therefore cursed both his and him, to the fourth generation. Albertus the emperour not once nor twice, but thrice sought at his hands to bee confirmed, and yet was reiected, neither could obtaine vnlesse firstwould promise to driue the French king out of his realme. In the factious discord in Italie between the Guelphs and Gibillines, which the part of a good bishop had beene to extinct; so little he helped to quench the smoake, that hee of all other was chiefest firebrand to increase the flame. Insomuch that vpon Ashwednesday, when Porchetus an archbishop came and kneeled downe before him to receiue his ashes; pope Boniface looking vpon him, and perceiuing that hee was one of the Gibillines part, cast his handfull of ashes in his eyes, saying: Memento homo quòd Gibellinus es, &c. That is: Remember man that a Gibelline thou art, and to ashes thou shalt goe. This pope moreouer ordained first the Iubile in Rome: in the solemnizing whereof, the first day hee shewed himselfe in his Pontificalibus, and gaue free remission of sinnes to as many as came to Rome out of all the parts of the world. The second day (being arrayed with imperiall ensignes) he commanded a naked sword to be carried before him, and said with a loud voice: Ecce potestatem vtriusque gladij: That is, Loe heere the power and authoritie of both the swords, &c.

V. Boniface 8.

The mischiefe of pope Boniface described.

Guelphes and Gibellines two factions in Rome.

Iubile first begun in Rome.

The pope claimeth and practiseth power of both swords.

From the which very yeare (as most stories doe record) the Turkes doe begin the first count of their Turkish emperours, whereof the first was Ottomannus, as you shall heare discoursed hereafter by Gods grace in the history of the Turks.

By this said pope Boniface, diuers constitutions extrauagants of his predecessors were collected together, with many of his owne newly added thereto, & so made the booke called Sextus decretalium, &c. By whom also first sprang vp pardons and indulgences from Rome.

Pope Boniface 8 author of the booke of decretals.

Romish pardons first begun by pope Boniface. Ex Hist. Nic. Triuet.

These things thus premised of Boniface the pope, now will I come to the occasion of the strife betweene him, and the French king. Concerning which matter, first I find in the history of Nicolas Triuet, that in the yeare of our Lord, 1301. the bishop of Oppanuham being accused for a conspiracie against the French king, was brought vp to his court, and so committed to prison. The pope hearing this, sendeth word to the king by his legat to let him at libertie. The French king not daring to the contrarie, looseth the bishop. But when hee had done, hee dischargeth both the bishop and the legat, commanding them to voide his realme. Whereupon, pope Boniface reuoketh all the graces and priuiledges granted either by him or his predecessors before to the kingdome of France: also not long after thundring out Anno 1303. The yeare following, which was from Christ, Anno 1303. the said pope Boniface the eight of that name, taking displeasure with Philip the French king; did excite king Edward of England to warre against him, promising him great aide thereunto. But he (as mine author saith) little trusting the popes false vnstable affection toward him well proued before, put him off with delaies. Ex Rob. Auesb. Whereupon, the French king fearing the power of king Edward whom the pope had set against his friendship; restored vnto him againe Malcone, which hee wrongfully had in his hands detained. Concerning this variance heere mentioned betweene the pope and the French king, how it began first, and to what end it fell out; the sequell hereof (Christ willing) shall declare, after that first I haue finished the discourse begun betweene England and Scotland.

The pope setteth king against king.

Ex R. Auesb.

Another Scotish rebellion happeneth.

In the yeare 1303. the foresaid William Maleis, which had done so many displeasures to the king before (continued still in his rebellion) gathered great multitudes of the Scots to withstand the king: till at length, the yeare following he was taken, and sent vp to London, and there executed for the same. After which things done, the king then held his parliament at Westminster, whither came out of Scotland the bishop of saint Andrewes, Robert Bruse aboue mentioned, earle of Dunbarre, earle of Arles, and sir John Comming, with diuers other: The which voluntarilie were sworne to be true to the king of England, and to keepe the land of Scotland to his vse against all persons. But shortly after the said Robert Bruse, who, as is said, married the second daughter of earle Dauid, forgetting his oth before made vnto the king; within a yeare or two after this, by the counsell of the abbat of Stone, and bishop of saint Andrewes, sent vp vnto pope Clement the fifth, for a dispensation of his oth made: insinuating to him, that king Edward vexed and grieued the realme of Scotland wrongfully. Whereupon the pope wrote vnto the king, to leaue off such doings. Notwithstanding which inhibition of the pope, the king prosecuting his owne right, after he had the vnderstanding of the doings of the Scots, and of the mischiefe of Robert Bruse, (who had slaine with his owne hands sir John Comming, for not consenting with him and other lords at his parliament) areared his power and strength of men, preparing himselfe toward Scotland: where he ioyning with the said sir Robert and all the power of Scotland in a plaine, neere vnto saint Johns towne, put him to flight and so chased the Scots, that of them were slaine to the number of 7. thousand. In the which victorie, such bishops and abbats as were taken, he sent them to the pope; the temporall lords and other Scots hee

The pope dispenseth with due and true obedience of subiects towards their prince.

The popes inhibition neglected in England.

Another rebellion of the Scots repressed.

Digitized by Google

Philip the French king excommunicated.

the sentence of his curse against him. Moreouer, citeth all the prelats, all diuines, and lawyers both ciuill and canon, to appeare personally before him at Rome, at a certaine day, which was the first of Nouember. Against this citation, the king againe prouideth and commandeth by straite proclamation, that no maner of person should export out of the realme of France either gold, or siluer, or any other maner of ware or merchandise, vpon forfetting al their goods, and their bodies at the kings pleasure: prouiding withall, the waies and passages diligently to be kept, that none might passe vnsearched. Ouer and besides, the said French king defeated the pope in giuing and bestowing prebends, and benefices, and other ecclesiasticall liuings, contrarie to the popes profit. For the which cause, the pope writeth to the foresaid king in forme & effect as followeth,

Boniface bishop and seruant to Gods seruants, to his beloued son Philip, by the grace of God, king of France, greeting and Apostolicall blessing.

Ex lib. Stephani Auferij.

BOniface the seruant of Gods seruants, &c, feare God, and obserue his commandements. We will thee to vnderstand, that thou art subiect to vs both in spirituall things, and temporall. And that no gift of benefices or prebends belongeth to thee: and if thou haue the keeping of any being vacant, that thou reserue the profits of them to the successors. But if thou haue giuen any, we iudge the gift to be void, and call backe how far soeuer thou hast gone forward. And whosoeuer beleeueth otherwise, we iudge them hereticks.

Vnto this letter of the pope, king Philip maketh answere againe in maner and order as followeth, which is this.

Philip by the grace of God king of France, to Boniface not in deeds, behauing himselfe for pope, little friendship or none.

A letter of king Philip of France to pope Boniface.

TO Boniface bearing himselfe for chiefe bishop, little healthor none. Let thy foolishnesse know, that in temporall things we are subiect to no man, and that the gifts of prebends, and benefices made and to bee made by vs were and shall bee good, both in time past and to come. And that we will defend manfully the possessor of the said benefices, and we thinke them that beleeue or thinke otherwise, fooles and mad men. Giuen at Paris the wednesday after Candlemas, 1301.

After these aforesaid and other writings passing to and fro, betweene the French king and the Pope: within a peare and a halfe after, the king summoneth a parliament, sending downe his letters to his sheriffes and other officers to summon the prelats and barons of the realme, vnto the said court of parliament, according to the tenor of the kings letters hereafollowing.

A parliament summoned by K. Philip at Paris.

PHilip by the grace of God king of France, &c. Whereas we would take counsell with the prelats, barons, and other our faithfull, about waightie matters and hard, and such as belong greatly to our right and touching our honor, state, liberties and lawes of this our realme, churches, and ecclesiasticall persons, and would also go forward and proceed in the foresaid matters according to their counsell: Wee command you, that ye diligently in our behalfe require and straitly charge all the prelats in your bailiwicke, and also all and singuler abbats and priors of the same your foresaid bailiwicke, (to certaine of the which we haue directed downe our speciall letters for the same cause) that as they fauour our honor, the good state both of the realme, of themselues, and of the church, they repaire to vs in their owne persons, all lets and delaies set aside, and all other businesse left off. Shewing to them moreouer, that wee can iudge none of them to be either to vs faithfull subiects, or friends to the realm, which shall faile herein, or withdraw himselfe in the foresaid businesse, counsels, and helpes in time. Wherein if peraduenture any shall slacke or refuse to resort and come toward vs within eight daies from the time of this charge giuen by you, or your commandement: That then, you to seise all his temporall goods into our hand, and so seised to hold them vntill you receiue other commandement from vs. Giuen at Paris the monday before the Natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptist, in the yeare of our Lord 1303.

A declaration of master William Nagareta, made against Pope Boniface the eight, with his appellation also made at Paris, afore the king and his counsell in the church of Paris.

The appeale of Nagareta made against pope Boniface the 8.

Ex Registro.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeare of our Lord 1303. Indictione secunda, the 12 day of March, and the ninth yeere of the popedome of the most holy father the L. Boniface the 8. by Gods prouidence pope; and in the presence of vs common notaries, and witnesses written vnder, the noble man master William Nagareta knight (a worshipfull professour of the lawes) standing afore the most excellent prince the lord Philip, by the grace of God most noble king of France; spake with liuely words, and gaue in writings these things that follow.

There haue been false prophets among the people, as there haue been also among you false teachers, &c. Saint Peter the glorious prince of the Apostles, speaking to vs by the spirit, told vs things to come; that likewise as there were false prophets aforetime, so there should come among you false teachers, bringing in sects of destruction: by the which the way of truth shall be defaced: and couetously they shall make merchandise of you with fained words; and further addeth, that such masters did follow the way of Balaam, of Bosor, which loued the reward of wickednesse, and had his bridled Asse to correct his madnesse, which speaking in a mans voice did stop the foolishnes of the Prophet. All which things as they be shewed to vs by the greatest Patriarch himselfe: your eyes see them fulfilled this day according to the letter. For there sitteth in saint Peters chaire the master of lies, causing himselfe to be called Boniface .i. a well-doer, where he is notable in all kind of euill doing, and so both he hath taken to himselfe a false name; and where he is not a true ruler and master, he calleth himselfe the lord, iudge, and master of all men. And comming in contrarie to the common order appointed by the holy fathers, and also contrarie to the rules of reason, and so not entring in at the dore into the Lords sheepefold, is not a shepheard nor hireling, but rather a theefe and robber. For he (the true husband of the Romish church yet liuing) deceiued him that was delighted in simplicitie, and enticed him with fained flatterings and gifts to let him haue his spouse to bee his wife, against truth, which crieth: Those whom God hath coupled, let no man separate: and at length laying violent hands vpon him, persuading him falsly that thing which the deceiuer said to come from the holy spirit; was not ashamed to ioyne to himselfe with wicked practise that holy church, which is mistresse of all churches, calling himselfe to her husband, whereas he cannot bee: for Celestinus the true Romish bishop, agreed not to the said diuorce, being deceiued by so great subtiltie; nothing is so contrarie to agreeing as errour and deceit, as mans lawes beare witnesse, that I need not to speake of his violence. But because the spirit inspireth where he will, and he that is led with the spirit, is not vnder the law, the holy vniuersall church of God, not knowing the crafts of that deceiuer, stumbling and doubting whether it came from the holy Ghost that Celestinus should leaue off his gouernment, and the sinnes of the people deseruing it, for feare of a schisme, suffered the foresaid deceiuer: although according to the doctrine of our Lord, by his fruits hee might be knowne, whether he came to the said regiment by the holy Ghost or otherwise: his fruits (as it is plainely here written beneath) are now manifest to all men, by which it is apparant to the world, that hee came not in by God but otherwaies: and so came not in by the sheepefold. His fruits are most wicked, and his end is death; and therefore it is necessarie that so euill a tree (according to the Lords saying) should be cut downe and cast into the fire. This cannot auaile to his excuse, which is said of some men, that is, that the cardinals did agree vpon him againe, after the death of the said Celestinus the pope, seeing he could not bee her husband, whom it is manifest that he defiled by adultery, her first husband yet liuing, and shee being worthie to haue the promise of mariage kept vnto her: therefore, because that which is done against the Lord, turneth to the wrong of all men: and specially in so great a mischiefe, by reason of the consequence by which shee is iudged of the people both a woman adultres or defamed: I, like a bridled Asse by the power of the Lord, and not by the voice of a perfect man, being not able to beare so great a burthen, take in hand to rebuke the madnesse of the said false prophet Balaam, which at the instance of king Balaac. 1. of the prince of diuels, whom he serueth, and ready to curse the people blessed of the Lord, I beseech you most excellent prince, and lord Philip by the grace of God king of France: that like as the angell of God in time past met in the way with a sword drawne, the prophet Balaam going to curse Gods people: so you (which are vnwilling to execute iustice; and therefore like the angell of the Lord, and minister of power and office) would meet with a naked sword this said wicked man, which is far worse then Balaam, that he performe not that euill which he intendeth to the people.

An insurrection against the placing of Boniface 8. in the papall see.

The pope well compared to Balaam which was wont to curse Gods people for reward of money.

First, I propound that the foresaid man, that nameth himselfe Boniface, is no pope, but wrongfully keepeth the seate which he hath indeed to the great dammage of all the soules of Gods holy church. I say also, that his entring was many waies faultie, and he entred not in at the dore, but otherwaies, and therefore is to be iudged a thiefe and a robber.

Articles propounded against pope Boniface.

2 I propound also, that the said Boniface is a manifest heretick, and vtterly cut off from the body of the holy church, because of many kinds of heresies, which are to bee declared in conuenient time and place.

3 I propound also, that the said Boniface is an horrible simonicall, and such a one as hath not been sithence the beginning of the world: and the mischiefe of this sin in him is so notorious to all the world (which thing is manifest to all that will plainely vnderstand) insomuch that he being openly slandered, said openly that he could not commit simony.

Digitized by Google

The nature of this pope and all popes by his image painted out.

4 I propound also, that the said Boniface being wrapt in infinite manifest hainous sinnes, is so hardened in them, that he is vtterly not possible to be corrected: and lying in dungeon of mischiefe so deepe, that hee may not bee suffered any longer without the ouerthrow of the state of the church. His mouth is full of cursing, his feet and steps are swift to shed blood. He vtterly teareth in pieces the churches, which he ought to cherish, wasting wickedly the goods of the poore, and making much of wicked men that giue him rewards: persecuting the righteous, and among the people not gathering but scattering, bringing in new sects of destruction that haue not been heard of. Blaspheming the way of truth, and by robberie thinking himselfe equall to the Lord Jesus Christ which is blessed for euer. And he being most couetous thirsteth for gold, coueteth gold, and by some deuice getteth gold of euery people: and vtterly not regarding the worshipping of God, with fained words, sometimes by flattering, sometimes by threatning, sometimes by false teaching, and all to get money withall, he maketh merchandise of vs all; enuying all things but his owne, louing no man, nourishing warre, persecuting and hating the peace of his subiects. Hee is voted in all vnspeakeable sinnes, contrarying and striuing against all the waies and doctrines of the Lord. He is truely the abomination of the people which Daniel the Lords prophet described.

The pope thinks himselfe equall with Christ.

Abominatio desolationis papa.

Therefore I answere, that lawes, weapons, and all the elements ought to rise against him, which thus ouerthroweth the state of the church; for whose sins God plagueth the whole world. And finally, nothing remaineth to him being so vnsatiable to satisfie him withall, but onely the vnsatiable mouth of hell, and the fire that cannot be quenched, continuing for euer. Therefore, seeing that in a generall councell it so becommeth, and I see this wicked man to be damned, which offendeth both God and all men: I aske and require, as instantly as I can, and beseech you my lord and king aforesaid, that ye would declare to the prelats, doctors, people, and princes your brethren in Christ, and chiefly to the cardinals and all prelats, and call a Councell. In the which (when this foresaid wicked man is condemned) by the worshipfull Cardinals, the church may be prouided of a shepheard: and for that Councell I offer my selfe readie, lawfully to pursue the foresaid things. And whereas the said man being in the highest dignitie, in the meane time cannot be suspended of his superior, therefore hee ought to bee taken, suspended indeed for the things aforesaid, seeing his state is called into iudgement, by the meanes aforesaid.

I beseech and require the said cardinals by you, and I presently require them and the church of God, that this wicked man being put in prison, the Church of Rome may bee prouided of a vicar, which may minister those things that shall appertaine, vntill the church of God be prouided of a bishop, vtterly to take away all occasion of a schisme. And lest the said wicked man should let and hinder the prosecuting thereof, I require these things of you my lord king aforesaid, affirming you to bee bound to doe this for many causes. First, for the faiths sake. Secondly, for your kingly dignitie, to whose office it belongeth to root out such wicked men. Thirdly, for your oth sake, which ye made for the defence of the Churches of your Realme, which the foresaid tauener vtterly teareth in pieces. Fourthly, because ye be the patron of the Churches, and therefore yee are not bound onely to the defence of them, but to the calling for againe of their goods, which the foresaid Dian hath wasted. Fifthly, ye following the footesteps of your ancestors, ought to deliuer your mother the Romish church, from so wicked a band, wherein by oppression shee is tied and bound. I require that a publike instrument may be made of these requests by the notaries here present, vnder the witnesse of the worshipfull men that be here present. These things were done and spoken as is aforesaid at Paris in the kings house of Lupara.

After this protestation of master Nagarcta, immediately insued the appeale of the king, pronounced and published against the said Boniface, in forme as followeth.

The appeale made by the king and the louers of the realme against Boniface.

The appellation of the French K. and Nobles against pope Boniface.

IN the name of God, Amen. In the yeare of our Lord 1303. Indictione prima, 13. day of June, and the ninth yeare of the popedome of Boniface pope the 8. By the tenor of this publike instrument bee it vnto all men knowne, that the most noble prince and lord Philip by the grace of God, king of France, the famous and reuerend fathers in Christ, archbishop and bishops, religious men, abbats and priors here vndernamed, in the presence of vs common Notaries here vnder written, especially called and required for this purpose, as it is contained in the subscriptions here vnder, the famous and noble men, the lord Lewes, sonne of the French K. Guido of S. Paul, and Iohn Drocen earles, and William of Plesiano lord of Vitenob knight; Moued as they said with a feruent faith, with affection of sincere loue and zeale of charitie to bee shewed to the holy Romish church, and hauing pitie from their heart, on their mother the vniuersall church, which, as they said, is oppressed dangerously vnder the rule of the said lord Boniface, and suffereth outragious defacing and losse: and pitying the right faith (as they say) in which stands the saluation of soules, and which (alasse for pitie) in their times miserablie pineth away, and perisheth for the lacke of wholesome gouernment of the church through all christendome: and earnestly taking paines, as they said, for the repairing and enhaunsing of the catholike faith: especially seeing it was necessarie for the same church, for the foundation of the faith, and health of the soules, that none should rule the fold of the Lords flocke, but the true and lawfull sheapheard: and also because the same church was the spouse of Christ that hath no spot nor wrinkle, all errour, offence, wickednesse and wrong should be put away, and saluation, peace and quietnes through Gods mercie might bee procured to the whole world, which, they say, lyeth in warres and darkenesse by the wicked deeds, cursed workes, and hurtfull examples of the said Boniface: They said and laid against the said Boniface, heresie, and other diuers horrible and cursed faults, wherein they affirmed him to be tangled, and commonly and notoriously reported, the king himselfe being present, with archbishops, bishops, and other prelats and churchmen (which were assembled for to intreate of their own matters, and matters of their churches) beside barons, earles, and other noble men, whose names are vnder written.

The said William propounded and obiected against him, swearing by the holy Gospell of God which hee corporallie touched, that he could proue all and euery the premises to be true. And the said William of Plesiano sware further this oth, that hee beleeued hee could proue the premises, and that hee would pursue to the full end against the said Boniface in the generall Councell, where, when, and afore whomsoeuer of right it ought to be done: requiring earnestly the said lord K. as a champion of the faith, and defender of the church; that for declaring of this truth to the praise of Gods name, to the increase and promoting of the catholike faith, to the honour and wealth of the vniuersall church and of all christian people, and the congregation of the said generall Councell, that he would helpe and bestow his profitable labour, with souldiers and other like, for the loue of men, and zeale to iustice (because his kingly house was euer a ruler of the truth) and that he would earnestly require the archbishops, bishops, and other prelats, and that hee would be effectually instant with them. The earles and knights themselues besought earnestly many of the same prelats (as they were pillers of the church and the faith) that they would helpe and effectually bestow their labour to the calling and assembling of the said councell, by all waies and meanes lawfull, according to the ordinances of the holy fathers and decrees of the canons. But when the prelats heard and fully vnderstood such obiections, oppositions, and requests, as is aforesaid; and considered that such a matter not onely was most hard, but needed wise counsell, they departed out of the same place. But on the Friday next following, the 14 day of the same moneth of Iune, the foresaid lord king being present, and also the lords, archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, and many witnesses here vnder written the same time being present, and in the presence of vs common notaries here subscribed, and being specially called and required for this purpose: the foresaid William of Plesiano knight said, propounded, affirmed, obiected, and read, as was contained more fully in a certaine paper which hee held in his hand, whose tenor was after this sort.

I William of Plesiano knight, say, propound, and affirme, that Boniface which now ruleth the Apostolicall see is a ranke heretike in heresies, and by heresies, outragious deeds, and wicked doctrines hereafter to be declared, which things to bee true, I beleeue I am able to proue: or else, such things as these shall be sufficient to proue him a full heretike, in a conuenient place and time, and afore whom of right this can or ought to be done. This thing I sweare on the holy Gospell of God presently touched of me.

First, that hee beleeueth not the immortality of men and of christian soules, but thinking much like as the Sadducees did beleeue, that there is no euerlasting life, and that men can not get at the length ioy, but all the lot and part of comfort and gladnesse to be in this world: and by this meanes hee affirmeth, that it is no sinne for the body to liue daintily in all dainties. And out of the abundance of this leuen he was not ashamed to say and openly to confesse, that hee had rather bee an asse or a dogge, or any other brute beast, then a French man; which thing hee would not haue said, if hee beleeued a Frenchman had a soule that could enioy euerlasting life. This thing hee taught many men, which knowledged this at the point of death, and the common report goeth on him thus in these things.

Pope Boniface had rather be a dog then a Frenchman.

2 Also, he beleeueth not faithfully, that by the words ordained of Christ, and spoken ouer the host, after the fashion of the church by a faithfull priest that is lawfully ordered, the body of Christ is be there: & therefore it commeth to passe, that hee

Digitized by Google

giueth no reuerence to it (no not a little) when it is lifted vp of the priest, yea he riseth not to it, but turneth his backe to it, and makes himselfe and his seat to be honored where he sitteth, rather then the altar where the hoste is consecrate: and hee is commonly reported to doe this.

3 Also, hee is reported to say that whoredome is no sin, no more then rubbing of the hands together, and thus commonly runs the voice and brute.

4 Also, hee said often, that to thrust downe the king and Frenchmen (if it could not be otherwaies done) he would ouerthrow himselfe, the whole world, and the whole Church. And when he had said so, some that stood by said, God forbid, he answered God grant. And when good men that heard the words replied against him, that hee should not say so, because the Church of God and all Christian men should suffer great slander so: he answered, I care not what slanders soeuer come, so that the Frenchmen and their pride bee destroyed: for it is necessarie that slanders and offences come.

5 Item, he called againe and allowed a booke made by M. Arnold of Newcon, containing and smelling of heresie, condemned by the bishop of Paris and reproued by the masters of diuinitie, and burned openly by Boniface himselfe; and in the full consistorie of Cardinals being likewise reproued, condemned and burned, yet he allowed it being written againe, and containing the same fault.

6 Item, that hee might make the most damnable remembrance of him perpetuall, hee caused his images of siluer to be set in the Church, by this meanes bringing men to Idolatrie.

7 Item, he hath a priuate priuell, whose counsell he vseth in all things, and through all things.

8 Item, he said once that if all men were on one side, and he on another, they could not deceiue him neither in law nor in deed, which thing could not be done except hee vsed a diuelish Art: and of this he is openly thus reported.

9 Item, hee is a witch, asking counsell at sothsayers both men and women, and thus he is commonly iudged.

10 Item, he said openly, that the Romish pope could not commit simony, which is heretticall to say. This is a sinne reproued as well in the old Testament, as in the new, and generally in the holy Councels. Also he is wont to make merchandise of prelats liuings, dignities, superiorities, and benefices, to the which holy orders bee necessarilie ioyned: and of absolutions and dispensations, like as vsurers and merchants vse to buy and sell common things in the market, and of this the common brute reports him.

11 Item, he letteth with all his might amõg Christian men the speciall embassade of Christ, made to his owne sonnes, saying: Peace I leaue to you, and soweth discord and wars: Wherefore once it was said afore him, that certaine parties would friendly agree after a good sort, but hee letted the peace: and when the other part did humblie beseech him, that he would giue licence to agree (he said) he would not: yea if the sonne of God or Peter the Apostle would come downe into the earth and command him; he would say, I will not beleeue thee.

12 Item, because the French nation (being manifestly a most Christian nation) followeth not his errours in the faith: he reckoneth and openly calleth all and euery of them Paterniani.

13 Item, he is infect with sodomiticall sinne, keeping with him boyes for Concubines, and of this fault hee is most commonly and openly reported.

14 Item, he hath caused many murthers of clerkes to bee done in his presence, and commending it reioycing at their death: and if they were not deadly wounded at the first by his seruants, as oft as he saw them smiting, he said, smite, smite: by which example many were slaine.

15 Item, when he had condemned a certaine Noble man, he forbad the Sacrament to be giuen him at the point of death, desiring it and being penitent: saying, that the Sacrament of penance was not necessarie to saluation.

16 Item, he compelled certaine priests to shew vnto him the confessions of men, and hee published them openly afterward contrarie to the will of them that were confessed, to their shame and confusion, and compelled them to redeeme their sinnes. Insomuch that once hee deposed a certaine Bishop of Spaine, for the faults that hee confessed to a certaine Cardinall, confessing vnto him a certaine priuie horrible fault vnder Benedicite, and compelled the Cardinall against his will to declare his confession: and yet afterward hee restored the same Bishop againe to his place for a little money. Wherefore he is thought to play the heretike in the Sacrament of penance.

17 Item, he fasteth not on the fasting daies, nor Lent, but eateth flesh indifferently, and without cause suffereth his household and friends to eate, saying, it is no sinne. Doing in this thing against the generall state of the holy church.

18 Item, hee oppressed the order of the Cardinals, and hath oppressed the order of blacke and white monks, of gray Friers and preachers: and said oft, that the world was destroyed by them, and that they were false hypocrites, and that neuer god could chance vnto any that would bee confessed to them, or would be familiar with them, or would keepe them in their house, and he neuer said good word of any prelate, religious man, or clerke: but euer rebuketh and slandereth them, taking away their good name, and to compell them to redeeme their faults, he is glad of their accusations: and this is the common voice and report of him.

19 Item, of old time hee going about to destroy the faith, conceiued a hate against the French king, euen to the abhorring of the faith: because of the light of faith which is there, and because of the great witnesse and example of Christianitie, is and hath been there. And before hee had this seate he is proued to haue said, that if hee were Pope, hee would rather ouerthrowe all Christendome, but hee would ouerthrowe and destroie the Nation, which he calleth the pride of the French.

20 Also, he is reported, that when the Embassadors of the king of England, in the name of the said king did require and intreat for the tenth of the Realme of England to bee giuen him: hee answered, that hee would not giue them the tenth, but on this condition, that he would make war with them against the French king. And besides this, he is reported to haue giuen great summes of money to certaine persons, to hinder that peace should not bee betwixt the saide kings. He himselfe also with all his might hath letted it, by messengers, letters, and otherwaies that he could, yea by giuing bribes.

21 Item, he is reported also to haue commanded Fridericke which keepeth the Ile of Cicill, that if he would betray Charles the king and breake the peace which he made, and sweare that he would keepe with him, and would stir against the king, and kill the Frenchmen: that then hee would giue him aide, helpe and counsell, and for so doing he would giue and grant him the said kingdomes.

22 He confirmed also the king of Almaine to be Emperor, and said openlie that he did it to destroy the nation, which he calleth the pride of the Frenchmen: which say, that they are subiect to none in temporall things. Wherein saith he, they lied on their heads, declaring moreouer, that whosoeuer (yea if it were an angell from heauen) would say, that all kings of the world were not subiect to the same king of Almaine, he were accursed. Pope Boniface enemie to the Frenchmen.

23 Further, he brake the agreements of peace betwixt the king of Almaine and the French king: in which, either of them should haue their owne saued. And what encrochings soeuer had been on either side, should be brought to a due state, and vnder an oath orderlie giuen and taken: hee is reported to haue commanded the same king of Almaine, that he should not keepe these conditions of peace, but be an enemie, and goe about to sow debate among christian men. Pope Boniface an enemie to peace.

24 Item, he is openlie reported, that the holie land was betrayed through his fault, and came to the enemies of God and of faith: and that he suffered this for the nonce, and denied to giue aide to the christians which defended it: spending the treasures and money of the Church (which should haue beene bestowed on that vse as the patrimonie of Christ) in persecuting of faithfull Christians and friends of the Church, and therewith would enrich his friends.

25 Item, he is openlie reported to vse simonie, not onely in bestowing of benefices, but in giuing of orders, and making dispensations. He hath set to sale all benefices of the church, and would bestow the church commonly on him that would offer most: and he made his seruants prelats of the church, not for wealth of the faith, nor to thrust downe infidels, but to oppresse the faithfull, and to enrich his kindred by the Church goods and of the patrimonie of him that was crucified: and presumed to make them Marquelles, Earles, and Barons, and was not afraid to build them strong holds, rooting out and oppressing many noble men and other.

26 Item, it is commonlie reported, that he hath diuorced many marriages lawfullie made, to the contempt, hurt, and slander of many: and he did promote his nephew to a cardinalship, being married, vnlearned, and altogether vnworthie to liue; and openlie married one that was diuorced, and compelled him to make a vow of chastitie, and after that he is reported to haue had two bastards by her, and so goeth the common brute of him.

27 Item, he is commonlie reported, that he handled vngentlie his Predecessour Celestinus of holie memorie, leading a holie life (peraduenture knowing in conscience that he could not forsake his Popedome, and therefore Boniface himselfe had no lawfull entrance to the Sea) and prisoned him, and there quicklie and priuilie caused him to die. And of this the common brute and report is through all the world, that he caused many and great learned men living a regular life (which disputed of this, whether hee might renounce the Popedome or not) to be set in prison, and there to die. Pope Boniface a murderer of his predecessor.

28 Item, he is reported to haue railed at religious persons leading a regular life, without a reasonable cause to the world, to the slander of many.

29 Item, he is reported to haue said that he would within short time make all the Frenchmen either Martyrs, or forsakers of their faith.

30 Item,

Digitized by Google

Item, he is commonlie reported, that he seeketh not the health of the soules, but the destruction of them.

These things being propounded and read, the same William protested, said, declared, appealed, and added these words, reading them in writing:

The protestation of William Plesiano.

I William of Plesiano knight, protest that I do not propound nor speake the foresaid things for any speciall hate of Boniface himselfe (for I hate not him, but his foresaid euill deeds) nor I seeke not his iniurie nor slander, nor any mans else: but I speake it for the zeale of the faith, and for the deuotion that I haue to the holie church of God, and the holie Romish see, as well for those things that I haue seene and heard of credible men of his doings, and by likelie presumptions gathered of the foresaid things, and many diuers other things to be declared in his due place and time. And I sweare by the holie Gospell of God (which I touch with my hand) that I beleeue him to be a ranke heretike, and that I also beleeue that the foresaid things and such other, may proue against him such things as shall be sufficient to proue him an heretike, according to the state of the holie fathers. I sweare also that I will pursue against him by the lawes, the foresaid things in the generall councell that shall bee assembled, in a place that shall be safe and sure for me, to the honour of God, and increase of the christian faith, sauing the right honour & state of the holie Apostolicall see, in all things. Wherefore, earnestlie and with reuerence, I require you my lord the king (to whom belongeth the defence of the holie mother the Church, and the catholike faith, for of that ye shall make account in the last iudgement) and you my lords the Prelates which be the pillers of the faith, and which ought to be iudges of the foresaid things, together with other reuerend fathers, the catholike prelates of the holie church, in the generall councell to be assembled: that ye would procure and take diligent paine that a generall councell may be gathered in a fit and safe place, and conuenient time, afore which the foresaid things may be propounded, brought forth, and proued against the said Boniface, as is premised. And I earnestlie also require you my lord king, that ye would require the same prelats present and absent, in what countrey soeuer they be, or to whom it belongeth: and that ye would effectually induce them manfullie to labour, and to require other faithfullie, that the foresaid councell for the foresaid matters might be gathered in such sort as is aforesaid. And because so long as this is deferred to proue, I suspect Boniface himselfe, lest hee beeing angrie and moued for the foresaid things against me and my partakers, procurers and helpers, my friends and familiars, should goe about by some meanes, whereby to stay and stop my good purpose and theirs for going forward: therefore, by these writings afore you my lord the king, and diuers Prelates, and afore your common notaries here present, I prouoke and appeale to the said holie generall councell Apostolicall and catholike that shall be, and to the holie apostolicall see, and to him and them to whom of right I may or ought: and I earnestlie require, once, twice, and thrice, that testimoniall letters may be giuen me from you: supposing my selfe, my followers, fauourers, familiars, friends, my procurers, and all them that will hereafter follow me, my goods and theirs to be vnder the protection and keeping of saint Peter and Paul, and the said holie councell to be assembled by the holie Romish see, and the Catholike Apostolicall pope that shall bee: sticking neuertheless and willing to sticke to the appellation and appellations, processe and processes made hereupon, by the noble man master William of Nagareta knight, in as much as they shall be found and made lawfull, and yet not forsaking this present appellation.

Pope Boniface proued an heretike.

When these things were thus read and done, the foresaid king answered and required the foresaid prelats, prouoking and appealing and making request, prouocation and appellation, as is contained in the paper vnder written, both there and then with other prelats: which things all are more fullie contained in these writings following, and were read to them that heard it, whose tenour is such.

The kings answere. The appeale of Philip the French King from the Pope.

Wee Philip by the grace of God, hearing and vnderstanding the obiections propounded by our beloued faithfull knight, W. of Nagareta, against Boniface now hauing the regiment of the Romish church: although we would gladlie couer with our owne cloke, the filthie parts of such a father: yet for the loue of the catholike faith and great deuotion that wee beare to the holie Romish and vniuersall church our mother, and all faithfull men and spouse of Christ, following the steps of our ancestors, which doubted not to shed their owne bloud for the increase and defence of the churches libertie and the faith: and coueting to prouide for the puritie of the faith and state of the church, as also to auoid the hurt of the generall slander, beeing not able to passe ouer any longer the premisses with winking and dissembling, and my conscience driuing to the same, seeing this estimate and opinion of him in these matters, is not rashlie of vs conceiued, but vehementlie and plainlie increased, by many and continuall cryings of credible men, and great authoritie oft and oftentimes beaten into vs, fearing moreouer the destruction of the faith, both of vs and of all other subiects, and specially of Kings and princes of the world, which ought to reproue negligence, which acknowledge that we haue receiued power giuen vs from the Lord, to the promoting and increasement of it; wee agree to your requests in this behalfe, and to the calling and assembling a councell for the glorie of God (sauing the honour and reuerence that is due to the holie Romish church in all things) whereby the truth may appeare in the premisses, and all error auoided: that the state of the vniuersall church and all christianitie and the matters of faith, and the holie land may be prouided for, and the slanders and ieopardies hanging ouer vs may be withstanded: we be readie and offer our selues gladlie, as much as in vs is, to bestow our labour & diligent paine thereabouts. Earnestlie requiring & beseeching in the mercifull bowels of Iesu Christ, you archbishops and other prelats here present, as children of the church and pillers of faith, called of the Lord to the promoting, increase and preseruing thereof, to care for the same; that with all diligence ye would giue heed, as becommeth you, and effectuallie you would labour by all waies and fit meanes, to the calling and assembling of this councell, in which wee intend to be personallie present. And lest the said Boniface, which hath boldlie and wrongfullie many times threatned to proceed against vs, stopping and hindring our purposes and intent: lest any of his works of darkenesse (if there bee any) should come to light, directlie or indirectlie hindring the calling and gathering of this councel: or lest any state being in the same realme that will indeed proceed against vs, or our state, churches, prelates, barons, and other faithfull vassals, our subiects, our lands, or our realme, and the state of the realme; by abusing any spirituall sword, in excommunicating, suspending, or other waies by any meanes for vs and our well willers, and them that will follow vs: we prouoke and appeale in writing to the foresaid generall councel (which wee instantlie desire to be called) and to one lawfull chiefe Bishop that shall be, or to any other to whom we should appeale: and yet not going from the appellation made by M. William of Nagareta, to whom we sticked then, and also yet stick: requiring earnestlie a witnes of our appellation of you prelates and notaries, expressedlie to renew such prouocation and appellation when and afore whom it shall be thought meet to you.

Then the Archbishops within written, Bishops, Abbats, and Priors, answered the premisses (as it is found in the acts) prouoked and appealed, agreed to and protested, and made prouocation, and appellation, agreement and protestation, as is contained more fullie in a certaine paper there openlie and plainely read, whose tenour followeth with these words.

The protestation of Prelats.

We Archb. of Nicosen, Remen, Senoren, Narbonen, Turonen, and bishops of Landuiren, Belnacen, Catolacen, Antisiodoren, Meldimen, Nurmen, Carnoten, Aurelianen, Ambiauen, Morinen, Silanen, Andegauen, Abricen, Constant, Ebroicen, Lexonicen, Sagien, Caloromont, Lemonicen, Auicen, Masticoren: And we abbats of Cluniac, premostraten of the greater monasterie of the court of S. Dionyse in France, Camped S. Victors, S. Genoueue, S. Marten, Landinoen, Figiacen, & Bellicen in Lemociuio, and frier Hugh, visitor of the houses of the order of knights of S. Iohn in Ierusalem in France, & the father prior of S. Martin in the fields, hearing these things which were said, propounded, & obiected yesterday, and to day by you the lords, earles, & Wil. aforesaid, against the lord Boniface the 8. and pope, being moued with such sayings, purposes, assertations, and your othes, your request and other lawfull causes: and were compelled by need, considering that the matter of our faith which is Christs, is handled in the premisses: Wee that be called to part of this care, to the defence and maintenance of the faith of soules of the realme, although vnworthy, yet coueting to withstand the ieopardies that hang ouer vs by reason of the premisses & other causes, thinking the calling & gathering of the said councel profitable & necessarie that the innocency of the L. Boniface himselfe may clearely be discussed, as we desire (our consciences bearing witnes) that it may be determined on him by the Councel, touching such things as are laid against him, & that may be done which they decree according to the Canons: Wee answer you our lord king, and you our Lords, Earles, and William, that (the honor and reuerence of the holie Romish church saued in all points) we agree to your due requests in this behalfe for the calling of the councell, and are readie to giue help and diligent labour to the calling and gathering of the said Councell, according to the decrees of the holie fathers, and to the lawfull orders of the Canons: not intending by any meanes, to make parties of this matter, nor to sticke to any that maketh parties. Yet lest the said Boniface being moued or prouoked by these things, as we feare by likelie coniectures and threatnings made against vs for the foresaid things, that hee will proceede against our parish Churches and our subiects by some meanes, or cause to proceed against vs by some authoritie of his owne or others by excommunication, suspension, interdicting, deposing, depriuing, or by some other meanes and colour sought to some impeachment or trouble of the said Councell: and that wee may sit in the same Councell to

iudge and doe all other things, that belong to the office of Prelats: that our friends that sticke to vs and would sticke to vs in all things may remaine safe, for our selues, our parish churches, our subiects and them that sticke to vs, or would sticke to vs in this behalfe: wee prouoke and appeale in writing to the foresaid councell, that is to bee gathered, and to him that shall bee the true and lawfull highest bishop, and to him or them to whom of right wee should appeale to, and earnestly require our appellations, committing vs, our parish churches, our subiects, friends, and them that sticke to vs, our state and theirs, our right, goods, to the godly defence of the foresaid councell, and of him that shall bee the true and lawfull highest bishop: and wee protest to renew this appellation, where, when, and afore whom, it shall bee thought meet.

This was done at Paris at Lupara in the chamber of the said lord our king, Indictione prima, the ninth yeare of his popedome, the daies of thurlday and friday aforesaid, these noble men beeing present; The lords of Auia and Bolone, the lords Martins and other earles named afore, Matthew Dotera, Peter the lord chamberlaine, Philip the lord of Wirtmos, and Henrie of Bologne knight, and also M. Philip archdeacon of Benigem, Nicolas archdeacon of Remeti, William treasurer of Anioy, Philip Bealspeare, Rainold of Bourbon and John Montagre, and many moe both clerkes and other specially required and called to bee witnesse to this.

After these things thus in the parliament decreed and agreed, the prelats of the clergie consulting with themselues what was to be done in so doubtfull a matter: and dreading the popes displeasure, for this which was done already, to cleare themselues in the matter contrued among themselues a letter to the pope, partly to certifie him what there was done, and partly also to admonish him what hee should doe: the tenor of which their letter contained these words following.

The forme of a letter which the prelats of France as well secular as religious sent to Boniface, that hee should cease his enterprise, wherein he proceeded against the king.

To the most holy Father and their deerest beloued Lord, the Lord Boniface the chiefe bishop of the holy Romish church and the vniuersall church: his humble and deuout archbishops, abbats, priors, conuentuels, deanes, prouosts, chapters, conents and colledges, of the cathedrall and collegiate churches, regular and secular of all the realme of France, being gathered together, doe offer most deuout kissings of your blessed feet.

The letter of the French prelats to pope Boniface.

WE are compelled, not without sorrow of heart and bitter teares to signifie vnto your holinesse, that the most famous Prince our most deare lord Philip, by the grace of God, the noble king of France: when hee heard and saw the Apostolicall letters sealed, which were sent to him of late, from your behalfe by the worshipfull man the cardinall of Narbo your notarie and messenger, and were presented by the same cardinall to him, and certaine other of his barons. Vpon the sight and perusing of which so bloodie letters being read and declared to them sitting by him: both our lord the king and the barons themselues were highly moued with great maruelling and great trouble. Insomuch that the said our lord the king by the aduice of his barons, commanded to be called afore him the other barons then absent, and vs also: that is to wit, All archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, conuentuals, deanes, prouosts, chapters, conuents and colledges, as well of cathedrall or collegiate churches, regular and secular, and also all the Vniuersities and communalties of the townes of his realme: that wee prelates, barons, deanes, prouosts, and two of the learnedst of euery collegiate and cathedrall church, should appeare personallie, and should procure the rest likewise to appeare, by their stewards, officers, and sufficient proctors, with full and sufficient commission at the appointed place and terme. Further, when wee and the other Ecclesiasticall persons aforesaid, and also the barons, stewards, officers, and proctors, and other of the comminaltie of the townes that were thus called: and when according to the forme of the foresaid calling by the kings commandement, wee stoode afore the king this Wednesday, the tenth of this present of Aprill, in saint Maries church in Paris: Our lord the king caused to bee propounded openly and plainely to all men, that it was signified to him, from you among other things by the foresaid cardinal and letters: that for his kingdome (which hee and his ancestors hitherto doe acknowledge they hold of God onely) now ought in temporalties to be subiect to you and hold of you, and that yee were not content with these so maruellous and strange words, and not heard of from the beginning of the world of any dwellers within the same realme, but that ye went about to put them in practise. And that yee called to appeare afore you the prelates of the said realme, and doctors of diuinitie, and such professors of both lawes, as were borne within the said realme, for the correcting and amending of such excesses, faults, arrogancies, wrongs, and harmes, as ye pretend to bee done to the ecclesiasticall prelates and persons ecclesiasticall both regular and secular, abiding within the realme and elsewhere, by our lord the king himselfe and his officers or bailiffes, by his peeres, earles, barons, and other nobles, with the communaltie and people of the said realme: To the intent, by this meanes, the foresaid realme might bee made strong, with precious iewels and durable treasures, which are to bee preferred before the bucklers or any armour of strong men, that is to say, by the wisedome of prelats, and wise men, and others: through whose ripe faithfull counsell, and circumspect foresight, the realme might be ruled and gouerned, the faith might be stablished, the ecclesiasticall sacraments might bee ministred, iustice might bee executed: which by them being robbed of their goods and riches, and vtterly spoiled, is in a doubtfull case, and in ieopardie of miserable decay, and for euer to be destroyed.

Among these and diuers other griefes, which were done by you and the Romish church, to him, to his realme, and the French church, both in reseruing and wilfull ordering of archbishopriks, bishopriks, and bestowing of great benefices of the realme vpon strange and vnknowne persons, yea and oft vpon suspect persons, neuer being at the churches or benefices aforesaid. By reason wherof the decaie of Gods worship ensued, the godly wils of the founders and giuers are defrauded of their godly purpose: the accustomed almes-giuing is withdrawne from the poore of the said realme, the pouerishing of the realme followeth, and churches runne in danger to bee defaced, while they remaine destitute of seruice: the prophets being taken away, and the fruits of them that serue them, bee appointed to the commoditie of strangers. And while prelates haue not to giue, yea to reward men for their deserts: noble men (whose ancestors founded the churches) and other learned men, cannot haue seruants: and that for these causes, deuotion began to bee cold, there was none at these daies that would stretch out a liberall hand towards the churches, and furthermore by the premises an euill example was giuen. Also hee complained of new taxes, of pensions, newly laid on the churches, of immeasurable bondages, exactions, and diuers extortions with other preiudiciall and hurtfull nouelties, by which the generall state of the church is changed, in giuing suffragans, as helpers to the higher prelats, whereby neither the bishops themselues nor the suffragans can doe their duties, but for them they might runne with gifts to the Apostolicall see. He complained also of diuers causes and some articles long since, but true in the time that they were prefented, that were done and bee done continually: and also not purposing to suffer so great a disheriting of him and his successours from the realme, and so manifest a griefe, they could not suffer any longer the euident losse of the honour of him and the realme, and said: that hee was certaine, that it was knowne to the whole world, and that he did maintaine in this matter a iust cause, as he had learned by the agreeable sentence of doctors in Diuinitie, and masters of both lawes, that were borne within his realme and others, which among the doctors and cunning men of the world were counted of the learned sort and more famous. Therefore he required vs, all and euery one, both prelats and barons, and other earnestly as our lord: he prayed and gently begged as a friend, to consult and take diligent paine, that hee might ordaine wholesome things, both for the keeping of their old libertie, the honour and state of the realme and of the inhabitants thereof, for the easing of the griefs aforesaid, for redressing of the realme and the French church, by our counsell and his barons, to the praise of Gods name, the encrease of the catholike faith, the honour of the vniuersall church, and promoting of Gods religion: specially seeing such griefes were done by his officers and others of the realme, to the churches and churchmen, for the which hee purposed a remedie of wholesome correction, afore the comming of the foresaid cardinall, and would now haue put it in execution effectuallie, but that he might be thought to haue done that for feare, or at your commandement, which thing yee cannot ascribe to your selfe. Furthermore, he would spend not onely his goods, but also his realme, yea his children if the case required: and therefore wee should regard to bee readie with counsell and helpe in season as wee are bound by the dutie of fidelitie in these things: wherein it is manifest, that as all and euery mans case is handled, generallie and particularly their case is promoted, and euery mans owne interest is touched. And then he demanded by and by to bee answered plainely and finally in these things, of all and euery one.

Then the barons sitting aside with the officers and procters aforesaid, at the length after they had taken counsell, comming to our foresaid lord the king, and praising greatly, and heartilie thanking him, for his laudable purpose and good will, answered with one voice: that for those things they were ready, not onely to spend their goods, but offered the same goods, riches, and also their persons to death, and not to flee any kind kind of torment. And said further with one voice, that if our foresaid lord the king would (as God forbid) suffer, or else willingly passe ouer those, they themselues would in no case suffer it.

Digitized by Google

Then when answere was asked of vs afterward, although we desired longer respite of deliberation of the king himselfe our lord, and of the greatest of the aforesaid barons, and that for this intent; that in the meane while the popes letters might haue come to our lord the king, wee answered that we would not offend against the libertie of the realme, or by some means to innouate things contrary to the kings honour in this behalfe.

Wee went about also to informe him with many godlie words, with earnest persuasions, and with many kinds of help, and by sundry waies to bring him to keep the speciall bond of vnity, which is known to haue continued to these present daies, betwixt the holy Romish church, and his predecessours. But when we were denied any longer delay, and it was plainly and openly told to all men, that if any man were of a contrary mind, from thenceforth he should be manifestly counted for an enemie of the king and the realme: We considering warily, and seeing plainly, that except our lord the king, and the barons aforesaid were content with our answere, beside other dangers and great offences (whereof there could neither be number nor end) and that the deuotion both of the Romish and French church, and also the whole obedience of the laitie, and all the people from thenceforth should be taken away without recouery, not without great feare and doubt, we thought good to answere thus:

That we would helpe our lord the king with due counsell and conuenient helpe for the preseruing of his person, and of his earthly honour, and the libertie and lawes of the said realme, like as wee were (certaine of vs) by the duty of allegiance bound to him, which hold of him dukedomes, earledomes, baronies, fees, and other noble parts of the said realme, by the forme of the oth, as all other doe: yet wee made humble sute to the same our lord the king, that seeing wee were bound to obey the popes holinesse and your holy feete, he would suffer vs to goe according to the tenor of your foresaid calling.

Then on the kings and barons behalfe followeth answere; that in no case they would suffer vs to goe out of the realm, and that by no meanes they would beare to be handled so dangerously, yea rather to be altogether wasted.

Then we considering so great an anger, and trouble so ieopardous, and so great that none could be greater, both of the king, the barons, and other lay people of the realme: and now knowing plainly, that the old enemy of peace, which goeth about from the beginning of his fall with sowing of darnell, to breake the vnity of the church, by troubling of peace; would breake charity, and infect the sweetnesse of good works, with the poison of bitter enuie, and would ouerthrow mankind vtterly, and would trouble with wickednesse the band of louely vnitie, and singular friendship, which hitherto haue had a happie increase betwixt the Romish church & our Lord the king, and his predecessors, and the realme, to the praise of the highest God, the increase of christian faith, and the setting foorth the honour of the church, of the king and the realme. But now (alas) a doore was open to the lamentable breaking and pitifull separating of great offences to rise on euery side, dangers are attempted against churches and churchmen, to spoile their goods and riches, with ieopardie of life, seeing that the laitie now doe abhorre and vtterly flee the obedience of clerks, vtterly banishing them from their counsels and doings, and haue taken courage to condemne the Ecclesiasticall censure and processe. All which ieopardies, with other sundry & diuers dangers (which neither tongue is able to tell, nor writing can declare) wee seeing at hand, thought good in this point of greatest necessitie, to runne with weeping voice, and lamentable sighes to the circumspect wisdome of your holinesse. Beseeching your fatherly mildenesse, and humbly praying you, that some wholesome remedy may be prouided in the premisses. By which, the sound profitable agreement and mutuall loue, which hath continued so long time betwixt the church, the King, and the realme, might bee maintained in that old sweet concord; the state of the French church might continue in godly and quiet peace: that yee would vouchsafe to foresee how to withstand the dangers and offences aforesaid: that we and our states may be prouided for, by the foresaid commandement of your calling, by the studie of your Apostolicall wisdome, and fatherly loue. The Almightie preserue your holinesse to his holy church a long time.

These things thus discoursed and done, then followed the yeere of our lord 1304. In the which yeere, about the nativitie of our Ladie, came a garrison of harnessed souldiers well appointed, sent partly by the French king, partly by the cardinals of Columpna, whom the pope before had deposed, vnto the gates of Aruagium, where the pope did hide himselfe, because hee was borne in the towne. The captaines of which army was one Schaira, brother to the foresaid cardinals: and another William de Longareto, high Steward to the French king. Who inuading the popes towne, and finding the gates open, gaue assault to the popes frontire: where the pope with his nephew a marquesse, and three other cardinals were immured. The townes men seeing all their intent and strength to bee bent against the pope, caused the common bell to bee rung, and so assembling themselues in a common councell, ordained Adulphus, one of the chiefest rulers of the towne for their captaine, who (vnknowing to them) was a great aduersary to the pope. This Adulphus bringing with him Reginaldus de Supine, a great Lord in Campania, and the two sonnes of John Chitan a noble man, whose father the Pope had then in prison; at length ioyned with the French company against the pope, and so beset his palace on euery side. And first, setting vpon the palaces of the three Cardinals, which were then chiefe about the Pope, rifled and spoiled all their goods. The Cardinals by a backe doore hardly auoided their hands: but the Popes palace, through munition and strength of the Marquesse, was something better defended. At length, the Pope perceiuing himselfe not able to make his partie good, desired truce with Schaira and his company, which was to him granted, from one till nine. During which time of truce, the Pope priuilie sendeth to the townesmen of Aruagium, desiring them to saue his life: which if they would doe, hee promised so to inrich them, that they should all haue cause neuer to forget or repent their benefit bestowed. To this they made answere againe, excusing themselues, that it lay not in their abilitie to doe him any good, for that the whole power of the towne was with the Captaine. Then the Pope all destitute and desolate, sendeth vnto Schaira, beseeching him to draw out in articles, wherein hee had wronged him, and he would make him amends to the vttermost. Schaira to this maketh a plaine answere, signifying to him againe, that hee should in no wise escape with his life, except vpon these three conditions. First, to restore againe the two Cardinals of Columpna his brethren, whom he had before deposed, with all other of their stocke and kindred: secondly, that after their restitution, hee should renounce his papacie: thirdly, his body to remaine in his power and custodie. These articles seemed to the pope so hard, that in no case hee would agree vnto them: wherefore the time of truce expired, the Captaines and souldiers in all forcible meanes bending themselues against the Bishop, first fired the gates of the palace, whereby the army hauing a full entrance, fell to rifle and spoile the house. The Marquesse vpon hope to haue his life, and the life of his children, yeelded him to the hands of Schaira and the other Captaine: which when the Pope heard, he wept and made great lamentation. After this, through windowes and dores, at length with much adoe they brake into the Pope, whom they intreated with words and threats accordingly. Vpon this he was put to his choice, whether hee would presently leaue his life, or giue ouer his papacie. But that hee denied stiffely to doe, to die for it, saying to them in his vulgar tongue; Eccle col, eccle cape: That is, loe here my necke, loe here my head; protesting, that he would neuer while he liued renounce his popedome. Then Schaira went about, and was readie to slay him, but by certaine that were about him, hee was staied: whereby it happened that the Pope receiued no harme, although diuers of his ministers and seruants were slaine. The souldiers which ranged in the meane time through all the corners of the Popes house, did lade themselues with such treasure of gold, siluer, plate, and ornaments, that the words of my author (whom I follow) doe thus expresse it: Quòd omnes reges mundi non possent tantum de thesauro reddere infra vnum annum, quantum fuit de papali palatio asportatum, & de palatijs trium cardinalium, & Marchionis. That is, that all the kings of the earth together were not able to disburse so much out of their treasurie in a whole yeare, as then was taken and carried out of the Popes palace, and of the palace of the three Cardinals, and the Marquesse. Thus Boniface bereaued of all his goods, remained in their custodie three daies. During which space, they had set him on a wilde and vnbroken Colt, his face turned to the horse taile, causing the horse to runne and course, while the Pope was almost breathlesse. Moreouer, they kept him so without meat, that he was thereby neere famished to death. After the third day, the Aruagians and people of the towne mustering themselues together (to the number of tenne thousand) secretlie braak into the house where the Pope was kept, and so slaying the keepers, deliuered the Pope by strong hand. Who then being brought into the middle of the towne, gaue thanks with weeping teares to the people for his life saued: promising moreouer, that forsomuch as he was out of all his goods, hauing neither bread nor drinke to put in his mouth, Gods blessing and his, to all them, that now would relæue him with any thing, either to eat or drinke. And here now to see what pouertie and affliction can worke in a man: The Pope before in all his pompe and most ruffling wealth was neuer so proud, but now was as humble and lowly, that euery poore simple man (as mine author testifieth) might haue a bold and free accesse to his person. To make the story short, the Pope

Anno 1304 Pope Boniface beseeged.

Pope Boniface brought to a strait.

Three conditions put to the pope.

Here may all kings by the French king learne how to handle the pope.

Boniface chuseth rather to die, then to giue ouer his popedome.

Ex R. Aluerd. The excessiue treasures of the popes house noted.

A prety handling of the pope.

The pope deliuered out of prison.

What pouerty and affliction can doe in plucking downe the pride of man.

Digitized by Google

in that great distresse of famin, was not so greedy of their victuals, as they were greedy of his blessing. Whereupon, the women and people of the towne came so thicke, some with bread, some with wine, some with water, some with meat, some with one thing, some with another, that the popes chamber was too little to receiue the offering, insomuch that when there lacked cups to receiue the wine, they powred it downe on the chamber flore, not regarding the losse of wine to win the popes holy blessing. Thus pope Boniface being refreshed by the towne of Aruagum, toke his iourny from thence, accompanied with a great multitude of harnessed souldiers to Rome, where he shortly vpon the same, partly for feare which he was in, partly for famin, partly for sorow of so inestimable treasure lost, died. After whom succeeded Benedictus the 11. of whom these verses are written: Are nomen habe, benedic, benefac, benedicte. Aut rem peruerte, maledic, malefac, maledicte, &c. And thus haue ye the whole story of pope Boniface the 8. author of the Decretals. Which story I thought the more diligently to set forth, that all the Latin church might see what an author he was, whose lawes and decretals so deuoutly they follow.

Pope Benedictus 11.

Now after the long debating of this matter betweene the French king and pope Boniface, let vs proceed in our English story. About this time, in the daies of king Edward, the church of Rome began daily more and more to rise vp and swell to high in pride and worldly dominion, that no king almost in his owne country could doe any thing, but as pleased the pope, who both had, and ruled all in all countries, but chiefly here in England: as partly by his intollerable tallage and pillage before signified may appeare, partly by his iniunctions and commandements sent downe, also by his donations and reseruations of benefices and church liuings; also in deposing and disposing such as him liked, in place and office to beare rule. In so much, that when the king and the church of Canturbury in their election had chosen one Robert Burnel bishop of Bathe, to be archbishop of Canturbury, pope Boniface of his owne singular presumptuous authoritie, ruling the matter after his pleasure, frustrated their election, and thrust in another named John Pecham. For among all other, this hath alwaies been one practise of the court of Rome, euer to haue the archbishoppe of their owne setting, or such one as they might be sure of on their side, to weigh against the king and other, whatsoeuer need should happen. To this John Pecham, pope Boniface directed downe a solemne bull from Rome, as also vnto all other quarters of the vniuersall church. In the which bull was contained and decreed, directly against the rule of Scripture and christian obedience; that no church, nor ecclesiasticall person, should hencefoorth yeeld to his king or temporall magistrate, either any giuing or lending, or promising of tribute or subsidie, or portion whatsoeuer, of the goods and possessions to him belonging; but should be cleerly exempted and discharged from all such subiection of tallage or subuention to be exacted of them in the behoose of the prince and his affaires. Which decree manifestly rebelleth against the commanded ordinance of God, and the apostolicall canon of Saint Peter, and all other examples of holy Scripture. For as there is no word in the Scripture that excludeth spirituall men more then temporall from obedience and subiection of princes: so if it chance the prince in his exacting to be too rigorous or cruell in oppression, that is no cause for the clergy to be exempted, but to beare the common burthen of obedience, and to pray to God to turne and moue the princes mind, and so (with praier and patience, not with pride and disobedience) to helpe and amend that which is amisse. Concerning the bull of Boniface, if any there be that either do not credit the same, so to containe, or would for his mind see and reade the same, the words thereof here follow.

The kings election in his owne realme frustrate.

John Pecham archbishop of Canturbury.

A point of practise in the court of Rome.

Ecclesiasticall persons exempted by the pope, for not paying tribute to the king.

The pope proceedeth against the manifest word, in setting the clergy free from the kings tributes.

The copie of the popes bull, wherein the clergy is exempted from giuing tribute to kings and princes.

Ex Chron. Rob. Gisburnensis.

BOnifacius, &c. Ad sempiternam rei memoriam. Clericis, laicos infestos oppido tradidit antiquitas. Quod & præsentium experimenta temporum manifestè declarant, dum suis finibus non contenti nituntur in vetitum & adillicita sua frena relaxant, nec prudenter attendunt quomodo sit eis in clericos ecclesiasticasue personas, & bona interdicta potestas. Quinimo ecclesiarum prælatis, ecclesijs ecclesiasticisq; personis regularib. & secularibus imponuntur onera grauia, ipsos talliant, & eis collectas imponunt, & ab ipsis suorumque prouentuum, vel bonorum dimidiam, decimam, seu vicesimam, vel quamuis aliam portionem, quotam exigunt & extorquent, eosq; moliuntur multipariè subijcere seruituti, suæque subdere ditioni. Et quod dolenter referimus, nonnulli ecclesiarum prælati, ecclesiasticaque persona trepidantes, vbi trepidandum non est, transitoriam pacem quærentes, plus timentes maiestatem temporalem offendere, quàm æternam, talium abusibus non tam tamerariè, quàm improuidè acquiescunt, sedis apostolicæ authoritate non obtenta. Nos igitur talibus actibus obuiare volentes, de fratrum nostrorum consilio Apostolicæ authoritate statuimus: quòd quicunque prælati, ecclesiasticaue personæ, vel seculares, quorumcunque ordinum condarionis, seu status, collectas vel tallias, dimidiam, decimam, vicesimam, seu centesimam suorum & ecclesiarum suarum prouentuum vel bonorum laicis soluerint, vel promiserint, vel se soluturos excesserint, aut quamuis aliam quantitatem, portionem, aut quicquam ipsorum prouentuum vel bonorum æstimationem vel valorem ipsorum subuentionis, subsidij, vel doni nomine, seu quouis alio timore, vel modo, vel quæsito colore absque autoritate sedis eiusdem: Nec non imperatores, reges, seu principes, duces, seu comites, vel barones, potestates, capitaneas, officiales vel rectores quocunque nomine censeantur, ciuitatum, castrorum, seu quorumque locorum constitutorum vbilibet, & * quis alius cuiuscunque præeminentiæ conditionis & status, qui talia imposuerint & exegerint, vel receperint, aut apud ædes sacras depositæ ecclesiarum vel ecclesiasticarum personarum vbilibet * arestauerint, sayserint seu occupare præsumpserint, vel arestari, saysiri, aut occupari mandauerint, aut * occupata, saysita, seu arestata receperint: nec non omnes qui scienter in prædictis dederint consilium, auxilium, vel fauorem, publicè vel occultè, eo ipso sententiam excommunicationis * incurrunt. Vniuersitates quoque quæ in his culpabiles fuerint ecclesiastico supponimus interdicto: prælatis, & personis ecclesiasticis supradictis in virtute obedientiæ & sub pœna depositionis districtè mandantes, vt talibus absq; licentia expressa dictæ sedis nullatenus acquiescant. A supradictis autem excommunicationis & interdicti sententijs nullus absolui valeat, præterquam in mortis articulo absque sedis Apostolicæ autoritate & licentia speciali, &c.*

* Quinis, pro quisquis, barbarismus Apostolicus.

* Flores Attici ex ipso Helicone desumpti. Irisomrie rhetorica.

* Tauri cornu, Ware the bulls horne.

* Apostolica autoritas frustra obtenitur, vbi Apostolica scriptura cõtemnitur.

This bull being directed (as is said) from Rome to the archbishop of Canturbury, and likewise through the whole vniuersall church, vnder the popes authority; it chanced not long after, the king held his parliament at Saint Edmundsbury, where was grãted to him of all cities and boroughs an eighth, and of the commõs a twelfth of their goods. Only the clergy by vertue of his bull, stood stout, denying to pay any thing to the king. This answer not well pleasing the king, he willeth them to deliberate better with themselues vpon the matter; and after long aduisement, so to giue him answer thereof against the next parliament, which should be holden the next Hillary terme at London.

The clergy denieth to giue tribute to the king.

In conclusion, the parliament came, the clergy persisteth still in the deniall of their subsidie, alleaging the popes bull for their warrant and discharge. Whereupon the king likewise secludeth them from vnder his protection & safegard of his lawes. And as concerning the archbishop of Canturbury, aboue mentioned, because he was found more stubborne then the rest, and was the inciter to the other, he seazed vpon all his goods, and caused an inuentory of the same to be inrolled in the exchequer. Notwithstanding, diuers of the other bishops relented some after to the king, and contributed the fifth of their goods vnto him, and were receiued againe to fauor.

The clergy secluded from the kings protection.

The archbishop of Canturbury for his stubbornnes, had his goods confiscat to the king.

In the life of this kings father, it was declared before how the said king Henry the third, father to this king, after diuers wars and commotions had with his barons, had granted certaine liberties and freedomes written and contained in Magna Charta, and in Charta de foresta. Concerning which matter, much businesse happened in this kings daies also in the realme, betweene the king and his barons and commons. The occasion was this: A packe of woll which before paied but a marke to the king, was now by this king raised vp to forty shillings. After this, the king hauing a iourny to make into Flanders, sent to his barons and diuers other to giue their attendance, and seruice in the same, which they refused and denied to doe. Notwithstanding (the king persisting in his purpose) with such a power as he had, prepareth toward his iourny. To whom being in his way at Winchelsey, the foresaid earles and barons, and commons, sent certaine petitions contained in writing vnder the name of the archbishops, bishops, abbats and priors, earles & barons, with the communaltie of the realm. In which writing, first lamenting and complaining of their afflicted state and misery, after humble manner they desired their lord the king to redresse and amend certaine greeuances among them. And first declared in the name of the whole commons, that the premonition or writs directed to them for their attendance vpon his grace into Flanders, was not sufficient: for that there was no certaine place in the said writs specified vnto them whither to come for making their prouision, and preparing money and other things according to the same. And if the place had been to them signified, yet because none of their ancestors euer serued the king ouer into Flanders before, the commons therefore thought themselues not bound to any seruice in that country. And albeit they had been so bound thereunto, yet they were not able to doe it, being so heauily oppressed with so many tallages, tares, tolles, customes, and prices of corne; otes, tinne, woll, leather, oxen, kine, flesh, fish, &c. And besides all this, hauing no pennie of wages giuen them to releeue their charges: Ouer and besides, the lacke of the kings wages not paied them, their owne pouertie like an heauie burthen did so miserably lie vpon them, that some of them had no sustentation, some of them were not able to till their owne ground. They alleaged moreouer, that they were not now handled after the old

The variance betweene king Edward and his barons and commons.

Petitions of the barons and commons to the king.

Digitized by Google

side lawes and customes of the land, as their ancestors were wont. Many also found themselues grieued in that they were not vsed according to the articles contained in charta magna, nor againe that the Charta de foresta, was not obserued nor kept as was wont to be. Wherefore most humbly they besee-ched the king, both for his owne honor and for the wealth of his people, that of these things they might finde redresse. For the custome moreouer of woll, the whole commons bewailed to the king their griefe, in that for euery packe of woll, was fi-ned to the king xl.s. and for euery sacke of tosed woll, seuen marks: The which woll of England, as it doth rise vp to the value of halfe the realme: so the tollage of the same surmoun-teth to the fifth part of the valuation of the whole land. And be-cause therefore the commons wished the honor and preseruati-on of their king, (as they were bound to doe) they thought it not good for his grace to saile ouer to Flanders, vnlesse he had better assurance of their fidelitie, especially at this time the Scots being so busie: who if they began to rebell, he being at home in his land, much more were they like to stir, he being a-broade out of the land. And that not only for the Scots, but also for that the like perill was to be doubted of other forraigne na-tions and kingdomes, which as yet were in no firme peace with England, &c.

Magna Charta. Charta de foresta. Custome for wooll.

The kings answer to the petitions of the barons and the commons.

To these petitions, the king said that he could as yet make no resolute answer, for that his councell, some was gone ouer already to Flanders, some were yet at London. Notwith-standing, at his returne againe from Flanders (which he tru-sted should be speedily) they should then heare his answer, and know more of his mind concerning the same. In the meane time this he required of them, to keepe good rule at home while he was forth. What answere the king had minded to make them at his returne, it is vncertaine, which peraduenture had turned to a bloudy answer: but occasion serued otherwise, and turned all to agreemen. For the Scots with their Captaine William Waleys aboue specified, in the time the king being absent, inuaded the realme with such violence, that prince Ed-ward the kings sonne, who was left to rule in his fathers stead, was forced to assemble a parliament, and to call for the earle of Hereford, the earle of Northfolke, high marshall of England, earle of Essex high Constable, with other earles, ba-rons, knights, and esquires, to intreat peace and concord be-twéene his father and them. Who comming vp to London with 1500 well armed souldiers, and obtaining the gates of the citie with their owne men, fell at length to agreement with the prince, vpon composition to haue the Articles of Magna Charta, and of Charta de foresta, confirmed, and that by his meanes and mediation they might be assured of the kings dis-pleasure to be removed from them. The which foresaid articles of Magna charta, with the other articles adioined withall, here follow vnder written.

Humfrey Bonne, Roger Bigot.

First, no tollage or subsidie by the king or his heires to be imposed or leuied hereafter within the realm of England, with-out the common assent of the archbishops, bishops, abbats and other prelats, earles, barons, knights, burgeses, and commons of the realme.

The articles contained in Magna charta.

Item no taker or seruitor of the king or of his heires hence-forth within this realme, to take graine, woll, leather, or any goods of any man, without the will and consent of him which is the owner.

No taking to be hereafter, in name of tribute, for any pack of woll.

Item, to be granted by the king and his heires after him, both to the clergy and laity of this foresaid realme: to haue and to inioy their lawes, liberties and customes, in as ample man-ner as they were wont at any time heretofore.

Item, if any decrées or statutes shall hereafter be made and set forth contrary to these foresaid articles, the same to stand void and of no effect for euer.

Agreement con-cluded and sea-led between the king and his barons.

Besides these articles also, in the same composition was contained, that all grudge and displeasure betwéene the king and the barons for not going to Flanders ceasing: the earles and barons might bee assured to be receiued againe into the kings fauor.

The moderate and good na-ture of king Edward noted.

These things thus agréed vpon, and by mediation of the prince also confirmed and sealed with the kings seale his fa-ther: so was all the variance pacified, to the great comfort of the people, and no lesse strength of the realme against their ene-mies: and most chiefly to the commendation of the gentle and wise nature of the king; who as he was gentle in promising his reconcilement with his subiects, so no lesse constant was he in kéeping that which he had promised.

Rob. Winchel-sey, archbishop of Canturbury.

After the death of John Pecham archbishop of Canturbury, aboue mentioned, who in the parliament had resisted the king in the right of certaine liberties pertaining to the crowne, touching patronages and such church matters: succéeded Ro-bert Winchelsey, with whom also the king had like variance, and accused him to the pope for breaking the peace, and toke part with them that rebelled against the king about bla-ges and liberties of the realme. Wherefore, the king being cited vp to the court of Rome, was there suspended, by the meanes of the said archbishop, directed his letters againe to the pope, taken out of the parliament rolles, where I finde diuers letters of the king to pope Clement, against the said Robert arch-bishop of Canturbury, the contents whereof here followeth videlicet qualiter idem. And as this king was troubled in his time with both the archbishops, John Pecham, and also Robert Winchelsey, so it happened to all other kings for the most part, from the time of Lanefranc us (that is from pope Hilde-brand) that euery king in his time had some businesse or other with that sea. As William Rufus, and Henry the first were trou-bled with Anselmus; Henry the second with Thomas Wec-ket; king Richard and all England with William bishop of Ely, the popes legat; king John with Stephan Langthon; king Henry the third with Edmund archbishop, called saint Edmund. Polic. lib. 7. Likewise this king Edward the first, with John Pecham and Robert Winchelsey aforesaid. And so other kings after him, with some prelat or other: whereby ye haue to vnderstand, how and about what time the church of Rome, which before time was subiect to kings and princes, be-gan first to take head aboue, and against kings and rulers, and so haue kept it euer since.

K. Edward was troubled with two arch-bishops of Can-turbury.

The church of Rome and Ro-mish prelats set against kings and rulers.

Kings of Eng-land commonly troubled with archbishops of Canturbury.

By this John Pecham afore mentioned, was ordained, that no spirituall minister should haue any more benefices then one, which also was decréed by the constitutions of Ot-to and Otobonus, the popes legats the same time in Eng-land.

Pilets to haue but one be-nefice.

About the beginning of this kings raign, after the de-crease of Walter archbishop of Yorke: William Wicewan-ger succéeding in that sea, minding to go on visitation, came to Duresme to visit the church and chapter there. But the cler-gie and the people of the citie shut the gates against him, and kept him out, whereupon rose no small disturbance. The arch-bishop let flie his curse of excommunication and interdiction against them. The bishop of Duresme againe with his cler-gie, despised all his curssings, grounding themselues vpon the constitution of Innocentius the fourth, De censibus & exacti-onibus. And so they appealed to Rome, saying: that he ought not to be receiued there, before hee had first begun to visit his owne chapter and Diocesse, which hee had not done. For to say the words of the constitutions: We ordaine and decrée, that euerie archbishoppe that will visit his prouince, first must procure to visit his owne Church, Citie, and Dio-cesse, &c.

Variance be-twéen the arch-bishop of Yorke and the clergy of Duresme.

Among other things in this king to be noted, that is not to be passed ouer; that where complaint was made to him of his officers, as iustices, maiors, sheriffes, bailiffes, escheters, and such other, who in their offices abusing themselues, extortioned and oppressed the kings liege people, otherwise then was ac-cording to the right and conscience: the said king not suffering such misorder to be punished, did appoint certaine officers or inquisitors, to the number of twelue, which inquisition was called Traibaston, or Trailbastoun: by meane of which inqui-sition, diuers false officers were accused, and such as were of-fenders were either remoued from their place, or forced to buy againe their office at the kings hand; to their no small losse, and great gaine to the king, and much profit to the common-wealth.

Inquisition made against ill rulers and false officers.

Trailbastoun.

In the chronicle of Robert Amesbury, it is recorded of the said king, that he being at Amesbury to see his mother (who was then in that monastery professed) there was a certaine man that fained himselfe blind a long time, brought to the pre-sence of the said Alinore the kings mother, saying, how that he had his sight againe restored at the tombe of king Henry her late husband, insomuch that she was easily perswaded in the miracle to be very true. But king Edward her sonne, know-ing the man a long time to be a vile dissembler, and a wicked person, vsed to lying and craftie deceiuing, dissuaded his mo-ther not to giue credit to the vile vagabon, declaring that he knew so well of the iustice of his father, that if he were aliue, he would twice rather plucke out both his eies, then once re-store him one. Notwithstanding, the queene the mother remai-ning still in the former fond perswasion, would heare or beleeue nothing to the contrary, but was so in anger with her sonne, that shee bid him depart her chamber; and so he did. By the example whereof may easily be conceiued, how and after what sort these blind miracles in those daies, and since haue come vp among the blind and superstitious people. For had not the king here been wiser then the mother, no doubt but this would haue been rung a miracle, and percase king Henry him made a saint.

Ex Chron. Tho. Walsingham.

A false miracle wel spied out of the king.

But as this was a fained miracle, and false no doubt, so in the same author we reade of another manner of miracle, sounding more neere the truth, and so much the more likelie, for that it serued to the conuersion vnto christian faith: to which vse properly, all true miracles doe appertaine. The miracle was this. In the raigne of this king, and the latter yeere of his raigne, Cassanus king of the Tartarians (of whom commeth these whom now wee call Turks) which fighting against the Souldan king of the Saracens, in the plaine of Damascus, slew of them a hundred thousand of Saracens: and againe at Babylon, fighting with the said Souldan, slew him in the field, and 200000 of his Saracens, calling vpon the helpe of Christ, and thereupon became christian. This Cas-sanus I say, had a brother a Pagan, who being in loue with the Ex eodem chron.

A true miracle.

Victory against the Saracens.

Digitized by Google

the daughter of the king of Armenia a christian woman, desired of her father to marry with her. Whereunto the king her father would not agree, vnlesse he promised to be a christian. Notwithstanding, the other being stronger in power & threatning to get her by war; the king at length was forced to agree. In conclusion, it happened that the child being borne betwixt them was ouergrowne, and all rough with haire, like the skin of a beare. Which child being brought to the father, hee commanded it to be throwne into the fire and burned. But the mother desiring first to haue the child baptised, caused all things thereunto to be prepared. The infant being three times in water plunged, after the sacrament of holy baptisme receiued; incontinent was altered and turned from all his hairie roughnesse, and seene as faire and smoth skinned as any other. The which thing after the father saw and beheld, was christened himselfe and all his house, &c.

Merton colledge builded in Oxford.

In the raigne of this king, Walter Merton bishop of Rochester, builded Merton colledge in Oxford. In whose raigne also liued Henricus de Gaudano, Arnoldus de villa noua, Dantes, and other mo. And Scotus called Duns. Who in his fourth booke of Sent. Dist. 18. complaineth of the abuse of excommunication and of the popes keies. Whereas before, excommunication was not vsed, but vpon great and iust causes, and therefore was feared: now, saith he, it is brought forth for euerie trifling matter, as for not paying the priests wages, &c. and therefore, saith he, it groweth in contempt. Under the same king, about the beginning of his raigne, was the yeere so hot and so dry, that from the month of Maie vntill the month neere of September, fell no raine: insomuch that many died for heat, and the vulgar people in their reckoning of yeeres, did count the time from the said dry yeere long after.

I. Scotus, Duns.

Pope Clement 5. The popes court translated to France.

After pope Benedictus aboue mentioned, succeeded pope Clement the 5. who translated the popes court to Auinion in France, where it remained the terme of 74. yeers after. At the coronation of this Clement, was present Philip king of France, Charles his son & duke John duke of Britanny, with a great number of other men of state and nobility. At which coronation they being in the middle of the pompe or procession, a great wall brake down and fell vpon them: by the fall whereof, duke John with twelue other were slain, king Philip hurt and wounded, the pope stricken from his horse, and lost out from his mitre vpon his head a carbuncle, esteemed to the value of 6000 florence. Plat. de vit. Pont. By this Clement was ordained, that the emperor, though he might bee called king of the Romans before, yet he might not inioy the title and right of the emperor, before he was by him confirmed. And that the emperors seat being vacant, the pope should raigne as emperor, till a new emperor was chosen. By him the orders of the Templaries (who at that time were too abominable) was put down at the counsell of Vienne, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall be declared. He also ordained and confirmed the feast of Corpus Christi, assigning indulgences to such as heard the seruice thereof. And as pope Bonifacius afore heaped vp the booke of Decretals, called Sextus Decretalium, so this Clement compiled the 7. booke of the decretals, called of the same Clement, the Clementines. In the time of this pope, Henricus the 6. of that name emperor, was poisoned in receiuing the sacrament, by a false dissembling monke called Bernard, that fained himselfe to be his familiar friend; which was thought to be done not without the consent of the popes legat. The emperor perceiuing himselfe poisoned, warned him to flee and escape away: for else the Germans would sure haue slaine him; who although he escaped himselfe, yet diuers of his order after that with fire and sword were slaine.

A carbuncle in the popes mitre valued at 6000. Florences.

Emperor no emperor, except he were confirmed by the pope.

The Templaries put downe.

The feast of Corpus Christi.

Septimus decretalium, called the Clementines.

Henricus 6. emperor poisoned in the host.

As this pope Clement the 5. had well prouided now (as ye haue heard) against the empire of Rome to bring it vnder his girdle, insomuch that without the popes benediction, no emperor might take the state vpon him, &c. now he proceedeth further to intermeddle with the empire of Constantinople. Where he first exerciseth his tyrannie and power of excommunication against Andronicus Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, an. 1306. declaring him as a schismatike and heretike, because he neither would, nor durst suffer the Grecians to make their appeale from the Greeke church to the pope, neither would acknowledge him for his superior, &c. Whereby it may appeare, that the Greeke church did not admit the popes superioritie as yet, nor at any time before. Saue onely about the time of pope Innocent the 3. an. 1202. at what time the Frenchmen with their captaine Baldwinus, earle of Flanders, ioined together with the Venecians, were set against the Grecians, to place Alerius to the right of the empire of Constantinople, vpon condition (as writeth Platina) to subdue the Greeke church vnder the church of Rome. Which Alerius being restored, and shortly after slaine; the empire came to the Frenchmen, with whom it remained the space of 58. yeeres, till the comming of Michael Paleologus in the daies of pope Gregory the ninth, who restored the empire from the Frenchmen, vnto his pristine state againe. During all which time of the French emperors, the Greeke church was subiect to Rome, as by the decretals of Pope Gregory the ninth may appeare. Then followed after this, that the foresaid Michael emperor of Constantinople, being called vp to a councell at Paleologus emperor of Constantinople excommunicated with all his adherents by Pope Clement, for not suffering the Grecians to appeale to Rome.

Anno 1306

Platina in vit. Innocentij.

When and how long the Greek church was subiect to Rome.

Note the practise of the Romish prelats.

Lions by pope Gregory the tenth, about the controuersie of proceeding of the holy Ghost (as is aboue specified) and obedience to the church of Rome: there, because the said Michael the emperor did submit himselfe and the Grecians to the subiection of Rome (as testifieth Baptist Egnat.) he thereby procured to himselfe such grudge and hatred among the Greek monks and priests, that after his death they denied him the due honour and place of buriall. The sonne of this Andronicus was Michael Paleologus aboue mentioned: who, as ye haue heard before, because he was constrained by the Grecians, not to admit any appellation to the bishop of Rome, was accursed by the popes censures for an heretike. Whereby appeareth, that the Grecians recouering their state againe, refused all subiection at this time vnto the church of Rome, which was the yeere of our Lord 1327, &c. After this Clement the 5. followed pope John the 22. with whom Ludouicke the emperor had much trouble. After whom next in course succeeded pope Benedict the 12. Which Benedict vpon a time, being desired to make certaine new cardinals, to this answereth againe: that he would gladly so do, if he also could make a new world. For this world (said he) is for these cardinals that be made already. Ex scripto Engethusensis. And thus much of the popes: now to returne a little backe to the kings story againe.

Ex Baptist. Egnat. Rom. princ. l. 7.

The Greeke church denieth subiection to the church of Rome.

In the yeere of our Lord 1307, which was 34 of the raigne of this king, in the beginning of Hillary Terme, the king kept a parliament at Carliel, where great complaints were brought in by the nobles and ancients of the realme, concerning the manifold and intollerable oppressions of churches and monasteries, and exactions of money by the popes legat William Testa (otherwise termed Mala Testa) lately brought into the realme of England. The comming of which William Testa was vpon this occasion, as followeth: Pope Clement, who as yee heard before, had translated his court from Rome into France, where he had been archbishop before, because he contemned to come and remaine at his owne sea: the Princes of Rome thought him therefore vnworthy to inioy Peters patrimony. And so by that meanes falling into barenesse and pouertie, liued onely of such money of bishops as came to him to be confirmed, and with such other thifts and gifts. So that by this meanes, partly of bishops and other religious men and persons, partly vnder the name of courtesie and beneuolence, partly vnder the pretence of borrowing; hee had within the first yeere 9500. marks of siluer, all his other charges and expenses, which he largely that yeere bestowed, clearly borne. Besides this, he sent moreouer the foresaid legat William Testa into England with his buls: in the which hee reserued the first fruits of the first yeere of all churches being vacant at any time, or by any man within the realme of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and also the fruits of abbies and priories within the said realmes, &c. Whereupon the king with his nobles, seeing the inconuenience and harme thereof ensuing to the whole realme: in the foresaid parliament holden at Carliel, withstood the said legat, charging and commanding him by the assent of the earles and barons, that henceforth he should abstaine from all such exactions. And as concerning his lord the pope, he would direct certaine his messengers vnto him, purposely for the same matter appointed: by the which ambassadors, the king wrote vnto the foresaid pope, declaring and monishing the pope, as right and reason was: that he should not exact the first fruits of churches and abbies, by his predecessors and noble men of the land, founded for the honour and maintenance of Gods seruice, for almes and hospitalitie: which otherwise in so doing, should all bee ouerthrowne. And so by this meanes, the pope at that time changed his purpose as concerning abbies. But after that, the fruit of English churches was granted to the king for two yeeres; in which space he obtained the fruits of the foresaid churches, &c.

Ex Chron. Nic. Trimt.

The popes exactions complained of in the parliament.

First fruits first brought in by the pope.

King Edward withstandeth the pope and his legate.

First fruits of abbies denied to the pope.

First fruits for two yeers granted to the king.

During the which parliament afore specified, as men were talking many things of the popes oppressions, which he began in the English church, in the full of the parliament; suddenly fell downe, as sent from heauen, among them a certaine paper, with this superscription.

An epistle of Cassiodorus to the church of England, concerning the abuses of the Romish church.

Ex vetusto Chronico Albanensi.

TO the noble church of England, seruing in clay and bricke as the Iewes did in time past vnder the tyranny of the Egyptians: Peter the sonne of Cassadore a catholike souldier, and deuout champion of Christ, sendeth greeting, and wishing to cast off the yoke of bondage, and to receiue the reward of libertie.

To whom shall I compare thee, or to whom shall I liken thee O daughter Ierusalem? to whom shall I match thee, O daughter of Sion? Great is thy perturbation, like vnto the sea. Thou sittest alone without comfort all the day long, thou art confounded and consumed with heauinesse. Thou art giuen vp into the hands of him from whence thou canst not rise without helpe of one to lift thee vp: for the Scribes and Pharisies sitting sitting vpon the chaire of Moyses, the enemies of the Romans are as thy heads and rulers: inlarging their garded philacteries, and seeking to be inriched with the marrow of thy bones, laying heauie burthens, and not able to bee borne vpon thy shoulders & of thy ministers, and they set thee vnder tribute, (which of old time hast been free) beyond all honestie or measure. But maruell not thereat, for thy mother, which is the ladie of people, like a widow hauing married and coupled her selfe to her subiect, hath appointed him to be thy father: that is to say, the bishop of Rome, who sheweth no point of any fatherly loue towards thee. Hee magnifieth and extendeth to the vttermost his authoritie ouer thee: And by experience hee declareth himselfe to bee the husband of thy mother. Hee remembreth oft with himselfe the propheticall saying of the Prophet, and well digested the same in the inward part of his breast: Take to thee a great booke, and write therein quickly with the penne of a man; Take the spoile, rob quickly. But is this it which the Apostle saith, that hee was appointed for, where hee writeth thus? Euery bishoppe taken from among men, is appointed for men in those things that belong to the Lord: not to spoile, nor to lay on them yeerely taxes, nor to kill men, but to offer gifts and sacrifices for sinnes, and to sorrow with them that bee ignorant and doe erre. And so wee reade of Peter the Fisher (whose successour hee boasteth himselfe to be) that after the resurrection of Christ, hee returned with other Apostles, to the office of fishing: who when hee could take nothing on the left side of the ship, at the bidding of Christ, turned to the right side, and drew to the land a net full of fishes. Wherefore the profitable ministery of the church is to be exercised on the right side, by the which the diuell is ouercome, and plenty of soules bee lucrified and wonne to Christ. But certainly, the labour on the left side of the ship, is farre otherwise: for in it the faith stumbleth, heauinesse beareth rule, when that thing that is desired by seeking, is not found. For who is so foolish to thinke, that hee can both at one time serue God and man, and to satisfie his owne will, or to sticke to the reuelations of flesh and bloud, and to offer worthy gifts to Christ? And doubtlesse, that shepheard that watcheth not for the edifying of the flock, prepareth another way to the roaring Lion, and seeking whom hee may deuour. And now behold, I say, O daughter, the deedes of him that is called thy father, such as haue not been heard of before: hee driueth away the good shepheards from the sheepfold, and placeth in their stead bishops, to rule, but not to profit (his nephewes, cosins, and parents) some that know no letters, and othersome dumbe and deafe, which vnderstand not the plaine voice of the sheep, not curing their wounds that bee hurt of the wolues: but like hirelings, plucking off the fleeces apace, and reaping that which other men haue sowen, whose hands moreouer be alwaies ready in their baskets and pouches, but their backes are turned from their burthens. By which thing it is manifest, that the priesthood is cleane changed at these daies, the seruice of God decaied, almes diminished and brought to nought, the whole deuotion of kings, princes, and christians, is banished. May not this be thought wonderfull in the eies of all men, that whereas Christ commanded tribute to bee paied to kings for him and for Peter, he now goeth about dominion of his stile, to subdue to him both realmes, and princes of realmes (against his will, whose vicar hee saith he is, and who refused the realmes and iudgements of the world) which this bishop contrariwise challengeth, claiming all that which hee in his stile writeth to bee his? Alacke, O daughter, what doth he yet more against thee? marke, hee draweth from thee whatsoeuer pleaseth him, and yet hee thinketh not himselfe content, to haue the tenth part onely of thy goods from thee; except he haue also the first fruits of the benefices of the ministers, wherby hee may get a new patrimony, as well for himselfe as for his kindred, contrary to the godly wils of the first founders. Ouer and beside all this, he inferreth other execrable taxes and stipends for his legats and messengers, whom hee sendeth into England, which not onely take away the feeding and clothing of thee & thine, but also teare in pieces like dogges your flesh and skinnes. May not this prince be compared to king Nabuchodonoser, which destroied the temple of the Lord, and robbed away the siluer and golden vessels thereof? The very same doth this man also; he robbed the ministers of God his house, and left destitute of due helpe. In like manner doth he: Truly they be better that are killed with the sword, then they which be pined with hunger: for they are dead straight, but these are wasted with the barrennes of the earth. O daughter, all they that passe by the way, let them haue pitie and compassion on thee, for there is no sorrow like thy sorrow. For now thy face is blacker then coales, through much sorrow and weeping, and thou art no more knowne in the streets: thy foresaid ruler hath placed thee in darknesse, and hath giuen thee wormwood and gall to drinke. O Lord, heare the sorrow and sighings of thy people, behold Lord, and descend, for the heart of this foresaid man is more indurate then the heart of Pharaoh. For hee will not suffer the people to depart, except in the fortitude only of thy hand. For he scourgeth them not onely miserably vpon the earth, but also after their death, he intendeth to incroch the goods of all christians vnder the name and title to die intestate, or making no will. Therefore let the chiualry of England well remember, how the Frenchmen in times past, directing their greedy eies on the realme of England, labored with all their power how to bring the same vnder their subiection. But it is to be feared, lest the new deuices and practise of this new enemy, supply that which hitherto hath been lacking in them. For in diminishing of the treasure of the realme, and spoiling of the churches goods, the realme shall be brought into such inability, that it shall not be able to helpe it selfe against the enemy. Therefore, O daughter, and you the ministers thereof, suffer not your selues to be led any more into such miserable bondage. Better it is for the wealth of thee and thine, that the christian king and the powers of the realme, which haue indued thee with great benefits, and you also which are indued with their benefits, doe labour with all your power how to resist the deuices, conspiracies, arrogancie, presumption, and pride of the foresaid person: who not for any zeale of God, but for the inriching of his parents, and for his owne kindred (exalting himselfe like an eagle) by these and such other exactions goeth about after another kind of extortion to scrape vp and deuoure all the money and treasure of England. Now, lest the dissembled simplicitie of the realme in this behalfe doe bring vtter subuersion, and afterward be compelled to seeke remedy when it is too late: I beseech the Lord God of hosts to turne away the vaile from the heart of that man, and to giue him a contrite and an humble minde, in such sort as he may acknowledge the waies of the true God, whereby hee may bee brought out of darknesse, and be inforced to relinquish his old sinister attempts: and that the vineyard which the Lords hand hath planted, may bee repleniished continually with the Preachers of the word. Let the words of the Lord prophecied by the mouth of Ieremy, stirre vp your minds to withstand and resist the subtill practises of this man, by the which words the Lord speaketh: O thou pastor which hast scattered my people, and hast cast them out of their habitations, behold I will come and visit vpon thee, and vpon the malice of thy studies: neither shall there be any of thy seede which shall sit vpon the seat of Dauid, neither which shall haue power any more in Iuda. So that thy nest shall become barren, and vtterly subuerted, like Sodome and Gomer.

And if he being terrified by these words, doe not leaue off from this which he beginneth, and doth not make restitution of those things which he hath receiued, then let all and singuler persons sing for him being indurat, to him that seeth all things, the psalme 108. Deus laudem, &c. For truly as fauour, grace, and beneuolence, remitteth and neglecteth many things; so againe the gentle benignitie of man being too much oppressed and grieued, seeking to bee deliuered and freed from the same, striueth and searcheth to haue the truth knowen, and casteth off that yoke by all meanes possible that grieueth him, &c. Hec Cassiodorus.

What effect this letter wrought in them to whom it was directed, is not in story expressed. This by the sequell may bee coniectured; that no reason or perswasion could preuaile, but that the pope retained here still his exactions, whatsoeuer was said or written to the contrary notwithstanding.

A parliament in France assembled, wherein is discussed, the iurisdiction ecclesiasticall, how farre it extendeth.

And thus much being written hitherto of these acts and doings here in England: now to slip a little into the matters happening the same time in France, vnder the raigne of the foresaid king Philip aboue mentioned: forsomuch as about this time, an. 1307. was commenced a parliament by the said king of France, against the pope, touching the iurisdiction both temporall pertaining to princes, and ecclesiasticall belonging to the church; I thought it not vnprofitable for the reader to heare and learne the full discourse and tractation hereof, according as we haue caused it to be excerpt faithfully out of the true copie and records of Peter Bertrand bishop of Eduenen, and chiefe doer and prolocutor in the said parliament vpon the popes side, against the king and state temporall.

Anno 1307.

For so much as the high prelat of Rome, otherwise called Antichrist, being then in his chiefe ruffe, extolling himself aboue all princes and potentates of the world, as in other countries, so also in France extended his vsurped iurisdiction, aboue the princely authority of the king, claiming to himselfe full gouernment of both the states, as well secular as also ecclesiasticall; the king therefore not suffering the excessiue proceedings of pope Clement the 5. aboue specified, directeth his letters mandatory to the prelats and barons of the realme of France, to conuent and assemble themselues together at Paris, about the beginning of December, the yere aboue prefixed: The tenor of which letters of the king directed to the prelats, followeth in this forme and maner.

The summons of a parliament by Philip the French king.

The letter of Philip king of France, to the bishops and prelats.

PHilip by the grace of God king of France, to our welbeloued bishop of Eduens, greeting and salutation. Reuerend Father in God, right trusty & welbeloued, we greet you wel. The more sight and knowledge you haue in diuinitie and the holy Scriptures of God, with the practise and experience of other good qualities and vertues: you know the better a great deale, how that the clergy and laitie of this our realme (as members of one body) ought to cleaue and sticke together: and how by their their helping hand, vnity and peace ſhould be maintained of all, and the contrary eſchewed and auoided, euery ſtate contenting it ſelfe, and not incroching one vpon another. And becauſe we are aduertiſed, how that our barons and officers (as well in time paſt as of late) haue diuerſly in diuers points iniuried you, as ſemblably you and yours in many cauſes haue wrongfully dainaged them: by occaſion whereof, the knot of vnitie and concord, which ought to haue flouriſhed among you, is quite looſed and vndone. To the end therefore by Gods grace ſome good reformation and redreſſe may be had herein: Wee moſt ſtudious of vnitie & concord require you, and by theſe our letters command you, to appeare perſonally before vs at Paris the 15. day of December next enſuing the date hereof, and there before vs to make relation of ſuch wrong as ye haue receiued at the laities hands. And we likewiſe ſtraitly charge and command you our barons, bailiffes and officers, not to faile, but to make your perſonall appearances before vs, the day and place aboue written, and there to exhibit before vs a bill of ſuch complaints, wherewith you burden our prelats and clergie, with their officials: that we with our counſell conſulting thereupon, with due regard may ſee redreſſe therein: whereby perpetuall loue and charitie may euer hereafter raigne and remaine among them for euer. Giuen at Paris the firſt day of September, an. 1329.

The parliament conuented.

At the day in the letters aboue ſpecified, the prelats and clergy aſſembled themſelues before the king at his palace in Paris, that is to wit, the lord Bituricen, the lord of Auritan, the lord Turonen, the lord Rothom, and the lord Senon, all archbiſhops: the lord Beluacen, the lord Cathalen, the lord Laudun, the lord of Paris, the lord Nouionon, the lord Carnoten, the lord Conſtan, the lord Andegauen, the lord Pictauen, the lord Melden, the lord of Cameracen, the lord of S. Feri, the lord Brioce, the lord of Cabulion, & the lord of Eduen, all biſhops. Where after due reuerence done vnto the kings grace, there ſitting in his owne perſon, with his barons and councell about him; a certaine noble and wiſe perſon, lord Peter de Cugnerijs, (being one of the kings counſell) roſe vp and openly in the parliament houſe ſpake in the kings behalfe on this wiſe, taking for his Theame, Reddite quæ ſunt Cæſaris, Cæſari, & quæ ſunt Dei, Deo: which is to ſay; Giue and render vnto Ceſar which is his, and vnto God which is Gods: which hee very artificially proſecuted and applied, diuiding it into two parts. Firſt, that obedience and reuerence is due vnto the king. Secondly, that there ought to be a difference betweene the iuriſdiction of the clergy and laity, ſo that ſpirituall matters ſhould be defined and ordered by the prelats and ſpirituall men, & temporall cauſes ruled and determined by the king, his barons and temporall men. Which all he proued by many reaſons both of fact and law, as more fully appeareth beneath in the anſwere of the biſhop of Eduen: finally he concluded, that the clergy ought only to deale and haue to doe with ſpirituall matters; in defence whereof, the kings highneſſe would ſtand their good lord and maintainer. His oration being ended, he repeated certaine words in the French tongue, which imported that the kings will and pleaſure was in ſome points to renew the temporall ſtate and iuriſdiction: and therewith exhibited a certaine bill in French, whereof alſo he gaue a copie to the prelats, containing certaine points and articles vnder written, the contents whereof he affirmed not to appertaine to the order and iuriſdiction of the ſpiritualty, but onely to the temporalty, complaining that the clergy had wrongfully proceeded in the ſame. But notwithſtanding the premiſſes, and for all this his complaint, he ſaid that the prelats ſhould haue time to conſult and deliberate thereupon with the king. The copie of which articles, with anſwer enſuing vpon the ſame, and the greeuances of the kingdome of France, wrought by the clergie, and exhibited to the king, hereafter followeth.

Lord Peter ſpeakes in the parliament.

The theame of his oration.

The oration diuided into two parts.

Obedience to the king.

Difference betweene the iuriſdiction of the ſtate temporall and eccleſiaſticall.

Articles in the parliament propounded, concerning the iuſt complaints of the laity againſt the clergy.

Cauſes reall.

1. Firſt, the cognition of cauſes reall, whether they touch poſſeſſion or their proprietie or not, by common law appertaineth to the iuriſdiction temporall. But the prelats with their officials, to the end to infringe the temporall iuriſdiction, take vpon them the determination of ſuch cauſes reall, eſpecially concerning poſſeſſion and all other interdicts.

2. Item, when a temporall man is ſued by any clerke or ſpirituall man for the poſſeſſion of his land, obtaining an adiornament of the ſecular power, in the cauſe of noutte or otherwiſe: the prelats officials ſtopping hereby the temporall iuriſdiction, at the inſtance of the clerke calleth by proceſſe before them, both the ſecular iudge and the party, inhibiting them to proceed any further in the cauſe, vnder paine of excommunication and forfaiture of a certaine ſum.

3. Item, although the ſecular iudge haue the cognition of all lay mens matters (except in ſpirituall cauſes) yet will the biſhops officials at the inſtance of any party, call ſuch before them. And if the temporall men doe except againſt their iuriſdiction, alleaging the incompetencie of the iudge, or elſe if they require the cauſe to be remitted to them (vnder whom they are) as the right iudges, yet doe the Officials refuſe this to doe, yea and by excommunication compell the parties to proceed before them.

Prelats intermeddle in temporall mens matters.

4. Item, the biſhops officials at the inſtance of the clerks, alleaging that they are iniuried in matters of inheritance by a lay man, call by proceſſe the laity. And if it be alleaged that thoſe cauſes ſtand vpon reality, being ſo indeed, and for that conſideration the cauſe to be remitted to the temporall law: this notwithſtanding, the Officials prohibit them vnder paine of excommunication, or ſome great forfet, not to proceed but before them.

5. Item, the Biſhops Officials take vpon them to heare the plea of ſuch contracts, as either be conceiued in writings or made by word of mouth in the temporall law, ſending out their monition of excommunication againſt them that ſtand bound concerning the ſame contracts.

6. Item, the biſhops and prelats decree prouinciall councels and ſynodall ſtatutes, enacting and ordering therein many things to the high and great preiudice of the temporall iuriſdiction, wherein they ought to haue no cognition at all, neither to intermeddle themſelues therewith.

7. Item, the foreſaid Officials take vpon them, before Notaries to ſweare perſons for performance of contracts and bargaines (made by them in places vnder the iuriſdiction temporall) concerning the ſale of inheritance or otherwiſe; incroching thereby vpon their iuriſdiction, when verily they haue nothing to doe with any contracts and obligations, but with ſuch as are made and agreed vpon within the compaſſe of their owne ſeat and iuriſdiction.

8. Item, the ſaid Officials of their meere office, call before them the laity, to anſwer to ſuch matters of correction as ſhall be laid to their charge, the cognition whereof, as they ſay, doth appertaine vnto them. And when the ſaid perſons doe appeare before them, and deny the crime obiected againſt them, the Officials detaine them and put them in priſon, although in ſuch caſes they are to be releaſed; and that impriſonment appertaineth only to the temporall power, and not to them.

Ex Officio.

Impriſonment pertaineth not to the clergie.

9. Item, in the caſes aforeſaid, although by making of their purgations and other the proceſſe therein, they be found cleere of that which is laid to their charge, and are acquitted; theſe yet the ſaid Officials will in no wiſe diſcharge & diſmiſſe them, before they haue to the vttermoſt paied for the writings and proceſſe in that behalfe, a good peece of mony, when by law it ought to be done gratis, and for nothing.

10. Item, it muſt not be forgotten to talk of the ſentence of excommunication, which is decreed by vertue of one only citation, ſo often times as a man faileth in his appearance.

11. Item, mention is to be made of thoſe kind of obligations Deniſi. Whereby a man is excommunicated by and by, if he make not paiment at the day preſired, although he be not able ſo to doe.

12. Item, whoſoeuer by vertue of excommunication in the biſhops court is excommunicat, and he ſo excommunicat, doe not ſatiſfie the ſumme due about the excommunication, by and by the ſum is doubled. And the ſecular power charged by the Biſhops or their Officials, that they vnder paine of excommunication compell the excommunicat by attaching their goods, to pay the ſaid ſum, and not to miſſe a iot: which monition, if the laitie refuſeth to put in execution, they themſelues are then excommunicat, and in no wiſe to be abſolued, before they diſburſe that mony, the which the principall excommunicat perſon ſhould haue paied.

13. Item, if the baliffes, headborowes, or other the kings officers & iudges of the temporaltie, receiuing the foreſaid monitions, do put the ſame in execution, and finde thoſe that be excommunicat, to be beggerly and nothing worth; the ſaid officers are bound at their owne proper coſts and charges, to reſort to the biſhops ſea or conſiſtory, whereſoeuer it is, and there to take a corporall oth, that the parties excommunicat, are nothing worth. This if they faile, thoſe officers are ſure to be excommunicat, and thereby inforced to diſburſe the due of the firſt excommunicat perſons.

14. Item, if two lay men be in ſute together before a temporall iudge, about an action either reall or perſonall, and one of them after conteſtation of law, and great proceſſe therein, do appeale vnto an eccleſiaſtical iudge, he will preſume then to detaine before him the plea of ſuch caſes and actions, both reall and perſonall, cauſing by vertue of his monitions and authoritie, the temporall iudge to ceaſe and leaue off from medling therein: which if the ſecular iudge obeieth not, he is pronounced excommunicat and compelled to make ſatiſfaction; by occaſion whereof, the temporall iuriſdiction is much annoied and cleane loſeth the prerogatiue thereof; becauſe by law no man may appeale from a ſpirituall iudge, to the temporall law.

Action reall, perſonall.

No man may appeale from a ſpirituall iudge to the temporall law by the popes diuinity.

15. Item, if a lay man, inhabiter of any of the kings townes, procureth his debter, being alſo a lay mã, to be arreſted by vertue of ſecular iuſtice in that place; and he which is ſo arreſted appealeth, and cauſeth alſo his creditor to be arreſted, the officials will take vpon them to heare this matter: and if any thing be attempted concerning the appeale, they miſſe not to demand coſt and ſatiſfaction both of the iuſtice, and alſo of him to whom the arreſt was made. And if any of the princes retinew compelleth them to reſiſt this iniurie, they are ſtraightwaies pronounced excommunicat.

16. Item, if the ſaid Biſhops haue a number of Officials vnder them, whom they terme deanes of the clergie, which vſually

Digitized by Google

Deanes of the clergie

suallie causeth all sorts of people through the kings dominions onelie by word of mouth to come afore them, and that sometime without commission: when that in euerie diocesse there ought only to bee but one seate or consistorie, wherein matters should bee heard and decided. And hereby it happeneth diuers times, that manie are wrongfully and without cause cited, and to the end, that they may pay money enough, to rid themselues thereof: which is to the no small preiudice of the kings maiesties subiects and the temporall iurisdiction.

17 Item, the said rulers of the clerkes, seale vp the houses of their clergie, which are situate in the kings townes, and other of his noble mens villages, to the preiudice of the kings maiesties iurisdiction, and other of his nobilitie: for that in such kind of places the bishops haue no such kind of iurisdiction.

Maried clerks.

18 Item, the said prelats or their officials, do presume to seale vp the moueable goods of maried clerkes, and of merchants, where in such cases, the order thereof appertaineth to the temporall law.

19 Item, they compell the laytie to put in suretie to answere clerkes before them in the spirituall court, yea and chiefelie the kings owne seruitors.

20 Item, they presume to heare and haue the cognition of actions, which are reall, or at leastwise mixt, that is, both reall and personall.

21 Item, the said prelats go about to haue cognition of such temporall mens matters as dwell in hospitals, almes houses, and the kings peculiars, and in villages of his subiects, although the plea thereof appertaineth to the king himselfe, and his subiects: forbidding vnder paine of excommunication and great forfeits, no man so hardie to commence any sute against any of them, but before themselues, in paine of a great summe of money.

22 Item, to the end the clergie and ecclesiasticall rule should be multiplied, they confer a number of Tonsures to children vnder age, some of them being sonnes of bondmen, other some bastards borne, yea and to many more maried folkes insufficient, vnable and vnlearned.

23 Item, they do cause by the gouernors of their clerkes, widow women to be inforced and defiled, and will haue the discussing thereof: as in like manner, they will determine the matters of pupils, applying their goods when they died, as they do the goods of them which die intestate, to their owne vse, the cognition whereof belongeth to the king himselfe: because those kind of persons with their goods are ward to the king and vnder his tuition.

Gimmes to get money.

24 Item, they procure through the said deanes of the clergie, of malice, temporall men of the kings dominions or other where (without all order of law) to bee apprehended: obiecting against them that they haue strayed from some article of christian faith, and therewith shut them vp: when that their imprisonment appertaineth to the king, while they be conuicted thereof.

25 Item, they exercise their iurisdiction in all places, hauing no regard, neither to the kings peculiar townes, nor yet to his subiects: but runne in euerie hole, when by law they ought to haue no iurisdiction, without their owne limits and precinct.

26 Item, when these prelats or their officials by vertue of their monitions do charge the kings officers and his iustices to execute any thing; if they do not performe that, which is prescribed vnto them, the forfeit (which the monition containeth) is taken: yea and excommunication denounced. And this is a new inuention sprung vp of late amongst them, much to the preiudice of the king and his subiects.

27 Item, when the bishops or their officials do prosecute a matter of office before themselues against any temporall man, and haue no proofe thereof; they compell many of the laytie to be deposed therein what they know, hauing no respect whether they be the kings burgesses, or no, or what they be; and yet will they not allow any charges and expenses for their paines taken in that behalfe. But if they appeare not at their day, they are sure to be excommunicat.

28 Item, if malefactours be apprehended by any of the kings iustices, and indicted of theft, and he (whose goods they were which were stolne) commeth before the kings sheriffes and proueth them to be his, and therefore the matter to be ordered by them: if afterward the bishops or their officials affirme the said felon or malefactor to be a clerke, they will by vertue of their decrees or monitions compell the kings sheriffes to restore and bring in the stolne goods: and if they do it not, they are pronounced excommunicate.

29 Item, if it happen the kings sheriffe or bayliffe to take an offender for his offence, and he affirmeth himselfe to be a clerke: although he neuer tooke any kind of tonsures or orders, wearing no habit appertaining thereunto: yet the bishops or their officials will cause the detainers of them by their censures to deliuer vnto them the said malefactour as their clerke.

30 Item, if it happen the kings sheriffe or other his iustices to take a theefe or murderer, which beareth a clerkes marke and tonsure, and therefore deliuereth him to the clergie to be ordered: it shall not be long before he be acquitted by them, although he afterward recognise his fact; yea and notwithstanding his fellowes and partners of that office being meere temporall, receiued iustice for the same, and appeached him thereof; and so the like malefactors to be incouraged thereby to commit after the like.

31 Item, if any complaineth and saith that he is spoiled, by and by the officials will decree a monition against the spoiler: by vertue whereof, some one of the deanes of the clergie shall monish him, to restore the things comprised in the monition, and also minister to him an oth whether he hath not spoiled the plaintiffe of such things, as he saith he was spoiled of. But if he refuse to take an oth before him, then the deane will straightwaies seale vp the monition, and excommunicat him, and by no meanes shall be absolued before he restore and satisfie the contents in the monition, whereof the plaintiffe said first he was spoiled of.

32 Item, if any for his offence be cast into prison by the secular power, although at the time of his taking hee weare temporall habit, and was in no orders, but all the daies of his life liued like a temporall man: yet if he shall auouch and vow himselfe to be a clerke, to the intent to haue more expedition at the clergies hands, and to escape vnpunished; the clergie will incontinent giue to the laytie in commandment to restore vnto them the malefactor, or else suspension to be denounced throughout the whole townelhip where the said malefactor shall be so imprisoned. And for auoiding the ieopardie which might arise of the said sealement; the secular iudge of necessitie is compelled to deliuer them the offender, to the great preiudice of the kings temporall iurisdiction, to whom the cognition thereof might appertaine, in case of resort and prerogatiue. Resortum.

33 Item, when any offender is deliuered by the temporall magistrates to the clergie, as their clerke; his friends will make sute to the bishops officials for him, and compound with them; by reason whereof they dismisse them vnpunished, and so do worse and worse, although their fact was neuer so notorious.

34 Item, so soone as any maried clerke being a merchant or of whatsoeuer other science he be of, for any his offence by him committed, is called before the secular iudge: the said clerke obtaineth of the officials a monition, bringing with them some prelat, who doth inhibit the secular iudge vnder paine of 100. or 200. markes, yea and of excommunication too, not to proceed further, nor to meddle in such causes, and not to molest such parties, neither in bodie nor goods: But if the iudges obey not, they shall bee suspended from hearing of masse in that place, although the matter concerneth the fact of merchandise.

35 Item, the said officials grant citations without number against the laytie in cases of warranties personally to ascite before them persons vnknowne. But if they be knowne, it is contained in the citation, that in no wise, and that vnder a great paine, he cause his aduersary to be called before a secular iudge, during the returne of the citation.

36 Item, when one is excommunicated in any place, the officials grant out personall citations against them, which do participat and are conuersant with the excommunicat: causing a whole countrey by the space of eight miles about to be cited together. And further, the friends and acquaintance of the partie so excommunicat (sometime by 40. sometime 60. yea and sometime by a 100. at once) are compelled to make their purgation before them, that they do not participat nor keepe companie with their friends the excommunicats. Whereby insueth that many honest, old and ancient men, for auoiding of troubles and expenses, do pay some twelue pence, some two shillings. By occasion whereof many vines are vnlooked to, much ground vntilled, yea and many good men constrained to lay the key vnder the doore, and run away.

37 Item, the said officials do burden many persons of good name and fame, to be blurers: whereby they are constrained to agree with them, for auoiding the infamie that thereby might insue.

38 Item, the foresaid officials call by citation afore them, the honest wedded (as well man as woman) charging them, that they haue committed adulterie to the perpetuall infamie of their husbands and wiues. And for nothing else but by extortion to wring money from them.

39 Item, mention must be made of the multitude and number of proctors, which eat and deuour vp all the world with their citations: catching vp clients, and keeping abroad in the countrie courts and assises, who for money returne not the citations, which by extortion they receiue of them which are cited.

40 Item, there bee manie other grieues and enormities, which the Chapters, Abbats, Priors, Prouosts, and other ecclesiasticall persons in the realme of France, practise against the people. As when they cause to be cited before them, many of the kings burgesses, and other in diuers places being priuiledged: that is to say, Baiocenses, Manmectans in Britaine, Ligoonis, Walticons, with other more. But specially the prouost of hospitals, vse more commonly this tricke, then any other do: whereby the people is much indamaged, and will be euery day more and more, if remedie be not had therein.

Digitized by Google

41 Item, ecclesiasticall magistrates labour to haue cognition of causes of iniurie, in whatsoeuer cause it be: whether the iniurie be committed by word or fact. Likewise, they take vpon them to heare the causes of married clerkes, and of their wiues although they both vse merchandize. And if at any time such couples be taken by the secular magistrates, the officiall causeth a suspension to be denounced in that parish, by force of the councell Siluanecten.

42 Item, they challenge to haue cognition concerning widowes goods, both moueable and vnmoueable. And if it happeneth at any time that a merchant widow, in any of the kings peculiars by way of rest, procureth any temporall man to be conuented before the secular iudge: and the matter so far trauised, that he should haue been condemned by the sentence of the secular iudge, and then come to the eare of the ecclesiasticall magistrates, how and before whom the widow did conuent him: the said temporall iudge shall be constrained, to withdraw the same. And by their monitions and censures to correct the same: and this oftentimes happeneth.

43 Item, many of the tenants and inhabiters of the bishops lands, calleth one another to the court of the officials, by a kind of appellation: by vertue whereof, the officials take vpon them to proceed in the same, and to haue cognition thereof, to the preiudice of the temporall iurisdiction of our soueraigne lord the king.

44 Item, if any man be apprehended by secular iustice in shedding of blood: by them if he be lay, he is to be ordered: if he be a clerke he is to be restored to the ecclesiasticall iudge. But whether he be a temporall man or clerke that is so taken, and appealeth to the officials court; they will be so bold to haue cognition thereof, requiring herewith amends of the secular court, which enterprised the foresaid apprehension. If this be suffered, the malefactor shall neuer be punished. For by and by they will appeale, and immediatly after the appellation flie and auoid away.

The clergie preiudiciall to common iustice.

Ex officio.

45 Item, when they cause many of office, to be cited before them, they will admit them to haue no proctors: to whom when they come at the day of appearance, they obiect the crime of vsury. And except they answere as the promoters will themselues, they are trodden vnder feet (although they be meere lay) and shall not be dismissed, before they fine euen as the officials list themselues, although they be no vsurers. But if any be vsurers, they take of them satisfaction and bribes: and so be permitted to vse their vsurie, no lesse then before. So that, they may haue their old fees and bribes.

Vsurie craftilie obiected by the clergie against lay-men.

46 Item, they procure their officers to apprehend clerkes in whatsoeuer soile they be found: albeit by iustice, they may appeale therefrom. But if by any they be let of their wil herein, they do forthwith by sentence of excommunication, cause them to desist therefore.

47 Item, as oftentimes as any temporall magistrate doth apprehend any person, which afterward being required of the clergie, is quietly deliuered vnto them: yet for all that, the officials cause those magistrates to be denounced excommunicat by law.

The prelats make the church a den of theeues.

48 Item, the prelats giue order of tonsures as well to men of thirtie yeares as vpward, as also to married men, when they come vnto them, for feare of imprisonment and punishment due vnto them for their criminall offences, before committed: And this is oftentimes put in practise.

49 Item, if it happen any of the kings seruants or any other to be excommunicat, and would faine be absolued, being glad to pay reasonablie for the same: the clergie will not receiue but such satisfaction, as shall please them, whereby many of them remaine still excommunicat.

50 Item, when two persons haue been at strife and law together for the possession of land, and the matter contentious be put into the hands of the king by some seruant or officer of the king, for the taking vp of the matter: then do the prelats admonish the one part, not to trouble the other which is in possession. Otherwise if he do, they do excommunicat him.

51 Item, the foresaid prelats, deanes, chaplaines, and other the rout of the clergie, put the kings officers to so much trauell and expences in trying out the kings vsurped iurisdiction, as they tearme it; that oftentimes many of them spend and consume in the trauell of the right and title thereof, all that they haue and more too.

52 Item, if any secular iusticer in a true and iust cause, at the request of the partie, putteth in his helping hand concerning the inheritance of clerkes: the ecclesiasticall iudges and their ministers, send out monitions in writing against the said iusticer: yea vnder paine of excommunication and forfeiture, to take away his hand and leaue off: Enioyning him further to suffer the other partie quietly to enioy the said things. Otherwise they denounce him excommunicat, and shall not be absolued before he haue well paid for it, euen as pleaseth maister official to the high preiudice of the authoritie of our soueraigne lord the king.

53 Item, the ecclesiasticall magistrates, so some as they heare any rich or fat cob to die, or thinke that he will not liue long: send out forthwith letters vnder seale to their chaplaine, commanding him in any wise not to presume to burie him, although he made his testament, and receiued the rites of the church. And when afterward, the friends and kinsfolkes of the dead resort vnto them to know the cause of their inhibition; they declare vnto them that he was an vsurer, and that he kept not the commandements of holy church: and so long keepe they the corps of the dead vnburied, while the friends of him buy it out with good store of money, heaping and hoording by these meanes abundance of riches.

Note this practise of officials to get money.

54 Item, if there be any violent shedding of blood in any churchyard, whereby the interdict taketh place: the clergie causeth a certaine imposition to be leuied of the parishioners there, for the salarie towards the reparing thereof. Although some of the parishioners be of an exempt iurisdiction: yea and although he which shed the blood be able to pay the whole taxe which they leuied and more too.

55 Item, certaine chaplaines affirme to haue certaine apostolicall priuiledges, by vertue whereof they may appoint what iudges they will (yea and oftentimes of their owne house) and so be iudges in their owne cause, which is plaine against the law. Whereby oftentimes it happeneth, that after great processe and expences had and made in any great cause of inquest (more often about realtie then otherwise) when they haue notice by the procters and aduocats that they shall haue the foile therein; they reuoke forthwith those named iudges, and so the kings subiects are damaged, and can haue no iustice nor redresse at their hands.

56 Item, if any temporall man call a clerke before a secular iudge in a case of inheritance: the ecclesiasticall iudge procureth a stop to be made therein, attributing to themselues the cognition thereof: and so by adiourning and remouing, the lay man is constrained to make satisfaction.

57 Item, the clergie challengeth the cognition of such causes as married clerkes being merchants and artificers do commence: when by law it doth appertaine to the temporaltie, especially about the trade of merchandise.

58 Item, they oftentimes make interdictions in many of the kings townes and holds, and cause the diuine seruice to cease: against the priuiledges granted by many of the high bishops of Rome to our soueraigne lord and maister the king.

59 Item, to and for the maintenance and keeping of their temporalities, they appoint bailiffes and other officers: who if they do offend, may not condignely be punished according to law and iustice.

60 Item, the ecclesiasticall iudges haue promoters belonging vnto them: who when any man is excommunicated (be it right, or be it wrong) they cause to be made, that no man shall worke or do any thing for him that is excommunicate: whereby the lands and vines are oftentimes vnlooked to and vntilled, to the no small preiudice of the king and his common people.

61 Item, the foresaid promoters cause citations to be made out, by vertue whereof they call in one citation, twentie, thirtie, fortie persons to appeare, for participating with such interdicted persons: taking of some ten, of othersome twentie shillings, as much as they be able to make: whereby the common people are much oppressed.

62 Item, the ecclesiasticall iudges cause all the aduocats of their courts to be sworne, that none shall retaine them of their counsell against any of them, without their licence: whereby oftentimes the poore man quitteloeth his right, and the kings cause is delayed: because his solicitours cannot freely retaine counsell, without speciall licence.

63 Item, they will make inuentories of their goods which die intestate, or without making of Will: and will haue the possession of their goods, as well moueable as vnmoueable in their owne hands to distribute to the heires, or to whom they list.

64 Item, the execution also of testaments they take to their owne hands, taking inuentories of dead mens goods, and keeping and disposing them to the heires after their pleasure. And haue officials properly deputed for the execution thereof.

65 Item, they will not giue credit (sometimes) to testaments made before witnesse, vnlesse they be first by their owne officials approued.

After he had thus spoken, the prelats required to haue time to answere thereunto. Whereupon was appointed for the same the Friday next insuing. On the which day, the bishop Eduen, and archbishop of Senon elect in the name of the whole clergie, answered for them all before the king, holding his parliament as that day at Vicenas, and thus he there propounded: For so much as the lord Peter Cugner of late propounding against the church of France, toke to his theme that is written in the 22. of Matthew: Render vnto Cesar, that which is Cesars, and vnto God that which is Gods: by which words he said, two points were to be noted: First the reuerence and subiection of the prelats, that they ought to haue to the king their soueraigne: Secondly the diuision of the temporall iurisdiction from the spirituall. The which first part he proued out of the first epistle of Peter in the second chapter, where Bishop Eduen and archbishop of Senon elect procurators for the prelats.

Repetition of the lord Peters oration aboue touched, pag. 324.

where it is written: Submit your selues vnto euerie creature, for the Lords sake, whether it be vnto the king, as vnto the superiour, or vnto gouernours, as vnto them that are sent of him: for the punishment of euill doers, and for the praise of them that do well. The second point he proued by the words of our Sauiour Christ in the two and twentith chapter of Luke, where the Apostle saith: Lord behold, here are two swords. And he said vnto them, it is enough, signifying by the two swords the two iurisdictions. And in likewise out of the seuentéenth of Matthew, where Christ would pay tribute for him and Peter. Giuing hereby an example, how that ecclesiasticall persons were bound to pay and yeeld to the temporall power the temporalities; which also is proued in the 11. quæst. prim. cap. Si tributum, & cap. magnum.

Luke 22.

Matth. 17.

Two gifts giuen, priesthood, empire.

And further, because this is proued by mans law, where it is said, two great gifts are bestowed, priesthood and empire: the priesthood to rule ouer matters diuine, the empire to beare domination ouer humane matters. Wherby he cõcluded, that when these iurisdictions are distincted of God; the one being giuen and limited to the church, and the other to the temporalitie: that in no wise the church ought to intermeddle, or to haue any thing to do with the temporall iurisdiction. For it is written in the two and twentith of the Prouerbs, You ought not to passe the old limits and bounds, which the forefathers haue set. And well by the way hée bringeth in this word, old and ancient: Because customes brought in to the contrarie, bée of no force, but rather are counted abuses and corruptions. Neither can prescription take place, for that ius fisci is imprescriptiple, neither can the king abrogat from himselfe such law, nor renounce his right, prouing the same by many chapters contained in the 10. Distinct. Wherefore séeing the king at what time he was crowned, sware not only not to alienate or infringe the lawes of his realme, but also to call in such lawes as were alienated and vsurped either by the church, or by any other: the king was bound by his oth to reuoke the same abuses.

Prou. 22.

Dist. 10.

In especiall hée did exhibit many articles in writing, wherein (as hée said) the church did vsurpe vpon the iurisdiction temporall. To answere these premisses with conciling of the places (vnder protestation what soeuer I say or shall say) it is not to ground or make any finall iudgement or determination herein: but only to informe the conscience of our soueraigne lord the king and his assistants héere assembled, alleaging the first epistle of Peter the second chapter, where hée saith: Feare God and honor the king. By which words, the holy Apostle Saint Peter teacheth vs two things. First, that loue, feare, and obedience, is due vnto God for the mightinesse and puissance of his Maiestie; saying, Feare God. Secondly, how speciall honor and reuerence is due to the king, for the excellencie of his dignitie; saying, Honor the king. But note you by the way, how the Apostle placeth his words: First hée saith, that feare is due vnto God, because principally and in chiefe we ought to feare God: For if the king or any other should command things cõtrarie to God, we ought to haue no regard therof, but to contemne the king and feare God. For it is written in the fifth of the Acts of the Apostles; We ought rather to obey God then men: and also in the seuenth chapter of Machabées the second booke, where it is said, I will not obey the commandements of the king, but the law.

1. Pet. 2.

Acts 5.

2. Mach. 7.

The reason wherof S. Augustine giueth both in the Glosse vpon the Romans, and also in the 11. quæst. 1. Hée that resisteth the superiour power, resisteth the will and ordinance of God. But put case thou art commanded to do that which thou maist not do, or not to do that which thou oughtest to do. Doubtlesse, thou must neglect the lesser power, and feare the higher, learning the degrées of worldly things.

11. Quæst. 1.

As for example, be it so that a proctor commandeth thée any thing, which (if the same be against the Proconsull) thou oughtest not to follow it. Yea and further, put case the proconsull commandeth one thing, the emperour another, and God willeth the third: Thou must not care for them, but obey God, for God is the greater power: For they may threaten thée with prison, but God may threaten thée with hell fire: they may slay and kill thy bodie, but God may send thée bodie and soule to perpetuall hell fire. And therefore worthily it is put first, feare God. And héere the place in the last of Ecclesiasticus is to be adioyned, where it is written: Feare God and kéepe his commandements.

Feare of God standeth in three points.

And me thinketh that man is bound to feare God chiefelie in three sorts. That is to say: First in the bountifull bestowing of his gifts and benefits. Secondly, in the euident promoting of his seruants: and lastly, in the full rendring and restoring vnto man that is his.

First, I say in the bountifull, &c. and for this cause the emperour Iustinian writeth: Although there is nothing to bée accounted good, which doth exceed and is too great, yet for a prince to bestow accordingly vpon the church, it is verie good. For why, the king and emperour is bound to bestow so much the more substance, how much the more God hath giuen to him, and to bestow the same both frankelie, and especially to famous churches, wherein the best and greatest measure is of the lords gifts, that is, a great gift. And to this end Gregorie enacteth a law, cap. 1. de extra. de donationibus, that no bishop ought in manner to prescribe this law to himselfe, to thinke himselfe bound to giue, when he giueth freely: and vnlesse he increase in giuing still, to thinke that he hath giuen nothing.

Wherefore Abel, as appeareth in the 4. chapter of Genesis, who offered of the best to the Lord, was blessed of God. And therefore other kings, the more they offered to God, the more they were both spiritually and temporally blessed of him: As we reade of Iosua, Dauid, Salomon, and others in the booke of the kings: and therefore it is so written in the 18. of Numbers: And ye shall separate vnto the Lords treasurie, things that be chiefest and most principall. As likewise Dauid saith in the first of Paralipomenon last chapter: I haue giuen all this with a glad heart, euen with a good will, and now haue I had ioy to sée thy people which héere are present, offer with a free will vnto thée. And no maruell, for Dauid saith in that place: For of thy hand we haue receiued all, and to thée we giue. And therefore it séemeth to me, that because the kings of France and barons of the same, more then any other haue giuen to God and his church: therefore they were happie and blessed aboue all other kings, and the more they did giue to God, the more they receiued at his hands.

Numb. 18.

1. Paral. cap. vlt.

What benefit commeth by giuing to the church.

Examples whereof we haue of Clodoue, Charles, and S. Lewes: the more one giueth to God, the more he receiueth of him: For he in the first of Luke hath promised, Giue and it shall be giuen vnto you. Wherefore, a gift that a prince bestoweth vpon the church is rendred againe with triple encrease, and that no lesse in time of warre then in time of peace. I say in warre time, because victorie proceedeth of no other but only of God, for it is written in the 1. Machabées the third chapter: The victorie of the battell standeth not in the multitude of the host, but the strength commeth from heauen. And likewise, in the seuentéenth chapter of Exodus it is declared, that when Moses held vp his hands, Israel had the victorie: but when hée let downe his hands, Amaleck had the victorie. To this end also serueth the last chapter of Machabées 2. Where Iudas being at the point to haue the victorie, thought he saw Onion and Jeremie (which had bén high priests and verie vertuous men) holding vp their hands toward heauen, and praying for their people and all the whole citie, &c. Likewise in peace time now, the long daies of the king and of his sonnes, their peace, prosperitie, and obedience (by the prayer of the church) is maintained and supported in the realme. For as long as Salomon was bent and giuen in building the house of God, so long he had peace: who thus in the sixteenth chapter of the Prouerbs teacheth vs: When a mans waies please the Lord, he maketh his verie enemies to be his friends: And also in 1. Esdras the first chapter, where it is read, how the priests were commanded to offer sweet sauours to the God of heauen, and pray for the kings life and his children. And well therefore may it be called a gift both sauourable and irrewocable, whereby victorie is giuen, life granted, and peace with securitie conserued. To serue therefore God, and liberally to giue toward the worshipping of him, is the chiefest signe and token of diuine feare and loue. Ecclesiast. chap. 2. Ye that feare the Lord, beléeue him, and your reward shall not be emptie.

Time of warre.

2. Mach. 3.

Exod. 17.

Time of peace.

Prou. 16.

Esdras 6.

Ecclesi.

Secondly, concerning the feare of God, I do you to vnderstand, that among the precepts of the Lord, the first and chiefest commandement of the second table is, To honor thy father. Which precept is verie well expounded to the Hebrewes in the twelfth chapter. Where it is not only meant of the fathers of our bodies, but also of the father of spirits. For as spirituall things farre excéede temporall matters: so much more a great deale the spirituall seruice is bound to reuerence the spirituall father, and to be in subiection vnto him, that hée may liue. And that the priests and prelats be the spirituall fathers, it is proued in the fourth book of the kings, the sixth chap. Where the king of Israel called Elizeus father, saying: My father shall I smite them? Vnto this effect serueth the tenth of Luke, where our Sauiour said to the Apostles (whose successours the bishops are) He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me. Also in the first to the Thessal. the fourth chapter, Hée that despiseth you, despiseth not men but God. Wherfore Iustinian the emperour in another place saith: We haue great care to the church of God, that therein may be true doctrine and integritie of priests life. Which hauing, we trust that for our great gifts we shall receiue such rewards at Gods hands, both as be durable, and shall remaine: yea and also that hitherto haue not happned. Blessed Saint Hierome in his register writing to a certaine emperour, which is also to be séene in the decrées, Decret. 11. quæst. 1. saith: Let not the emperour disdaine priests, but haue speciall regard on them for his sake whose seruants they be: and so let him rule ouer them, that due and condigne reuerence be giuen vnto them. For they in diuine Scriptures are sometime tearmed Gods, sometimes named Angels, Exodus 22. Then shall both their causes come before the gods. Also Malachie the second, the priests lips should bée sure of knowledge, that men may séeke the law at his mouth: For hée is a messenger of the Lord of hosts. And therefore is it no maruell, if we should vouchsafe to honour them, when God himselfe in his speech attributing to them honour, tearmeth them Gods and Angels. And héere is to bée noted,

The second part of feating God.

Hebr. 12.

Honoring of spirituall fathers.

4. Kings 6.

Luke 10.

1. Thess. 4.

11. Quæst. cap. 1. Sacerdotibus.

Exod. 22.

Malach. 2.

Honor to be giuen to priests.

how Constantine the emperour, when certaine of his subiects presented vnto him libels accusatorie against the bishops, receiued them at their hands. But calling before him those bishops which were accused therein, cast in their sight those libels into the fire, saying: depart you hence and discusse these matters within your selues: For it is not conuenient and méete that we iudge Gods, because it is written: God stood in the synagogue of Gods, and in the middest of them hée did iudge Gods. In which chapter it is declared, how that the Pagans who worshipped golden and woodden gods, attributed great honor to the priests: What maruell is it then, if the godly and great and christian emperours doe honor and reuerence the priests of the true God? And doubtlesse, it is their dutie so to do. And it is reason which the lord Peter the last day said, in this point: That there are two powers, priesthod and dominion, the one spirituall, the other temporall: which no lesse differeth one from the other, then the Sunne from the Moone, the heauen from the earth, and gold from lead. And therefore if honor is due to be giuen to the lesser power, by them that bée vnderneath him: he that is chiefe of the higher power, of right god dutie is to be honored, and reuerenced of all vnder him, as expressely is declared, Cap. Solit. Dema. & ob. In which chapter answere is fully made to the allegation of the lord Peter (alleaged by him to make for his purpose) that is to say: Be yée subiect to all creatures for Gods sake, &c. There hée speaketh of the subiection which standeth vpon the merit of vertue, and not vpon the dutie of necessitie. For else if hée should speake of the subiection which is by dutie of necessitie: then must it néeds follow, that euery bishop ought to be subiect to euerie beggerly rascall in the citie of Paris. For the text is, Be yée subiect to all humane creatures: but a rascall is a humane creature: Ergo, bishops must be subiect to a rascall. Of the dignitie of a bishop Ambrose talketh in his pastorall. The honor, saith he, and the maiestie of a bishop is without all comparison. If you compare it to the royaltie of a king, it is euen as you would compare mettall or lead to the beautie of gold. For that is to be séene,, that kings and princes stooping vnder the knées of priests, and kissing their right hand; thinke themselues to be defended by their prayer. And because the kings of France haue more then other, honored and reuerenced the prelats, they haue aboue all other flourished and prospered. It is said in Eccles. 4. He that honoreth his father, shall reioyce in his sonnes. And it followeth there, Hée that honoreth his father, shall liue a long life. This is therefore the signe of the feare of God. And as it is written in Eccles. 4. He that feareth God honoreth his parents.

Thirdly I say, that a man ought to feare God, in the full reuerencing and reshoring vnto man that is his: For he that doth not giue to another that is his, but goeth about to vsurpe, doubtlesse he feareth not God. Contrarie, he that reshoreth all againe, he is said to loue and feare God. Ecclesiast. 18. He that feareth God will do good things. And in the Psalme, I haue béen afraid of thy iudgements, and haue done iudgement and iustice. For as the lawyers say, which is true: A thing may be made mine diuers waies, as by succession, commutation, prescription, or any other acquisition, either by law or custome: And so of the rest. And whereas the Lord Peter the last day, by distinction of iurisdiction temporall and spirituall, endeuoured to proue that hée which had spirituall iurisdiction, ought not to haue temporall; otherwise there were no distinction thereof, but rather a confusion of iurisdictions: I will therefore proue the contrarie, that these iurisdictions are compatible both in one person, especially in an ecclesiasticall man. And this will I proue by the law of God, by the law of nature, canon law, ciuill law, by custome and priuiledge. But first I alleage, that accidentall formes some of them are so distincted, that they are not cleane contrarie, but dislike, as whitenesse and sweetnesse. Other formes there be which are so distincted, that they are cleane contrarie one to the other, and are not compatible in one subiect. For one contrarie expels another, and importeth the negatiue of the other. Wherefore those things be contrarie, which one from another are most of all distant and disagreeing, and in one susceptible may come one after the other, but not together, as the philosopher teacheth in the Predicaments. But those formes which are so distincted, that they be not contrarie but dislike; are compatible in one subiect, as quantitie and qualitie, which being distincted in respect of their Genus generalissimum, yet may be in one person. And fortitude and temperance being vnder one kind of morall vertue, are found to be in one man, as Logicke and Grammar, which are also species and kinds in one genus, viz. of intellectus. Therefore it is no good argument: These formes be distincted, Ergo, they be not compatible in one subiect. And therefore that the iurisdictions temporall and spirituall are so distincted, that they are not contrarie but compatible, it is euident hereby, because things contrarie be so that the one cannot be ordained to concurre with the other, but rather confoundeth and destroyeth the other: but in this case iurisdiction temporall is ordained for the spirituall, and contrarie, the spirituall for the temporall. Or rather, the one so dependeth of the other, as the clearenesse of the Moone doth of the brightnesse of the Sunne. Also the one iurisdiction so helpeth and comforteth the other, that there is no contrarietie in them. And therefore it is no good consequence, because they are distincted: Ergo, they are not compatible in one person. This also is to be proued de facto. For the earth is the Lords, and the plentie of the whole vniuersall world, and all that dwell therein. It is proued in likewise by this reason. For if the iurisdictions were not compatible; it should follow, that no ecclesiasticall person should haue any iot of temporall iurisdiction: neither land, tower, castle, lordship, or any other thing else, which is most absurd: and so by this meanes it should follow, that no ecclesiasticall person should bée in subiection vnto the king, which were to the great derogation of the kings maiesties crowne and dignitie. It must néeds bée therefore that these iurisdictions bée compatible, notwithstanding the distinction of them one from another. And thus for answere to all these reasons, by the which lord Peter proued the distinction of these iurisdictions.

These things premised, thus I proceed further to proue that a person ecclesiasticall, which hath iurisdiction spirituall, may also haue temporall iurisdiction: and that the iurisdiction temporall may bée in an ecclesiasticall person, I will proue it by the Scriptures: and first out of the old testament: to the euident probation whereof, it is to bée vnderstood: That God, after the creation of the world and man, euen vnto Noes time, would gouerne the world himselfe as king by the ministerie of Angels. By reason whereof hé gaue and pronounced sentence himselfe against Cain, Genesis the fourth. Noe also which offered burnt offerings vnto the Lord, and built an altar, as teacheth the eight of Genesis: (which thing appertained onlie vnto the priests) had the gouernment and rule of all things, as well spirituall as temporall, which were in the Arke of Noe. Melchisedech in likewise, the which was the priest of the most high God, and also king of Salem, as appeareth in the fourteenth of Genesis, and had both the iurisdictions in his owne hands. For Magister Historiarum, in the said fourteenth of Genesis declareth, that all the first begot of Noe, euen to Aarons time were priests: which at meales and offerings blessed the people, and which only had the Ius primogenituræ, whereby the regiment of others was due vnto them. Moses in like manner (of whom it is said in the Psalme, Moses & Aaron in sacerdotibus eius) consecrated Aaron and his children to bée priests, which Aaron did iudge the whole people in temporall matters, yea and that in causes of inheritance and meere reall, as appeareth in the seuen and twentith chapter of Numbers, and many other places. To which purpose serueth the seuenteenth chapter of Deuteronomie: where it is said; If a matter be too hard for thée in iudgement betwixt blod and blod, betwixt plea and plea, betwixt plague and plague; then shalt thou rise and go vp to that place, that the Lord thy God hath chosen: and shalt come to the Priests, the Leuites, and to the Iudge then being, and shalt aske, who shall shew vnto vs the truth of the iudgement; and follow their sentence. And if any man presumptuously shall refuse to obey the priests commandements and decrée of the iudge, the same shall die. Behold how manifestly it doth appeare, how not only the iudgement appertaineth to a priest, betwéene plague and plague, concerning the circumstances and irregularitie of the law: but also betwixt blod and blod, in matters criminall: yea and betwixt plea and plea in ciuill matters: Which thing doth appeare to be in many iudges out of the booke of Judges. For Samuel, which was both a prophet and priest, was appointed iudge of long time ouer the people in matters temporall: And when the people desired a king, the Lord was highly offended with them, and said vnto Samuel: They haue not refused thée but mée, that I should not be king ouer them. Furthermore, as long as kings among the people of God, vsed the aduice and counsell of priests and bishops; it was well with them and their kingdome: But when they forsoke and left the counsell of bishops and priests, then was their kingdome diuided, and finally they brought into captiuitie. In which captiuitie, the people were altogether gouerned and ruled by the priests and prophets, as by Esdras and Nehemias: And last of all by the meanes of the Machabées, the kingdome and gouernment was deuoluted and brought vnto the priests hands, who were the kings and captaines ouer the people: and had the gouernment as well of spirituall matters as of temporall, as is read in the first booke of Machabées the second chapter: Of Mathatia and his sonnes, videlicet, of Juda, Machaby, Jonatha, Simon, and John the son of Simon: which in all spirituall and temporall matters, were gouernours ouer the people of God. Moreouer, the first chapter of Jeremie declareth, which was one of the priests, after this manner: I haue set thée ouer the people and kingdomes, that thou maist root out, breake, destroy, and make waste, and that thou maiest build vp and plant, Ierem. capite primo. Besides this, in time of Judge Eliach, a priest in like maner had the iudgement of temporall matters. And so much concerning the proofe hereof, out of the old Testament.

Secondlie, I proue my former proposition by authorities taken out of the new Testament. For Christ had not only by diuine nature both the powers, whereby hée created all things of nothing, and by consequence was God of all, but

Two powers, temporall and spirituall, and what difference betweene them both.

De mai. & obed. cap. Solit.

Double subiection vpon merit of vertue, and vpon dutie of necessitie.

The authoritie of a bishop and a king compared.

The pride of the prelacie.

Stoop kings. Eccles. 4.

Eccles. 4.

The third part of fearing God.

Eccles. 18.

A thing made mine diuers waies.

Sixe proofes.
1. Diuine law.
2. By the law of nature.
3. By canon law.
4. By ciuill law.
5. By custome.
6. By priuiledge.

Formes being dislike and not contrarie, may be compatible in one subiect.

Exodes out of the old Testament.

Melchisedech was both king and priest, Ergo, the pope may haue both iurisdictions. Genes. 14.

Deut. 17.

Samuel was iudge in temporall matters, Ergo, the pope may haue both iurisdictions.

1. Mach. 2.

Ierem. 1.

Proofes taken out of the new Testament.

Digitized by Google

but also by his humanitie had both powers. For hée was the priest, secundum ordinem Melchisedech (as it is said in the Psalmes, and also is alleaged to the Hebrewes) which had both in his vesture and thigh written: King of kings and Lord of lords. By this vesture or thigh was meant his humanitie, which was ioyned to his Diuinitie, as the garment is to him that weareth it. He said of himselfe in the last of Matthew: Giuen is vnto me all power both in heauen and in earth. As also to the Hebrewes the first chapter, Whom hée made and constituted heire of all vniuersal things. And likewise in the second chapter to the Hebrewes: Hée hath made him not much inferiour to the Angels: hée hath crowned him with glorie and honor, and hath set him aboue the workes of his hands: Thou hast put all things in subiection vnder his feet, sheepe and oxen, and all the whole cattell of the field. When therefore it is said, hée made all things subiect to him; hée excludeth nothing as the Apostle there saith. Whereby it is apparant, that as concerning his humane nature, in the which he was made lesse then the Angels, all things were subiect to him. Also this appeareth in the second chapter to the Philippians: He humbled himselfe, wherefore God exalted him, &c. And it followeth, that in the name of Iesus should euerie knée bow, both of things in heauen and of things in earth, and of things vnder the earth. Behold héere, that by nature by which hée did humble himselfe, hée was exalted because euerie knée should bow downe to him. This in like manner hath Saint Peter in the tenth chapter of the Acts, where hée saith, hée was constituted of God the iudge ouer the quicke and the dead: And hée speaketh of the nature which God raised vp the third day, as the whole Scripture proueth. And likewise Saint Peter had this power giuen him, whom Christ constituted and made his vicar, who also condemned by sentence iudicially Ananias and Saphira for lying and stealing: Acts chapter 5. Paul also condemned a fornicatour conuicted, 1. Corinthians 5. And that Christ would the correction and iudgement of such matters to appertaine to his Church, a text in the eightéenth of Matthew expressely declareth, where it is said: If thy brother trespasse against thée, go and tell him his fault betweene him and thée: if hée heare thée, thou hast wonne thy brother: But if hée heareth not, then take with thée one or two, that in the mouth of two or thrée witnesses all things may be established: if he heare not then, tell it vnto the congregation: if hée heare not the congregation, take him as an heathen man and a Publican. Verily I say vnto you; whatsoeuer you bind on earth, the same shall be bound in heauen, and whatsoeuer you lose on earth, the same shall be losed in heauen. Behold how expressely it is commanded, that whensoeuer in any matter one offendeth the other, he being first charitablie admonished, the matter must bée published and referred to the order of the church and congregation. But if the offender do not obey and heare the admonition, hée is to bée taken as an heathen and a Publican: which is as much to say, like one that is excommunicat by the church and congregation, so that hée may haue no cõmunion or participation with it. And that this was the intention of Christ, this séemeth much to proue it, where in giuing the reason hereof, hée immediatly addeth: Verily I say vnto you, What soeuer, &c. (where note this terme distributiue, whatsoeuer) so as the apostle argueth to the Hebrewes the second chapter, that if hée ordained all things to be subiect vnto him, hée excludeth nothing vnsubiected. Wherefore thus I may argue; If all things that the church and congregation doth lose, be losed, and euery thing that the church bindeth is bound: There is nothing that the church may not lose and bind. Or by logicke thus I may reason: There is nothing bound by the church, that is not bound in heauen: which argument is good by a certaine rule of logicke which saith: that contraries if the negation be put after, are equiualent. For euery thing and nothing, whatsoeuer thing, and no manner of thing, bée contrarie one to the other. And so nothing not, is as much to say, as all things. Secondly, I do proue it out of another text of Saint Luke, chapter 22. Which place alleaged to make for his purpose, I will strike him with his owne weapon. For where he said, that by the two swords the two powers temporall and spirituall were to be vnderstood, it was so indéed: but to whose hands would he (I pray you) haue these two swords committed? Truly to the hands of Peter and other the Apostles, &c. But the holy father the pope succéeded Peter, and the other Apostles, the bishops disciples, curats, parsons, as in the Glosse appeareth, Luke 10. whereby thus I argue: That by the two swords, the two powers are meant: But Christ willed those two swords to bée put into the churches hands: Ergo, hée would likewise the two powers. But you may replie and say, that Christ did reprehend Peter because hée strooke with a temporall sword and cut off an eare, saying vnto him, put vp thy sword, &c. Which reason is of no force. For Christ did not will Peter to cast away quite from him the sword, but to put it into the scabard and to keepe it, giuing to vnderstand thereby, that such power, although it be in the churches hands: yet the execution thereof (as much as appertaineth to bloodshedding in the new law) hée would haue to appertaine to the secular iudge: notwithstanding yet perhaps, according to the discretion and will of the clergie.

Thirdly, I proue this by the intent of Saint Paul in the Apoc. 19. Christ by his humane nature had both powers.

A.

Psalme 8. Hebr. 2.

Philip. 2.

Act. 10.

B.

Act. 5.

C.

Matth. 18.

D.

E.

Omnia terminus distributiuus.

F.

Luke 22.

G.

H.

1. Corinth. 6. where he saith: that they which haue secular businesse, and contend one against another, ought to be iudged by the Saints. And that they should iudge therein, therefore hée made this argument: Know you not that the Saints shall iudge the world? And if the world be iudged by you, are ye not good enough to iudge small trifles? As though he would say, do yée not know how that yée shall iudge the Angels? How much more then may you iudge things secular? And it followeth: If you haue iudgement of secular and worldly matters, take them which are despised in the church and congregations, and make them iudges. Neither doth it make any thing against, because the Apostle in the same place inferreth: Ad verecundiam vestram dico: I say it to your shame. For that is to be referred to those, where hée saith, Appoint those which are despised. Wherefore the Apostle speaketh ironiously in this matter, as meaning thus: Sooner and the rather you ought to run to the iudgement of the despised which be in the church, then to the iudgement of those which be out of the church.

1. Cor. 6. I.

Ergo, the rather to resort to the iudgement of the wise, who remaine in the church and congregation. Wherefore the Apostle by and by added when he said, I speake to your shame: What not one wise man amongst you that can iudge betweene brother and brother? Meaning thereby that there was some. By these therefore and many other like reasons it appeareth (which for breuitie I omit) that both the powers may be in an ecclesiasticall mans hand: and that an ecclesiasticall man is Capax both of the temporall and spirituall iurisdiction. Nor is it anie matter if it be obiected, that Peter and other Apostles and Christ himselfe, vsed little this temporall power. For in them was not the like reason as now is in vs, as is proued in the 22. quest. 1. cap. and in many other places of the law. The Apostles at the first beginning toke no receit of lands and possessions, but the price only thereof; which now the church with verie good reason doth receiue: and that to the great merit both of the giuer and offerer, as it appeareth of Constantine and others: In the which foresaid 1. cap. the reason of diuersitie is well proued. For that the Apostles did foresee, that the church should be among Gentiles, and not only to be in Iudea, &c. And further, at the beginning Christ and his Apostles were wholie bent and giuen, to our health, salvation and erudition: little sticking or standing vpon the exercise of euerie churches iurisdiction, hauing regard to that which is written in the first chapter to the Corinthians: All things are lawfull vnto men, but all things are not expedient. And likewise in the eight chapter of Ecclesiastes it is read, that euerie thing hath his time. But now (through the grace of God) the whole people of the realme of France haue submitted themselues to the Christian faith; worthilie therefore the church is occupied about ministring of iustice and punishing of vice: for peace shall be the worke of iustice, Esay the 33. chapter. And in these iudgements this only is to be considered, that the life of man bée reformed, &c. Thus you see, how this our conclusion somewhat is confirmed by the Scriptures. Now will I proue it by naturall law and reason, and first after this manner: Hée séemeth most fit to play a good iudges part, which followeth néerest God: for properly God is the ruler and director of all iudgements, who saith, Prouerb. capite octauo, By me the law-maker shall decrée iustice and iust things: but ecclesiasticall persons, follow nert to God, and bée neerest him: For that they bée elected of God into a peculiar people, whereof it is said, 1. Peter 2. You are a chosen generation, a royall priesthood, a holy nation, and a peculiar people, that you should shew the vertues of him that called you, &c. Ergo, it is most fit that persons ecclesiasticall, and churchmen, should iudge of such matters. Moreouer, none doubteth, but that the correction and punishment of sinne, belongeth to ecclesiasticall persons; wherefore, when such things be not committed without sinne and offence of the one partie, it is euident that the church may haue cognition thereof. Also, whoso hath power to iudge of the end, hath also power to iudge of things ordained to the end; for the consideration of the things ordained to the end resteth of the end. When therefore the bodie is ordained for the life and soule, and temporall things for spirituall, as to the end: the church which doth iudge of spirituall things, may in like manner lawfullie iudge of temporall things. All which is sufficiently confirmed In extra. c. Iudicijs. Where it is said, that the Accessarie followeth the nature of the principall, which appeareth sufficiently by example. For so much therefore as these two iurisdictions bée compared to two lights, that is to say, to the Sunne and to the Moone, and all the whole clearenesse and brightnesse of the Moone both in forme and vertue, dependeth of the Sunne, and in the Sunne: And that the brightnesse of the Sunne is not of the Moone, or in the Moone, it is plaine, that spirituall iurisdiction which is compared to the Sunne, hath in it both in forme and vertue, the iurisdiction temporall: and not contrarie. Manie other like reasons might bée brought in. But for that the time wareth short, I will omit them.

K. 22. quæst. 1. cap. Futurum.

Esay 33.

M. Probation, by ciuill law and reason.

Thirdly, I proue by the ciuill law, Auth. Desse. Iud. § Si tamen ix. col. where it is said, If a secular iudge be suspected, let the bishop of the citie be ioyned vnto him. But if hée bée negligent, then let the whole iudgement bée referred to the bishop. In like sort Theodosius the emperour enacted such a law, that whatsoeuer suter being plaintiffe in any kind of matter, whether at the beginning thereof, or after contestation of law, or when the matter came to confirmation, or to sentence: if the plaintiffe had once chosen the court and iurisdiction of the holy sée; there without all doubt, though the defendant resisted and dissented, the matter before the bishops and other ecclesiasticall iudges should bée determined and ended. Which law afterward Carolus the great, who was king of France, confirmed in these words: Wee will and command that all our subiects, as well Romans and Frenchmen, as others vnder our dominion whatsoeuer, bee by law and custome henceforth bound and charged to keepe this for a perpetuall and prescript law: That whosoeuer began or commenced a sute, &c. as is aboue mentioned, &c. 11. quæst. 1. Quicunque, &c. 2. But you may obiect and say, that this law is abrogated, as the Glosse séemeth there to touch. But all will not serue: For although this law is not redacted into the bodie of the law, yet for all that it is not abrogated. But surely it is a priuiledge honorablie granted to the whole vniuersall church, which the emperour cannot take away no more then any other libertie of the church. By the canon law also this priuiledge is confirmed, extra. de iud. c. timor Nouil. and moreouer séemeth to be confirmed by the ciuill law, C. de sacrof. Si ecclc. priuilegium: although it be not expressely, but generallie named. And so it is cleare by the ciuill law, that such iurisdiction doth pertaine to ecclesiasticall persons. By canon law in like manner in places infinite: Distinct. 22. cap. Omnes Patriarchæ. 2. quæst. 5. cap. Si quis presbyter. 11. quæst. 1. cap. relatum. 25. distinct. cap. ecce. Extra de iudicijs. Nouit. De compententi foro. cap. licet. With many other places infinit; yea and further the canon law so farre proceedeth, that whosoeuer goeth about by custome to interrupt or hinder any hauing such iurisdiction, incurreth sentence (ipso facto) of excommunication, as is proued cap. quoniam intelleximus de immunitate eccle. lib. sext. Which is most plaine by the notorious custome, time out of mind, in the daies of the good and christian princes, where to violate such custome, it is plaine sacriledge: 11. quæst. 1. tit. 1. &c. 2. For by law, custome winneth and gaineth iurisdiction, especially to him that is Capax thereof: yea and further, custome (time out of mind) is amongst all persons in place of written and confirmed law. Now seeing the church of France, hath in common vsed with the temporaltie to iudge and decrée both of actions personall and reall touching the church: it is plaine, that such custome winneth iurisdiction to it. Ergo, &c. But the lord Peter auouched, that the custome could not preuaile in this case, because héere lacked true dealing. Besides, the said law is called imprescriptible; for that it is Ius fisci. But this maketh nothing against vs. For the church of France rather challengeth this law by custome, then by prescription. Which custome séemeth rather to be brought in of the frée will and election of the people, frequenting more the ecclesiasticall Consistories, then the secular courts. Besides this, custome in that it hath been oftentimes decided in iudgement contradictorie, (manie of the barons dissenting, and not consenting thereunto) is much thereby confirmed. This custome I say of the church, hath béen fast established by the consent and assent of the prelats, and then confirmed by the kings of France your predecessours, and so peaceablie obserued of the church.

Probation by the canon law. N

Custome.

Iudicium contradictorium.

And yet may the church challenge this by prescription; For that there are but three things which are required in prescription: that is to say, title, true dealing, and continuance of time. And it is without doubt that the churches both purely haue, and in time past had a good title, as appeareth by the priuiledge granted of Theodosius the emperour, and confirmed by Charles; who gaue in commandement, to kéepe the same inuiolablie; which title it hath both by diuine, naturall, and humane law, as before is mentioned. Wherefore it must néeds haue true dealing, when so many great and cleare titles are knowne to condescend therunto. Also there concurreth such continuance of time, that euen against Ius fisci, it is prescriptible. For it hath not only continued by the space of 100. yeares, but also more then six hundred yeares last past. Neither is this alwaies true, that this law is imprescriptible, especially of the church; the which in as much as it appertaineth to the spiritualtie, is not subiect to the king, but is much more noble, and far excelleth: Euen no lesse then the Sunne doth the Mone, gold, lead, and heauen, the earth. And this is certaine, and no lesse reason, that the higher and equall may duely prescribe law against him, that is either equall or lower in degrée. As one king may do to another. Wherefore it appeareth, that the church may prescribe this, although it were Ius fisci, as indéed it is not.

Three things pertaining to Prescription: 1. Titulus. 2. Bona fides. 3. Temporum continuatio.

Ius fisci.

The church not subiect to the king.

Finally, this is proued by priuiledge granted by Carolus the great king of France, as before, and by Ludouike the second, and by Philip your vncle, and Ludouike and Philip your kinsmen, which priuiledges we haue héere readie to shew. But perhaps you will say, that these things cannot agrée: that the church hath this iurisdiction, both by law, custome, and priuiledge, which all cannot well hang together. For if the church haue it by one of these, it should follow that the church lacketh it by another. But this may I answere two manner of waies: First, that the priuiledge may be double, one as a bringer in of a new law, and thus it cannot be reconciled: the other as a confirmatiue and declaratiue of the old law; and this way it may well be agréed: which distinction may also take place in custome. Wherefore it may thus be answered, that although this iurisdiction is due vnto the church by law, it appertaineth also vnto the same by priuiledge and custome; but yet not by such kind of custome and priuiledge, which inducеth a new law; but which declareth and confirmeth the old law. And if any will replie, demanding wherefore the church of France should more challenge this, then any other churches in other realmes, which haue no such prerogatiue: I can soone answere them. If the kings of France (whom God with singular grace, honor, and priuiledge, farre aboue all other princes, hath blessed and indued them for three speciall causes, to wit, for their great faith and deuotion vnto God, for their honor and reuerence to the church, and for their good iustice shewed vnto the people) haue granted to the church speciall liberties, or haue permitted those which before were granted, peaceable to bée kept and obserued: why then they should haue them, it is no maruell. Yea and further, their deuotion vnto the church hath béen such, that the nérer the churches were vnto them, the more liberties they enioyed: and yet had these princes neuertheless therefore, but rather the more: which is euident, and redoundeth to the great honour and nobilitie both of the king, and his realme.

The French king more bound then other in three things: 1. Faith to God. 2. Honor to the church. 3. Iustice to the people.

I haue oftentimes heard of other, how that foure or fiue things doe especially nobilitate and adorne this realme.

Fiue things doth nobilitate the realme of France.

First, their sincere and inuiolable faith: for it was at no time read, that the kings of France (since the receiuing of the faith) did euer swarue from the same.

Secondly, the nobilitie of blood, which descended from Priamus the king of the Troians, and successiuely from Carolus and other royall kings.

The blood of France came out of Priamus king of Troy.

Thirdly, the vnitie and peace of concord, which especiallie aboue all other raigned and flourished in the realme of France.

Fourthlie, the solemnitie and pompe of the prelats and clergie.

Fiftly, the good disposed readinesse of the barons and subiects to obey.

If therefore the prelats of this realme should not haue this law and priuiledge, but should be depriued thereof; then should the king and his realme lose one of his noble estates, whereby they are highly magnified (I meane the braunerie, solennitie, and royaltie of the prelats). For then, they should not only bée neither pompous nor royall, but more beggerlie and miserable then any other, the most part of their liuing consisting herein. I doe conclude therefore, to bé proued both by diuine law, naturall law, canon law, ciuill law, custome and priuiledge; that the right of determining such temporall matters of the church, may of right appertaine to the church of France: and so I returne the lord Peters theme against himselfe. Besides this, will I propound that which is most plaine and manifest: that whatsoeuer things be offered vp to the church, and are conuerted to the dominion and propertie of the same, bée Gods and appertaine to him: for so much as they are said, to be dedicated and sanctified by him, as sufficiently throughout the Leuites may appeare: as is declared in the 21. cap. 1. regum, concerning the bread offered to God, where it is said: I haue no common bread vnder my hands to eate, but holy bread. Wherefore, it was not lawfull for the laitie to eate of the same bread, but in time of great necessitie: which is also proued in Daniel the fifth chap. where it is read: Because king Balthazar and his lords with his quéene, drunke in the golden and siluer vessels, which his father Nabuchodonoser had taken out of the temple of Jerusalem; in the same verie houre there appeared fingers as it had béen of a mans hand, writing right ouer the candlestick vpon the plaine wall in the kings palace: And the king saw the palme of the hand that wrote, and that which was written was Mane, Thetel, Phares: the interpretation whereof is this, as there it appeareth: Mane, God hath numbred this kingdome and brought it to an end: Thetel, thou art weighed in a balance and art found too light: Phares, thy kingdome is dealt in parts, and giuen to the Medes and Perses. The verie selfesame night was Balthazar the king of the Caldes slaine, and Darius succeeded in the kingdome of the Medes: the Monarchie of the Assyrians being then translated vnto the Medes. Whereby it appeareth, that those things which are offered vp to the church, belong to God, and so dedicated to him, that no lay man may vse them: which if they doe, they must looke to receiue vengeance at Gods hand, as Balthazar did. These things now ended, I will argue out the lord Peters theme (which was) Giue vnto the emperour, that is the emperours, and vnto God, that is Gods. But this iurisdiction, which (as I proued before) is diuerslie conuerted to the dominion and propertie of the French church, is now Gods; and therefore to bée reserued to and by him. Wherefore, whensoeuer anie goeth about to take away the same: the good and godly ought to re-

Obiection.

Iudicium contradictorium.

1. Regal.

Daniel 5.

resiste

Ambrose in calleth to obay the emperour.

were as Ambrose did to the Gothen souldiers sent to him by the emperour, which was to this effect: If the emperour (quoth he) had requested that which had been mine, I would not haue denied him, albeit that whatsoeuer I haue, all is the princes: But because hee demandeth those things which belong to God (wherein hee hath no right or interest) I had rather hee should imprison mee, yea and cut off my head, then to condescend to his request therein: alluding to the historie of Nabaoth, which is to be seene in the 21. chapter, 3. Reg. How Nabaoth the holy man, possessor of his vineyard, was requested by the king to giue vp his vineyard: who made answer, I will not giue vnto thee the inheritance of my fathers: at which answere the king was maruellously offended: wherefore (quoth Ambrose) if Nabaoth would not deliuer his vineyard, shall we deliuer to you the Church of Christ? No, God forbid that I should deliuer you Christs heritage. Nabaoth did not deliuer the vineyard, nor surely will I deliuer Christs Church. And further he addeth a good saying: I can neither diminish, nor adde any thing to the church of God, for that I take not vpon me the charge of keeping it: besides this, it is my duetie and office to consult with the high emperour of saluation, in this matter what is to bee done: and doubtlesse I may not deliuer any thing to him, nor yet hee receiue any thing of me, as is prooued 24. quæstione vltimo capitè conuenior. qui. Wherefore by these and the like reasons it appeareth, that not onelie iurisdiction spirituall (as the Lord Peter falslie hath suggested) doth belong to God: but also, all other kind of iurisdiction whatsoeuer touching the Church: whether it be by law, custome, or priuiledge: insomuch that neither may wee surrender the same to any, nor yet may the king at our hands take the same. Further the Lord Peter affirmed, that Christ for example sake did pay tribute; which is vntrue, as appeareth in Genesis the fortie eight chapter. For the land of priests were free from paying of all kind of toll and tribute. And if the lord Peter well considered the seuenteenth of Matthew, hee should haue found there, how that Christ did not only pay tribute for example sake: but rather prooued, how hee was not bound to pay any at all. To conclude therefore, the children be free: but yee pay, to auoid slander and offence: wherefore the text saith: Lest wee should offend them, goe to the sea, &c. But peraduenture it may bee answered, that by the example of Christ (to auoid offence) yee ought to pay. But this is vntrue, because there is double offence of the weakelings and of the Pharisies: for as concerning the offence of the weaklings, which commeth of ignorance and not of malice, some things are to bee omitted for a time, while they bee better instructed: as the Apostle saith to the Romans in the fourteenth chapter. But for the offence of the Pharisies, which commit and offend of a pretensed malice; there is nothing to be omitted, as Christ saith in Matthew 16. Where to his disciples saying: Doe you not know how that the Pharisies hearing this word are offended? answered: Behold, suffer them, they are blind, and leaders of the blind: For that in the time of Christ, the offence then was of little ones. But now is the offence of the Pharisies: Wherefore, then it was not to bee paid for auoiding of offence: but now not so. Now therefore it is apparant that the third token of the feare of God consisteth in the whole true reuering of goods: And of him, which hath such feare whereby he reuered to God his owne, it is spoken of in Eccle. 15. chap. The seed of the man that feareth God shall bee brought to honour: but the seed which transgresseth the commandement of the Lord shall be shamed. And thus it fully appeareth, how louing feare and obedience is due vnto God, for the excellencie of his maiestie: because the words be: Feare God.

Nabaoth denieth to the king his vineyard.

3. Reg. 21.

Offence how it ought to be auoided.

Rom. 14.

Matth. 16.

The third note of the feare of God.

Eccles. 15.

Secondly I doe say, that especiall honor and reuerence is due vnto the king, for his dignitie sake: which followeth in the theame. Now it is said, Honour the king. I will alleage the 10. of Ecclesiast. where it is specified: In the middest of the brethren, the ruler is holden in honour among them. Wherefore it seemeth to me, y there are 2. kinds of honors, one which proceedeth from the lips, and that is named flatterie, whereof it is spoken in Matth. the 17. chap. This people doth honor mee with their lips, but their hearts are farre from mee. There is another kind of honour which is reall, and commeth from the heart. And this is the very true honor indeed, wherewith the king ought to be honored. But me thinketh that he doth really, and de facto in very deed honor the king; which wisheth and counselleth him, to keepe and do these things, whereby his dominion is beloued, his roialty not diminished, his honor and fame preserued, and his conscience not burthened: and he that perswadeth him contrary to these, I thinke doth not honor the king. To proceed therefore further: I say first, that he doth de facto honor the king, who perswadeth him those things, wherby he may be beloued of his subiects. For a prince ought to studie rather to be beloued, then feared. And what more greater treasure can a prince wish, then to haue the hearts of his subiects? According to the saying of Seneca: The loue of the citizens, is a fortresse inuincible, and a bulwarke not saytable. What thing is more to be wished for? what better then to liue and raigne, euery man willing and reioycing thereof? And in my opinion, there is nothing which causeth more a prince to bee beloued, then if hee keepe and maintaine his ancient liberties, and bring in no alteration: Wherefore it is said in the 22. capter of Prou. Thou shalt not remoue the land markes, which thy forefathers haue set. This place the Lord Peter alleaged to make for himselfe: which I will proue to make against him, and that by this reason, He ought not to transgresse the old limites and bounds which the fathers haue set: For nouitie and alteration doth ingender discord. And for this cause in making of new alterations there ought to be both euident vtilitie, and vrgent necessitie. If therefore the prince will abrogate and take away the liberties granted by his forefathers and predecessours; he shall not be of his Realme beloued, as it appeareth by Roboam in the 11. chapter of the 3. Reg. All which likewise is to be seene in the Chronicles, how that by these meanes many kingdomes and dominions were translated from nation to nation, and from their owne native regiment to the rule of strange people. And now for this time certaine it is, that your grand predecessors Charles the great, Saint Ludouick, Philip the faire, Ludouick and Philip his sonnes, with many others, haue sealed and confirmed this libertie of the Church. Wherefore for a man to counsell and perswade your highnesse to spoile the Church of any thing: it is euen the next way to spoile and vndoe you selfe, and to bereaue you of that, by which your dominion is beloued. And for this cause I thought good to put your grace in remembrance of the 20. of Matthew, where it is written: Remember the workes of your forefathers, which they haue done in their generations, and you shall receiue great glorie and renowme for euer. Note heere your highnesse by the way, how that king Philip grandfather to Saint Lewis, fostered and kept in his realme Saint Thomas archbishop of Canturburie: who for that hee stoutly defended the liberties of his Church, was banished out of England. How much more therefore are you bound to defend and maintaine your owne prelates, in their liberties ratified and confirmed by your graces predecessors, according to the saying of Gregorie in 25. quæst. cap Si. If I should destroy and pull downe those things which my predecessours haue built and ordained, I should not bee called a builder and maker, but iustlie accounted a strop good and puller downe, as the voice of the Lord saith: Euerie kingdome divided within it selfe shall bee confounded: All knowledge and learning diuided one against the other, shall bee destroyed. In another place he saith: It is ouer sharpe, and against all good manner and ciuilitie (vpon what reason and excuse so euer) to breake and subuert those things which are well ordained: or by his example, to teach others at their pleasures to dissolue old constitutions. Marke here a storie about a castle which was giuen to Saint Remige, to the Churches vse, by Clodoup the king, which afterward king Pipine desired to haue by exchange and recouerie. To whom the said Saint Remige appeared in his dreame, and highly blamed him therefore, saying: A better man then thou gaue it mee, and yet wilt thou take it away from me? And with that hee smote him, who the next day was found all blacke. Since which time, no king of France durst euer lie in that Castle. Verily therefore hee doth not honour the king, which giueth him counsell to passe the old limits that his old fathers did set. Yea rather the kings maiestie ought to say vnto them, which is written in Saint John eighth chapter; I do honour and glorifie my Father; that is, in keeping the liberties of the Church, as they did which granted them: but you haue dishonoured mee, in counselling mee that, which seemeth best to please your selues, as it is written in Ecclesiast. 4. The worship of a mans father is his owne worship, and where the father is without honor, it is the dishonour of the sonne.

Honour of the king.

Eccles. 10.

Two kinds of honors. Matth. 17.

Double honor, with lips and with heart.

A prince rather to be beloued then feared.

Seneca de clemētia ad Neronem. Sentence.

In alteration what is to be considered.

Prouerb. 22.

3. Reg. 11.

Matth. 20.

25. Quæst. 2. cap. Si.

Marke heere a fable.

A dreaming fable.

Iohn 8.

Eccles. 4.

Secondly I say, that hee truelie doth honour the king, who counselleth him: whereby his power and dignitie is not diminished. For as it is great honour to the kings highnesse to encrease and augment his power: so is it as much dishonour for him to diminish any iot thereof. And therefore, the Emperours were wont to call themselues victorious, of augmenting and encreasing their common wealth. And to say that you and your predecessors could not grant these things to the Church, it were too too absurd, and to the too much derogation of your Maiesties most honorable estate. And therefore you (most soueraigne Lord) who hold and possesse so ample right and title in the realme of France, both by election and inheritance; not to grant and leaue this to your posteritie, it were to the great debasing of your maiesties honour, crowne and dignitie. Yea if it were (as God forbid) it would follow, that your predecessors liued continuallie in sinne: yea and further, it were as much to say (which were too vile) that blessed S. Lewis, by whom all France is beautified, could not be iustly canonized.

For as the Lord speaker declared, if he toke his oth at his coronation both to alienate nothing, and also to cal in that which was before alienated, which is inseparable from the crowne: it should follow that he was forsworne, and consequently committed deadly sin, & so could neuer be canonized, which is too too absurd to bee talked of. And if replie be made, that hee might haue repented: It is soone to bee answered: That his sinne is read of, but of his repentance it is not found, as it is said of Salomon Salomon. But put case it be true that the lord Peter said, then it must nedes follow, that your grace could bestow nothing, neither countrie, town, nor tower. And yet there be few, which willinglie would not receiue them, notwithstanding their allegiance and homage, which they pretend to your highnesse. Keepe therefore and confirme (most renowned prince) that which was granted by your noble progenitors: otherwise, your royall honor shall decrease, that it may bee verified in you which is read of, in the 11. to the Rom. I will honor my ministerie. Rom.11.

Thirdly, I doe affirme, that hee rightfullie honoreth the king, which perswadeth him that, whereby his honor and renowne is preserued. For in matters of weight, and of great importance, next after conscience wee must haue regard to name and fame, as it is written in the 22. of Prou. It is better to haue a good name, then riches. A good name farre passeth all things, and is aboue siluer and gold. And Saint Augustine saith, two things are necessarie for thee, conscience and name: Conscience for God, and name for thy neighbour. And therefore it is written in the 4. chapt. of Eccle. Labour to get a good name, for that will continue surer by thee, then a M. great treasures of gold. A good life hath a number of daies. Which renowne and name, the Lord (who annointed your grace with the oile of gladnesse) hath in so little time more abundantlie blessed you withall, then any other prince; wherfore you ought to be more vigilant and carefull, how to keepe and enioy the same still: For it is no lesse vertue, to keepe that which is gotten, then to seeke and get: whereby not onely while you liue, but also when you are dead, your glorious renowne may liue for euer: yea and farther, that by you nothing be done, whereby any blot or foile should creep into that your so great renowne: alluding that to your grace, which is said in the tenth of the Prouerbs, &c. The memoriall of the iust shall haue good report, &c. Beware therefore most noble prince, and take heed that in your daies and time, the liberties of the Church bee not taken away (which God forbid) or diminished in any iot. For if your glorious name should be blotted therewith, there be thousands, which would chronicle the same to perpetuall memorie. Wherfore most Christian prince, if such (as trusted after their death for no other life, but onelie for fame and renowne) liued a life most godly and vertuous: how much more ought we Christians, which looke after another life, by our well doings heere, to win vs a perpetuall name and memorie after our death? And you besides, if you should dishonour your name and fame; what a matter were it? considering how the kings of France, were euer counted the most christian princes, and most bountifull towards the Church, giuing examples to other princes, how to enrich their churches and liberties therof. And now especiallie, if your grace, the church in some places being in great persecution (which God forbid) should shew light to other to pull and take away that which was giuen by your forefathers to the Church; what might the world say? For then by the like reason, might the Emperour depriue the church of all, which was giuen to it by Constantine the emperour. Also other kings would doe the like in their realmes. God forbid that your highnesse should giue such example. And for my part, I would rather wish my selfe to bee dead, then giue you such counsell, that in so pernicious and naughtie a matter, you should bee example to other: especiallie, when the kings of France your predecessors, were defenders alwaies against such as went about to take away the liberties from the church: which is the office of a king. Hieronymus saith vpon Jeremie, which is found also in the 24. quæst. 5. cap. Regnum & C. princeps, after this manner: Let the princes of the world know and vnderstand, how they are bound to make an account to God for the church which they take vpon them to keep. Note you also, and reade some examples out of stories and Commentaries, what regard the kings of France had in obseruing those things; and see you by their example, to follow and doe the like: and then shall it bee verified in your grace, which is written in the 37. chapter of Eccle. A wise man shall obtaine honour amongst his people: As also in the third of the same: Hee that honoureth his mother, is like one that gathereth treasure together.

Who honoreth the king.

Prou.22.

Conscience and good name.

Eccles.4.

24.q.5.cap. Regnum.

Eccles.37. Eccles.3.

Fourthly I say, that he indeed doth honour the king, which perswadeth him to doe that whereby his conscience is not hurt. For aboue all things a Christian man ought to beware how to doe that thing, which should bee a grudge vnto his conscience, because the life is more then is meat: Mat. the 6. chap. And assuredlie I beleeue, that your grace would not commit that thing willingly, wherewith your conscience should bee burdened, for all the worlds good: and that iustlie. For the more miraculouslie God hath called your highnes to ỹ state of a K. and hath endued you with his grace: so much the more care ought you to haue, and take heed that you offend him not. Nor is it to be doubted, whether in doing the contrary, hee will not bee the more grieuouslie displeased with you, as hee was with Saul, 1. King. chap. 15. Consider therefore most soueraigne Lord, that at what time you were crowned, you sware onelie these things following, and no other. First, that you would defend and maintaine the canonical law, priuiledge and iustice, granted to the bishops and the church: and as much as in you did lie, to enlarge and amplifie the same. Also that by your arbitrement, all christian people at all times should keepe the true peace of God and his Church. Also that you should forbid to all nations, all kind of sacrileges, spoilings, and iniquities. Also that in all kind of iudgements, you should will and command equitie and mercie. Also that throughout your whole territorie and iurisdiction, you should sincerely with all your endeuour, studie to exterminate and rut off from the Church, the noted heretickes: which all, and no other, your maiestie sware to fulfill, at the time of your Coronation: vnder the leaue and correction of the Lord Peter, which affirmed you were sworne to none other thing besides. Now therefore, seeing it is a canonicall priuiledge of the Church, and in the heart of the whole Cano. 6. qu. 1. Quicunque item habens, incorporate: when also by custome which is canonicall, it came in, that the church and spiritualtie, may haue cognition in a number of cases, against which diuers articles haue been here laid in: If this amongst the laitie should not bee obserued in the church, your graces conscience thereby might somewhat bee burdened. In like manner, if you be bound with all your whole might and power to procure, that all whole Christendome should keepe the true peace of God and his church: much more haue you to procure the same amongst your owne Barons and people, who euermore were all one with the Church. And alwaies where any Church was in honor and estimation, there were belonging to it, twentie stout barons and knights: whose office, as it was to defend the Church, so was it the part of the Church to pray for them, and to offer sacrifice for them vnto God. And to this end, that blessed S. Lewes so much laboured in his time: who when the greatest barons of his realme had confederate to suppresse these liberties of the Church, and had consulted to giue him (to that end) the hundreth part of their goods, would neuer condescend thereunto, but alwaies dissuaded them therefrom: and finallie by his authoritie, sealed and confirmed these liberties of the Church. Consider heere your maiestie, how that pope Innocentius at that time proceeded against those Barons, &c. I dare be bold to say, that if there should be now dissension betweene the prelates and barons: it would not bee long before the communaltie would vsurpe to rule and beare domination. As by experience it hath been seene in many places, and likewise by practise wee of late time might haue seene: at what time the people Romaking the spiritualty in the parts of Campania and Burgundie, at last rose and made in euery towne a king; and therewithall caused the officers which brought citations and absolutions, from the pope and other, to be well banged: and not long after, made insurrection against the lords temporall, and serued them with the like sauce: vntill that by the kings power they were suppressed, & many of them hanged. And this doubtlesse was in the daies of Lewes last king of that name. Truelie the noble men ought not to bee grieued with that that the Church is possessed withall. For that there be few of them, who haue not their brothers and kinsfolks, which liue and are maintained by the goods and reuenues of the Church. Amongst whom if they should diuide their inheritance, perhaps they would bring a little to nothing at all. Let the barons also consider how that there are but few, which beleeue not in the church. For the Church is one, as in the first of Canticum; My Doue and dearling is one. Wherefore without great perill of transgression can they not persuade and counsell such liberties of the church to be abrogated and taken away.

The 4. honouring of the king

Matth.6.

1.King.15.

The oth of the French kings.

Arg. by the possessions of the church many brethren and kinsmen of the nobles be maintained.

Ergo, such possessions are not to be grudged at.

To beleeue in the Church, is not in our fault.

That therefore your Maiesties conscience may remaine pure and immaculate: pleaseth it your highnesse by your authoritie, to seale and confirme this good ancient and Canonicall priuiledge. And contrary attempts, (if any be made by way of proclamation or otherwise) to reuoke and call them in. And further, to keepe your mother the church of France in her ancient franke choice, libertie, and customs. And then by you in all things God shall bee glorified and honoured: to whom be honour and glorie for euer and euer, Amen. Who then will honour you, as is said, 1. Reg. 21. Whosoeuer shall honor me, I will crowne him with that glorie, in which consisteth the true honor, and is granted to none vnworthie. Whereunto also none is admitted but worthie, as blessed Saint Austen saith: which honor, grant he vnto you and vs, who is blessed world without end, Amen. And because a bill of many articles was exhibited, whereof part did infringe the whole ecclesiasticall iurisdiction: to the defence therof, we will according to the fourth chapter of Ecclesiasticus stand euen to the death. where it is said: For the truth striue thou vnto ỹ death, and God shal fight for thee against thine enemies. Some other of them containe onely abuse, which we beleeue none such to be. But if there be, we will see redresse therein. Therefore for the honour of God, for the vnburdening of our consciences, for the kings maiesties reuerence, and for the peoples profit and peace: All wee here assembled, haue concluded to see remedie, that the aforesaid abuses, if any such be, shall be left. to the quietnesse of the people, and praise of almightie God. To whom be honor and glorie world without end, Amen.

1. Reg. 21.

To the bill of articles exhibited.

Another sitting in the parliament.

The next Friday following, being the 29. of December, the

Another daies sitting in the parliament.

the prelats assembled themselues againe together at the kings palace in Paris, where the reuerend father the lord Peter Bertrand, by Gods permission bishop of Eduen, spake openly there before the king, sitting with his counsellors and Barons about him: taking to his theame that which is written in the 18. of Genesis, O Lord bee not angrie, that I speake yet more, &c. The which he applied to this end: that for the maiesty of the king, the prudencie of his counsell, and insufficiencie of himselfe (considering the weightines of the cause) hee trembled and was afraid to speake: yet neuertheless, trusting vpon his accustomed clemencie, toke to him audacity, and presumed that which was appointed to him by the prelats. Beginning with the 89. psalme: Lord thou art our refuge, &c. Which hee prosecuted in extolling the king his person, and his miraculous attaining to the crowne of France: preaching further, how he ought to be the champion and defender of the faith: all which he proued in few words by many reasons and authorities. Afterward, he touched those propositions which were propounded by the foresaid lord Peter of Cugner, and for no other only cause as he protested, but to informe the conscience of his soueraigne lord and king, and to aduise his grace concerning the same: Not going about to make any finall iudgement, determination, or answer, whereby either sentence, order, statute, right to any man, or other processe, might thereof ensue or bee grounded. And namelie he first beginning with the theame of the lord Peter: first affirmed (Render vnto the Emperour, which is the Emperours, and vnto God which is his; Mark. 12.) By which words was signified the obedience and subiection to the king, with the difference of the spiritualtie from the temporaltie; whereof the first member is proued by the 1. Peter 2. Where it is said; Be yee subiect to euery humane creature, &c. Also by the Cap. solite, extra. de maio. & ob. And by the c. nouit extra, de iudicijs cap. de sacerdotibus 10. q. 1. with the notes about the same. Moreouer, as touching the distinction of both iurisdictions: whereof the lord Peter proued the temporall iurisdiction to pertaine to secular men, the spirituall to the clergie, by the words of our Sauiour Christ, Luk. 22. where he said: Behold two swords. Also for that Christ did pay tribute; Teaching thereby, how that the temporalties were to be reserued to the temporall men: Mat. 17. 11. q. ca. Si tribut. ca. Magnum.

Bishop of Eduen again speaketh.

Matth. 2. Mark 12.

In like manner by the law of Iustinian, where it is written, that two great gifts were ordained and granted of God: a bishoprick, and a kingdome: The first, to beare rule ouer Gods matters, the other ouer worldlie things, &c. And said moreouer, that these two be the cases which in no wise could be altered or changed. Prou. 20. de Tionmo. lib. 1. & vlt. And affirmed also, that of such princely right, the king could not abrogate and depriue himselfe. For that it was imprescriptible, appertaining to the crowne and his regall seat, (considering how hee toke his oth at the time of his coronation) not only not to breake or alienate the lawes of his realme, but also to restore and reuoke such as were broken and alienated. To which these his reasons it was answered, that the iurisdiction and determination of ciuill causes (whereabout the controuersie now standeth) belongeth to the church, both by Gods law and mans law. By Gods law it proued was, euen from Adams time to Christs comming: per Innoc. ca. licet extra de foro, compe. And from Christs comming, to Peters time and his successors. 22. di. c. omnes patriarchæ. Math. cap. 16. But how the church in the realmes of catholike princes, attained vnto this right and interest which at this present it doth enioy, the law proueth: 2. q. ca. 5. Si quis. Presbyter. 11. q. 1. Relatum 25. dist. Ecce. Which also is confirmed by the emperors in the bodie of the law, ff. 3. ¶ Si causam. col. 9. 23. q. vlt. c. his, & a quibus. The canon furthermore teacheth, how that S. Peter commanded all the princes of the earth and others, to obay and giue place to the bishops: c. omnes, extra. de maior. & ob. 16. dist. duo sunt. Wherefore it was concluded, that in no wise this right is to bee separated and taken away from the church. And albeit in the realmes of tyrannous princes, this state of the church is violated and not kept: yet in this blessed realme of France, it hath been alwaies euen to these daies dulie obserued: c. nouit. extra. de iudicijs. This iurisdiction, the lawes of Theodosius the emperour and Carolus the great, hath also confirmed: extra. de iudicijs. c. nonne. all. 11. q. 1. quæcunque, &c. fe. iurisdictio. c. expresse. Where it is mentioned, that the same Carolus king of France (and emperour) especiallie constituted the said law. And likewise to speake of custome, it hath been knowne from time out of mind, the same to haue belonged to the church of France: He therefore which shall go about to violate this law, committeth sacrilege, 11. q. 1. ca. 1. & 2. And let not the kings maiestie maruell, if that in this most noble realme of France this prerogatiue bee due vnto the church: As when hereby, his power and nobilitie is beautified. Anth. vt iud. sine quoquo suffra. fi. in principio Col. 2. Besides this, our soueraigne lord the king, at what time he was crowned, was sworne by the Euangelists to keepe and obserue this canonicall priuiledge of the church. Further, the Barons who in a manner are all sworne to the church, swore fidelitie to the same: by which oth of fidelitie, they are bound to keepe these liberties and rights of the church. When therefore euery oth which tendeth not to the perdition of the soule, is to be kept: a fortiori that oth which is taken in the fauour of the church, is much more to be obserued: c. Si vero extra. de iure iurando. 22. quæst. 4. c. vlt. Besides this, blessed Ludouicke, Philip of Arragon, Philip the faire, Ludouicke, Carolus the great, and Philip; confirmed these priuiledges, customes, and liberties of the Church, which all were sworne at their coronations, as before, &c. These things considered, who can aduise the kings maiestie without damning of his owne soule, contrarie to these liberties granted and so confirmed to the Church? To whom belongeth great reward, whosoeuer bestoweth any thing vpon the Church: Antho. de non alie. at permut. re. ecce: § si minis col. 3. Neither maketh it against vs where it is said, that there are two swords, &c. Neither yet the distinction betweene the bishoprick and kingdome. Because it is true that there are two swords, the power whereof is left to the Churches hand, although the execution of the materiall sword is committed to the temporall and secular men: Matth. 26. where Christ saith to Peter: Conuert and put vp thy sword into the place. But as touching the distinction betwixt the bishoprick and kingdome, indeed it is true, almuch as appertaineth to the end and to the execution of bloud, but not concerning the beginning and subiect: for that in one subiect, both the powers are, may be, and ought to be, as is before proued. To that point where it is said that Christ paied tribute: it is answered, that not therefore he paid it, because hee ought or was bound thereunto: because it is certainelie true, that the sonnes of the king (as he was) ought not to pay; but this hee did to auoid offence: yea also the clergie is not bound hereunto, Esdræ 1. & vlt. Wherefore, such things doe not inferre a consequence. Neither yet maketh that against vs where it is said: that the king our soueraigne lord and maister cannot abdicate from himselfe this right, especiallie for that he was sworne thereunto at the time of his coronation, &c. For it is answered, that he may well abdicate the same. And how doth hee abdicate the same from himselfe, which he giueth and bestoweth to God and the church? The land is the lords. And doubtlesse, to giue, is nothing else, but to render to God and the church their owne: for then by that reason, the gift giuen to the Church by Constantine is naught and nothing worth; which is false: and this is proued 16. dist. ca. Const. Wherby it appeareth, that an Emperour and king may alienate things of the empire: ff. de legatis i. l. apud Iulianum § vlt. nor yet hereby the empire or kingdome is damaged: for that the thing returneth to the pristinat state, ff. de pactis l. vnus § pactus 35. dist. ab exordio. Furthermore, by this reason propounded, all the kings of France which euer were (and especiallie blessed Ludouicke) should bee spotted: for if that were true (as God forbid) then all they were periured and died in mortall sinne, which is too too absurd. Last of all, it hurteth not where it is said: that such things are imprescriptible. It is true indeed, they cannot of subiects, or otherwise then of the Church bee prescribed: but in this cause wee talke not of subiects. Also seeing they may bee alienated, they may bee prescribed, especiallie (the kings thus consenting, who confirmed the same so long a time) which excludeth all right both fiscall and Ecclesiasticall. The prelats therefore all with one consent, agree and affirme to the same as a veritie to bee maintained and defended. Beseeching the kings maiestie their lord, both for his soules health, and peace of the Church, to maintaine the same, and keeping the liberties of the Church. Desiring him to consider what commoditie daily hee receiueth by the church, and that his church neuer failed him yet, when he had need of the lattie, shewing the dangers and examples of them who did to the contrary. Further, hee beseeched his highnesse to weigh how entirely his lord the pope doth and hath loued his person and realme: Affirming, that neuer any placed in the seat of Peter, loued better his realme, then hee doth. Alleaging the text of Eccl. 6. where it is said: Stand in the multitude of the priests, and beleeue them with thy heart.

22. q. 4. cap. Si vero.

Matth. 26.

Why Christ paied tribute.

Eccles.

After this in the said session, the foresaid bishop of Eduen prolocutor inferred many things beside, and answered particularlie to the articles aboue specified, and exhibited by the lord Peter in writing to the king and parliament. Which, because they touch more the subtiltie of the law and stiles of the courts, then are necessarie to this our historie, and because we would not burden the volume withal, containing no great profit in them, we haue heere of purpose for breuities sake omitted them, passing to the next sitting, which was the next friday next following the same, as ensueth.

Speciall answeres to the articles premised by bishop Eduen.

The next Friday after this, the prelats assembled at Micenas before the king, to heare their answer: where, the foresaid lord Peter of Cugner (being prolocutour for the king) spake on this wise, taking for his theame: I am peace vnto you, do not feare, &c. Which he prosecuted, monishing that they should not bee troubled in any thing that there had been spoken. For that the intent and mind of the soueraigne lord their king was, to keepe the rites of the Church and prelats, which they had by law and by good and reasonable custome: Where, betweene the first and second conclusion, he went about to proue, that the cognition of ciuill causes ought not to appertaine to the Church: For that such things were temporall and ought to pertaine to the temporaltie, as spirituall things to the spiritualtie

Another daies sitting in the parliament.

11. q. 1. cap. 1. & 2.

16. Dist. cap. Constantinus.

35. Dist. cap. ab exordio.

86. Dist. cap. rum ad verum. Shauing of priests crownes wherefore, 12. quest. 2.

altie. And besides his other reasons he alleaged the 86. dist. declaring for a truth, that for this intent first the clerks crowns were shauen; in signe that they should be free from all worldlinesse, and forsake all temporall things. Alleaging to that end the 12. q. 2. Furthermore hee declared, that the bishops had cognition in certaine cases expressed by law. Wherefore, these said cases, ministred a certaine rule against them, alleaging for the proofe thereof, De reg. iuris ff. de lega. 1. L. ticie textoris. Also hee affirmed, that by reason of sinne, the decretall Nouit. could not make for them. For the same did speake of the king of France his state, which hath no superiour: but in other persons it was (hee said) otherwise. And these things thus being proued, then said hee, and concluded: That neuertheless, their lord and king was readie to heare the information of them, which would instruct him of any custome: and those customes which were good and reasonable hee would obserue. Which answer, because it did not seeme to please and suffice the prelates, incontinently the bishop Eduen answered for them all in manner following: First, commending the good and generall answer, he spake in this wise: The prince of the people (said he) shall be praised, for the prudence of his talke, commending therewith as touching the former good generall answer of the king, his purpose and talke propounded. But as concerning the words of the lord Peter, which engendred and brought darkenesse and obscuritie, and might giue occasion to their temporall lords, to breake and infringe the rites and customes of the church: Wherefore his answer seemed not full and plaine to the prelats. Speaking moreouer to the said Peter, hee alluded to the words of the Virgin speaking in the Scripture thus to her sonne: Sonne why did you so to vs? And so prosecuted the same, both maruelling with himselfe, and yet couertly complaining of his answere. Afterward answering to those things which the lord Peter affirmed, and first to the chapter, Ad verum, he said, that it was before answered, touching the diuision of the two iurisdictions, that they may be in one subiect as before is proued. Neither doth let it which the lord Peter said, these two iurisdictons could not be in one subiect, because that things which be in themselues diuers, and be vnder one Genus, as a man and an asse, cannot bee in one subiect. But if they were vnder diuers kinds, as whitenesse and sweetnesse in milke, they might be well in one subiect. It was answered, that this rule was not true: because iustice and temperance are two diuers vertues, and vnder one kind, and yet be in one subiect. Besides these differing species, a man and an asse be not compatible in one subiect. Also to that which was spoken concerning the shauing of the crowne, it was answered, that the crowne did betoken rule and excellencie: and the shauing did signifie, that they ought not to heape vp store of temporall things, so to applie their hearts thereunto. But that the temporall things ought to be subiect to them, and not they to the temporaltie, as is proued in the said chapter, duo sunt genera. Also as concerning the thing, which was talked of de regula: he answereth, that this maketh for the church, as before was proued: yea also, the custome doth make the rule for the church. Also laws in al kind of sense doe alwaies except the custome. And therfore, his saying makes nothing against it. And now to that place which the lord Peter spake about the decretall Nouit. That the case was onely in the kings person, yet for all that it is expressly said in the same text of euery christian man. And although their law doth speake onelie of the pope, yet the same is applied to all bishops in their dioces.

The bishop findeth fault with the kings answere.

Wherefore the said bishop concluded and beseeched the king that it would please his grace to giue vnto them a more plaine and comfortable answere: and that they might not depart from his presence all pensiue and sad, whereby occasion might be giuen to the lattie to impugne the rites and liberties of the church: And that they doubted nothing hereof in the good nature and conscience of their soueraigne lord and king. In the end it was answered to them in the behalfe of the king, that his mind and intent was not to impugne the customes of the church.

The gentle answere of the king to the bishops.

The Sunday following the bishops assembled themselues againe before the king at Vicenas, where the lord bishop of Eduen repealed their last supposition, with the last answer made vnto them in the behalfe by the king, when the bishop of Byturien had giuen them to vnderstand how the king willed them not to feare: For that they should suffer no hinderance or damage in his time, yea and would defend them in their rights and customes, because it should not be said that he would giue ensample to other to impugne the church, assuring them, that euen the kings grace him willed so to declare vnto them. The said lord bishop of Senon in the name of the whole prelates gaue humble thankes to the king therefore, and the said bishop of Senon beseeched that such proclamations which were made to the preiudice of the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, might be repealed, and called in. Hereunto the king himselfe answereth with his owne mouth, that they were not published at his commandement, neither did hee know of them, nor ratifie them. Thirdlie, the bishop proposed that those abuses which the temporaltie complained of, should be so ordered and reformed, that euery man should bee well contented therewith. Last of all, he beseeched the kings highnes, that he would of his gracious goodnesse giue them a more comfortable and fuller answer. Then answered the lord Peter in the name of the king: That if the prelats and bishops would ses reformation of those things which were to be amended (whereabouts he would take respite betweene this and Christmas next following) his grace would innouate nothing in the meane season. And if in the foresaid space they would not correct and reforme that which was amisse, his maiestie would appoint such order and remedie, that should be acceptable both to God and his subiects. After this, the prelats had leaue of the king to depart and went home.

The finall answere of the king to the prelates.

A briefe recapitulation of the bishops answere, with certaine notes answering to his popish reasons vnto the reader.

Notes vpon the bishops answere pag. 330. col. 2.

THe answer of bishop Eduen in the name of the other prelats, to the oration and articles before obiected by the lord Peter, consisteth in two parts. First, in declaring the feare due to God. Secondly, the honour due to the king. Whereof the first is, the feare of God (he saith) consisteth in three things. 1. In giuing to God. 2. In honouring his ministers. 3. In restoring that which hath been taken away, &c. The 2. which is, the honouring of the king, he saith, consisteth in a double sort, that is: In words only, wherein is flatterie: And in deed: which againe he diuideth into 4. members: First, when a man counselleth a king to that whereby his dominion his loued. 2. When the king is counselled to that whereby his honour and excellency is not diminished. 3. Thirdly, when the king is counselled to that, wherby his fame and renowne is maintained. 4. Fourthly, when a king is counselled to that, wherby his conscience is not wounded, &c. And this is the order of his whole tractation. Now remaineth with like breuitie to recite the reasons and arguments in order, wherby he proueth the premisses, with the subdiuision of euery member and part thereof. Wherein the studious reader may note both the subtile proceedings of these popish prelats, and also the feeble & impotent ground wherupon they build. Whose building (as by this discourse and many other may appeare) wholly and finally tendeth to this, to maintaine their liberties, pompe, and estimation aboue all other secular princes and persons.

Feare of God consisting in three things. 1. In giuing. 2. In honoring. 3. In restoring.

Honour to the king, double.

In word flattering, in deed effectuall.

Honour effectuall standeth in foure points. 1. In maintaining the kings loue. 2 In maintaining his dignitie. 3. In maintaining his good name. 4. In maintaining his conscience.

First, as concerning feare to be giuen to God, which hee diuideth into three parts, in giuing, in honoring, and restoring: for the first, hee prooueth that princes ought to giue largelie and without measure to the church by these arguments.

Pa. 327. col. 1.

